No Paths Are Bound

Posted originally on the Archive of Our Own at http://archiveofourown.org/works/34816549.

Rating:
Explicit

Archive Warning:
Graphic Depictions Of Violence

Category:
M/M

Fandom:
天官赐福 - 墨香铜臭 | Tiān Guān Cì Fú - Mòxiāng Tóngxiù

Relationships:
Hua Cheng/Xie Lian (Tian Guan Ci Fu), Feng Xin/Mu Qing (Tian Guan Ci Fu), Pei Ming/Shi Wudu, He Xuan/Shi Qingxuan, Ling Wen/Yushi Huang

Characters:
Hua Cheng (Tian Guan Ci Fu), Xie Lian (Tian Guan Ci Fu), Feng Xin (Tian Guan Ci Fu), Mu Qing (Tian Guan Ci Fu), Bai Wuxiang, Xiè Lián's Parents, Wu Ming, Jun Wu (Tian Guan Ci Fu), Qi Rong (Tian Guan Ci Fu), Láng Yíng (Tiān Guān Cì Fú), Original Characters, Mei Nianqing, Pei Ming (Tian Guan Ci Fu), Ling Wen (Tian Guan Ci Fu), Shi Wudu, Shi Qingxuan, He Xuan (Tian Guan Ci Fu), Wei Ying | Wei Wuxian, Lang Qianqiu, Quan Yizhen, Yin Yu (Tian Guan Ci Fu), Ban Yue (Tian Guan Ci Fu), Lan An (Modao Zushi), Lan An's Cultivation Partner (Modao Zushi), Jiang Chi (Modao Zushi), Pei Su (Tian Guan Ci Fu), Shen Yuan | Shen Qingqiu, Yushi Huang, Heaven's Eye (Tian Guan Ci Fu)

Additional Tags:
Basically a retelling of the novels, Hurt/Comfort, Horror Elements, Internalized Homophobia, Hong-er plays a much bigger role earlier on, major novel spoilers, Mentions of sex work, Very minor fenglian, Graphic Violence, Torture, Suicide Attempt, Implied/Referenced Suicide, Fan art included in chapters, when I say slow burn i mean 65k words in u get (1) smooch, implied sexism and abuse of power, mdzs references all over the place, basically everyone falls in love with Xie Lian at one point or another, Yin Yu needs to unionize against Hua Cheng’s capitalist oppression, Implied Sexual Content, gender fluid characters, Cunnilingus (Beefleaf),

Vaginal Sex (beefleaf), sexual assault (not of a main character), Domestic Violence, Demisexuality, Edgeplay (accidental), References to SVSSS, implied childhood sexual abuse (not of a main character), Hand Jobs, Anal Sex, Oral Sex, Pregnancy (not of main characters)

Language:
English

Series:
Part 1 of MXTX - Retellings, Part 1 of No Paths Are Bound + Extras

Stats:
Published: 2022-04-13 Completed: 2022-09-08 Words: 1,158,737
Chapters: 152/152

No Paths Are Bound

by Cataclysmic_Calamity

Summary

Xie Lian found something in himself that he thought was gone—worn away with every mistake he had made.

Faith.

His arms opened, and the child was hesitant—but eventually, he fell into them, his body trembling with silent sobs.

"I remember you," he whispered again, voice breaking as Hong-er clung to him.

I remember you.

I remember you.

I will always, for as long as I live, remember you.

(A re-telling of TGCF where Xie Lian has his cursed shackle placed in his eyes, blinding him. And yet, through all of his struggles; there is always someone watching over him.)

(MULTIPLE TRANSLATIONS AVAILABLE)

Notes

This is, once again, a story that started as a thread fic on twitter—if you want to keep up with current updates, you can find me on @cataclysmicevie !

- Translation into Português brasileiro available: No Paths Are Bound [Tradução Pt-Br] HIATUS by AceSpadey
- Translation into Українська available: Й ти не звідаєш перепон (No Paths Are Bound/UA/UKR) by seishei
- Translation into Polski available: No Paths Are Bound [tłumaczenie PL] by Leanaz
- Translation into Français available: No Paths Are Bound (FR) by HuaHuaChengCheng
- Translation into Español available: No Paths Are Bound (Español) by Islaofnofucksgiven

- Translation into Русский available: Никакие Запреты Неведомы (No Paths Are Bound) by Lissaart, WitchDiff
- Translation into Türkçe available: No Paths Are Bound || Türkçe Çeviri by essizSalatalik
- Translation into Italiano available: Nessun Percorso È Vincolato (No Paths Are Bound) by Paradise_sky

Table Of Contents / Disclaimers / Additional Information

Chapter Summary

> Given the length and breadth of this story, an informational chapter seems necessary. This will explain what the story is, how it works, as well as give you helpful information as you navigate the fic. You don't have to read, it is skippable, but may be helpful.
>
> This has three Sections:
>
> Frequently Asked Questions
>
> Table of Contents
>
> Spotify Playlists

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

FOREWORD

I know this informational chapter can seem like a little bit much, but with how long this work is (and the limitations placed on tags by Archive of Our Own), it's necessary to make sure people know exactly what they are getting into before they read this story! First, I want to say thank you for stopping by! While this has become my most popular work, I certainly don't take any readers for granted, and I'm grateful to anyone who takes the time to read this monstrosity! Second, while I am aware that this story has become widely read across the TGCF fandom, I do ask people to remember that this was written in ten months, while I was in university. I am not a professional, and while I worked very hard on this story and am proud of it, it is not perfect. I humbly ask that anyone who reads it manage their expectations accordingly. This was a labor of love, done with the utmost respect to MXTX and the beautiful story they created. Even if you do not read the subsequent FAQ, I ask that anyone who reads this understand that this story is not a supplement or a replacement to the canon storyline, it is a love letter to it. Thank you again for stopping by, and I hope you enjoy the story.

By Heaven Official's Blessing, No Paths Are Bound!

Evie

FREQUENTLY ASKED QUESTIONS:

Is this a fan translation of Tiān Guān Cì Fú?

No. This is not a fan translation, and this should not be considered canon to TGCF. This story re-tells the events of TGCF with elements of canon divergence, and should be treated as a canon AU.

Can I read this story without having read the novels?

That is not recommended. This story covers most of the canon timeline, but it does so in a different order. We pick up from Book Four, and use a linear timeline rather than the novel's flashback system. If you begin this story without having read the novels, you will spoil yourself for most of book four. Also, while most of the fic still uses exposition and explains lore, there are some canon events that are not explained in the story, presuming that you have already read the novels. This will lead to confusion. Furthermore, this story expands heavily on canon lore and inserts new characters, and if you have not read the books, the canon and non canon elements will confuse you.

> PLEASE NOTE: I read the novels prior to the official english translation through Seven Seas, so when I say Book Four, I am referring to the original Web Novels, of which there are five. If you are judging by the English translation volumes, you should wait until at least Vol. 6 of the Seven Seas release in order to avoid spoilers for the fourth arc of the series. This story goes in chronological order, so after that point has been passed, you will be spoiler free up until the arc that is going to be covered in Seven Seas volumes 7-8, but this arc is highly canon divergent in this story and holds very few similar plot points.

Can I read this story without reading Mó Dào Zǔ Shī?

Yes. There are no spoilers from Mó Dào Zǔ Shī in this story. That being said, it does include quite a bit of lore from MDZS. However, you do not have to read MDZS to understand this lore, it will be explained within this story. There are also allusions to SVSSS, but beyond understanding the basic premise of that series, you do not need to know anything else.

Can I print/book bind this story?

Yes. You may print or book bind a copy to have at home, but it may not be used for commercial profit.

Can I translate this story?

If it is credited and I have given you permission, then yes.

Can I create fan content inspired by this story, and if so, can I have it included in the fic?

Yes. I am extremely flattered whenever anyone makes additional content from my writing, and as long as I am credited I do not mind. This includes any form of creative content. If you write a fic inspired by this one and would like it to be listed as a related work, as long as it's clearly derived from this story, it will be approved! I also allow inclusion of my original characters in fan art and stories, as long as it's credited. I also try to link as much fan art inspired by this story within the fic as I can, but I only do so if I have your written permission as the artist. I have had people express that they would like to share fanart from this story but do not have a twitter. If you prefer another platform but would still like to have your artwork included, feel free to leave a link in the comments, or reach out to me at cataclysmiceve1@gmail.com, and I am happy to work with you! It's always an honor to know my writing inspired someone else's creativity, and I'm always happy to celebrate other creators when possible!

Are all of the relationships tagged prevalent in the story?

Hualian is the central couple of this story. However, a significant amount of time is spent focusing and expanding on other characters and relationships. Beefleaf and PeiShui get a lot of screen time once we move into content from Book One onward. FengQing is also prevalent throughout the story. LingHuang does not become relevant until later, but all of these side couples play serious roles within the story, they have their own arcs and individual scenes, and they are not only mentioned briefly, hence why those relationships are tagged.

Should I be concerned about the sexual assault related tags?

This story heavily discusses themes of grooming, child abuse, and sexual assault. There are scenes that depict sexual assault. However, these scenes are always warned for ahead of time within the beginning notes of each chapter, and you do not need to read them to understand the story. There is also a scene where, involving a relationship that has themes of dubious consent, the sex results in a pregnancy (this does not happen to Hualian.) If I ever fail to tag something appropriately, please tell me in the comments and I will adjust. It's important to me to make this story as accessible as possible for anyone who wants to take the time to read it! Furthermore, neither Xie Lian nor Hua Cheng are sexually assaulted in this story, nor do they experience Childhood Sexual Abuse, these events are experienced by other characters within the story.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

(Offset count by 1 for informational chapter)

Book Four Content (Seven Seas Vol. 6) : Chapters 1 - 13

The 800 Year Gap: Chapters 14 - 39

Book One Content (Seven Seas Vol. 1) : Chapters 40 - 62

Book Two Content (Seven Seas Vol. 2) : Chapters 63 - 65

Book Three Content (Seven Seas Vol. 3-6) : Chapters 66 - 112

Interlude: Chapters 113 - 115

Book Five Content (Seven Seas Vol. 7-8) : Chapters 116 - 142

Post-Canon Content: Chapters 143 - 149

Epilogue: Chapters 150 - 151

Q & A / Post-Word: Chapter 152

SPOTIFY PLAYLISTS

(Offset count by 1 for informational chapter)

This story has a lot of playlists associated with it that you can listen to while you read if you want!

First is the official No Paths Are Bound Playlist, which has tracks that correspond to every chapter of the fic, and updates as the story does.

Here's the tracklist, and it's corresponding chapters:

Ch. 1: King, You Found Me

Ch. 2: Through the Eyes of a Child, Ugly, This is How You Fall in Love, July

Ch. 3: Sorrow, Now Comes the Night, Swallowed By the Sea, Saturn, Leaves from the Vine

Ch. 4: Remember Me, It's Quiet Uptown, Dancing With Your Ghost, Echo

Ch. 5: My Mistake, Bad Friend

Ch. 6: Haunted, Gravity

Ch. 7: The Devil Within, Become the Beast, O Death, My Love Will Never Die

Ch. 8: The Archer, Appointments

Ch. 9: How Villains Are Made, Paint it Black, If I Killed Someone for You

Ch. 10: Glass Heart Hymn, Control

Ch. 11: The Times, They are a-Changin', Order 66 Theme

Ch. 12: Heavenly Father, Landslide, Stop Crying Your Heart out, Epiphany, Evermore

Ch. 13: Cover My Eyes, Best of Me, Found/Tonight, Wait for Me (Reprise)

Ch. 14: Eye of the Needle, Bloody Tears (epic version), Don't Get in My Way, Trials

Ch. 15: Maps, Wolves

Ch. 16: Hunt You Down, The Waltz of the Bone King, The Devil's Whisper

Ch. 17: Bad Dreams, Jenny of Old Stones

Ch. 18: Holy, Tolerate It, The Last Butterfly

Ch. 19: True North

Ch. 20: Smoke Signals

Ch. 21: Bad Moon Rising

Ch. 22: New Years Day

Ch. 23: All Too Well (10 Minute Version)

Ch. 24: Blood On My Name

Ch. 25: Comes and Goes (in waves)

Ch. 26: Dear Friend Across the River

Ch. 27: Come Away to the Water

Ch. 28: Let You Down, Survivor

Ch. 29: Dark in My Imagination, Iron

Ch. 30: Graveyard

Ch. 31: A Sky Full of Song

Ch. 32: For What it's Worth

Ch. 33: The Chain, Look Who's Inside Again

Ch. 34: Wanderer's Lullaby, Stories

Ch. 35: I'm Trying (Not Friends)

Ch. 36: Ba Sing Se

Ch. 37: Wu Ji

Ch. 38: Shang-Chi Main Theme, Blackest Crow

Ch. 39: Something I Need, Thus Always to Tyrants

Ch. 40: Immortal

Ch. 41: Yi Hua Yi Jian, Fall on Me

Ch. 42: Crazier Things

Ch. 43: Ghost

Ch. 44: Death Wish

Ch. 45: When You Were Young, Hold Me While You Wait

Ch. 46: Sociopath

Ch. 47: I Hope You're Happy

Ch. 48: 1000 Times

Ch. 49: Falling

Ch. 50: All That You Are

Ch. 51: The Hills

Ch. 52: She Used to be Mine, The Night We Met

Ch. 53: Chaos is a Ladder

Ch. 54: The Wondersmith and his Sons, The Home We Made

Ch. 55: The Devil is a Gentleman

Ch. 56: The Beast

Ch. 57: Flames

Ch. 58: Nothing is as it Seems

Ch. 59: Runaway

Ch. 60: Who Are You

Ch. 61: Body Bag, Wasteland, Baby!

Ch. 62: Happier than Ever - Edit, Let Me Go

Ch. 63: Good Girl Winnie Foster

Ch. 64: Run, Perfect - Stripped

Ch. 65: Mercury

Ch. 66: Autumn

Ch. 67: Epic III, Fairytales

Ch. 68: Yellow, Infinity, Through Heaven's Eyes

Ch. 69: I Scared All My Friends Away, When the Party's Over, 85%

Ch. 70: Tear in My Heart

Ch. 71: Animal

Ch. 72: Afterglow, Heavenly, Turn out the Lights

Ch. 73: To the Gallows

Ch. 74: Wonder

Ch. 75: Strawberry Blonde, Burn Butcher Burn

Ch. 76: Suspiria

Ch. 77: No Time to Die

Ch. 78: For the First Time in Forever (reprise)

Ch. 79: Swan Lake - Epic Trailer Version

Ch. 80: Never Let Me Go

Ch. 81: Enemy, Ready As I'll Ever Be, Double Crossed

Ch. 82: I Was Wrong

Ch. 83: The Confrontation, The Last Agni Kai, Dear Theodosia

Ch. 84: Surface Pressure, Older than I Am, Adelaide

Ch. 85: Drown, Casualty, Trauma, Waste This, Monster, Illicit Affairs, Favorite Crime

Ch. 86: The Successor, Xion, Goodbye, What Could Have Been, Requiem, Dear Theodosia (reprise)

Ch. 87: Hear Me Roar, Light of the Seven, Losing Your Memory, If I Die Young, Arms Tonite

Ch. 88: Meet Me In the Woods, High

Ch. 89: Better Man, Hold My Girl, [Wen Qing] Woodland

Ch. 90: The Mask

Ch. 91: Angels (Acoustic), i wanna be your girlfriend

Ch. 92: The Kids Aren't Alright, Ways to Go, Lotta True Crime

Ch. 93: Bastards, Dear John, I Think I'm OKAY

Ch. 94: Lightning Crashes

Ch. 95: Pokerface

Ch. 96: Falling In Love, Bad Liar

Ch. 97: Lay All Your Love on Me

Ch. 98: Till It Happens to You, abcdefu (angrier)

Ch. 99: STFU!!

Ch. 100: Lotta True Crime

Ch. 101: Gimme, Gimme, Gimme (A Man After Midnight), Hayloft

Ch. 102: Soldier, History Has It's Eyes on You, Fortunate Son

Ch. 103: Serial Heartbreaker

Ch. 104: The Man

Ch. 105: Invisible String

Ch. 106: Jealousy, Jealousy, Nothing New

Ch. 107: Little Dark Age, Leave Me Alone

Ch. 108: I Did This All For You, Bruises

Ch. 109: A Witch Stole Sam, Before You Go

Ch. 110: All of Your Lies, Mr. Forgettable, Sweet Dreams

Ch. 111: I Hear a Symphony, Experience, Je Te Laisserai Des Mots

Ch. 112: Everybody Wants To Rule The World, Tonight You Belong To me

Ch. 113*: The Bells of Notre Dame, Killer Queen*

Ch. 114 : Our Love, The Plagues

Ch. 115: The Winner Takes It All, Bang Bang, Confrontation, Sweet Child O' Mine, From Now On

Ch. 116: Maneater, Look What You Made Me Do

Ch. 117: Enemy

Ch. 118: Feeling Good

Ch. 119: Why Am I Like This?

Ch. 120: Fake It, Masquerade

Ch. 121: Marjorie, Night Changes (slowed), Kiss it Better, Your Ex-Lover Is Dead

Ch. 122: Hellfire, There Isn't Any God, A Little Piece of Heaven

Ch. 123: Hell's Coming With Me, Ain't No Crying, Power, Friction, We Will Rock You

Ch. 124: Hold My Hand, Take Me Home

Ch. 125: No One's Here to Sleep, The High Seas, Demise of a Nation

Ch. 126: Not That Big, Gasoline, Headlights

Ch. 127: Washing Machine Heart, Darkest, Mikasa vs. Warhammer Titan, Ashes

Ch. 128: Tough to Be a God, Holding Out For A Hero, Rapid As Wildfires

Ch. 129: The Mad King, My Condolences, Monster

Ch. 130: PRO//MARE, Supercharger, thunderBOLTfantsy

Ch. 131: Dog Teeth, Michelle, When The Party's Over

Ch. 132: I hate u but thank u, Drunk Walk Home, You Might Not Like Her

Ch. 133: Brother

Ch. 134: Wands into the Earth, Irregular God, GAL-OTHY-MOS, AOGIRI, Omega

Ch. 135: Festival of Light, Eren's Berserk Theme, Ashes on the Fire V2, Bios, Symphonicsuite (Aot) Part 2-6th, Kröne

Ch. 136: Cardigan, Hurricane, Home

Ch. 137: Heavenly Father, Service and Sacrifice

Ch. 138: I'm Not Angry Anymore, Medicine, Shapeshift

Ch. 139: Satisfied, Parallel Universe, The 1, Moon Song, Something in the Orange

Ch. 140: MDZS Donghua Soundtrack x 2, Running Up That Hill

Ch. 141: Wait for Me, Mercury, Mr. Loverman

Ch. 142: I Know a Place (Acoustic)

Ch. 143: To Heal, Enough for One Life

Ch. 144: Another - Track 7, This Love

Ch. 145: Come to Me, Lover

Ch. 146: Light of Love, Love, Heaven

Ch. 147: Not Easy, 7 Years

Ch. 148: Don't Take the Money, Mirrorball, The Great War

Ch. 149: As it Was, Life You Lead, Greek Tragedy

Ch. 150: In Your Arms, Carry On, Sweetest Devotion, Mastermind

Then, there are playlists that correspond to specific arcs within the story:

- The Kiln / Mount Tonglu
- Guoshi Fangxin
- The Black Water Arc
- The Water Masters Arc

Then, there are playlists for relationships within the story.

- Hualian
- BeafLeef
- Fengqing
- Peishui

Finally, there are playlists for characters within the story.

- Xie Lian
- Hua Cheng
- Mu Qing
- Feng Xin
- Wu Ming
- The White Clothed Calamity
- Shi Qingxuan
- He Xuan
- Shi Wudu
- Pei Ming
- Ling Wen
- Yushi Huang
- Quan Yizhen
- Yin Yu
- Ren Song / Shuo (Original)
- Zhao Beitong (Original)

Chapter End Notes

> This will be updated with additional information as the story progresses, if you would like to have anything added to the FAQs, feel free to leave a comment! Thanks for taking the time to read this story!

I Remember You

Chapter Summary

You can find the Russian Translation of this story HERE

Chapter Notes

Songs From this chapter: King, You Found Me

The bandages over his eyes create a natural disguise—and there are days when he's lucky, and people decide to offer charity. Enough for him to have a hot meal.

What little remains of his skills from cultivation allows him to navigate somewhat—enough for menial work.

People let him help with the harvest, tend to farm animals—but that work comes and goes.

Eventually he finds one of his own shrines in a remote village, worn down and abandoned.

It feels fitting.

Local farmers give him work—and when they can't, he goes hungry.

He used to spend many nights hungry as a child, refusing food due to his delicate palette—but this is different.

This is cold, gnawing hunger—laying on the floor of his shrine, waiting for sleep to spare him from the ache.

But then…someone starts bringing food.

The first time he wakes up with a plate of fruit beside his head, he's too hungry to wonder. Maybe a farmer took pity, sent one of his children out to leave a lame beggar something to eat.

He devours them with little pride, even the berries that he used to loathe as a child.

But every morning, there's a plate.

Often in the evenings too, when he returns from a day of working himself to the bone in the fields.

Fruits. Meats. When there's bread, Xie Lian sheds a few grateful tears.

After weeks of this—his curiosity gets the best of him.

He's curled up on the shrine floor, turned on his side—feigning sleep.

And the moment he hears the soft clink of a plate hitting the stone floor, he's quick as a viper, rolling over, snatching out until his fingers wrap around someone's wrist, and he hears a soft gasp.

"Who are you?"

He doesn't receive an answer.

"Why are you helping me?"

He can't imagine a reason—maybe for the occasional kind gesture, but this is…

That's when Xie Lian notices how thin the wrist in his grasp is. That the person is trembling—probably from the God's strength.

He lets go, almost ashamed. "I'm sorry, you don't need to be—"

The figure scrambles away before he can speak more, left alone on the stone floor, hand outstretched.

"…Afraid," he finishes, somewhat bitter.

From then on, the food is left on the shrine steps—never too close.

Xie Lian still feels a presence, sometimes. He'll come back and find the floor swept. One day—there's a blanket. Nothing extravagant, but far better than sleeping with thin, torn rags.

Part of him wonders if Feng Xin disobeyed his orders and came to find him, but…

Even if he had disobeyed, Feng Xin wouldn't hide from him. And that arm—it belonged to someone younger. That much he's certain of, it couldn't be someone beyond their mid-teens.

But then who would be helping him now, and why?

When the entire world hates him—has forgotten him.

Often he can feel someone watching, hanging in the distance—never daring to approach.

Xie Lian sits up from where he was gathering stones by the edge of a stream, slowly turning his head in that direction.

He can't see the eyes on him, but Xie Lian can feel them.

"…I know you're there," he calls gently. He hears the soft rustling of leaves, the snap of a twig, like the stranger is about to leave—and his voice takes on a panicked edge, "Please—!"

The noises stop, and his voice wobbles.

"Please, don't go—I…"

He's…lonely .

Xie Lian can't remember the last time he had someone listen to him when he spoke. What it felt like to have someone by his side.

It's pitiful, really.

He hangs his head, waiting for the youth to flee, but…

Now, he hears the sounds of them cautiously creeping closer.

They don't say a word—but when they're close enough, Xie Lian reaches out, tugging at the hem of a shirt sleeve, soft and worn.

"…Why are you here?"

It's a simple question, but the ache in his voice adds so much weight to it.

The voice that answers is that of a young man.

"…To serve his highness."

Xie Lian's expression freezes—and now he's the one flinching away, trembling.

He thought he had become accustomed to the shame that came from falling so low—but in the end, he had only taken comfort in anonymity.

"You…know who I am?"

The voice sounds a little more certain—almost cocky. If Xie Lian wasn't struggling between emotions—he would have been endeared.

"I would know Dianxia anywhere."

The title makes him flinch again, shrinking towards the edge of the stream. "Don't…you shouldn't call me that…"

He senses the boy starting to retreat again, worried that he might have offended the god—and Xie Lian grabs that sleeve again, clinging tightly.

"Don't go," he repeats, his voice trembling. "Please, don't go."

"…" Instead of answering verbally, the youth kneels beside him.

Xie Lian shudders with relief, fingers tightening in the fabric of his shirt—and he repeats himself once again.

"Why are you here?"

"…" he can hear the confusion in the boy's tone, "To serve—"

"Why?" Xie Lian presses, his voice raw. "I can't give you anything now."

There's a silence—and part of Xie Lian wonders if the boy hadn't realized that until now. That maybe he thought this was all some sort of self imposed penance. After all, what could he know of cursed shackles—and now, he'll leave.

Beneath the bandages, Xie Lian's eyes fill with tears.

He'll leave. He will. Xie Lian knows he will. Everyone did. And the ones who didn't—he pushed them away a long, long time ago.

There's no one left now.

He's trembling, when the boy answers.

"...I don't want anything."

At first, Xie Lian doesn't believe him. He's cautious—distrustful, like a wounded animal.

The boy still comes every day. Brings the food directly, morning and night. Quietly tells the god about current events when he asks.

He catches the boy praying sometimes—never kneeling, head bowed as he stands before the shrine altar.

Xie Lian reminds him that he can't answer. That in this state, he can't even hear the child's prayers—his tone more than a little bitter.

He can't see the smile on his face.

"That isn't why I pray.”

Xie Lian's brow furrows, and the smile on the boy's face is invisible to him, but it carries more faith than a god has ever known.

"Dianxia already answered this servant's prayer once, that was enough."

Xie Lian pauses, staring in his direction blindly

When did he...?

"...What did you pray for?"

The boy doesn't look up, hands still clasped in prayer. "An answer."

The memory pricks at him, and his fingers twitch as he strains to remember. "...To what?"

"A reason to continue living in this world."

Xie Lian's breaths halt.

He hasn't forgotten that day. It was only a few years ago, after all—but still...

"What was the answer?"

The boy's reply is simple, but it robs Xie Lian of his ability to speak.

"You."

How foolish he had been, back then. Thinking he could save everyone. That he could be...

That Xie Lian could be anyone's reason for living. After the damage he's done, all through his own selfish arrogance...

And believing in him hasn't brought the boy very far. No—he's spending his days bringing a fallen god scraps to survive.

That isn't a reason for living.

Maybe it's an excuse. An obligation. But it's nothing worth believing in.

When he finally finds the ability to speak, Xie Lian's voice is thick with so much self pity—it makes him sick.

"...I guess it wasn't a very good answer, was it?"

For once, the boy's reply is sharp.

"I don't want a different one."

Xie Lian can't understand it, but it's the reply that the child has always given.

'Forget about me.'

'I won't!'

'Don't bother with me anymore.'

'This one won't leave Dianxia's side—even if I get lost, I'll always come back.'

He never believed him. Always thought that the boy would change his mind—but he never did. Even now, after months of this.

Xie Lian asks, not for the first time—

"Who are you?"

The boy has never answered before, always demurred. Called himself a believer. A servant.

The reply doesn't come as easily this time. He hesitates.

And eventually—like the answer might horrify him, he mumbles it under his breath. If Xie Lian's ears weren't so sensitive by now, he wouldn't have heard—

"...Hong..."

The god's eyes widen instantly.

"...Hong-er?"

Silence follows—and all Xie Lian can hear are the boy's trembling breaths. They sound a little wet, laden with the occasional sniffle, and eventually—

"...Dianxia remembered me?"

His voice isn't smooth, stubborn, or cocky.

It's small, awed—thick with tears.

In truth—it was a memory that Xie Lian had almost forgotten, with the chaos that followed it. Normally, when he thought back on the boy—it was when he was angry with Qi Rong. Or when he would occasionally wonder what became of him.

Xie Lian had assumed the plague took him.

The fact that it didn't—that means that the small, terrified child that he caught in his arms that day, the boy who clung to him later, bleeding and broken, sobbing that he wasn't cursed—became a killer.

Xie Lian's salvation clearly hadn't offered him much, but...

"I remember you," he whispers, lips trembling.

Xie Lian finds something in himself that he thought was gone--worn away with every mistake he had made.

Faith.

His arms open, and the child is hesitant—but eventually, he falls into them, his body trembling with silent sobs.

He isn't alone—his god is shedding tears of his own. Slipping from underneath the bandages over his eyes, making shining paths down his cheeks as he holds Hong-er in his arms.

"I remember you," he whispers again, voice breaking as Hong-er clings to him.

Xie Lian believes him.

He believes that—out of everyone else in the world—this child might see what others don't. That he knows how it feels to be alone, broken, and scorned.

Xie Lian holds the boy until he falls asleep in his arms, stroking his hair.

Handsome

Chapter Notes

> You can find me on my twitter and the current updates of this fic here.
>
> Songs for this chapter: Through the Eyes of a Child, Ugly, This is How You Fall in Love, July

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Xie Lian begins to believe that Hong-er won't leave.

That trust is terrifying at first, but it grows with every passing day. The boy keeps his distance when Xie Lian needs it–but he's always there.

He accompanies Xie Lian to the fields, always insisting on taking the harder work for himself.

Xie Lian learns where the food was coming from when he realizes that many of the people in town already know him. That the boy had already been doing work here and there–giving Xie Lian food that was meant for himself.

He's stern, then, about making Hong-er keep his own share.

The meat came from hunting—a tedious task, one that forced the boy to resort to learning how to make traps and snares.

Xie Lian may not be good for much these days—but he mends a discarded bow, carefully teaching the boy how to use it. He doesn't notice the way Hong-er's fingers tremble when he adjusts them on the bow string, teaching him how to adjust his grip.

Xie Lian's thoughts are always occupied with Feng Xin in those moments. Missing him, missing Mu Qing, but...

He was useless to them, anyway. A burden.

When Hong-er makes his first shot, striking a rabbit in the eye, he crows with victory, jumping up and down. "Did you see me, Dianxia? I—"

He freezes, awkward, horrified by his own thoughtlessness, and—

Xie Lian burst with laughter, throwing his head back, clutching his belly

"No, but it sounded impressive!"

He can't remember the last time he laughed without wanting to cry.

The boy's anxieties ease when his god's hand lands on top of his head, ruffling his hair.

"Well done, Hong-er."

He beams, his face a picture of happiness itself.

The boy becomes quite the hunter—to the point where meat never becomes a problem. Xie Lian isn't much help with the cooking—but he can remove the pelts, sitting with Hong-er by the fire, telling him stories. The boy listens with rapt attention, never missing a single word.

They bring the pelts to town in the morning to sell–or, with time, Xie Lian learns to sew them into a better pair of boots for Hong-er. He never complained—but the months are getting colder, and Xie Lian can sense that he's getting taller–his old things probably didn't fit.

They honestly aren't special–but they're sturdy. You would think that Xie Lian gave Hong-er his weight in gold, with the way he responds—

And in moments like that, the god doesn't feel useless.

The nights grow cold, and Hong-er is still sleeping on the steps of the shrine.

It worries Xie Lian. His own body is sturdy, even in his banishment. It can handle a little cold, hunger, or injury—but Hong-er is still mortal.

It frightens him. And the prospect of the boy falling ill fills him with dread.

Xie Lian doesn't want to be alone again.

Each night for a week, he tries to coax him into sleeping inside—near the fire, at the very least. Hong-er comes in to tend to it, stoking the flames so his god won't catch a chill in the night—but he always leaves.

In the end, Xie Lian only finds one solution.

"Hong-er?"

He always appears with near immediacy when the god calls, "Dianxia?"

"I'm cold."

The teenager rushes forward, quick to stoke the coals, adding a little more kindling from the pile he chopped that morning, but—

"It's no good," Xie Lian sighs, forlorn. "Could you just..." He slides over, making room on the bamboo mat for one more, "Sleep here?"

Hong-er is frozen, his expression a mask of tempted longing, guilt, and anxiety that the god can't see. "This one should really..."

"Please, Hong-er?"

He swallows thickly.

"I'm still cold."

The first night, he's as stiff as a board, sleeping on the very edge of the mat. Xie Lian isn't sure if he actually sleeps at all. The second and third nights are like that too, but...

Eventually, he starts sleeping with his side lightly pressed against Xie Lian's back.

With the intention of helping the god keep warm—even if he never relents about getting under the blanket with him. It isn't perfect–but he's inside, near the fire, and Xie Lian sleeps easier.

He's never shared a bed before—and he finds comfort in it now.

It isn't lonely.

Over time, he scolds Hong-er enough times for using his title that the boy eventually starts calling him, 'Gege.' Shyly at first, like he's worried Xie Lian might find it overly familiar—but the god never seems to mind.

Banishment stops feeling like such a punishment, now.

There's joy in watching Hong-er grow. He's still a gangly teenager, just like he was the first day Xie Lian tried to touch him in the shrine—but he's gaining weight, starting to get a little taller.

He whines with embarrassment when his voice starts cracking, going silent.

But Xie Lian finds it endearing, pleading for the teenager to stop being so shy—after all, the silence can often become a little too much for him—and, however awkwardly, his companion always relents.

And after everything he's done, Hong-er still expects nothing in return.

It bothers him, when he needs Xie Lian's help. He sulks for an entire afternoon when the god has to help him fend off a group of teenage bullies from the next village over—and sure, it must be embarrassing to be saved by a blind man, but...

It seems to run deeper than that.

He always lunges in front of the god at the first sign of danger, often only to find himself pulled behind Xie Lian as he deals with whatever small-time criminal or low level demon has decided to cause them trouble. And after, he always falls into an ill mood for hours at a time.

Eventually, Xie Lian comes to understand: Hong-er wants to protect him.

It seems a little silly—after all, there's little left that could hurt the god now, but it makes him smile.

That's when he starts teaching him more than just archery.

He notices that the teenager isn't completely without skill–that there's clearly already some experience already there. Hong-er explains he was a foot soldier in the war—that he picked up a few skills, here and there.

Xie Lian smiles sadly.

It explains his skills, yes.

It also explains why the plague spared him. And the knowledge of that—the things Hong-er must have had to do, when he was still so young...

It hurts to think about.

(Xie Lian forgot–forgets so often, now—that he was young back then, too.)

They might be sparring with sticks—but the boy shows a strong natural inclination for offense. Xie Lian comments he would be suited to sabers—and something about that makes the child smile.

The next time the god has to defend him, and Hong-er is left scowling—Xie Lian smiles, reaching down to ruffle his hair.

He doesn't have to reach as far down now, as he did before.

"If you train hard enough, one day you'll be able to return the favor and save me next time."

That doesn't make the sulking go away–but it certainly seems to light a fire under the teenager.

Xie Lian also comments at some point, with a forced tone of cheerfulness, how much girls like that sort of thing. Having skills like that will help Hong-er find a wife one day.

Statements like that always seem to make the teenager scoff, and Xie Lian isn't surprised. He was that age once. Things like romance seemed far off, silly. The only thing that seemed to matter was his cultivation.

The whole thing feels so ridiculous now.

"I don't want a wife."

Xie Lian smiles faintly.

Of course, he feels that way now. And the fallen prince is selfishly happy about it while it lasts. He doesn't want Hong-er to be alone. Doesn't want him to have nothing, but—

Part of him not having anyone else—it means he still needs Xie Lian.

He's often ashamed of feeling that way. He should want Hong-er to have people in his life that love him. Xie Lian should want the teenager to grow into a man, to have a life of his own.

But growing up—that might mean outgrowing Xie Lian, too.

That terrifies him.

Xie Lian wants him to be happy. The affection he's developed for his companion in the last year is deep—meaningful.

He doubts that Hong-er realizes it, but Xie Lian has come to adore the boy.

But he's so afraid of being alone again, fumbling in the dark.

Still, he smiles.

"You'll change your mind, one day." He reaches out to ruffle Hong-er's hair again, something that always used to make the boy preen happily.

But he shrinks away from it now. Irritated with being treated like a child.

The child Xie Lian desperately wants him to always be.

"I won't," he mumbles, stubborn. "I don't need anybody but dianxia."

Oh, Xie Lian feels so horrible for the happiness in his chest, the relief. That even if those are the words of a child—it means Hong-er still is one.

That Xie Lian gets to feel needed for a little longer.

But there are things he can't see. Xie Lian finds himself wondering–after all, the boy is sixteen now, he must be watching girls, even if he doesn't approach.

Which ones does he like? Is he shy about it? Does he want to talk to them, but doesn't know how?

Xie Lian is utterly useless in that regard—he's never wanted anyone in such a way. He's been on the receiving end of want and desire many times—but such things never interested him, and...

He was so far above everyone else, back then. He never allowed anyone to reach for him.

Xie Lian makes soft inquiries, needles him about it in a teasing voice, smiling softly. Hong-er always sits against the opposite wall of the shrine, curled up into a ball—and Xie Lian never sees the way the boy watches him, cheeks flushed, biting his tongue.

The god is kneeling on the floor, weaving. It's a skill he's picked up over time—one that he's developed a fondness for. It's slow, peaceful. Hong-er will quietly indicate which color of thread he's holding, and the god uses the threads to create pictures in his mind's eye.

And as Xie Lian works, he presses with a gentle smile, "Have you really never pictured it? You must have some kind of idea of what sort of girl you want."

(Maybe if Xie Lian has some idea, he can brace himself for abandonment when such a creature appears.)

"What if it isn't a girl?"

The prince falls silent—and he can hear the human's heart beating faster, likely afraid of the judgement, possible rejection he might face for admitting such a thing.

Xie Lian isn't ignorant of the fact that there are men who love other men. There were moments when he...

When he said he never really wanted someone before, that was true. But he was still a teenage boy, even when he was training and focusing on his cultivation.

He would feel flashes of warmth, at times—especially when he found himself looking at Feng Xin.

It felt shameful.

Not knowing why the sight of his friend's body would bring this flooding heat in his gut—but knowing that he shouldn't be feeling that way.

It frightened Xie Lian at the time. He knew that Mu Qing caught him looking more than once.

His other friend never said a word—but he reacted with quiet disgust. Resentment, even. And it only made the shame worse.

But Xie Lian pushed the feelings down. Recited his sutras. And eventually–they stopped.

His friendship with Feng Xin was never affected, the other teenager never knew what Xie Lian had been feeling, but...

Xie Lian knew then, cultivation was his only option forward in life.

That it gave him an excuse not to look at people. And even if he was different, he...

No one would ever know. He would never become a source of shame for his parents, if he never had a wife or children.

When a man chooses to forgo women for no reason, people whisper. When he does it out of a devotion to faith, people admire him.

No one ever considered Xie Lian's choice of cultivation paths to be intentional. It was just the method that Guoshi happened to practice.

With that, Xie Lian didn't feel like he was lying or hiding from anyone. Only himself. His pride made such things necessary, back then.

He never quite forgave himself for being different. But as his life became dominated by other problems, other worries...there was no room left for those feelings. And after that, he was alone. He never found himself needing to think about it again—he nearly forgot.

But now...

When he remembers the shame—the quiet fear that used to consume him at night, nearly hyperventilating as he fought the feeling between his legs—denying it, whispering to himself that it wasn't like that, that there was nothing wrong with him.

He doesn't want that for Hong-er.

Xie Lian isn't blind to what it means to be worshipped. Knows that if he tells the boy something is so, that Hong-er will believe it with all of his heart.

If Xie Lian could have done that for himself, he would have been spared so much shame.

"...That doesn't change anything."

He keeps his chin held high, even as his fingers tremble slightly, struggling to pull the threads together. "Loving someone is the most beautiful thing a person can do."

Hong-er's eyes never leave his face, he hardly even breathes.

"Man or woman, it's still meaningful."

The silence that follows is one of petrified hopefulness, and when

Hong-er speaks again, he does so with a cautious happiness that breaks Xie Lian's heart.

"...Does gege really mean that?"

He's well practiced now, when it comes to smiling through pain.

"With all of my heart."

Hong-er's fingers are digging into his shins through the fabric of his pants, his eyes as wide as they can possibly be.

Even now, he has no hope of his affections ever being returned—but now, he knows that they wouldn't be a source of disgust.

That it isn't something shameful.

He swallows thickly, hugging himself a little tighter, because—

Loving someone—Hong-er, loving someone, no matter who that someone is—

Xie Lian thinks it's something beautiful.

Hong-er doesn't love quietly. He can't. He loves with every breath, with every part of him.

He's always been over—emotional, lacking in self control. He can't stop himself from feeling things, they just consume him.

And when loving someone is everything that he is, having the world tell him that love was shameful—

It made every part of him feel shameful. Sinful.

And how could he ever expect love from god, or even just acceptance—when with every bone in his body, Hong-er knew that he would always be a sinner.

His tears fall silently—but they don't come from sadness.

"Is it a man?"

The boy looks up with a start, and Xie Lian smiles.

"If there was someone you wanted, I mean?"

He's quiet, blinking until the tears stop, waiting for his breathing to become a little more even before he answers—

"It doesn't matter to me, either way."

Xie Lian tilts his head to the side.

"Man or woman," Hong-er explains. "They're the same to me."

Xie Lian pauses, considering–and eventually, he smiles. "I see." His fingers are a little steadier now, weaving the threads together. "But when you picture the sort of person you want, you must imagine something, right?"

Knowing the god can't see, Hong-er allows his eyes to drift over Xie Lian's shoulders, the long curtain of dark tresses that pool on the ground around him.

"...Hair..." He mumbles, his face hot.

"Hmm?"

The boy is rarely so tongue tied.

"I like...longer hair, I guess."

Xie Lian's smile is patient, affectionate. "Hong-er—most people have long hair."

The teenager squirms, pressing his legs tighter against his chest. "But...it has to be soft," he mumbles. "Shiny. Not everyone's is like that."

Well, that is true.

"What else?"

"Gege..."

He sounds so embarrassed , Xie Lian can't stop his smile from widening just a little. It's sweet—no, it's cute, actually. Unexpected, from a young man who rarely ever seems shy about anything.

"Tell me, please?"

The teenager rubs his cheek with a quiet groan.

"...Not short," He admits slowly, "but not too tall either."

"That's a bit of an odd description..."

"Well, it's fine if they're taller than me right now," Hong-er explains without thinking, "I'm still growing."

He pauses, realizing how odd that sounds, adding in a rush—

"Hypothetically."

It's a credit to Xie Lian's own stupidity when it comes to these things that he doesn't realize, laughing softly. "For someone who didn't want to talk about this, it sounds like you've thought about it a lot."

"I haven't," Hong-er whines, sounding horribly sheepish. "Really!"

The prince's smile is good natured. "Anything else?"

"...Smart," Hong-er's chin presses against his knees. "Strong. Kind. Brave. Those things are the most important."

Xie Lian's smile falters, just a little. "...Those are some pretty high standards, Hong-er."

The teenager shrugs, sounding completely unbothered. "I'm not worried about it."

"Finding such a person might be difficult."

The sheepishness seems to be retreated, replaced by that stubborn sense of certainty—

"I'm really not worried about it, dianxia."

Xie Lian frowns.

Some selfish part of him is happy—after all, Xie Lian has seen a little bit too much of the world by now.

He knows that someone kind, intelligent, brave, and generous—they aren't probably don't exist.

(If this was only about hair and height, things would be easier.)

But he finds himself caught between relief, and...not wanting Hong-er to be disappointed, when he doesn't find such a person.

After all, the only person Xie Lian can think of that might check all of those boxes would be Hong-er himself—and he's a rare, precious thin.

Xie Lian often suspects that the teenager has the potential to ascend—with each passing week, he becomes more and more sure that he will.

And when he does, he won't need Xie Lian anymore. He'll have his own purpose for living—he won't need the things that he did before.

And then, he'll be alone again.

Maybe, if he was a little less selfish, he would order Hong-er to leave his side. He'd have a better chance of ascension that way. Or, at the very least, he might find someone—man or woman—to share his life with.

Hong-er deserves that.

But Xie Lian is a coward, and he can't. He's learned what it feels like, to sleep next to someone every night. That he doesn't need fine silks or golden palaces—just for someone to listen, when he speaks. To laugh with him.

And he's so, so afraid of giving that up.

He does notice that the boy never shows interest in talking to people his own age. He never makes friends in the village—even when Xie Lian reassures him that it's alright, that he can go and enjoy himself.

Hong-er always refuses, remaining rooted to his side like ivy on stone.

Even when he does relent to Xie Lian's demands to socialize even a little, making small conversations with the other teenagers when they're in the market selling animal pelts, or walking back from the fields–Xie Lian notices something.

Hong-er doesn't like being touched.

One of the other boys will give him a playful smack on the back, and Xie Lian can sense the venom in Hong-er's glare in response. Girls smile and fawn over how strong his arms are—but when they reach out to touch him, the teenager jerks away sharply.

It gives the god pause.

Ever since the day he learned his companion's name–he's always been affectionate with Hong-er. Well…what Xie Lian would call affectionate, anyway.

He grew up in a palace, tended to by servants. His parents loved him, but physical shows of love were rare, given sparingly.

The fact that Xie Lian is prone to ruffling the boy's hair (less now, since Hong-er seems to dislike it), giving him the occasional hug, even...is a sign that the prince has come to view Hong-er as something close to family.

Now, he wonders if the teenager is only tolerating it.

He becomes much more careful with his touches, more than aware of the imbalance of power in their relationship. Hong-er worships him—and if something makes him uncomfortable, Xie Lian knows the teenager won't tell him.

He has to be more thoughtful, more considerate of him.

Xie Lian never realized how much it would upset the boy. Not at first—but eventually, as weeks of this passed, and Xie Lian smiled, congratulating him on a job well done—but not reaching for him, patting his head, or pulling him into a hug—

Hong-er can't stand it anymore.

He's gotten so good at controlling his voice, hiding his feelings from his god as best as he can. Even when his hands are balled into fists at his sides, trembling with emotion.

"Gege?"

He glances up from where he's gathering firewood, a gentle smile in place, "Yes?"

But now—Hong-er can't hide the pain in his voice; the fear.

"Has this servant offended you?"

Xie Lian's face falls.

It's been months since the boy called himself a servant.

"No," he shakes his head, setting down the wood in his hands, "why would you say that?"

Hong-er hangs his head, almost ashamed to vocalize it, because if he gives voice to the reason for his worry, the god might begin to understand why he...what he really...

(In that sense, he's vastly overestimating Xie Lian's understanding of such things.)

“…This one never expects anything of his highness,” Hong-er mumbles, and Xie Lian’s frown only deepens—because the teenager is always reverent of him, but when he’s upset, such reverent words are usually a sign that he fears rejection.

“I know, Hong-er.”

The boy swallows hard.

“…Gege has been far away from me lately.”

Xie Lian tilts his head to the side, thinking about it. He’s always been prone to fits of daydreaming—but that isn’t new. He doesn’t think he’s been quiet, either. “…I don’t understand what you mean?”

Hong-er’s hands tremble.

“…This one means it literally,” he mumbles, heart beating halfway out of his chest, expecting the worst sort of answer, but nothing could hurt quite so much as thinking his god was angry with him. “…Physically.”

Xie Lian pauses, his lips forming a perfect ‘O.’

“Hong-er…” The teenager doesn’t look up, and the god is caught in place, stumped. “That…wasn’t because I was angry with you, you hadn’t done anything wrong.”

It’s a relief, but Hong-er still shrinks.

“I just…thought you were getting too old for that sort of thing,” Xie Lian admits.

That makes the young man freeze, eyes snapping up with confusion.

“..Too old?”

Xie Lian laughs a little awkwardly, rubbing his hand against the side of his neck. “You seemed…like you didn’t want to be treated like a child anymore. And you never let anyone else touch you—”

“That’s different,” Hong-er never interrupts him, but now he does—his voice sharp, words coming out in a rush. “I never mind when gege touches me!”

“…” Xie Lian frowns, glancing away from him, his stomach twisting with anxiety. “You don’t have to say that, I wouldn’t…” He lets out a heavy sigh, “I wouldn’t be upset with you for telling me that something made you uncomfortable. I would only be upset if I found out you didn’t tell me, because you didn’t want to upset me.”

As a prince, he was used to people lying to him about such things.

Mu Qing did that the most, and it created this overwhelming sense of anxiety after—when Xie Lian had lost everything.

He doesn’t want to be lied to, while the ones who follow him build up silent resentment. If he’s crossing a line, he wants to know, so he doesn’t end up…

Alone. Again.

“I’m not lying,” Hong-er pleads, his voice low, frightened—but forcing himself to speak out none-the-less. “If gege doesn’t want to touch me, I…I don’t expect it. But if he does…”

Xie Lian bites his lip, hesitant.

“…I…do,” he admits. “It’s hard, when I…”

In most ways, he’s adjusted to life without his sight. There’s still the occasional trip up—but in a practical sense, Hong-er has bridged nearly all of the gaps.

But it’s hard, when you can’t see the person beside you. Something as small as the weight of Hong-er’s hand, it…

The amount of comfort it brings Xie Lian is hard to describe. The gentle reassurance that he isn’t alone. That someone is there.

“…When I can’t see the world the way everyone else does,” Xie Lian finishes. “But it’s alright.”

He forces a smile, bright, but strained.

“I don’t need Hong-er to force himself—”

He can’t finish the sentence—and then, he’s just frozen with shock.

A pair of arms have wrapped around him, holding him tightly—and Xie Lian is hesitant at first, realizing—he's never really been held before. Not like this.

Hong-er is clinging to him—not so different from the day he told Xie Lian his name, but…

He's Xie Lian's height now. The god hadn't realized.

How did he grow so fast?

And instead of weeping in Xie Lian's arms, accepting his reassurances—it's actually the opposite.

Xie Lian is slow, hesitant to lay his head on the human's shoulder, cheek pressing against the collar of Hong-er's shirt.

The only other person he was probably close to like this was his mother—and instead of silk dresses and perfume, his face finds threadbare cotton, and…

Hong-er smells like the forest. Pleasantly earthy, familiar—like home.

Xie Lian's eyes are closed beneath the bandages—and still, they sting.

He misses his mother. Misses his friends. Misses the way things were.

But he would have missed these arms, even if they never held him.

They're trembling with hesitation—like he's worried about Xie Lian's reaction, half expecting to be shoved away. But…

When Xie Lian's arms move—it's only to wrap around the boy in return. He doesn't weep, no, but he sags, allowing the teenager to bear his weight.

Having one of his senses sealed, means every other sensation becomes all the more important.

Xie Lian learns to love the sounds of the birds in the trees—the rush of wind through the grass. The sound of Hong-er's breathing, learning to trace the way it changes with emotion.

He becomes keenly aware of different smells, good and bad. He can track a demon for miles—and certain perfumes give him such terrible headaches, he can barely stand to be in the same room.

But Hong-er's smell—it soothes him. Puts him at ease at night, when he tries to sleep.

Taste—well, he was already unlucky in that sense, but hunger has cured a sensitive palette. He's a little spoiled these days—only has to eat what his companion cooks for him, and that, he never minds.

But Xie Lian never realized how much he would come to adore touch.

He always hears Hong-er coming, but the boy has taken to greeting him with a gentle squeeze of his shoulder. When he feels Xie Lian get tense, he always reaches for the god's hand, squeezing softly.

His fingers are rougher than Xie Lian's, longer than they used to be—familiar.

There was a time where he could barely seem to stand sleeping beside him, shrinking to the far side of the bamboo mat. Now, Xie Lian falls asleep each night with the young man's warmth against his back. It's never too intimate—just a constant reminder of his presence.

He has nightmares, sometimes.

He used to wake up alone, trembling, covering his hands with his mouth, whimpering against the dark.

Now, he awakens to arms wrapped firmly around him, a voice whispering into his hair—

"They aren't real, dianxia."

Xie Lian's eyes stare, unseeing

His breaths are shallow, unsteady. He's pathetic. A frightened, broken shadow of the man that he once was.

When did those arms become so strong?

"It's just a dream."

Xie Lian's lips tremble, and the shadow of a feeling stirs inside of him—one that he's quick to push down.

He notices all of the little ways that his companion was touching him before—when he wasn't paying attention.

Xie Lian has gotten pretty good at navigating without his sight—but he still stumbles when he walks an unfamiliar path, and when he does, Hong-er is always there.

Catching him by the elbow, one hand on his back to steady him. “Careful, gege.”

One of his favorite things in the world is combing Xie Lian’s hair—he still laughs with child-like delight whenever the god agrees, spending hours carefully working through every single tangle.

He even learns some of the fancier styles that the prince used to wear—even if Xie Lian no longer has the fancy hair pieces or pins that he used to. The god smiles with assurance, assures the boy it isn’t necessary, but…

It makes Hong-er happy, so he could never tell him no.

He isn’t quite as skilled as Mu Qing used to be—but far more gentle, to the point where Xie Lian ends up slumped back against him, purring like a contented house cat.

(He never sees how flushed Hong-er gets, the breathless way he smiles, like he’s been given a precious gift.)

Seasons pass, and Xie Lian hasn’t thought about his cultivation. He learns to forget the way his name sounds from anyone but Hong-er’s lips.

Part of him wonders if he’s being a coward, hiding from the world. Hiding from his mistakes.

He has moments of guilt, shame, and sorrow.

What about the people who looked to him? Everyone that he let down? What of his parents? He doesn’t even know where they are now—and he knows Feng Xin wouldn’t have allowed any harm to come to them, but he…

How can Xie Lian justify allowing himself to be happy?

It takes him time to realize that’s what the feeling inside of him is, whenever he has Hong-er by his side. This lightness when he hears the teenager’s voice, dropping lower with every passing week, becoming that of a man.

He used to spend each day silently worrying.

Fretting over how to hide his weaknesses. How to be someone worth following. Because if he wasn't—Hong-er would leave. That was just assured. One day, it would happen.

After a year together, Xie Lian is starting to realize that it won't.

That this is more than happiness.

Xie Lian begins to recognize it as love—knowing that it isn't the romantic kind. After all, Hong-er is still just a boy, yet to live a life of his own. But…Xie Lian does realize that he's given the teenager something through their companionship.

Comfort, stability—guidance.

And for someone who grew up without a home, without a family… being with Xie Lian has allowed him to finish out those latter childhood years with someone who cared for him.

Xie Lian knows he gave him that. And he'll always be grateful for what the young man has given him, but…

Part of loving someone is wanting what's best for them. Even when it isn't what you want. Even if it hurts.

Xie Lian knows, Hong-er will follow him for the rest of his life if the god doesn't stop him. And while this is more happiness than Xie Lian could have hoped for…

Hong-er could have more. He deserves more. He should have more.

For so many months, Xie Lian would cling when the boy shrunk away, begging him not to leave. Now—he's encouraging him to do just that.

To move on, to have a life of his own—to stop wasting his life on Xie Lian.

The suggestion that it could be a waste always makes the young man angry.

"Have I ever told gege that I wanted to leave?"

"No—"

"Does gege want me gone?"

Xie Lian swallows thickly, shaking his head. "No, it's not about wanting you gone, Hong-er, I—"

"Then I'm staying."

They've never argued before—Hong-er never dared to contradict him. But the one thing they never agree on is the one thing that he can never back down from:

That Xie Lian is worth it.

And it makes the god so frustrated , because Hong-er is throwing so much away.

"Do you even UNDERSTAND the kind of life you could have?!" Xie Lian snaps one day, hands balling into fists. He's never raised his voice to the boy—not like this. "You—do you have ANY idea how special you are?!"

And god, he's so stubborn .

"If I'm special, it's because of—!"

"Don't you dare say it's because of me!" He stands quickly, his weaving forgotten—tossed aside. "I—I've barely given you anything, Hong-er! If anything, I've slowed you down. Every good thing about you—it's in SPITE of me, can't you see that?!"

He's cursed everyone in his life.

His family. His country. His people. He'll curse Hong-er soon too, if he isn't careful.

How, how could he be this selfish?

When the boy speaks again, his voice is small—and to Xie Lian's horror, hurt.

"…How could you say that it's nothing?"

The god freezes, falling silent.

His eyes grow wide, and he realizes how that sounded. Whatever he meant, even if he didn't intend it, he—

'Take me as your reason.'

He can't see how wide Hong-er's eyes are, but he can feel the waves of hurt coming off of him.

'If you can't find a reason to live, live for me.'

In the intervening years—Xie Lian had forgotten where they started.

That when Hong-er was the one that was downtrodden, alone—told that he was cursed, Xie Lian was the one that lifted him up. Those words, which often seem so foolish to him…

They define Hong-er's entire world.

And now Xie Lian is practically spitting on that. Telling Hong-er that it meant nothing. That his reason—it's actually meaningless.

When he realizes that—the god's heart fills with nothing but shame and self loathing, and, against his own teachings…

He falls to his knees.

"I'm sorry," He chokes, arms wrapped around himself as he hangs his head with shame.

As a prince, he was always told to hold his head high. That he never needed to bow before anyone.

The first time in his life that he kneels like this—it's for anorphan. Someone with nothing.

"Hong-er, I—" He gasps, fighting back tears, "I'm so sorry!"

But he isn't kneeling on his own for long.

He's in a familiar set of arms, taking shame in the comfort he finds in being held, knowing he's the last person to deserve it.

Hong-er doesn't acknowledge his apologies.

He just repeats the one thing he always has—that he won't leave. That he won't ever want to.

This is where he wants to be. And Xie Lian can never understand it.

He reminds the young man that he could ascend—and Hong-er scoffs, not believing in that possibility. And even so…

"If the heavens are too stupid to want dianxia, why would I want anything to do with them?” He huffs, arms tightening around Xie Lian’s shoulders, “I wouldn’t fit in, anyway. I have better taste.”

The disgraced official smiles weakly, choking out laughter. “Shameless.”

But his hand comes up to rest in Hong-er’s hair anyway—not ruffling it like he used to, just stroking gently, and Hong-er hums in acknowledgment, leaning into his touch. “Gege always forgives me for it.”

Xie Lian could forgive him for anything—Hong-er makes it so easy to do.

But he makes other points—ones that aren’t so easy to deny.

That Hong-er won’t be able to find someone if he spends his life like this, caring for a blind man in a dusty, forgotten shrine. He won’t have a family of his own.

“I don’t need more than this.” He repeats every time.

Xie Lian doesn’t accept that quite so easily. After all—he knows why he chose his own path, but Hong-er…he isn’t a prince, and he doesn’t have the exact same…predicament as Xie Lian.

There’s no reason that he couldn’t find a partner. That he couldn’t be happy.

When the god presses him on that point, eventually—Hong-er offers a reply that makes him stop, his eyes a little wide underneath the bandages.

“What makes you think anyone would want me?”

Xie Lian freezes, his face a mask of confusion.

“…I don’t understand what you mean.”

Hong-er’s voice is wry—but the security beneath it is real. It runs deep. “I’m not like you, dianxia.”

“…” Xie Lian laughs quietly, tilting his head to the side, “You don’t need to tell me that we’re different people, Hong-er, but that doesn’t mean—”

“I’m not beautiful.”

Finally, the god falls silent.

The implication that Hong-er finds him beautiful isn't lost on him—and his feelings around that are…complicated.

There was a time when Xie Lian always felt beautiful. The world was always telling him so.

And how far did that beauty get him?

When things got ugly, what did the beauty of his face bring him? Did it keep his believers behind him? No.

To love something only for the beauty of it is cheap. Xie Lian learned that the hard way.

"…Do you only follow me because you find me beautiful, Hong-er?"

He doesn't answer verbally, but Xie Lian can feel the movement of him shaking his head from how vehement it is.

"Then why do you think that such a thing could stop anyone from loving you?"

Xie Lian suspects that the young man's worry isn't founded as it is.

He might be blind—but he isn't deaf . He's heard girls sighing and fawning over him when he walks by in the street. Oddly enough—many whisper about the fact that he looks dangerous, which Xie Lian finds odd. He can't imagine the teenager that way, but—

'Dangerous' isn't the same thing as 'ugly .'

It used to amuse him. Lately, it's been less funny, even though he can't place why…

"Most people aren't like me, gege."

Oh.

Xie Lian's lips quirk up, somewhat wry.

The first compliment the young man is willing to give himself, and it's only to justify why no one could ever love him.

He moves a little closer, pulling his arms back. Hong-er came to sit back before, when he was comforting Xie Lian, leaning back against the stone wall of the shrine.

The god sits up a little, his expression serious.

“Alright, let me see, then.”

“…” Hong-er stares back at him, confused—half wondering if the god is about to pull the bandages off and say, ‘surprise, I was just testing you this whole time!’

But he doesn’t. He moves closer, not really thinking about, well…

The fact that the action leaves him straddling the teenager’s lap. Not pressing against him, he’s up on his knees, but…

Hong-er’s breathing quickens, and his heartbeat pounds, hands trembling and balling up in his lap.

He’s only seventeen, after all—and this—

It’s a lot .

Xie Lian’s palms press against his cheeks, leaving him even more mortified by the heat there—but the god doesn’t comment on that. Instead, he brushes his thumbs over the bandages, his voice tinged with worry.

“…Are you hurt, Hong-er?”

He remembers the boy had bandages before.

But both times, he was already injured. Does he…wear them all the time?

It’s quiet, and when the teenager answers, his voice is small.

“…No.”

Xie Lian frowns, tugging at them gently, “Can I?”

His breathing is shallow, and his head is spinning, but…

Hong-er nods.

He’s careful, unwinding the bandages that cover most of the right side of his face, setting them down on the floor beside them. The boy stays perfectly still, trying to make it easier, but…

Xie Lian's heart aches when he feels how the young man is shaking. How nervous he is.

(Of course, bless him, Xie Lian is completely misinterpreting the reason for the nervousness.)

His fingertips begin the slow, purposeful process of tracing Hong-er's face. It's different from the little boy he remembers.

His jaw is a little more square, his cheekbones sharp.

He has soft, full lips that quiver under Xie Lian's thumbs, trying so hard to be good, to keep still for him.

His chin is slightly pointed—probably from a need to gain weight. His eyes are evenly set, with long lashes, fluttering like butterfly wings beneath his touch.

Finely shaped brows, bangs that fall into his forehead so often that Xie Lian has to delicately push them away. Hong-er's hair is slightly more coarse than his own, a little unruly—but Xie Lian doesn't dislike it.

If anything, it makes him smile fondly.

There are also things he can't see. The way Hong-er's chest is heaving—just how dark and flushed his skin has become, pupils blown.

He can hear the fast breathing, the rapid heartbeat, but—

He doesn't see the way the teenager is staring at his lips, how close their faces are.

His nose is long, thin—there's a slide crookedness to it and a bump in the bridge, like it's been broken many times before.

There's texture on his skin, but not from teenage acne, like what Xie Lian might have expected, no…

They're scars.

Numerous, some of them deep.

But those things aren't ugly.

Xie Lian has learned to scoff at things that are gleaming, unblemished, and new.

He was, once. Still is, in many ways—this body constantly erases any reminder of his past.

The small signs of wear and tear on the teenager’s face—they’re a story.

One that he doubts Hong-er would ever be willing to tell—but they aren’t ugly.

The teenager’s breaths are shallow as he watches the god’s face, waiting for Xie Lian to laugh it off awkwardly, to give a kind, but fake compliment—or say something about Hong-er’s personality, but…

The smile never leaves his face. It only softens, deepens with a warm kind of affection that Hong-er has only known from his god’s lips, and he murmurs—

“Handsome.”

Hong-er’s rushed, unsteady breathing halts—and Xie Lian leans forward, thumbs stroking over his follower’s cheeks

He’s never done more than hug Hong-er, always careful to keep some degree of separation there. And this—it's the sort of touch he’s always dreamed of receiving from his god—the kind he’s always been too ashamed of wanting to ask for.

The god’s lips press against his forehead

“My handsome, brave Hong-er.”

The teenager lets out a shuddering sigh, his eyes flooding with tears.

It doesn’t sound like a lie. He knows it must be, but—it sounds so sincere .

He doesn’t believe him.

Hong-er squeezes his eyes shut, allowing Xie Lian to hold him tight.

He’ll always believe in his god. Follow him to the ends of the earth, no matter the cost. No matter what Xie Lian says or does. Hong-er’s faith is blind. Unending.

But he doesn’t believe it when Xie Lian says that he’s handsome.

Brave, yes. Hong-er has always been brave.

It’s easy to be brave, when you’ve already lived through the worst of what the world can do.

But Hong-er knows that he’s ugly. He’s always been ugly. That’s why all of this happened. Why he…

‘My Hong-er.’

Oh, oh …

Even if one word was a lie, he…

‘My.’

My.

Please…

Did he mean it like that?

The teenager’s heart is still beating unsteadily later, when his god is sleeping in his arms—one hand still resting over the boy’s cheek, light, fond.

Please, did he really mean that?

Even if he isn’t handsome, could Xie Lian…have meant the rest?

Could he, someone with nothing—no luck, wealth, power, not even a name—

Could he be worthy of even belonging to someone like him? Deserving? Certainly not. But in some act of madness…could Xie Lian want that anyway?

Then, movement in the night cuts through his thoughts.

Xie Lian was born a prince. Rose to become a god. Then fell again. And in all of that time—and the years that would follow—he would say that his happiest year was when he had nothing. When he was penniless and lame, sleeping in an abandoned, dusty shrine.

Not because of any shining moral platitude, or grand realization about how wealth and fame meant nothing, no—

Just because of the boy that was sleeping beside him. The boy that believed in him. The boy that saved him, who stayed beside him.

Xie Lian should have made him leave.

He should have remembered what he was. What loving him could do to a person. The damage his mere presence could cause.

But he didn't.

He was so desperate for companionship—for someone to care, and Hong-er's devotion was like a drug. It made him relax—and it made him forget.

For the first time in months, he wakes up alone.

Chapter End Notes

> Happy Halloween! Make sure you give thanks to our local ghost king, and say happy birthday to Yiling Laozu!
>
> 🎃👻

A Ghost Fire Burns Cold

Chapter Notes

> Content Warnings for this chapter: non-graphic depictions of violence, sensory horror elements
>
> Will be linking fan art to the chapter later, so feel free to come back and check that out!

The blanket is carefully tucked around him—but when Xie Lian sits up, he can smell the smoldering ashes of the fire.

Hong-er never allows it to get that low.

He turns his head, pushing his hair back, calling out—

"...Hong-er?" There's no answer.

"..."

The god stumbles to his feet, struggling to pull his hair back as he walks around the shrine—he had gotten used to having someone do it for him again.

"Hong-er!"

The silence is vast—and it frightens him.

Something is very, very wrong—he can feel it.

He makes his way out of the shrine, so worried, he often forgets the obstacles in the path that he long since memorized.

He falls. Scratches his palms, his knees, his cheeks. No one catches him now.

"..." His hands begin to tremble, and he calls louder. "Hong-er!"

He isn't by the stream. Isn't on the path they always take through the forest. Xie Lian loses track of how many times he falls over, pausing to whimper for a moment when he twists his ankle so hard, he feels something crack—but he can't stop looking.

What if something happened to him? What if he's trapped somewhere, and can’t call out to him? Why would he leave without waking him up? Why wouldn’t he wait? He’s never done that before, what if he—?

Xie Lian freezes, his heart clutching with terror.

What if he just…left?

After all, Xie Lian gave him plenty of reasons the night before. The things he said— how ungrateful he was, how pathetic and self pitying…

‘How could you ever say that?’

“…” Xie Lian covers his mouth, shoulder’s trembling with shame.

What if, when he had time to think, he…

…Decided he couldn’t forgive him?

What if he heard Xie Lian’s reassurances that he wasn’t ugly, saw how pitiful the god was…and decided he didn’t need him after all?

What if Xie Lian’s words finally sank in? What if he listened?

The god hunches forward, hyperventilating.

That was what he wanted, wasn’t it? Shouldn’t he be happy, if that’s what happened? Is he really such a coward? Were his hopes for the boy so empty? Was his love for the boy that selfish? Has he not changed at all? He—

No .

Xie Lian’s fingers tear at his hair, head spinning.

If this was a year ago, he would have believed it. He would have fallen to the ground, despairing, feeling sorry for himself.

Xie Lian’s jaw locks with determination.

“He…” His voice is unsteady—but filled with the certainty that Hong-er gave him.

“He wouldn’t leave me.”

Xie Lian trembles, but he repeats the words. Each time he falls over, or finds himself taking the wrong path.

He wouldn't leave me.

He wouldn't leave me.

He would NEVER leave me.

It took so long for Xie Lian to believe that. Hong-er worked so hard to convince him.

He won't spit on that by giving up on it so easily now. The boy doesn't deserve that. He believed in Xie Lian, no matter what...Xie Lian won't give up on him now.

But part of believing that comes with an even more terrifying question:

If he wouldn't leave...why isn't he here?

The panic builds, and as Xie Lian ticks off more and more spots, eliminating the possibilities one by one, terror grips him.

"HONG-ER!"

He screams now, breathing hard, slipping and falling again , landing on his hands and knees, a bramble gauging his cheek.

Where is he?!

Blood is dripping down from his chin, but he doesn't bother to wipe it away.

Something does, though. Well—it tries. This cold, fluttering pressure against his cheek. Xie Lian flinches away, not recognizing it at first, his chest heaving as he looks around, disoriented.

"Hong-er?" His voice is trembling, weak. "If—If it's you, I won't be mad, just please answer me, I can't take this..."

That pressure bumps against his cheek again, but when Xie Lian reaches up—he finds nothing.

A sob rips from his chest.

"If this is a game, it isn't funny..."

Hong-er has hidden from him before. Playfully—and never too far, allowing Xie Lian to find him by sound and scent alone. Then, it was fun. This—this isn't fun.

Xie Lian doesn't hear anyone breathing. There's no human heartbeat but his own.

Something cold brushes against him.

A sob rips from his throat again as he flinches away, whipping his head around, "Hong-er—if it's you, I'm—just stop it, I'm—" He hunches inward, trembling like a leaf. "I'm scared!"

There's no cold now—but no one answers him either. Xie Lian stays still for a moment, shivering.

His breathing slows—and no matter how hard he listens, there's nothing but the natural sounds of the forest. But when he breathes in, he catches a scent he had almost forgotten.

Spiritual Power. But...why here?

He reaches out, fingers trembling—and something lands in his palm. Light, fluttering like a flame—but cold.

Xie Lian's eyebrows furrow as he brings his hand in, raising it towards his face— And there's that cool brush against his cheek again.

A...ghost fire?

The god frowns, his mind racing.

What is a ghost fire doing all the way out here?

They're far from any battlefield. There aren't any cultivators or merchants nearby using them as wares. How...?

Xie Lian pauses, shaking his head quickly, snapping himself out of it. He doesn't have time for this.

The god pushes the flame away, rising to his feet.

"Hong-er!"

The fire follows so persistently, even when Xie Lian apologizes—explaining that he isn't here for him. If it's looking for peace, it needs to find someone else to help, Xie Lian doesn't have time.

And now, he needs something that he doesn't have;

Eyes.

He was so proud in the beginning—too proud. Fleeing from any outstretched hand, from those who wanted to help him. He only was able to accept it from a stranger. Someone with nothing to lose.

Now, he's pounding on every door in the village, crying out— "Help me! Please!"

Hands trembling, breathing so hard, he can barely speak. "Oh god, please—help me!"

The farmers have come to know him over the last year—and so have their families. They drift out, watching the Taoist—whom they all viewed as the kind, but unfortunate local invalid—with concern.

"What's wrong, kid?"

"Did something happen?"

"Where's that friend of yours?"

The mention of him forces a panicked cry from Xie Lian's chest, and he shakes his head weakly. "I-I don't know—I can't—I can't find him!"

A local merchant frowns, rubbing his chin.

"Leaving a blind man to fend for himself…" He glances Xie Lian over. His cuts and bruises, the limp, shaking his head. "How shameless."

Xie Lian can't glare, but his eyebrows knit together as he whips his head in the man's direction.

The villagers have only ever known him to be soft spoken, with a sweet temper. It's startling now, the way he stomps over, grabbing the man by the front of his shirt— nearly lifting him off of the ground.

And he snarls .

"Don't talk about him like that!"

He gives the man a violent shake. "Don't EVER talk about him like that!"

"Easy, son, he didn't mean—"

They fall silent when they see how the young man is trembling, even in his anger—his voice breaking.

“He wouldn’t leave me!”

Xie Lian can feel it in the eyes watching him: Pity.

He lets the man go, taking an unsteady step backwards, lips quivering as he repeats himself—

“Hong-er—” he stumbles, “He wouldn’t leave me!” Someone catches him now—

But not the person that he wants.

The farmer gives his shoulders a reassuring squeeze. “He’s right.”

Everyone watches him, and the man clears his throat, “Those two worked my field every day last harvest—that kid was completely devoted to the little priest here.”

Xie Lian chokes back a sob. “He wouldn’t have left.”

There’s murmuring in the crowd—and then, everyone is looking.

They comb through the forest again—the shrine. The river. The path back towards town. Every time Xie Lian feels that cold brush against his cheek, he shoves it away— too impatient to feel sorry for the spirit.

“I can’t help you!” He snaps. “Find someone else!”

His voice is hoarse from screaming Hong-er’s name, but he doesn’t stop. Doesn’t give up, even when it starts to get dark, when the air gets cold enough that he can see his breath.

There’s mention of stopping for the night—but when they see that Xie Lian won’t stop…they stay.

His ankle is swollen—his feet are bleeding. As the cold sets in, his teeth start to chatter.

They press for him to go home again, to wait until morning—and each time, Xie Lian refuses.

Xie Lian doesn’t have a home to go back to, not until he finds Hong-er.

The night deepens. He walks further. Calls out until his voice is almost gone—and he never gets an answer.

Until he does.

"...Gege?"

His head whips to the side, heart leaping momentarily, but...

It's not the right voice.

It belongs to one of the farmer's sons.

Xie Lian wipes at the blood on his cheek, almost dry now. "What is it?"

"We..." The young man is hesitant, and...he doesn't sound like he's giving good news.

"We found him."

"..." Whatever color remained in Xie Lian's face slowly drains away, and it was cold before, but now...

It feels like there isn't any warmth left in the world. Like the sun died at some point after slipping beneath the horizon, never to rise again.

It won't make a difference to Xie Lian if it ever does.

"Where..." he can't keep the fear from his voice, "Where is he?"

The young man doesn't answer verbally, just takes him by the arm, leading Xie Lian back down the path.

There's a gentleness to the way he handles him, like one would with a wounded bird. "Where—?"

"He's here," another villager answers, and—

Xie Lian can hear people crying.

He stumbles forward, falling to his knees, only caught by two of the farmers, until he...

He feels it.

His hand comes into contact with a boot on the ground—and Xie Lian feels an unnamed part of him break.

Xie Lian knows those shoes.

He made them.

There's denial left in there, somewhere. Some hysterical thought that his friend could still be out there somewhere, wandering around without shoes, but...

He scrambles forward, hands frantically making their way up— Xie Lian knows those hands.

He's held them so many times.

A strangled whimper tears out of his throat, and when his hands reach for the body's face, he—

Xie Lian learns something.

Heartbreak isn't a metaphor. It's literal.

He felt it, the moment his heart died. More than a broken bone, more than a lost limb.

He knows that face.

The shape of that jaw. The curve of that mouth. The small bump in that nose. The—

The scars.

Xie Lian glances around—wondering if there's an earthquake or, for one wild moment, if he's ascending again. The ground won't stop shaking. But—?

Oh.

That's just him.

He's shaking.

Everyone falls silent, unsure of what to say, and then—

There's screaming.

Distantly, Xie Lian wonders why no one is looking for who it is.

Someone might be hurt. They might need help. He sees the farmer's son move, only to be held back.

Oh.

That's just him.

He's screaming.

His grief isn't pretty. He doesn't fall to his knees and weep beautifully in someone's arms.

Xie Lian howls, loud enough that the heavens must hear him.

Good.

He wants them to.

He wants the entire world to stop. Wants the sky to shatter. Wants the pain to explode out of him.

That would be easier than this.

When he was a child, he was horrible at being told, 'No .' He only ever heard 'maybe .' Kept his hopes up, even in vain.

He always thought things would turn out okay for him, in the end.

Xie Lian believed in happy endings, big and small.

It made it hard for him, when the answer didn't change. He struggled to accept it. He'd whine, ball his fists up and cry.

Like that could fix it. And usually, it did. Crying almost always got Xie Lian what he wanted.

But this isn't throwing a tantrum to his mother.

No matter how much he screams and cries, he won't get what he wants. No one is going to pop up with a sympathetic smile, and make the pain go away. What Xie Lian wants—no one can give to him.

No one can give Hong-er back to him. He's just gone.

That's it. That's the ending. Xie Lian can't let him go.

He finds himself kneeling on the ground, clutching Hong-er against him. The body has already gone stiff and cold.

He presses his ear against the teenager's chest—and only finds silence.

He still smells the same. Death hasn't taken that yet. Like the forest. Fresh, comforting, familiar.

Xie Lian's face is soaked with tears. Like home.

When the fury of it leaves him—there's only emptiness. Grief is a cannibalistic construct. It hollows you out, leaves you empty. Numb.

When he speaks, it's rasping—dull. "...How did it happen?"

No one seems to answer him, and Xie Lian hugs Hong-er a little closer, pressing his cheek against the teenager's shoulder. Like he used to, when he was hurting.

Back then, Hong-er would be holding him.

Hold me, he thinks desperately, blinded with pain.

Why isn't he holding me?

After a long stretch of silence, he glances around—not seeing, not really—but retracing his steps.

"...I already looked here," he mumbles, petting Hong-er's hair. It's in his face again. He'll have to comb it when they get home, the boy always forgets.

"He wasn't there before."

"...We moved him," one of the men explains carefully, watching the young man with sympathy—and wariness.

Xie Lian stares ahead blankly, trying to understand—but he can't. "Why?"

More silence follows, and Xie Lian holds the body closer. Why won't anyone answer him?!

"...It was better for you not to find him that way," one man finally answers, and Xie Lian—

He doesn't understand.

Hong-er is already—

He's already gone.

What could be worse than that? What could they possibly need to shield him from?

The silence stretches until Xie Lian can't stand it anymore, his face contorted with emotion, "ANSWER ME!"

He doesn't speak like a beggar, or a blind man. He does it with the authority of a king—the wrath of a god. Several farmers take a step back, but one remains by his side.

"...I'm so sorry," he murmurs, one hand landing on Xie Lian's shoulder. He flinches.

He doesn't want to be touched. The only hands that he wants are limp against his side. Cold. Unmoving.

"The lad suffered."

No one wanted to tell him, but there's no avoiding it.

Up until that moment—it never occurred to Xie Lian that it was more than a horrible accident. That he had wandered off in the night for some reason, fallen, and had been unable to get help.

At worst, maybe he was attacked by an animal. Or...

Xie Lian asks again, trembling; "How did it happen?"

Because he knows...Hong-er wouldn't have left without waking him up. How did Xie Lian even sleep through it to begin with? The boy was quiet, and Xie Lian was comfortable enough with him to sleep soundly, but...

His heart wrenches with guilt.

How...How was Xie Lian not able to keep him safe?

He knew how fragile human life was. He was too terrified of the boy getting sick to even let him sleep on the stairs.

How did this happen?

The tears won't stop falling.

How did Xie Lian allow this to happen?!

"...Someone hurt him," the farmer murmurs, his terms intentionally vague, and Xie Lian's expression slowly begins to change. After all—

It's not like he can see the condition of the body, not really. He only touched Hong- er's hands. His face.

Now, he starts to look.

In the only way that he can.

His hands are trembling and unsteady as they slide down the boy's chest, over his stomach—and now...Xie Lian notices what he was too frantic to feel before.

Small tears in his clothes. The familiar texture of...of dried blood.

'He suffered.'

Xie Lian was a soldier for many years. A master with most blades. He recognizes blows from a sword by touch alone.

But when he starts to probe at the wounds, most of them are shallow. Only one of them was deep enough to be fatal.

This wasn't as simple as suffering. Torture.

Hong-er was tortured.

'I don't want anything .'

Xie Lian's face sinks forward until their foreheads are pressed together.

'Gege—did you see me?'

If the teenager were still alive, his ribs would be cracking from how tightly Xie Lian is holding him.

There's something cold against his hand again.

Xie Lian doesn't have the energy to address it directly--just swats it away without a glance.

There's a question in his mind—one that he can't seem to fathom.

"...Why didn't you scream?" He mutters, clutching the boy's hair.

If he had, Xie Lian knows he would have heard. He would have come. He would have saved him.

So, why didn't he? He must have known that doing so would have been his only chance. He was childish about it when Xie Lian tried to protect him, but he never...he never would have...

And then, Xie Lian knows.

Not all at once. It comes to him slowly. Like remembering you left something behind when you're already halfway out the door, but you're not sure what. You think, toss it around in your head, but you never realize until you're already gone, and...

Then it's already too late.

Xie Lian knows why Hong-er wouldn't have screamed.

If he thought it was something Xie Lian couldn't save him from.

If he thought Xie Lian trying to save him would put the god in danger.

He would have endured anything in silence, for that.

"...I don't know if you were aware of this," one of the farmers pipes up, sounding...hesitant. "But there's a tattoo."

Xie Lian blinks slowly, all of the fight drained out of him, "...What?"

"Do you think he...had any criminal ties? I don't know, maybe...He had some enemies?"

Xie Lian shakes his head, fading into this calm kind of numbness. "No, he...he wasn't a criminal," the god explains. He started rocking at some point, he doesn't remember when. Like Hong-er is asleep, and the prince is just trying to keep him comfortable.

"He..."

Xie Lian feels his voice break, feels more tears fall. He knows he's doing those things, and at the same time—it feels completely removed from him.

"My Hong-er was a soldier."

It's quiet, then—and no one really knows what to think of the phrasing, but...they leave it be.

Finally, one of them speaks again—choosing his words carefully. "Soldiers can have enemies too, lad."

Xie Lian knows that better than anyone.

"Do you know if he had any?"

Xie Lian leans back, and for the first time in years—he mourns his sight.

He just wants to see him.

The face in his memories is a child. He—

Xie Lian wants to see the young man he crew into. He wants to see what his smile looked like. He wants to know what Hong-er's eyes looked like, when they looked at him.

More than touch, sound, or smell. Xie Lian wants the rest of it. And now, he'll never get it.

His fingers are so careful, so loving, as they smooth the front of his shirt. As he brushes his bangs away from his face. They're really a mess today. He'll—Xie Lian feels himself starting to tremble all over again. He'll have to comb it when they get home.

No matter how many times he reminds the boy, he always forgets. He—

His breaths are coming faster, on the verge of hyperventilation.

He always wants to play around with Xie Lian's hair, but he never remembers to fix his own.

"Kid?" The voice sounds like it's coming from far away, like Xie Lian is at the bottom of a lake, and someone is calling out to him from the water's edge. He looks around, disoriented, and the farmer asks again — "Did he have any enemies?"

"...No," Xie Lian whispers. "But I do."

Xie Lian knows who did this. And he knows why. There are no questions left to ask. "...Should we take this to the authorities? Maybe they can—?”

The laugh that rips out of Xie Lian is hollow. A reflex. There's no mirth.

"No," he mutters. "They can't do anything."

No one can end it. There's no winning against it. No escaping it. Xie Lian tried.

There's quiet discussions of how to deal with moving the body back down—but Xie Lian shakes his head.

"I'll carry him." His tone leaves no room for discussion.

But there is one thing...

One thing that he doesn't understand.

"Why did you move him at all?" He mutters, shaking his head. After all—it didn't do much good. Xie Lian found out, anyway.

That silence is there again, but when he lifts his chin in warning—he doesn't need to shout to get an answer.

"...We didn't move him far," one of the men murmurs, and Xie Lian frowns, fingertips digging into Hong-er's back.

"I already came this way." Xie Lian mutters, his eyebrows knitting together. "And he wasn't here."

If he finds out they're lying to him, even a little, he'll...

One of the younger men, standing just a few feet away—shudders. And when he speaks, he sounds haunted.

Like a man that's seen something that no one should.

"We just...took him down. That's all."

Xie Lian doesn't move. Not for a long time. Doesn't think. Doesn't speak.

That phrase just echoes through his head, over and over again.

Took him down.

Took him down .

Took him down .

His voice sounds so calm. Like it belongs to someone else. "Where was he?"

No one wants to answer—but there's an understanding that they don't have a choice. "Up...there."

Xie Lian lifts his chin. It's almost comical, since—obviously, he can't see. But they're in a forest. The answer isn't complicated.

"..." His fingertips drift down, brushing over Hong-er's throat.

Xie Lian doesn't ask anyone anymore questions after that.

No one else touches him. Even if they wanted to—Xie Lian won't let him go.

It's slow, carrying him down the mountainside. He's limping, cold, and tired—but he doesn't stumble. Doesn't dare drop him.

The villagers are kind enough to give him space. They don't ask questions. He's alone with him for a time, sitting on the floor of the shrine. It—

It felt like a home, before. One that they made together.

Now, it feels like a tomb.

Xie Lian's fingertips never stop caressing his face, silently trying to memorize it.

"...Handsome," he whispers.

"You didn't believe me, did you?"

His lips press together tightly, but nothing can stop the tears from falling. They never seem to stop. Xie Lian wishes he could find the part inside of him that makes him feel—and just cut it out completely.

It would be better than this.

But Hong-er was handsome. Even if he didn't believe it. Even if Xie Lian never got the chance to see him completely.

He—

Xie Lian shudders, clutching him closer.

Hong-er was beautiful. In the way that fireworks are beautiful. Burning bright in the sky, sparkling all around.

But they're always gone too fast. Before you really take it all in—and there's only smoke left behind.

"...I'm so sorry," He mumbles, wishing he had something better to say—as though—

As though anyone could hear him, anyway.

"I—” The sobs start again, wracking his frame. They don't stop for a long time.

"I should have made you leave, I..." He curls up around him, noticing--at some point, Hong-er got taller than him. Wider in the shoulders. And he didn't...

It's hard to speak through the tears, but he tries--he won't get the chance again.

"I messed up," he chokes, rocking back and forth with the teenager in his arms, remembering.

Hindsight has always been cruel to Xie Lian. So horribly unfair.

There were so many warnings. Even if what happened to his family, to Xianle wasn't enough...

The Guoshi warned him.

That day, when he told him about Hong-er's fortune. Making the offer for Xie Lian to apologize, or for one of the boy's senses to be sealed.

How the boy was born under the shadow of a curse as it was. That he-- That he wouldn't survive to adulthood.

How could Xie Lian...

How could he forget that? How could he sleep through it? How could he be so careless, allowing a human to get so close to him?

Why did he think, just because the war was over, that the rest of it was? How did Xie Lian let this happen ?

"I was selfish..." He whispers. "...because I loved you too much."

And he should have told him that. Xie Lian can't explain now why he didn't.

Maybe because...the emotion felt a little too human, and there were already so many things about the prince that made him less of a god. But...

Honger worshipped him anyway. And Xie Lian—he was always so afraid that, if he gave the boy one reason too many to realize that he wasn't special, that he was actually just...

A weak, miserable failure. A coward. So painfully, painfully human...

He thought Hong-er would leave.

And Xie Lian was so terrified of that. He had grown addicted to the sensation of being wanted. Of no longer being alone.

Xie Lian couldn't admit that Hong-er had worked his way so deeply into his heart, that having him ripped out now has left him shattered at the foundations.

There's a sharp sensation of cold pressing against his back. Xie Lian doesn't have the strength to push it away now.

He just whispers apologies to him, over and over. That he loves him. That—

That Xie Lian won't forget him. No matter what.

'You...remembered me?'

Each memory is hard to piece through, but he tries. Fights to tuck each one into his mind, wishing that he had more. Wishing—

That they'd had more time.

Eventually he falls silent, listening to the sounds of wood being moved outside, the rustling of straw.

It's a cruel echo of the past, when Hong-er would return from an afternoon of gathering firewood, stoking up the fire.

He won't ever walk through that door again—and this firewood isn't for keeping them warm in the night.

The villagers are building a pyre.

Xie Lian wishes he had more to give him—but there's nothing. He wishes now, that he'd had something left that he didn't pawn—that he didn't have to lay his final companion to rest in bloody, torn rags.

When he fumbles through their things—he does find one thing.

An earring.

Small, round; a coral bead.

"...I..." Xie Lian bites his lip, rolling the trinket around in his palm. He gave one away. That couldn't be here, but this...

"I lost this," he whispers, trying to understand how it could be here, why it would be here—and he—

He remembers.

The day he lost it. It was the day he met...

The smile that crosses his face is half agonized—half adoring. He reaches behind him, fumbling blindly until he finds Hong-er's hand, squeezing it gently.

"Shameless," he whispers.

A farmer is kind enough to lend an old set of robes—still better than what he had, but he's apologetic.

It seems to be in poor taste, after all—burning a young man in the robes of a bridegroom. Like a cruel reminder of the life he never got to live.

The life Xie Lian stole from him, with his cowardice. His selfishness. His carelessness.

He reassures the farmer that it's a kind gesture—and that it's fitting. After all—red was a part of his name. And...Xie Lian would like to think that the color hides the signs of blood.

It takes time to change him into the new clothes—a woman from the village offers to help, but Xie Lian stubbornly refuses.

He won't let anyone touch him. Not ever again.

The body under his hands isn't that of a gangly child. Not the little boy who felt so light in his arms.

Even when he fell from the sky—catching him then felt so easy.

These arms are strong. Xie Lian knew that. They felt strong when they held him. Tears sneak down his cheeks once more.

(Why isn't he holding me?)

It's the body of a man. Someone who could have been... So much more.

When it's finished, Xie Lian lifts him into his arms again—carefully descending the steps of his shrine—

Their shrine, really.

—one last time. He won't come back here again. Won't be able to stand the memories.

He's so careful, laying Hong-er down.

He smooths the robes over the young man's chest—straightens his sleeves, carefully folds his arms over his stomach.

He—he's fairly sure that the boy never had his ears pierced, so he tucks the earring against one of his palms, curling his fingers in around it.

"...You were always so silly," he whispers, fingers trembling for a moment, where they hold Hong-er's hand. "If you had asked, I would have given it to you."

But maybe it wasn't about that. Maybe it was just...

Wanting a piece of Xie Lian, when Hong-er knew he couldn't stay.

Xie Lian understands that now. He doesn't think he's ever understood anything so much in his life.

Normally, he would ask before doing such a thing, but—

Xie Lian knows that he's the only one who will mourn the child. That, in a way—he was the boy's family.

He takes a lock of hair, carefully cutting it away with a knife before tucking it into his sleeve. There's no more stalling now, so he just...

Leans in, whispering something into the young man's ear. No one else hears it—no one else is meant to.

It's only for them.

Then, he has to let Hong-er go.

He has to step back, sinking to his knees as one of the villagers comes forward, laying a torch over the straw at the bottom of the pyre.

There's heat against his cheeks, as it begins to burn—but to Xie Lian, everything still feels cold.

He slowly winds the lock of hair around his finger, the wind playing through the folds of his robes.

Xie Lian spent his entire human life trying so hard to become a god. Chasing immortality for the fame, the glory. Because it felt like his destiny. Because he...

When Xie Lian knew nothing about the world, he thought that he could save it. That he could change it.

He couldn't even save one boy.

When he was chasing immortality, he didn't understand what it was. What it meant.

The flames crackle, and snap, casting shadows across his face This is what immortality is.

It's not divine statues or worshippers. It's not fame or glory. That's godhood—and godhood doesn't last forever.

It's kneeling before the pyre of your very last believer. Alone. Knowing that even this isn't the end—even if you wish it was.

For the first time in his life, Xie Lian truly longs for death.

He resents every single one of his heartbeats. It feels like a timer, measuring the growing time between now, and when Hong-er's heart stopped.

He doesn't know how long he sits there.

Doesn't know when the snow started falling, but before long, it's all around him—in his hair, settling on his shoulders. His nose stings from it--but all of that seems so far away.

Xie Lian doesn't move until the flames burn down into embers, and hissing as snowflakes land.

Then, he begins the slow, deliberate process of collecting the ashes, sweeping them into a small red pouch. It's slow work—tedious. He burns his fingertips more than once.

He never falters—not until what remains of Hong-er is carefully sealed away, clutched tight in his hands.

Only one villager remains now—a young girl, watching Xie Lian with an odd mixture of curiosity and pity, her shawl clutched tightly around her shoulders.

Eventually, she asks—

"Just what was that boy to you?"

It takes Xie Lian a long time to answer, his head bowed. The reply he offers is deceptively simple.

"We loved each other."

Xie Lian spent far too long presuming that Hong-er's devotion was purely worshipful. And that was why Xie Lian could never tell the young man how deeply he had come to care—because to Hong-er, he was more.

More than a human being. More than small feelings like love or attachment.

It all seems so empty and silly now.

Hong-er loved him.

Xie Lian's fingers tighten around the pouch in his hands. He isn't crying anymore—he doesn't think he has any more tears left.

He loved Hong-er.

He wasn't suffering, when Hong-er was with him. He was happy.

And because of that, someone took him away.

Xie Lian leaves the village the same day. He finds a small leather cord, using it to hang Hong-er's pouch around his neck. He doesn't look back.

The Ghost fire follows.

At first, it’s hard for Xie Lian to know. It doesn’t have the energy to do more than just trail behind him—and the god isn’t looking for another presence, isn’t trying to detect the scent of spiritual energy.

Xie Lian only realizes it’s there when it bumps up against his back. He flinches from it—stumbling, almost falling over.

Finally, he whips around, glaring blindly. “Would you just—!”

Then, he stops.

Xie Lian cannot see the flame in front of him—can’t even feel any warmth from it.

And even without the shackle around his eyes, grief blinds him.

He could only focus on one thing at a time, before. Finding Hong-er. And he couldn’t give the little flame much thought, then. He was so afraid. Trying to deny what he knew, in his heart, had happened.

And when he found the body, there was only grief. It swallowed him whole. Now—the pain is still there. It’s overwhelming. Suffocating, even.

But when Xie Lian reaches out, fingers trembling—the fire rushes straight into his palm, tingling against his skin.

He’s afraid to ask. He’s so, so afraid of being wrong. But...

“...Hong-er?” He whispers.

It’s almost too much to hope for. The young man was a soldier, yes—but he didn’t die on the battlefield. And while he had the potential to cultivate...he never had the chance.

It’s possible that his spirit could have formed like this—but a very, very slim possibility.

The Ghost Fire doesn’t answer.

“...” Xie Lian waits, waits, and waits. Until his hopes slowly fade again, and his lips twist into a bitter frown.

Hong-er would answer him. No matter what he had to do.

Xie Lian let's go, turning away—and when he speaks, his tone is frigid. "If you're not him, then get lost."

For a time—he doesn't feel it again. Part of him starts to wonder if the little creature actually listened.

But there's the occasional brush against his palm. The scent of spiritual power on the air when he breathes in.

His jaw clenches.

At first—he's so resentful of the creature. Xie Lian can't figure out why it's haunting him with such determination—

Unless it's him.

And if it is him, Xie Lian can't understand why it won't tell him.

It's been a long time since the god had to travel alone. He isn't used to it anymore.

It doesn't necessarily hurt, when he falls. The sting in his hands and knees is nothing compared to the void in the place of the arms that used to catch him.

It isn't exactly unbearable, going hungry. The constant ache in his stomach is just…

A painful reminder of the mornings when he would wake up to a plate of fruits, not knowing who left them there.

He falls asleep hungry these days. He wakes up hungry.

Times are difficult. Work is hard to come by for an able bodied man—non-existent for a blind man.

People aren't as charitable as they used to be.

If he finds a barn to sleep in, he's lucky. More often than not, Xie Lian finds himself curled up in a ditch on the side of the road.

It could be worse. He wears an extra robe these days, over his own.

It used to be Hong-er’s.

Not the one from that day. Xie Lian burned the bloody clothes in a separate pile from the pyre.

He had grown out of this one, towards the end. Xie Lian had been planning on letting it out a little for him—but he never got around to it.

It still smells like him.

But some nights, it can’t keep the chill from sinking past his skin.

Xie Lian trembles, curling into a ball as the snow falls around him. He won’t die, no matter how cold he gets.

He isn’t that lucky.

He clutches the pouch around his neck, fingers stiff, remembering.

How he used to lie, just to get the boy to come inside from the Shrine steps.

The way he had to coax him into sleeping beside him.

There’s no lie in Xie Lian’s voice now as he trembles, curling into the tiniest ball that he can, whispering into the night—

“S…so cold…”

He can’t see the way the ghost fire rushes to his side, pressing against the front of his robes—burning so brightly, with everything that it has, but…It’s no use.

A ghost fire always burns cold.

I Don't Believe You

Chapter Summary

> "Do you have an unfulfilled wish?" He murmurs, tilting his face forward, "Something...keeping you here?"
>
> "Yes."
>
> Xie Lian lets out a soft breath. Well—that's something he might be able to help with, if it's something simple. At least he can try.
>
> "What is it?"
>
> The spirit bounces again, cool flames lightly brushing against the prince's nose.
>
> "I still have someone precious in this world."

Chapter Notes

> If you want to hear more about this story, find me on twitter, and follow the current updates of this story here!
>
> Fan art will be linked at the bottom of the chapter, please support the artists for their hard work! And to the artists, thank you so much for making such beautiful artwork, it's so special to me!
>
> Evie

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Traveling is slow, when he's like this–and for the first few weeks, he doesn't have any particular destination in mind. Planning ahead means having any form of motivation, and he...

Eventually, the thing that sharpens his focus is fear.

He knows who hurt Hong-er. He knows why.

When he lays alone, in the dark, shivering from the cold–he knows why.

Because Xie Lian was...looking back on it, if he had taken a moment to step away from his own self pity, he was healing. Having Hong-er by his side–

It had been saving him, bit by bit.

But Hong-er isn't the only person capable of doing that. He isn't the only person in the world that cares about Xie Lian.

Now that the god knows what level that creature is willing to stoop to in order to get to him...he has to know.

Did that thing find his parents? Or Feng Xin? Or Mu Qing?

Slowly, knowing it might be impossible to find them in this state, knowing that Feng Xin would have hidden them well...

The crown prince returns to Xianle.

Unlike every other traveler on the road–his shadow burns in the dark, gently floating along.

Each time the Ghost Fire brushes against him, Xie Lian asks the same question, fingertips trembling as they cup the spirit in his hands.

"Hong-er?" He pleads, pressing the flame to his forehead, lips trembling. "Is that you?"

He pleads, but it never answers.

For a time, Xie Lian assumed that was because the spirit didn't have enough power to speak. But if that were true, how could it have followed him for so long?

It's easier to be recognized here, in familiar territory–and the royal family is still being hunted.

He resorts to using a silk band to wrap the lower half of his face–in this state, with his eyes covered, barely any part of his face is visible.

Many take pity on him. Assume he was a casualty of the war. Some think he's a survivor of the plague.

They toss the beggar scraps.

One night, no matter how hungry he might be–he can't force himself to stomach the stale, crumbling chunk of bread in his hands. He tosses it away, taking shelter from the rain--settling down beneath a bridge. Maybe he'll find sleep tonight. Maybe he won't.

He breathes in through his nose--and he senses it there.

Spiritual power.

"..." He lifts his hand without speaking–and just as it always does, the Ghost Fire flies into his palm, nuzzling against his skin. In another life, the gesture would have made Xie Lian smile.

Smiling doesn't come easily anymore.

He tries again–Xie Lian doesn't know why–asking the same question that he always does.

"Hong-er?"

This time, he isn't surprised when he gets no reply. Just...tired.

In a moment of frustration–he shoves the spirit away.

He curls up into a ball, pulling his robes tighter around him. It's not much—but he's gotten better at keeping himself warm these days.

"If you aren't him, then why are you here?" He whispers, desperately wishing the creature would leave him be.

This hurts too much.

He keeps finding himself hoping, against everything in his body telling him that he shouldn't, that Hong-er's voice will answer.

How cruel a thing to pray for. That his loved one won't Rest In Peace. Hong-er deserves that.

He—

"Your Highness."

Xie Lian goes perfectly still.

The voice isn't one that he immediately recognizes—faint, breathy. More like if a breeze could form words.

As is the way with most spirits of such a nature, but still, Xie Lian clings onto some small shred of hope.

"...You know me?"

The Ghost Fire bounces lightly in his palm. "Of course, I know you!"

There's a childlike eagerness to it. One that feels so eager, the hope in Xie Lian's chest swells, and he tries again , desperately praying for an answer.

"Is it you, Hong-er?" Silence.

For the first time in weeks, Xie Lian feels his eyes sting. It can speak, but it won't answer to that name. It—

A set of tears slip down his cheeks as the last little bit of hope in his chest is snuffed out.

It isn't him.

It isn't Hong-er.

If it was, Hong-er would answer him.

But then...why is this spirit following him?

For a moment, he wonders if it's a soldier from Yong'an, taking the chance to taunt him, but...It's been following Xie Lian since he left the village, far from their borders —and it doesn't feel malicious.

Then, he realizes—and the god's mouth fills with the bitter taste of shame.

Xie Lian was probably the only cultivator around for miles. With the war over, many were dead—and those who weren't fled to peaceful kingdoms, better lands for spiritual cultivation.

The poor thing was probably just looking for someone to help it move on, and Xie Lian ignored it

"I'm sorry," he mumbles, wiping at his cheeks, "I'm sorry, I'll..."

Xie Lian swallows thickly, thinking about all the weeks he left the spirit to trail behind him, silently waiting for him to stop and look.

"I'll help you now," he sits forward, and brow knitting in concentration.

He performs a quick service—it's the first time he's thought about anything close to his cultivation in months—and gives the fire a soft push, encouraging it to float back up into the air, to pass on.

And still..

The little fire comes right back down, landing in his palm.

"..." Xie Lian frowns, struggling to remember what could have gone wrong—why it's still here . "...Did I miss a step?"

"No," he jumps when the spirit replies again, airy words whispering through the stillness of the night, "dianxia didn't do anything wrong."

His frown only deepens as he breathes in again, fingertips gently curling around the fire as he brings it closer.

It's interesting—most docile ghost fires are freshly deceased, too scattered to have a real consciousness, much less speak.

The ones that can are notoriously skittish—aware of how defenseless their spirits are, how easy it would be for them to be dispersed.

But this one is different.

It speaks clearly—shows strong awareness, and yet, it's perfectly content to sit in the palm of Xie Lian's hand.

Even when his fingers squeeze around it—so close to a movement that could crush it —the spirit doesn't even flinch. If anything, it presses closer.

And when Xie Lian probes closer, he finds something else there—trace amounts of another spirit, this one...

Distinctly demonic.

"...Did someone curse you?" Xie Lian murmurs. "Is that why you can't move on?"

He doesn't have enough spiritual power to deal with something like that. Maybe Feng Xin or Mu Qing could, if Xie Lian could manage to find them.

"No," the voice answers softly. "That isn't why."

Xie Lian frowns, wanting to ponder the matter more, because if the rite was performed correctly, that the spirit should have—

"I'm the one who didn't want to leave," the voice echoes slightly, barely audible over the patter of the rain. "That's all."

There's a painful pang of fondness in Xie Lian's chest.

He's developed a particular appreciation for that kind of blind— almost psychotic— level of determination.

"Do you have an unfulfilled wish?" He murmurs, tilting his face forward, "Something…keeping you here?"

"Yes."

Xie Lian lets out a soft breath. Well—that's something he might be able to help with, if it's something simple. At least he can try.

"What is it?"

The spirit bounces again, cool flames lightly brushing against the prince's nose.

"I still have someone precious in this world."

"…" Xie Lian's lips press together tightly, holding back an emotional response. "I see. Is it your wife?"

"We were never married," the voice replies easily. "In fact—I'm not sure that they knew how I really felt."

The god frowns, raising an eyebrow.

With that kind of devotion? To linger on, even in this form?

What kind of blind fool would fail to take notice? "How could that be?"

Who could fight so hard to linger on for someone who didn't even realize how much they cared?

Just how beautiful must such a person be?

The flame wobbles in the air for a moment, shying away from Xie Lian's hand— almost sheepish.

"I…didn't know how to tell them, dianxia," the voice whispers. "I was afraid."

Oh.

Xie Lian's chest aches .

He reaches out again, pulling the spirit back in—never minding the cold. “I understand,” he replies, more sincere than he’s ever been in his life.

He made the same mistake, over and over again. Sometimes, he thinks—if their positions had been reversed, he might be a ghost fire too.

Xie Lian couldn’t have left Hong-er alone. Even if he...

Even if he was too much of a coward to tell the young man what he felt. Or the depth of it.

After taking a moment to compose himself, he manages to ask;

“What is your wish, then?”

It doesn’t sound like a problem with a simple answer, but maybe...

“I want to protect them.”

That, Xie Lian cannot help with. No one can.

No one can protect anyone in this world. He’s learned that lesson over and over again now.

“...But you don’t belong in this world anymore,” he whispers. “What of it?”

Xie Lian’s lips twitch.

He knows it isn’t him. He does.

But there have been several moments talking to this spirit when Xie Lian has felt the echoes of him. Faint reminders that hurt as much as they make him smile.

(Shameless.)

“If you stay, you won’t be able to Rest In Peace,” he points out gently.

“I pray to never Rest In Peace.”

Xie Lian’s lips tremble—and he can’t seem to figure out whether or not he wants to laugh, or cry.

He feels that way more and more often now.

"If your beloved knew you couldn't Rest In Peace because of them...they might feel guilty about it," he tries again in vain.

The spirit doesn't seem particularly troubled. "Then, I just won't let them know why I haven't gone."

How childish. They make it sound so simple.

"...Anyone would notice something like that sooner or later," Xie Lian points out.

No one could ever be THAT blind.

When the spirit replies, it's voice is dry—almost a little sarcastic, like it's muttering under its breath and doesn't ACTUALLY intend for the god to hear.

"You would be surprised."

Xie Lian pauses, raising an eyebrow—but the fire continues on like nothing was said at all;

"I just won't let them find out that I'm protecting them either."

"..."

Even now, knowing that this isn't the boy that he loved—Xie Lian can't stop his heart from feeling a little moved by the depth and sincerity of such devotion. But...

This man clearly died young.

In a time such as this—it would be from the war, or the plague. Either one, Xie Lian is responsible for.

And given how friendly the spirit is towards him, how quickly he recognized him—he must have been from Xianle.

"...The war took you away from the person you love."

He whispers the words with a ringing sort of finality, knowing them to be true. "...I'm sorry I didn't win."

He forgot what this guilt felt like. Hong-er made it so much easier to live with. The ghost fire presses closer, nuzzling against Xie Lian's cheek.

Thunder rumbles.

“To die for you is my greatest honor.”

Xie Lian’s lips tremble once more.

It’s something they used to cheer over and over again, drilling the words into young men sent to fight for Xianle;

“To die in battle for the crown prince is the greatest honor for a Xianle soldier.”

It seems too shameful now, to teach boys who were little more than children such a thing.

As if they could ever understand what dying truly meant.

He doesn’t notice the fact that the spirit never said anything about dying in battle— only dying for him.

Two very different things.

Xie Lian fills in the blanks on his own, eyes swimming with tears. You would think he would have none left by now—but he always seems to find more.

“I’m sorry,” he chokes, letting the spirit go, “forget me.”

The cold flares near his face, like the flame is burning brighter. “I won’t forget, your highness.”

That, Xie Lian very much doubts. The world has such a short memory for beautiful, shiny things.

That’s all he ever was. A beautiful, unobtainable object. And the moment he stopped shining so brightly, he was tossed aside.

Everyone will forget.

“I am forever your most devoted believer.”

That makes Xie Lian recoil, scrambling back until his shoulders press against the stone supports of the bridge.

“...No,” he mutters, shaking his head. “I’m sorry, but you’re not.” The fire drifts closer, “I am.”

Xie Lian cringes away.

His hands tremble, clutching at the pouch around his neck.

“My—My most devoted believer…” His voice is so fragile.

Xie Lian remembers a time when he would speak, and the world would listen. Now, he can barely raise his voice over the rain.

He hunches forward, holding Hong-er.

The sob that tears from him comes from somewhere so deep, the sound itself is painful against his ear.

“He’s gone .” Xie Lian croaks, tears slipping down his cheeks.

The Ghost Fire tries to slip into the circle of his arms, to press against him, but the god won’t allow it.

He hugs his arms closer, shrinking away, trembling all over—and when the voice speaks again, there’s a clear note of distress.

“I AM your most devoted believer, dianxia.”

Xie Lian whips his head back and forth, unable to ever accept such a thing. “No!” Even if he could—

No one could take Hong-er’s place. Not now. Not EVER.

The ghost fire is so stubborn, repeating it over and over again, until Xie Lian can’t stand it, snapping a question when he already knows what the answer will be.

“Are you Hong-er?!”

Silence.

Xie Lian’s smile isn’t happy. It never is—not anymore.

“Then you’re not.” He mutters, shaking his head. “And you should forget about me.” “I won’t.”

The young man gnashes his teeth together, and now, he’s trembling from frustration.

“People who believe in me—” Xie Lian lifts the pouch in his hand, trembling from how tight his grip has become, “They end up like

THIS!" He cries. "Either they forget about me, or they die alone, in pain—and I can't even PROTECT them!"

Thunder crashes again, even louder now.

For a moment, there's only silence—and Xie Lian begins to wonder if maybe...he's managed to scare the spirit off. That's probably for the best, he—

"Well, dianxia doesn't have to worry about me dying." The tone is, once again, dry—but playful.

He—?

Xie Lian, in spite of everything, barks out a surprised laugh.

"I—You!" Then, he catches himself—and he turns his head away, feeling like a spiteful child, refusing to allow himself to be cheered up.

He doesn't want to laugh. He doesn't want comfort. "Shut up!"

He tucks Hong-er back into his shirt, bowing his head once more. "You'll forget me— or you'll end up destroyed—so just go!"

The voice isn't so playful now—and the fire stays close, even if it won't touch him again. "I won't."

Silently, Xie Lian begins to weep. "You will," he croaks.

There was only one person who thought all of this was worth it. That Xie Lian was worth it.

He's gone now.

Xie Lian failed him. Just like he's always failed everyone else.

The Ghost Fire hovers just over his head, like it's afraid to touch him now.

When it speaks again—it's voice isn't so cocksure and stubborn. It's pleading—with an edge of desperation that is almost familiar.

"Dianxia, believe me!" Coldness brushes against his hair, and Xie Lian flinches.

The voice is so much smaller now, unbearably sad.

“...please, believe me,” It pleads, and Xie Lian can’t see the way it trembles—how it burns just a little dimmer when the god sinks down to the ground, curling into a small, shivering ball.

“...I don’t believe you,” The god whispers. He can’t.

He doesn’t even believe in himself.

It takes him months, but he finds his family.

Or, more accurately—they find him.

Xie Lian is sitting on the side of the road, taking slow, reluctant bites of a stale, slightly molded bun. It’s objectively horrible, but...

It’s been four dates since he had anything at all.

He hears the occasional sets of footsteps, ox carts rolling by. There’s a town, two miles down the road. No one bothers him—eventually, if he waits long enough, there’s usually someone willing to toss a coin or two, or maybe offer a ride on the back of their wagon.

Now—he feels pressure on the back of his shoulder—then, hears the words— “Your highness?!”

At first, he whips his head around out of habit, ready to snarl the words, ‘go away!’ Because that stubborn little spirit is relentless , but—

He knows that voice.

“...” His lips tremble. “...Feng Xin?”

The hand on his shoulder is warm, strong—and when he hears that voice again, Xie Lian’s chest bursts with this overwhelming flood of emotion—

“It’s me, your highness.” Relief. Comfort. Safety.

Oh god, it’s—it’s actually him.

It’s been nearly two years since they’ve seen one another—and the guard is startled by how much his prince has changed in that time.

He’s so thin, pale—hair completely loose and unkempt. Nearly unrecognizable from who he used to be, but—

That isn’t the most startling thing.

Xie Lian was never quite so stiff as the king, or out of touch as the queen. He was kind, empathetic—but there was always some degree of decorum to him. A poised air that came with being born into royalty.

Now the young man throws himself into Feng Xin's arms, biting back tears. "You're okay ," he whispers, holding on so tight, his friend lets out a pained grunt.

"Of—Of course I'm alright, your highness, but—you're forgetting your strength—!" Oh, right.

He hasn't touched someone living since...

Xie Lian's smile dims, but his grip loosens.

When it does, Feng Xin leans back, getting a better look at the prince's face—and when he does, he frowns.

"...What happened here?" He mutters, gently probing a bruise under Xie Lian's right eye with his fingertips.

The god thinks on it, squinting.

"I think...it must have been from when I got robbed yesterday."

Well, 'robbed' being a loose word. All they did was rough him up a bit and take the food he had managed to scavenge—

(Hence why he was desperate enough to eat a molded meat bun.)

"You were robbed?!"

Feng Xin sounds almost dumbstruck—and infuriated. "Who would rob a blind person?!"

"..." Xie Lian let out a tired snort, his voice dry— "You would be surprised."

It's happened more than once.

Feng Xin pauses—then he frowns.

He can't ever remember his friend sounding so... Bitter. Utterly cynical.

The guard frowns—and instead of probing the bruise now, he's cupping Xie Lian's cheek, gently brushing his hair back beneath his ear.

For Xie Lian, who has already been completely robbed of one sense—going so long without touch has been...difficult.

The only contact he's had since that night with Hong-er has been the cold brush of the Ghost Fire against his skin, or the feeling of a fist crashing into him.

So this—this small show of physical affection has the prince immediately leaning into it, shivering.

Feng Xin frowns, trying to understand the change in behavior. "What—? OW!"

He jerks away from Xie Lian with a glare, looking around—and the prince sits there, looking around, trying to understand what's going on. "Feng Xin?!"

"It's alright, just..." He rubs the side of his head.

"A ghost fire just slammed into me," the former Junior official glances around until he finds the thing, glaring—and Xie Lian sighs.

"Oh—don't worry about him."

Feng Xin glares at the green flame hovering a few feet away from him, "Why?!"

"He won't hurt you," Xie Lian sighs.

"...Not from lack of trying," Feng Xin grumbles, still rubbing his head.

The fire hovers closer to Xie Lian's head, and Feng Xin swears—the way it bounces in the air almost seems taunting.

"Pervert."

The official's eyes widen sharply, reaching out to snatch the spirit. "You little—!"

The moment Xie Lian senses his friend snatching for the Ghost Fire, his expression completely changes.

He uses one hand to pull the little fire close, his other smacking Feng Xin's arm away. "Don't hurt it!"

“...” The guard stares. “...Your highness...”

He takes in how quickly the prince is breathing, how tightly he’s holding the little fire —and the fact that the spirit seems perfectly content with it’s predicament, despite the fact that Xie Lian could crush him at any moment.

“...Are you ATTACHED to that thing?”

“...He’s just...” Xie Lian coughs, clutching both arms around the little fire. The cold used to bother him—but it’s getting warmer outside these days, and Xie Lian’s gotten used to it. “He’s annoying and stubborn and stupid, but...he’s just...”

Feng Xin is staring like he’s lost it.

“...A silly little guy,” Xie Lian finishes, nodding rather seriously.

He can’t see Feng Xin’s expression, but he can hear the incredulousness of his tone. “...Your highness...”

Xie Lian hums, parting the ghost fire absentmindedly, like the little freak was ACTUALLY scared. “Hmm?”

“...Have you been drinking?”

It’s hard to read Xie Lian’s expression when so much of his face is covered—but when Feng Xin looks closely, he can see the shape of an awkward smile beneath the silk band around the lower half of his face.

“Ah...not...not purposefully?”

Feng Xin leans in and sniffs—and there’s definitely a hint of alcohol hanging around the God’s body. “What is that supposed to mean?!”

The smile on Xie Lian’s face isn’t awkward anymore—just bitter. His tone is equally so.

“I take whatever people give me, Feng Xin.”

The first couple of incidents were cruel jokes. Hand a cup of liquor to a blind man and tell him it’s water, just to watch him choke.

Xie Lian was so thirsty once, he didn’t bother to smell first—and he did.

Hong-er caught someone trying to do that a few months ago.

He broke the man’s nose, even when Xie Lian tried to laugh it off, saying no harm was done.

Xie Lian still remembers how surprised he was by the strength in the boy’s hand when he gripped the god’s wrist, stopping him from raising the cup to his lips.

His skin feels hot now, when he thinks about that moment–but the god couldn't tell you why.

All he knows is that remembering the teenager fills his heart with this miserable sort of ache.

Up until now, Xie Lian had never needed to mourn someone. Grief is...a learning process.

It's sort of like having a broken bone. He's alright, when he doesn't think about it. When he doesn't move around too much.

But when he remembers Hong-er, thinks about the things that he loved about him, it's...

The pain can be so jarring, sometimes–it almost frightens him. But he also promised that he wouldn't forget him, so...

"...What about your cultivation?"

The prince glances up, suddenly remembering that he was in the middle of a conversation. He isn't used to talking to people anymore–he's out of practice.

"What?"

Feng Xin frowns.

"If you've been drinking–how are you supposed to cultivate properly?"

It isn't as easy to shrug it off with Feng Xin as it would be with anyone else--he's Xie

Lian's best friend, after all...and they practice the same method.

The prince grimaces.

He never said that he had been drinking habitually, never even implied it, but...

Feng Xin seemed to gather that passers by are more likely to give Xie Lian liquor than water. After all--they're still recovering from a drought.

(A bitter subject, obviously.)

"I...Uh..."

Xie Lian doesn't have the heart to admit the truth: that he hasn't thought about cultivation at all. Not in months.

When they went their separate ways--the idea was that Xie Lian was going to be focusing exclusively on that. It was the only way he could get Feng Xin to allow it.

To be fair: in part, Xie Lian did have such intentions, he just...

He had no idea how hard it would be, all on his own. And when he was with Hong-er, he just...

"I've...switched cultivation methods," he mumbles, rubbing his cheek. "Alcohol doesn't factor in anymore."

Feng Xin raises an eyebrow, "Which method are you using now?"

"..." Xie Lian's chin dips lower, and he mumbles something under his breath.

(The 'winging it' method.)

His friend leans forward, "What was that?"

The Ghost Fire lurches from Xie Lian's arms with a sudden jerk.

It's so sudden, Feng Xin doesn't have a chance to react before it smacks straight into his forehead with a surprising amount of force, sending the junior official sprawling. "He said to mind your own business!"

Xie Lian watches the scene (well, stares in the general direction).

"...That isn't what I said," he mumbles, somewhat cluelessly–reaching over to snatch the ghost fire up again when he senses Feng Xin lunging. "I said not to hurt it!"

Feng Xin glares, an angry red mark already forming on his forehead. "That thing is a MENACE!"

“He’s going through a lot,” Xie Lian mutters.

“Like what?!”

“Oh, I don’t know,” the god responds dryly, his tone suddenly sarcastic, “the afterlife?”

That shuts Feng Xin right up, his cheeks slightly flushed, and the Ghost Fire trembles in Xie Lian’s arms...

...Almost like it's laughing at him.

"That isn't an excuse to body slam people!"

"He doesn't have a body," Xie Lian reminds him helpfully. "And you're the older one."

Well that just makes Feng Xin feel like a scolded child.

"If you want to fight someone, you can pick someone your own size."

Xie Lian says it pleasantly, but the implication is clear–if Feng Xin actually did want to hurt the spirit, he would have to go through Xie Lian first.

And, well...

They always used to joke that the prince could take on an entire battalion blindfolded, with one hand tied behind his back--but there was really nothing comedic about it.

And Xie Lian still has both hands, even now.

"...I won't bother him if he doesn't bother me."

Feng Xin is grumbling, crossing his arms over his chest, and to the man's faint disgust...Xie Lian is actually petting the little spirit.

"Be good," he mumbles, somewhat stern.

And the way the fire bobs up and down—it's almost like it's nodding.

Xie Lian smiles, looking up. "It won't bother you."

Feng Xin seems doubtful of that, crossing his arms over his chest, but...he sighs, looking Xie Lian over. "What–?"

Before he can ask, the prince interrupts him, "Can you take me to my parents?" He murmurs. "Are they alright?"

Feng Xin lets out a sigh.

"...Yeah," he mumbles, pushing himself to his feet, reaching down to take Xie Lian's hand, "I can take you to them."

The prince pauses, a little startled by the feeling of someone else's hand in his own. It's been...

He swallows thickly, allowing Feng Xin to help him up. ...It's been so long.

His hand is larger than Xie Lian's, warm–fingers slightly rougher than his own, but... Not the same as the hands that helped him up before.

The Ghost Fire floats along behind them as they walk–and Xie Lian can't see but...

It looks a little dejected.

Feng Xin isn't bad, as far as guides go. (It's not like Xie Lian has a broad frame of reference.) He doesn't let the prince fall, always catches him on every stumble, but...

Xie Lian is realizing now, how careful Hong-er was, how gentle.

Always holding him by the wrist and elbow, always attentively looking in the path ahead for possible obstacles, warning the prince to step over. And if Xie Lian did stumble, Hong-er would catch him with both arms before Xie Lian's weight could come down in the slightest.

Feng Xin is attentive too–but gentleness doesn't come to him as easily. When he catches Xie Lian from a stumble, the grip on his wrist becomes bruising. Sometimes he'll accidentally twist it...

All of this makes Xie Lian sound ungrateful--he isn't. He just... Xie Lian just misses his...his...

...His Hong-er. That's all.

The fact that the prince has become so quiet hasn't slipped Feng Xin's notice--not in the slightest. And, carefully, he starts to ask the question that had been on his mind before.

"Your highness?"

"...Hmm?"

"What..." Feng Xin glances him over, "...What happened, while you were away?"

"..." Xie Lian's relieved for the silk band around his face now–it hides the way his lips tremble. "I...was in one of my shrines," he murmurs. "In the north."

There's more to it than that.

Feng Xin can tell. It's not that Xie Lian was vain before. He...actually did have moments of vanity, but he was never above getting messy when the situation required it.

But right now, Feng Xin's prince looks like he's completely forgotten what he once was.

He doesn't speak in the same way–his personality is...It's changed.

"What happened, while you were there?" Feng Xin's voice is rarely gentle–but it always is for him. Patient might be a better word--either way, Xie Lian always feels safe to take his time to respond.

And it does take Xie Lian time. Several minutes of walking–but Feng Xin doesn't ask again. He knows that his prince is thinking about it.

"...I met someone...very special to me," Xie Lian explains carefully. "And we...became quite close."

Feng Xin's eyes widen slightly.

It's no small thing for Xie Lian to become close with anyone. That was the part of Mu Qing–

(He grits his teeth now, even thinking of that name.)

That was the part of Mu Qing that always infuriated Feng Xin. Always too absorbed with himself to understand the actual situation.

Xie Lian is kind. He's always been sweet tempered–but people often mistake that for openness, and it isn't. He was raised to understand that everyone was below him, Mu Qing wasn't wrong about that, but...

He was also raised to understand that people would always want things from him. It was rare for Xie Lian to let his guard down.

And as his guard—no, as his best friend–Feng Xin never did either. Even less so.

The fact that he took Mu Qing under his wing was highly unusual.

It took time. But once he started to view the boy that started as a mere servant as an actual companion...his admiration and respect for Mu Qing were obvious.

Well, to everyone but the man himself.

And even that took quite some time. Years, in fact.

So, the thought that someone could become so close to him, so quickly, particularly when Xie Lian was in such a vulnerable state...

It's shocking.

"...Where are they now?" Feng Xin questions, and this time, the silence stretches for so long that he feels like it won't end.

Long enough that he starts to glance over Xie Lian again–and now, he notices the leather cord around the prince's neck, the small pouch dangling from it, and he reaches without thinking. "What is–?"

Xie Lian yanks out of his grip, both hands clutching the pouch tightly.

For a moment, he doesn't speak, his breaths quick and shallow, shoulders trembling.

He can't–

He can't let anyone else touch him again. Not–Not ever again.

Feng Xin is silent, watching as the prince struggles to compose himself.

The answer to his question is obvious, now.

In a rare show of perceptiveness, he doesn't ask anything more.

He doesn't take Xie Lian to the King and Queen immediately, no–seeing him in such a state would be too upsetting. There's a mountain stream, near their hiding place–clean, private.

The Ghost Fire zooms off the moment that Feng Xin begins the process of helping Xie Lian out of his robes, swerving behind a tree.

Feng Xin stares after it, as he helps his friend bathe.

"...That is the weirdest spirit I have ever encountered," the guard mutters.

Xie Lian doesn't disagree–but the smile on his face is a little too fond not to be called endeared.

"He's...unique."

"Why is he so obsessed with you?"

"...I think obsessed is a strong word," Xie Lian frowns, but...Feng Xin finds it pretty appropriate. Finally, he shrugs.

"He...was one of my believers, when he was alive."

"..." Feng Xin focuses on scrubbing his hair, only grunting in response. He's slightly more generous with the little ghost fire after hearing that, however.

He struggles with Xie Lian's hair, after all–there's so much of it.

Eventually he has to settle for the only hairstyle he's really mastered—a high, tight ponytail. It doesn't look too bad on the prince, actually—it reminds Feng Xin of when they were still boys, training under the Guoshi on Mount Taicang.

It makes him look younger. Softer.

(If they still WERE those boys, Xie Lian would have whined about how the weight of his hair tugged on his scalp—that Feng Xin pulled it too tight, but...he's missed his friend too much to complain.

Eventually, he asks about where Mu Qing is—and Feng Xin's response is hesitant.

“...He left, your highness. Not long after you did.” Feng Xin mutters, helping Xie Lian into a clean set of robes. They belong to his friend—much too big for him, but...

It’s been months since Xie Lian felt clean. Taken care of.

Xie Lian is quiet, thinking that over. “...Did he say why?”

Feng Xin stares at the shape of the prince's back, wishing that he could read him the way that he used to. There's a blankness to him, now.

But Feng Xin is honest with him, as always.

"He didn't think his staying did much good for anyone." He mutters.

Which is exactly what Mu Qing said at the time—but Feng Xin has never described it that way until now. Typically, he's a little less...generous.

"...I see." Xie Lian murmurs, his shoulders a little straighter—his tone is complicated, straddling emotions. "That's...good."

Feng Xin stares, unable to fathom how that could be a...good thing. "...You think so?"

Xie Lian nods, reaching for the pouch. He set it down on the river bank while he was bathing, memorizing the spot—and when he feels Hong-er against his chest, he breathes a little easier.

He doesn't explain why—can't bring himself too, but—

'At least...he's safer, this way. '

When he's dressed, he's still thin—but far more presentable than he was when Feng Xin found him on the street—

And he does something odd. Odd for him, anyway.

He grabs Feng Xin's hand.

The young man pauses, half convinced that Xie Lian just wanted them to go ahead and get moving, and this was his way of asking Feng Xin to show him the way, but—

Xie Lian hasn't moved yet, and his head is bowed.

"You...were taking care of them alone, all this time?"

Feng Xin just nods at first, the movement stiff—before he remembers that he has to answer verbally, when it comes to Xie Lian. "...Yes, your highness."

Xie Lian is gripping his hand so tightly, it's almost painful.

“...Oh, Feng Xin,” he murmurs, his voice heavy. Sorrowful. “I’m so sorry.”

His friend pauses—unsure of how to respond, and just...stunned.

It’s not something that Xie Lian would have ever thought about before. Much less apologized for. Of course, Feng Xin stayed, even when Mu Qing left.

Those were his orders. Simple as that.

And maybe, if the last year of his life hadn’t happened, Xie Lian wouldn’t have thought about it that way at all.

Wouldn’t have known how it might feel to be alone, when everyone else has left you. To feel forgotten.

Xie Lian spent so long worrying about Hong-er’s future, wrestling with the guilt of stealing it away from him—knowing that the boy would follow him to the ends of the earth, if Xie Lian never stopped him.

Now, he’s realizing he never once thought of Feng Xin’s future before.

His position in the royal household was prestigious, he was groomed and selected for it from boyhood. Their futures—they were always so closely intertwined.

There was so much Xie Lian was going to give to him back then—he never gave much thought to how much Feng Xin did for him.

But that isn’t true anymore.

Xie Lian can’t give Feng Xin anything at all. He’s—

The prince is quiet, the entire walk back.

He’s only a burden, now—and Feng Xin is too loyal to discard him. And Xie Lian knows, if he had learned his lesson...he would make his friend leave.

Before that thing comes back. Before Xie Lian is crawling through the woods, screaming his name.

Before Xie Lian is standing before his funeral pyre.

He forces smiles, when he sees his parents. Demurs when his mother crows over how thin he’s become. Chokes down her…‘cooking.’

It's hard for them to see him this way, and...even if Xie Lian can't 'see' them, it...isn't easy for him, either.

He can hear the slight wheeze to his father's breaths—the faint bubbling from his lungs. When he asks Feng Xin about it, his friend tells him it's been ongoing.

When he asks his father—the man just scowls, grumbling something about how, compared to what's happened to Xie Lian, a little cough is nothing.

He isn't sure if the King means that as a way of saying, 'Worry about yourself, not me,' or, 'You're the weaker one.'

Later, when the man has already gone to bed, and Feng Xin is busy cleaning the dishes from dinner, Xie Lian finds himself sitting with his mother, leaning his cheek against her shoulder as she rubs his back, stroking her fingers through his hair.

"My sweet boy..." She hums. "I missed you so, so much..."

The last time Xie Lian was in someone's arms like this, they were Hong-er's. There's a soft, maternal familiarity. He takes comfort in it, but...

God, he misses what he's lost.

"...I'm sorry I was gone for so long," he whispers.

The Queen doesn't guilt him for that. Unless Xie Lian was arguing with his father, she never made him feel sorry for anything.

Her palm presses against his cheek, stroking the bruise under his eye, and still—she doesn't ask.

But she does have one question.

"Something's hurting you," She murmurs. "More than before."

And it was hard to imagine, before, that anything could hurt more than the shame of failure. Of banishment.

Xie Lian didn't know anything back then. He bites his lip.

It's the first time he admits it to another soul; "...I loved someone."

Xie Lian doesn't tell her exactly what he means. Doesn't think he ever wants her to know that part of him. But the raw edge to his voice is enough to convey the gravity of his emotions.

Her arms tighten around him when she hears his voice crack. “And…they died.”

He doesn’t say more on the subject—but when she reaches for the pouch around his neck, she’s the only person, now, or ever, that Xie Lian allows to touch it, her fingertips brushing over the worn, fabric surface.

“…They were with you, while you were gone?”

Xie Lian nods, his words thick with emotion, “They took care of me.”

The Queen stares at the pouch for a long moment, finally asking; “What was their name?”

He hasn’t said it out loud in what feels like ages now. “…Hong-er,” he whispers.

She squeezes the pouch gently. “Thank you, Hong-er.”

That night, cautiously, his voice laden with embarrassment, he asks Feng Xin to sleep in his room. They used to do that when they were children—

(Xie Lian was always a coward, when it came to his nightmares.)

—Feng Xin doesn’t complain about it now, either, perfectly comfortable to make a spot on the floor in front of the door.

Maybe there’s some comfort in not being alone, but…Xie Lian realizes now, how different it is from having someone sleeping in the bed beside him.

Colder.

He wakes several time in the night, just to look over and make sure that his friend is still there. That he didn’t sneak off somewhere in the night. That he isn’t screaming in pain somewhere, with Xie Lian sleeping right through it.

Xie Lian doesn’t have a word for this feeling.

This constant, recurring terror that he can’t seem to escape from. He’s always trying to outthink it now, to get a step ahead of it, so he won’t have to stop being so afraid anymore, but…

But Xie Lian is always afraid.

It’s easy to be afraid, when you’ve seen what the world can do.

When Mu Qing comes to visit, months later—he’s clearly surprised that the prince doesn’t seem to have a single unkind word to say to him. Didn’t seem to trust it, not at first.

He asks Xie Lian the least about the time on his own—but his question cuts the closest to home.

When he hears that Xie Lian met someone, and he lost them, he simply asks— “Were you in love with him?”

‘In love with him.’

Xie Lian always knew that Mu Qing suspected, but…

He doesn’t seem disgusted now. Not in the way that he was before.

Xie Lian holds himself tighter.

“…I don’t know,” he mutters, wishing…they’d had more time. That he’d had the chance to see Hong-er grow more. If Hong-er could have met Xie Lian when things were still…

“…I think I…I think I was,” he admits.

(Later, he’ll know that telling Mu Qing was a mistake.)

ART WORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY:

(Linked with permission, do not use or repost.)

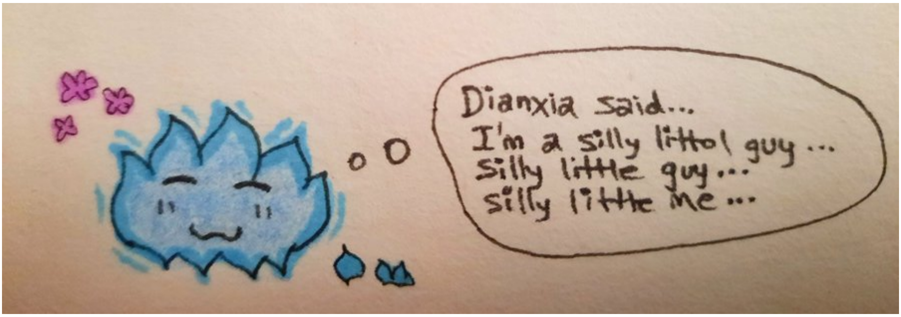
CREDIT: Musing Lotus !

DO NOT REPOST
@RoseNightshade

CREDIT: RoseNightshade !

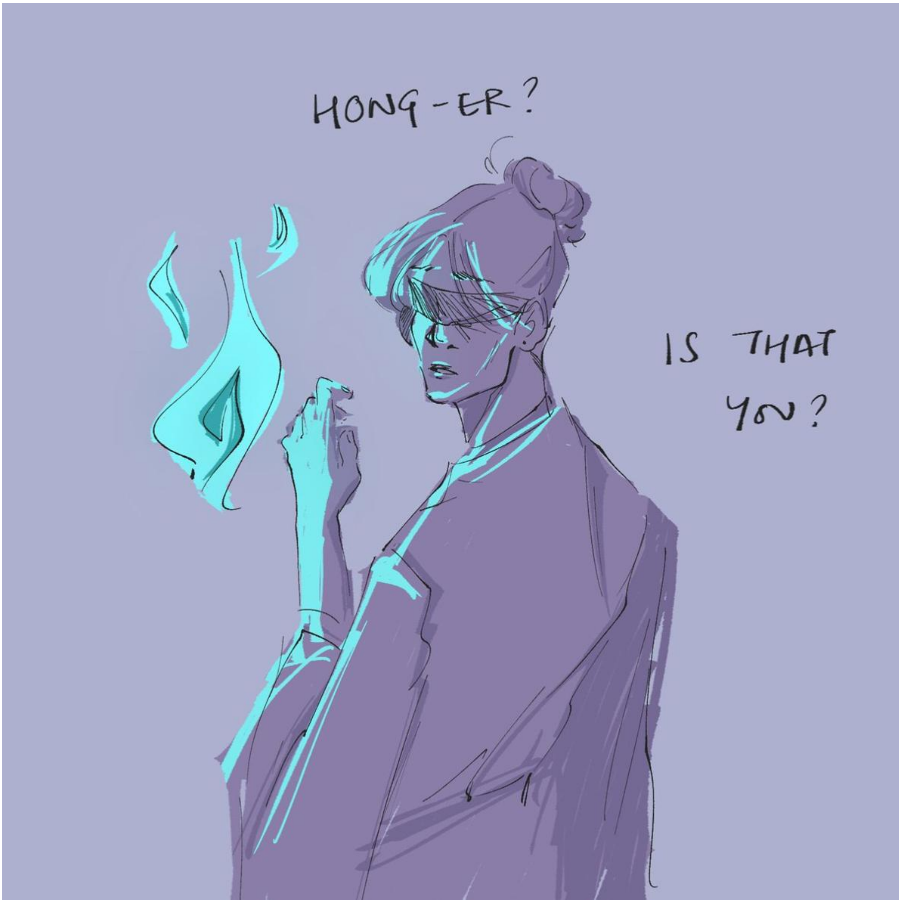
[image]

CREDIT: Baneberry16 !



Dianxia said...
I'm a silly littol guy...
Silly little guy...
silly little me...

CREDIT: Crimson_Maple22 !



HONG-ER?
IS THAT YOU?

CREDIT: Sun_numen !

CREDIT: Musing Lotus !

[image]

CREDIT: Crimsonroses56 !

Chapter End Notes

> Thanks again to everyone for making such beautiful artwork! There's more that will be linked in future chapters, but Ao3 will only let me link so much, unfortunately! See you tomorrow, Evie

All a Spirit is

Chapter Summary

> “...Have you ever done this before, your highness?”
>
> Xie Lian shakes his head vehemently, still trembling with shame.
>
> “No,” he whispers, voice dry and cracked. “Never.”
>
> “...” One official pats his back, almost sympathetic. “Don’t worry, your highness.”
>
> Xie Lian shivers, shrinking in on himself.
>
> “We won’t tell anyone.”

Chapter Notes

> TW// for chapter: no sexual assault happens, but there are moments that could make people with SA related trauma uncomfortable. There are also mentions of sex work that are not positive, but these are not a reflection of my (the author’s) feelings on Sex Work, but rather a reflection on the historical mistreatment of those who do perform sex work.
>
> you can find me (and this fic) on twitter at @cataclysmicevie
>
> Thanks!
> Evie

The passage of time isn’t a healing thing now. Not like it was before. It drags on—and Xie Lian isn’t really getting better, he’s just learning to fake it more and more.

No one mentions a word about a man in mourning robes, or the curses that follow him.

Xie Lian doesn’t find happiness again, that would be too difficult. But he finds stability. He starts to feel safe.

And it only takes one incident to rob him of that all over again.

When he’s sitting on the mountain side one afternoon, fiddling with threads between his fingers.

Feng Xin is in town again, trying to make money busking. He won't let Xie Lian go along, or try to help. A blind man shattering boulders on his chest wasn't the draw that Xie Lian thought it would be.

There's only one real way Xie Lian could make money these days.

Someone stops him to offer most times, when he's in the city. If Feng Xin isn't around to punch the person in the face, the ghost fire usually is, slamming into them until they fall to the ground.

Xie Lian has never really considered it. He's strayed from his cultivation, but…

For a long time, he didn't even understand what people like that were actually asking for. He had no experience with that sort of thing to begin with, and…so much of it is innuendo.

The look in someone's eyes, the curve of their mouth, the twitch of an eyebrow.

The first time he got a grasp of the fact that when someone used that tone, it meant something inappropriate, was back when he was still with Hong-er. A man passing through the village had been trailing after him in the market, mentioning something about wanting 'stress relief.'

Xie Lian had been a little annoyed by the man's persistence, but he kindly explained a few sutras that always helped him with his anxiety.

The man did not find that answer particularly satisfactory, and amended the request to wanting, 'company.'

Xie Lian found that rather sad.

He knew what it was like to be so desperate for companionship—but he was also busy at the time. The chores for the day had barely been started, and Hong-er was still waiting—

It wasn't until the man mentioned 'paying' for company that Xie Lian's interest was caught.

He'd been halfway out of the market, allowing the man to lead him off by the time Hong-er found him—and when Xie Lian explained what he was doing, caught wind of what was going on.

At first, Xie Lian didn't understand the young man's anger. But when he did…

There was shame.

That even then, he was still so ignorant of the world that Hong-er, still practically a child himself, knew more about such things than him.

That the stranger thought Xie Lian was…that he would…

Xie Lian recoiled from the idea, back then.

It went against everything he was raised to believe. It felt—

It felt beneath him.

But he wasn't hungry every day, back then. His father wasn't sick—getting sicker by the day. Hong-er was helping, yes—but that wasn't the same as watching Feng Xin work himself to the bone.

It wore him down. And now, he's thinking about it.

Sitting alone on the mountainside, while Feng Xin works in the city below. Demeaning himself in a different way, a way that isn't an option for Xie Lian.

He toys with the threads in his hands.

Xie Lian hasn't taken up weaving again. Not since Hong-er was around. It's hard, now, when he tries. He remembers the way the boy used to lay on the ground beside him while he worked, curled up but he fire—head resting against Xie Lian's thigh, listening as the god told stories…

Maybe Xie Lian could make money through that, Hong-er always said he was good at it, but…

Hong-er said that Xie Lian was good at everything—and now, the god knows that isn't true.

But when he thinks of the other option…he's frightened. He—

He doesn't want to.

Then, there's a sound stirring him from his thoughts.

At first, Xie Lian thinks it's an animal—but when he listens, he doesn't feel a heartbeat, or detect anything breathing nearby. The closest thing is a sparrow, thirty feet away...

Then, he breathes in, slow and deep.

It's there—the tell tale scent of spiritual power. Stronger than what he's been used to, though not by much.

"..." The god tilts his head to the side, outstretching his palm—but there's no cool, flickering presence of the ghost fire. "...Is something wrong?" He calls out.

There's no answer.

The Ghost Fire is usually with him—only wandering off sometimes. It can't come inside the small house that Xie Lian and his family have been staying in, his mother has always been frightened of spirits, but...

Usually, if Xie Lian calls out, it always comes.

But when he breathes in again—the spiritual power is still there, meaning that whatever it is, it's closer.

Xie Lian didn't hear anything move.

A demon or a goblin would make some sort of noise—and the presence doesn't have the dirty sort of smell he associates with that.

There's a shift in the air in front of him—like something's standing there. It doesn't have a scent, a heartbeat, a single breath for Xie Lian to track. Just like...a ghost.

The prince's pulse skips, and his breathing halts.

Even now, he can't learn his lesson.

"...Hong-er?"

He can't let go of the hope that, some day, the boy he knew will answer him again.

That Hong-er will come back to him.

No one answers now, but the further Xie Lian's fingers outstretch, they brush against something.

A set of fur lined boots. Xie Lian—

He knows those shoes.

Instantly, his eyes are swimming with tears.

Xie Lian made them.

“Hong-er?!” He croaks, lurching forward, reaching, and when he finds a hand, fingers intertwine with his own.

Now, the tears are slipping down his cheeks. He knows those hands.

He’s held them many times before.

A sob rips from him.

A ghost couldn’t fake this. Not so perfectly. It’s—

It’s him.

Oh god, it’s really him.

Xie Lian’s hands are trembling so badly, Hong-er’s fingers have to tighten around his to keep him steady, but—

But why won’t he answer?

The god pulls, trying to get him closer—and the boy comes so easily, sinking down to his knees before him.

“W-where were you?” He whispers, reaching. “I-I thought you were —”

When no ghost appeared to answer his call for months on end, Xie Lian thought... He thought his friend was at peace.

And he knows, he should have been glad. But now...

For the first time in so long, he’s happy. A tear stricken smile on his lips as he reaches up to cup the boy’s cheeks, to tell him everything, everything he should have before—

What his hands find isn’t a face.

Not the square jaw, pointed chin, or slightly crooked nose that Xie Lian remembers. Not the scars, or the bandages that once covered them.

Xie Lian's fingers come into contact with something cold and hard. A mask.

Half smiling, half crying. He screams.

It's immediate, bloodcurdling, his entire body recoiling as he tries to scramble back, but those hands wrap around his wrists—

The grip, like shackles.

They drag Xie Lian back in, even as the young man cries out, desperate to get away—

"I never left."

Xie Lian's sobs aren't happy anymore—they're petrified. And—and so angry, because —

He's wearing Hong-er's boots.

Underneath that mask, he's probably wearing Hong-er's face.

And there's nothing that Xie Lian can do about it.

The grip on his wrists tightens—

It hurts.

Xie Lian struggles, uses all of the strength he has left—and even with the shackles, it would be enough to throw a human man so violently, landing would be fatal.

Now, it feels like a paper boat fighting the current of a river that has burst its banks.

The scent around him isn't mild anymore—the spiritual power is overwhelming, and so demonic, it nearly makes him gag.

And the voice that's speaking now; it—it isn't Hong-er's.

It's low, cruel—mockingly saying the words that used to bring Xie Lian the most comfort.

"Oh," one hand lets go of his wrist, but the other is perfectly capable of keeping Xie Lian in place, even as the god thrashes and cries, reaching toward to cup his face, "my poor, poor crown prince..."

His thumb strokes down Xie Lian's cheek. Hong-er's thumb.

Xie Lian sobs.

"Don't be afraid..." The voice croons, fingers curving around Xie Lian's jaw—only to grip it tightly when the prince cringes away, leaning closer.

If not for the mask between them and the prince's panicked struggling, it might be mistaken for a moment between lovers.

"I will never leave you."

Xie Lian isn't fighting anymore.

He's frozen, trembling in Bai Wuxiang's hold, tears falling silently from his cheeks. The calamity wipes them away—so, so tenderly, crooning—

"No matter what happens, I will never leave your side."

The first time Xie Lian longed for death, it was because he wanted to see someone again. Now, it's out of a need to escape.

Living with the knowledge that this will never, never end.

"...Kill me," he whispers, limp in the calamity's grip, "...please, just kill me."

For a moment, there's just silence. And the response—it's oddly baffled. Like, somehow, white no-face has finally been surprised by something.

In any other situation, Xie Lian might find it funny.

He's reacting like a child, smashing a beloved toy against a wall, over and over again —only to be surprised when it breaks.

"...I would never," The figure murmurs, his grip on Xie Lian's jaw digging in even tighter.

It hurts.

Xie Lian's eyes squeeze tightly shut under the bandages.

"Why?"

The calamity hums, and Xie Lian cringes when he can feel the cool edge of the mask brush against his cheek. If it weren't there, the touch would be...intimate.

"Because one day, you'll come to my side."

As he says this, he lets go of Xie Lian's other wrist, reaching. The prince can't imagine what he wants, what he'll do. In part, he starts to think he might not care.

It feeds on his fear. His reactions. If he's going to suffer anyway, why give him one?

But it isn't that easy.

Not when Xie Lian realizes what that hand is reaching for.

Hong-er.

The sound that rips out of his chest couldn't be described as a snarl—it's more aggressive than that. More like a howl of protective rage, reverberating through the otherwise silent forest.

And he shouldn't be strong enough to push the creature away, but when Xie Lian shoves at him with all of the force that he has, it surprises Bai Wuxiang enough to make the calamity stumble back.

"DON'T TOUCH HIM!" Xie Lian shrieks, scrambling backwards. "Don't EVER touch him!"

The calamity pauses, hand still outstretched. Slowly, his head tilts to the side.

"...Such a stubborn child," he murmurs, watching Xie Lian, curled up against the base of a tree, clutching the pouch to his chest. "That little insect is gone now."

The god flinches.

"He has nothing left that he can give you," his voice is still so taunting—but almost like he doesn't mean to be. "What are you still holding onto?"

Xie Lian doesn't see that the creature is reaching for him, fingers inches from his face.

"...He gave me more than you ever could," he mutters, nails digging into the pouch, clutching it with all of his might.

Those fingers stop—inches from his cheek.

When Bai Wuxiang speaks again, his voice is even colder than before.

“I suppose we’ll have to see about that.” And just like that, he disappears.

No voice. No hands. No overwhelming presence of spiritual power. Just…nothing.

And when Xie Lian can hear the sounds of the forest again, the birds singing, the babbling of the brook—he realizes the calamity must have set an array around them

There’s a faint whistling noise in the air, like something whipping through it at great speeds—and Xie Lian nearly jumps out of his skin when he feels something slam against his chest, thinking for a moment that the calamity came back, that it’s an attack—

But it’s just cold.

“Dianxia,” Xie Lian’s eyes relax slightly under the bandages as the Ghost Fire presses close to his chest, it’s voice quivering with distress, “Dianxia—!”

“I’m okay,” he whispers, knowing he sounds like the opposite. He’s trembling, his voice is still quivering. “I-I’m alright.”

The little spirit wobbles under Xie Lian’s fingertips when he tries to smooth it, rising up until it can press underneath the god’s chin.

“I tried to get to you,” it whimpers. The voice is stronger now, than it used to be. Less like the wind, but still distinctly inhuman.

“But I couldn’t get through. No matter how hard I tried, I…”

Xie Lian shivers when the cold presses against his throat, but he doesn’t complain. It —

It’s distinctly more comforting than the touches he was feeling moments before.

“If you had, he would have dispersed you.”

Xie Lian points out, his voice calm—matter of fact.

It seems to distress the creature almost as much as the idea of not being able to get to Xie Lian at all—but not out of a fear of being dispersed, no. Xie Lian can't sense any fear in the spirit at all.

Brave little thing.

And with it's bravery, Xie Lian feels a little more pathetic.

This little creature is ashamed, because it's too weak to protect him.

Xie Lian feels even more shame—because how weak could he be, for a ghost fire to believe it needs to protect him?

In the weeks that follow, Bai Wuxiang doesn't show his face again. Xie Lian warns Feng Xin, who listens with a grave level of seriousness.

"What does he want with you, your highness?"

Xie Lian can't bring himself to answer.

His father's coughing gets worse. Feng Xin is gone in town longer with each passing day, and the money he brings back becomes more and more scarce.

Xie Lian's mother tries to say she isn't hungry to pass her portions of food off on him when there isn't enough.

Eventually, the prince feels those rigid, hard lines inside of him begin to bend and blur.

His pride is practically gone—and while he might be willing to die for what's left of it...

That's not the same as being willing to watch as his father dies a slow, humiliating death.

When he sees the King wiping blood from his chin one evening, he wakes up that morning decided.

He's going to do it. Even if he's frightened. Even if he doesn't want to.

When he gets ready to leave for town that morning, he tells his mother he's meeting with Feng Xin.

And as he makes his way down the mountain path, he pauses, fingertips reaching for the pouch around his neck.

"…" his lower lip wobbles slightly, thinking of how the young man would have reacted to this.

But—

Hong-er isn't here.

Xie Lian has to remind himself of that. Hong-er isn't here anymore.

And if Xie Lian doesn't do something, his father won't be, either.

Still, he…

His fingers tighten around the pouch.

He doesn't want to have Hong-er with him, when he does it.

"…" Xie Lian lifts his palm, and as always, the Ghost Fire comes.

"I need you to do something for me," Xie Lian murmurs, feeling the flame vibrate in his hand, listening eagerly.

"Anything, Dianxia."

He's so careful, like he's handling glass—and he tucks the pouch into the hollow of a tree, hiding it beneath fallen leaves.

"Watch this for me," he murmurs. "Keep it safe, until I come back." The little spirit hesitates, hovering in front of his face.

"Please," Xie Lian whispers.

"…Where are you going, your highness?"

The prince swallows thickly, and he doesn't explain.

"You said anything."

The spirit hovers, not answering, and Xie Lian wraps his arms around himself, his pleading once again—

"Please." He bites his lip. "It's something very precious to me."

"…" Slowly, the Ghost Fire sinks into the hollow of the tree, resting over the pouch of Hong-er's ashes.

"Yes, dianxia."

The smile on Xie Lian's face is grateful, but it isn't happy.

It never is. Not anymore.

"Thank you," he whispers.

Feng Xin washed and brushed his hair just the night before—his ponytail is neat, if not extravagant.

And his robes, well...They're clean, at least

Xie Lian worries that, in this state, he might not be able to attract very much interest. He was a great beauty once—but he's had no way of gauging that in quite some time.

He could be hideous now, for all he knows, but...

He had no reason to worry. He finds an offer fast.

For more money than he expected, too. A local merchant, who seems just a little too eager about the whole thing, but...Xie Lian has no way of knowing that.

And beggars can't be choosers.

"...A face like that, and you're working off the street?" The man muses.

He managed to coax the young beggar into taking off his bandages—a verification of quality before purchase, after all.

He didn't bother with the blindfold—he actually likes that, it adds something to the whole thing.

Now, he strokes Xie Lian's cheek.

"Such a waste."

The prince fights back the urge to gag. Smiles pleasantly.

It's just work. It's just a different kind of work than what he's used to, that's all.

"I could introduce you to a few of the brothel keeps in town, if this goes well. Better money, that way."

Xie Lian forces himself not to flinch. "That would be very kind of you," he murmurs.

The man mutters something about a referral discount, and Xie Lian's smile becomes just a little bit more strained.

He agrees not to do it in town—he's married, after all, couldn't risk that. But he has a hunting lodge, just through the woods. Private. Secluded.

Xie Lian supposes he should be grateful that it isn't a back alley, or the forest floor. Money is exchanged, and the man starts to lead him along by the wrist.

He tries not to think too much. To be brave.

But the walk through the woods is long, and he—

Xie Lian is frightened.

He doesn't know the man's name, doesn't even know what he looks like. He's never had anything like this, and now he's about to give that away for money that he once would have considered pocket change.

He doesn't want to do this.

Xie Lian doesn't have a word for what it is, to force himself. Doesn't know why the prospect is so horrific to him, when the alternative seems equally horrible, but—

"Are you cold, or something?" Xie Lian pauses, baffled— Oh.

He's trembling.

"...Oh," He can hear the grin in the man's voice as he leans closer, toying with Xie Lian's ponytail. "Are you a virgin?"

This time, Xie Lian can't stop himself from flinching—but the man doesn't seem to care.

"That explains it..." he muses, "Don't worry, friend."

His breath hits the side of Xie Lian's ear as he leans in, speaking next to his ear:

"I'll be gentle."

Something about that makes a piece of Xie Lian snap. The part of him that could shut up and bear it. That could tell himself that he wasn't afraid.

Xie Lian scrambles away.

"Hey?" The merchant crows, "No need to be like that, I was just playing—"

"I can't do this," Xie Lian mutters, shaking his head, hair whipping around him. "I—what?"

"I'm sorry," he gasps, still backing away, fighting down the beginnings of a panic attack.

"But I don't want to do this."

He's unfamiliar with this path—doesn't see the tree root sticking up before he's falling backwards over it, landing hard.

The merchant doesn't seem amused now. "In case you forgot—I already PAID for you."

Xie Lian grits his teeth.

If he's the sort who thinks that he can force him—he's going to lose more than just his money, "I'll give it back—"

"I don't want it back, I want what I—"

"Your highness?"

Both men freeze, and Xie Lian's blood feels like ice, his stomach plunging into a free fall.

Oh. Oh no.

At first, Xie Lian thinks he's only a little unlucky. That he's been interrupted by some random citizen that happened to recognize him without the bandages. That would be humiliating enough.

When Xie Lian breathes in, he knows he overestimated his luck.

Heavenly Officials.

Their spiritual power isn't strong enough to be ascended gods from the upper court, no, but...

Obviously, they know who Xie Lian is. He hangs his head.

At first, they're all horribly sympathetic. Gallant, even. Assuming that the situation was something much more sinister.

One of them throws a robe around Xie Lian's shoulders to help with the shivering. Two of the others go to restrain the man, to summon the authorities, ignoring the prince's weak protests—

But eventually, the merchant gets a word in.

"I wasn't forcing him! We had an agreement!"

Suddenly, the other officials grow silent, and Xie Lian—he still can't seem to stop hanging his head with shame.

"The tease just backed out and tried to fleece me!"

If Xie Lian had called the man a liar, the officials probably would have believed him, but...

He doesn't.

Suddenly, all that concern begins to turn, and...

Even after the merchant flees, Xie Lian can feel the judgment. The disgust. Maybe even a little bit of glee.

"...Have you ever done this before, your highness?"

Xie Lian shakes his head vehemently, still trembling with shame.

"No," he whispers, voice dry and cracked. "Never."

"..." One official pats his back, almost sympathetic. "Don't worry, your highness."

Xie Lian shivers, shrinking in on himself.

"We won't tell anyone."

It's a small mercy. Living with the knowledge that any of them know, it's... It's already hard enough.

When he returns home, he doesn't speak for the rest of the night. Not to his parents. Not to Feng Xin. Locks himself in his room. Doesn't sleep. Doesn't eat.

He only thanks the ghost fire when he returns to the tree to collect Hong-er.

He feels so lost now. Unable to help. No one needing him. He doesn't dare try that again, not after that disaster, but he...

The longer he thinks about it, there is one thing that he could do. Maybe not for money. Maybe it won't help his parents, but...

Ever since that day in the forest, when Bai Wuxiang appeared...

Xie Lian doesn't want to be tricked again. Not like that. It was too horrible.

He wants to ensure that no one can ever do that again. And of course, the easiest solution would be destroying Hong-er's ashes, but...

He can't bring himself to do that. He never could.

The next easiest thing is performing a summoning. Making sure that his spirit isn't lingering anywhere. Xie Lian already knows that it isn't, that if it was, Hong-er would have returned to his side, but—

He needs peace of mind.

He doesn't have the spiritual power required to perform the ceremony. If he had, he would have already done so a long time ago, but...

Now, he's determined, and he tells Feng Xin that he's going to cultivate.

Not for so long as before, just a few days.

Feng Xin eagerly agrees, just happy that Xie Lian wants to leave his room.

He worries over Xie Lian going alone, but the prince has no such concerns.

A small flame bobs behind him as he takes the road away from the mountain, never straying far.

He always has company.

"Dianxia? Dianxia, what happened that day?"

The little spirit never stops asking—and Xie Lian never answers.

Eventually, he finds a mountain with dense spiritual energy—most auspicious. The sort of place he could have drained with ease, back when he was a god.

Now; it's more than enough for what he needs.

He sets down his bag, sitting on the ground, cross legged.

The ghost fire hovers around, clearly a little bored, before eventually landing on top of the prince's head, smoldering.

Xie Lian almost smiles—but he needs to focus. "...dianxia," it whines.

Xie Lian's lips twitch. "Hush."

"Why are we here?"

He clucks his tongue softly, "You're here because you followed me."

The fire rolls around on top of his head for a moment. Pouting, Xie Lian realizes. "Why did dianxia come here?"

His amusement fades

"...To find someone important to me," he murmurs, lifting the pouch from around his neck, carefully setting it in his lap.

If the person can be found, anyway. More than likely he can't.

He doesn't have food or gold to use for an offering—so he uses a few drops of blood instead.

The ghost fire swirls around, hissing with upset when he slices his finger, and Xie Lian rolls his eyes.

"Settle down," he murmurs, "it's barely a scratch."

Particularly for someone that has run himself through with a sword before. Compared to that, Xie Lian doesn't think anything could really hurt anymore.

(He didn't know anything, back then.)

Even if it isn't painful, however—Xie Lian's blood is no small gift. It's that of an ancient royal bloodline, blessed by the heavens, even now.

If Hong-er is still around to feel it—it should give the spirit enough power to come to him. Enough power to speak.

This part of cultivation was never Xie Lian's specialty—Mu Qing was always better at dealing with ghosts and spirits alike.

(Feng Xin always said it was because he was just as bitter and twisted inside as they were, and Xie Lian told him that was mean.)

But a summoning ceremony like this shouldn't be too difficult, with all of the spiritual power around.

He goes through the steps—already having everything he needs. Hong-er's ashes, the lock of hair.

Someone who mourns him.

He feels the heat from the small array he drew on the earth as it slowly burns away, telling him the magic is in effect—and Xie Lian calls, one more time:

"Hong-er?"

If he's here, in this world, he'll answer. Xie Lian knows that. Knows with every fiber of his being. If he doesn't, that means he...he...

Silence.

Xie Lian's frown slowly deepens, his lips trembling slightly at the corners.

The Ghost Fire hovers.

"...Dianxia?"

Xie Lian should be happy. He knows that. Hong-er—he's—

Where he is, Bai Wuxiang can't hurt him again. Can't use him to hurt Xie Lian anymore. He—maybe Xie Lian couldn't have saved him, but...

One tear slips down his cheek. Just one this time. He has less tears to offer, now. Hong-er doesn't have to suffer anymore.

The smile on Xie Lian's face isn't fake, no—but it hurts so much more than if it was. "...You're really at peace," he whispers, fingers tightening around the lock of hair. "I'm glad."

And yet...he's also jealous.

When he thinks about what the Ghost Fire told him, the first time they spoke. ‘I still have someone precious in this world.’

It just sounded…so much like something that Hong-er would have done. And while Xie Lian scolded the ghost fire for it, he wishes…

Oh god, he wishes…

The Ghost Fire hovers over the array for a moment, quiet. Xie Lian can’t remember when it moved over there, but…since it didn’t work, he supposes it doesn’t matter.

“Dianxia…” Xie Lian doesn’t look up, just nods in acknowledgement. “…you said this person was special to you?”

The prince nods, his gaze pained, but fond. “Oh, yes. He was.” Xie Lian tucks the lock of hair back into the pouch, placing it back around his neck. “He always wanted to keep me safe.”

The spirit sounds almost petulant, now. “It doesn’t sound like he did a very god job.”

There’s not a quicker method in the world to bring a frown to Xie Lian’s face. “He did his best. Always.”

And when Xie Lian remembers how well taken care of back then—even if he wasn’t in a palace, or dressed in jewels—he felt far more treasured then, than he did as a prince.

“But you’re always unhappy now,” the Ghost Fire grouses, sounding…equally unhappy, somehow. “If he was any good, how could he leave you like this?”

“…” Xie Lian hangs his head, hands balled into fists in his lap. His voice is sorrowful— but firm. “He never would have left me.”

The Ghost Fire hovers, silent for a long while. He never asks Xie Lian anything about his life before. Other than the first time they spoke, they’ve almost never discussed anything too serious, and now…

“…What happened to him, then?” The spirit asks quietly. Xie Lian bites his lip.

“…I couldn’t keep him safe,” the god whispers, hanging his head. “I couldn’t protect him.”

“You shouldn’t have had to!” The answer is so quick, so pointed—it startles him. When he looks up, he can feel cold emanating—like the spirit is burning brightly.

"...You said he wanted to protect you," the Ghost Fire explains, slowly dimming. "He probably would have been ashamed...if he became a burden to you."

He's never spoken this much before—not so passionately, or in such long sentences. Xie Lian didn't realize, but...

He's been getting stronger, hasn't he? Probably strong enough to take an actual form, soon.

When he does, he'll probably be able to go and find his beloved again. That—

That makes Xie Lian happy for him, even if he's...a little sad. At some point, he... became fond of the spirit.

He'll miss him when he goes. After all—everyone always does.

"...Part of caring about someone is wanting to protect them," Xie Lian murmurs. "And if one of us was the burden—it was me."

"Dianxia could never be a burden to anyone." Xie Lian almost smiles.

"He said that, too."

It's the most he's spoken about Hong-er to anyone. It...almost doesn't hurt as much, to talk about it with the little Ghost Fire. It...feels like he understands.

When it speaks again, it's voice isn't petulant anymore. It's...deeply sad.

"You should forget about him, dianxia."

The suggestion startles him, even if the spirit clearly didn't say it maliciously.

"...I won't!" He cries, clutching the pouch around his neck. "I promised!" "He would feel bad, if he knew you were still sad about him..."

Xie Lian locks his jaw. "It's not like he'll ever know."

Stubbornly throwing the little spirit's words right back at him. Maybe it's a little immature—but the creature seems to get the hint.

"...If he really loved you, dianxia—he wouldn't want to be something that causes you pain."

Xie Lian pauses, because...

He never said that Hong-er loved him.

What Xie Lian said implied devotion, yes. Loyalty. But not love. Not in the way that the spirit clearly meant it.

His brow furrows. "How did you...?"

Those questions leave his mind, though, when he hears the sound of approaching footsteps.

"Ah, now THIS is a most auspicious spot for cultivation! You always find the best places!"

Xie Lian listens as several other officials crow with agreement, an entire group of them coming up the mountainside.

By his hearing, there must be over thirty of them.

"..." Xie Lian huffs out a sigh, tilting his head back. It's not ever fun to see heavenly officials these days. Not when his body is like this—and especially not when the memory of his last encounter is still swirling inside of him, but...

He'll leave them alone.

He just needs a moment to rest, then he can slink off. After all—he hasn't performed a ceremony like that since he was banished, and he did manage to absorb a little more spiritual power than he intended. He just needs to...

"Your highness?"

Xie Lian lets out an irritated sigh.

Of course, they already found him. It's like the universe is resentful of the idea that Xie Lian might get a moment's rest.

"...Hello," he mumbles, forcing his voice to sound more pleasant than he feels. "What are all of you doing here?"

Several officials squirm with discomfort. “...Cultivating, your highness.”

Xie Lian is starting to notice—no one uses that title like they actually mean it. Not anymore. It sounds almost...

His stomach sinks.

Mean. It sounds mocking, somehow, even if...they—they probably don’t intend it that way.

“...I see,” he smiles, attempting to keep his tone lightly amused, like this is all just... normal. Nothing sad or uncomfortable about it. “I didn’t realize that cultivation had become such a social event these days.”

The air feels tense. At first, he doesn’t understand why.

“And what are you doing here, your highness?” One official asks—and the forced smile on Xie Lian’s face becomes even more artificial.

“...I was also cultivating,” he mutters, not wishing to explain that he...

There’s an expectation among cultivators, to leave the dead in peace. To perform a summoning ceremony for personal reasons, not official business...would be considered inappropriate. Selfish, even.

Xie Lian already knows that it was.

Somehow, his answer causes more of a stir.

Maybe they think the idea of him even trying to cultivate at this point is silly. That most officials never ascend again after being banished, even when they have their sight.

Xie Lian doesn’t disagree. He also finds it unlikely—but he doubts they could blame him for trying.

He waits—assuming they’ll get to their own business if he’s quiet, then, after a moment of rest, he can make a peaceful retreat. They won’t bother him, Xie Lian, he —

He doesn’t want to cause trouble for anyone.

Apparently, he overestimated the kindness of his colleagues.

After a few minutes of standing off on their own, quietly speaking among themselves —

(Xie Lian couldn't pick many words out—it's overstimulating for him, when so many people speak at once.)

—one of the younger junior officials approaches. "...Your highness..."

"...Yes?"

The man squirms, glancing back at the crowd of cultivators behind him—and several give him thumbs up, or shooing motions of encouragement. "...Given how...strong, your cultivation method is...don't you think it's a little unfair to the rest of us?"

Xie Lian almost laughs. Unfair.

In all honesty—if he was anywhere close to the cultivator that he used to be, he would have absorbed all of the spiritual energy on this mountain before they arrived.

And they still seem to think there's enough for thirty of them. How is he a threat?

"...Don't worry," Xie Lian mutters, his shoulders becoming slightly tense. "I never planned on taking more than my share."

"That never stopped him in the old days," one official mutters, his tone a little bitter.

'Maybe you should have been a stronger cultivator in the old days'

The bitterness of that thought honestly surprises Xie Lian—and he's glad that he managed to keep it quiet.

"...With so many of us," the official explains, crossing his arms, squirming slightly, "even you just taking your share, it would be..."

The Ghost Fire hovering next to the fallen prince—it has a surprisingly menacing presence, doesn't it? But...

Not worth worrying over.

"..." Xie Lian can't stop himself from being a little irritated. "If you were worried about such a thing, why cultivate in such a large party?"

"We weren't expecting to run into you," Another official speaks up. "It was fine, when it was just going to be the group of us."

Oh yes, because one blind cultivator really pushes the situation over the edge.

Finally, Xie Lian can't play dumb anymore.

"...are you asking me to leave?" He mutters, somewhat incredulous—and he's stunned when no one contradicts him.

It's—

Xie Lian knows that he hadn't actually planned on cultivating at all. That this argument is, to some extent, moot.

But the rudeness of it all—it stuns him. "...Be reasonable, your highness—"

Xie Lian barks out an incredulous laugh, "How—how is any of this reasonable?!"

After everything he's been through in the last two years. After everything he's suffered —they couldn't even leave him be? For such a small thing?

He's allowed so many things to go unchallenged, endured so many indignities—and he—

He's sitting here, alone, mourning someone precious to him. And they're upset, because he might take some fractional amount of Spiritual Power from them.

How petty. How selfish .

"...I'm not leaving," he answers—his tone not so friendly anymore. "I was here first."

He might just go ahead and drain the entire place at this point. They don't deserve it. How—

How disgraceful, for those representing the heavens to behave in such a way.

"Your highness," a voice sighs, exasperated by his stubbornness. "Don't make this more difficult than it has to be. We aren't asking."

Oh.

The smile on Xie Lian's lips holds more bitterness than he would have thought himself capable of.

Are they giving him orders, now?

Xie Lian probably wouldn't have had the words to express his anger, before. But he's been left to stew in his own sadness for too long—and he—

He can't help but remember a boy, all alone in a shrine, shouting as a group of children taunted him. Telling them to go away.

That he could take on all of them, if they wanted to fight.

Xie Lian's chest twists with grief.

What a brave, stubborn child.

Worth far more than any of the officials before him now.

"...You know, there's something my Guoshi used to tell me when I was a boy," Xie Lian murmurs.

One of the officials glances at the others—irritated by how much time they're wasting arguing—but his companions silently gesture for him to tolerate it.

Let the little disgrace crow his head off, he'll have to leave anyway.

"He said the best judge of a man's character was in how he treated those below him." Xie Lian explains.

Even when he was so far, far above everyone else—he never treated anyone like this. Never once.

"How many of you begged, before, just for the chance to stand in my presence?" His tone is low—dangerous.

You could cut the tension in the air with a knife—but Xie Lian hasn't had enough. They don't understand. They're still so focused on their small, stupid, selfish little lives.

"How brave," he drawls, and—

Xie Lian doesn't even sound like himself.

"It only takes thirty of you to tell a blind man to get out of the way," a quiet laugh bubbles up in his chest. “The standards of the heavenly court must be so high these days, to accumulate such a generous and graceful group like yourselves.”

“There’s no need for this,”

The official that originally spoke to Xie Lian still seems to want to resolve things without more of a dispute—but even his tone is a little bit offended. “Haven’t you already offended the heavens enough? Why make things worse for yourself?”

“I’m not offending the heavens.”

Xie Lian lifts one hand in front of his face, picking at the dirt beneath his nails— bravado, really. He can’t see it—but it provides this air of elegance, of calm— something he hasn’t tried to project in years.

“None of you have ascended. If you were, you wouldn’t be here.”

The prince tilts his head, listening to the stir among them. “I was lifted from this earth by the hand of Jun Wu himself. I’ve stood directly by his side in the Grand Martial Hall. Has he ever met even one of you? Does he know any of your names?”

He’s learned where to punch.

“You dare to speak that way?” One of them snaps, taking a step towards him, “Look at the state you’re in, before you start speaking as though you’re better than anyone!”

“I was better than you,” Xie Lian replies calmly. That’s just a fact.

“I was better than any of you. Each of you could consume an entire place like this on your own, a hundred times over, and you still wouldn’t reach as high as I did.”

Xie Lian knows how far he rose. He felt every bit of it’s height when he crashed back down.

“And I still fell.”

The silence is filled with a mixture of offended anger—and now, anxiety, from the idea that Xie Lian is instilling in their minds.

“The only difference between me and any of you, is time.”

They’re just as arrogant as he used to be, after all. It could happen to any of them.

The ghost fire bounces around him in an excited little circle as he speaks, like it's silently cheering on every word that he says.

"...If your highness thinks he's anything like the rest of us," one of them sneers, "he overestimates his own importance."

Xie Lian smiles faintly.

"Make me leave, then," he calls out—only to be met with silence. "If I'm so weak, compared to the rest of you—make me leave."

There's an air of hesitance. Maybe, because they all find it distasteful to fight a blind man, or maybe—

Because even like this, in a fair fight, none of them could defeat the Crown Prince of Xianle.

The knowledge of that must be a bitter thing to swallow.

It couldn't be about his blindness, however—because one of them has no qualms about taking advantage of that.

A palm shoves against his back—and the official must have jumped to get behind him, because Xie Lian didn't hear any footsteps—

Not expecting the blow, he looses his balance, falling to his hands and knees on the ground.

"..." He gnashes his teeth together. "You—!"

"Oh, thank the heavens," one of them calls out, speaking over him. "It's you. Could you PLEASE deal with him?"

Who—?

Xie Lian freezes, when he hears the voice speak out.

"What's going on here?"

Oh.

His heart squeezes hopefully.

It's—It's Mu Qing.

“He’s being completely unreasonable!” One of the officials whines. “We already explained to him why he needs to go, and he’s been insulting all of us! Disgraceful!”

Xie Lian’s hands ball into fists as he struggles to his feet, listening as Mu Qing’s footsteps approach.

“Is that true, your highness?”

Well—the insults part, yes. But Xie Lian can’t bring himself to feel bad about that.

“...” He reaches out to grab Mu Qing by the sleeve, taking comfort in his friend’s presence. It’s—

It’s alright. He isn’t alone now. Mu Qing—

He’ll help him.

“...I was here first,” he explains, knowing that he wasn’t wrong. That they were being unfair. And—And he—

Xie Lian leans closer, lowering his voice so only his friend can hear—

“I wasn’t here to cultivate,” he murmurs, “I was just—I was just trying to read him.”

Xie Lian can’t see the look on Mu Qing’s face—how the young official is clearly struggling between emotions—and when the former servant speaks again, he also keeps his voice low.

“...Him?”

It’s a testament to how much he trusts Mu Qing, when Xie Lian takes his hand— bringing it up to the pouch around his neck.

He knows his friend will understand. They talked about it. Mu Qing—he knows how important it is. That Xie Lian wouldn’t lie about such a thing.

“...” There’s a long pause as Xie Lian waits for his friend to tell them—to scold the other officials for how awful they’re being. And once he does, Xie Lian can leave, and be done with this whole thing—

“...Your highness,” Mu Qing’s tone is strained, “don’t make this difficult.”

Xie Lian doesn't react at first—and he doesn't know how hard it is for his friend, to watch the slow realization dawn on his face, his mouth twisting with hurt—and—

And disappointment. "...What?"

Mu Qing doesn't push him away, he still allows Xie Lian to hold onto him, but...

"...they obviously aren't going to let you cultivate here," Mu Qing mutters, squirming with discomfort. "So why stay, and make a big scene about it?"

Xie Lian's expression is frozen, his stomach churning with shock. Mu Qing—

He knew.

He knew how important it was.

How—

How could he?

"You..." Xie Lian's voice wavers for just a moment, and Mu Qing grimaces. "You really —?"

A voice speaks out—and Xie Lian's blood goes cold.

"You really had the nerve to say that we're the same as you." The color drains from the fallen prince's face.

It's—It's the—

It's one of the officials, from that day. Why—why didn't he SAY anything before? Xie Lian, he never would have said ANY of that if he had known—

"Even if one of us fell, we would never resort to something as low as selling our own bodies," the official sneers.

Xie Lian doesn't see the way the Ghost Fire goes completely still by his side, frozen in the air.

He doesn't see the way Mu Qing's expression changes from one of emotional conflict to offended fury, because—at first—

He really was going to defend the prince.

Because that—that was just too far. To insult the man like that, when he would NEVER—

Xie Lian lets out a choked sound.

Low, horrified—and humiliated.

“You—” his voice trembles, then breaks. “You said you wouldn’t tell anyone!”

Mu Qing’s jaw slowly drops, eyes going wide.

In that moment—it’s all too much for the prince to stand. Even if he can’t see the look on his friend’s face. Even if he doesn’t know how disgusted the officials around him must look—

He can’t bear it.

He lets go of Mu Qing, turning away—and he flees. At first, the Ghost Fire doesn’t follow.

It’s still silent—but burning so brightly, one of the officials has to squint, covering its eyes. Normally, it would draw more attention, but —

They’re all a little distracted by what was said, just now.

They don’t see it.

The way it slowly hovers around the group, taking a moment beside each one.

(Memorizing their faces.)

Xie Lian makes it halfway down the mountainside when he trips, stumbling and landing hard on the ground, rocks and twigs tearing at his hands and knees.

He doesn’t wince.

He’s gotten used to falling, by now. No one catches him anymore.

Xie Lian sits up, pressing his hands against his face. It—

Even if he could ever manage to ascend again, how could he ever show his face now?

His fingers tremble, clutching at the pouch around his neck.

The one comfort, in all of this, is that Hong-er doesn't have to see him like this now. As much—as much as Xie Lian trusted him, when the young man said he would never leave him, that he would always believe in him...

He probably never realized how much lower Xie Lian could sink. Even if he—

"Your highness?"

The sound of Mu Qing's voice brought him such comfort, only a few minutes ago.

Now, it makes Xie Lian cringe.

His friend creeps closer to where the fallen god is on his hands and knees, head hanging low.

It's...hard, seeing him like this.

"..." He takes a deep breath, kneeling down. "You shouldn't make scenes like that, when you're still like this." One palm rests against his back—and he doesn't ask about what was said. "Do you still need to try to summon him? I can—"

Xie Lian cringes away from him.

"Don't—" he sobs, scrambling away, "Don't touch me!"

Mu Qing hasn't moved, his hand still frozen in the air from where it was resting on the crown prince's back. "What—" he sputters, his eyebrows knitting together. "Your highness, what did you expect me to do?!"

"You—" Xie Lian shakes his head, and the tears pouring down his cheeks—for the first time in months, they aren't from sorrow. They're bitter—angry, and betrayed. "You KNEW how important it was! I-I TOLD you about him!"

And Mu Qing still wouldn't help him. Not even then. "That's why I—"

"I don't CARE why!" Xie Lian snaps, whipping his head back and forth, "It doesn't make a difference!"

Because he needed Mu Qing, and his friend didn't…he didn't… After a pause, in a small voice, his friend asks—

"Was it true?"

Xie Lian freezes, trembling.

"What that man said back there—was it true?" His tone is cautious, not angry—like he—

Xie Lian's nails bite into his palms.

Like Mu Qing pities him.

And Xie Lian he—

He really can't take much more of this.

"What," he mutters, his voice thick, "did you expect ?!"

It doesn't matter if Xie Lian actually did it or not. He didn't stop that day because he thought he was above it. Xie Lian knows now that he isn't above much of anything.

The only thing between him, and that, was that he was afraid. And Xie Lian regrets that now.

Because if he hadn't made a scene back then—those officials never would have known about it to begin with. He would have been able to buy more medicine for his father.

Xie Lian can't try to tell Mu Qing that he never stooped to that, because he did.

He's much lower than anyone in a brothel—because he didn't have the grit to actually do it. He was…too much of a coward.

But that doesn't stop him from lashing out now.

"LOOK at me," he smacks a hand against his chest, glaring in Mu Qing's direction.

"You were the one always treating me like I was so naive, like I didn't know anything about the world—did you EVER think about how I was going to survive?!"

After all—he can't get normal work anymore. He can't even busk. Mu

Qing must understand that.

This wasn't unforeseeable.

Once everything was pawned, there really was nothing left for Xie Lian to offer. Except...Except for the one thing that his banishment had left intact.

Beauty.

God, how Xie Lian has come to resent the fact that he was ever once called beautiful.

"I didn't..." Mu Qing sputters.

"When I left, I thought Feng Xin..." He starts, then stops, shaking his head. "I thought he would tell you, I left because I thought I—"

"I don't CARE about that," Xie Lian moans, shaking his head, "He told me—and I—"

It's a kindness that he can't see the hurt in Mu Qing's eyes. There are so many ways that a man can be blind. Xie Lian—

Even when he had his sight, there were so many things he could never see.

"I was HAPPY, when I heard that you left!" He sobs, wrapping his arms around himself.

Because it would be better for everyone, if they left him. Because it meant that Xie Lian couldn't drag him down, too.

"It was a relief," he weeps, "So, just go!"

Mu Qing doesn't respond at first, not until the prince shoves at his arm, over and over again.

Because he can't stand this. He really can't take anymore.

"Just LEAVE!" Finally, he does.

Silently, without another word.

Xie Lian takes some time before he moves again, curled up on the ground, weeping. The embarrassment—the self pity—

He really can't take it.

There's a familiar brush of coldness against the back of his head.

Xie Lian shudders, hands covering his face.

"You—you heard too, didn't you?" He whimpers, legs curling in against his chest. Like he's still a child who can crawl under the covers in his bed, and hide away from the world.

"You'll—you'll leave now too, won't you?"

The Ghost Fire presses close against his head, burning gently.

"Never," the voice whispers, slowly rolling over until presses against Xie Lian's hands, bumping against them until they lower from his cheeks.

The coolness of the flames soothes his skin—burning from humiliation. It brushes against his lips, dry and cracked.

The closest thing the prince has ever had to a kiss, coming from the flames of a ghost fire.

Xie Lian's shoulders shake as he cries even harder.

"Please," he begs, "stop—stop believing in me!"

Maybe if he did, there would be no one else in the world that believed in him anymore.

Then, when his shrines and temples burned, as the world moved on, Xie Lian could fade away. This body wouldn't sustain him anymore.

It wouldn't hurt anymore. He could rest.

The Ghost Fire never leaves. Just caresses his face, soothing the flushed pain from him until Xie Lian is too tired to cry any longer, his breathing starting to slow.

"I'm sorry, dianxia," the voice whispers. Xie Lian stares ahead, unseeing.

"I'm sorry—but I can't."

After all—you can't ask someone to stop being what they are.

And believing in Xie Lian— That’s all this spirit is.

The Most Beautiful Eyes

Chapter Summary

> Eventually, those fingers drift back up over his face.
>
> His thumb strokes over the space between Xie Lian's eyes, tracing down over his cheekbone, "...I can't remember the last time I saw your eyes," he admits.

Chapter Notes

> TW// again, this chapter involves negative attitudes around sex work. Also, there is more content that could be triggering for anyone who has experience with sexual assault, as well as a serious violation of consent depicted that does not rise to the likes of rape, but could be very disturbing for some readers. Please read with caution!
>
> You can find me (and the rest of this story) on twitter at @cataclysmicevie !

Xie Lian doesn't speak a word to Feng Xin, when he returns. Barely acknowledges either one of his parents.

Somehow, he's even worse than he was before he left.

There's not a single moment of relief, after that.

Before, when Hong-er was still by his side, he taught the prince how to fall in love with something as simple as being touched. How comforting that sense could be.

Now, Xie Lian learns that touch is something to be feared. At first, he thinks it's something as simple as being taunted.

When he doesn't hide in his room, he'll find a quiet place by the mountain side. The shade of a tree, the bank of a stream.

Occasionally, he'll hear the voice of one of his parents or Feng Xin—come to comfort him.

Sometimes he'll feel his friend's arm around his shoulders, or his mother's hands on his face—and he'll relent. He'll reach out for comfort.

When he does, he only ever finds the surface of that mask. Laughing at him. Sobbing with him.

Every single time, Xie Lian screams.

With time, it becomes clear that this isn't being taunted. It's even worse than being hunted like an animal, no—

Xie Lian is being haunted.

Worn down, bit by bit. Until he can hardly stand to leave the house at all, but...

When he's there, he hears the whispering. Between Feng Xin and his parents. The worry.

He asks Feng Xin, voice shaking with sadness, if his friend doesn't believe him. If he thinks Xie Lian is succumbing to madness.

Each time, his friend tells him that isn't true. That he believes him.

But Xie Lian is still afraid.

One afternoon, when he walks back to the house—he hears shouting.

All too familiar shouting, actually. Two voices combining together to make a reminiscent din of anger.

"You have a lot of nerve, showing your face here!" Xie Lian pauses, one hand on the doorway.

Feng Xin—he sounds so angry. And when Xie Lian fumbles his way inside, feeling for the edge of the table—he feels something surprising.

Sacks of rice. More than they could afford over several months. How...How could they—?

"Don't get so high and mighty with me!"

The sound of Mu Qing's voice makes him freeze.

Why—? Why is he here?

"Especially not when I'm here to help!"

Feng Xin crosses his arms over his chest, and when he sees that the prince has returned, he steps in front of Xie Lian protectively. "Who said anyone WANTED your help?"

Xie Lian opens his mouth to tell Mu Qing that it's fine. To thank him for the rice, even —anything to make him go. Before—

"How can you say that, after what he had to do?!" Mu Qing snaps, and Xie Lian— Oh god.

He feels Feng Xin stiffen with confusion, and his lips tremble. "What the hell are you talking about?!"

Xie Lian tries. He tries to speak up. To stop it before it starts, but— "Mu Qing, I—"

"You're SO damn stubborn, you'd let him sell himself before you would take help from me?!" Mu Qing snarls. "You hate me THAT much?!"

Sell himself.

Feng Xin is frozen, and Xie Lian's face twists with agonized shame.

"He..." The guard's voice, normally so steady, so certain, is unsteady. "Sold..." he shakes his head, gritting his teeth, "You're LYING!"

Mu Qing glances back and forth between Xie Lian and Feng Xin, realizing.

"You didn't..." His expression falters when he sees the pain in the prince's face, "You didn't tell him?"

He doesn't have the chance to say more before Feng Xin shoves his chest hard. "GET OUT!" The guard barks. "LEAVE!"

"I didn't—!" Mu Qing protests, "I was just trying to—!" He freezes at the sound of Xie Lian's voice. Low, quiet.

"Listen to him, Mu Qing." His eyes widen, then narrow.

"You know—I—" he shakes his head, trembling. And Xie Lian knows —has always known, that when his friend feels hurt, he hurts back. He expected that, but...

"I really felt bad for you, when you told me about that guy you fell in love with," Mu Qing hisses, and Xie Lian's entire demeanor changes. "I guess it must be a relief that he never had to see this, isn't it?"

Xie Lian always knew that Mu Qing had a tendency to lash out. 'Were you in love with him?'

He saw it many times before. And even when he told his friend to leave just now, Xie Lian had been expecting some sort of harshness in response but—

'I...I don't know. I...I think I was.'

Xie Lian didn't expect it to hurt this much.

And it runs so much deeper than just insulting Xie Lian. Or belittling his feelings.

'The guy you fell in love with.'

'The guy.'

Feng Xin hasn't said a word—and the walls in this place are thin. Xie Lian would be surprised if his parents hadn't heard.

He was able to give Hong-er a gift, before he died. To use the belief the teenager had in him to instill one thought—

That loving someone was the most beautiful thing a person could do. That man, or woman—it didn't change anything.

That it wasn't something to be ashamed of. It's a gift that no one has ever given Xie Lian.

That part of himself—the part that he knows never desired a wife, that would always disappoint his family—he was never able to accept it.

Xie Lian didn't think he was asking for much. He didn't expect anyone to accept it.

He wasn't trying to share his life with a man. Or even being open about the desire to.

The only thing he wanted was to keep that part of him to himself. To be spared from the judgment that came with people knowing.

He spoke to Mu Qing about it, because he already knew .

He saw the way Xie Lian looked at Feng Xin, all of those years ago. And when he never said anything, when he asked that question later —

Xie Lian thought it meant that his friend accepted him. Maybe he was disgusted before, and he didn't understand it—but he accepted it.

Xie Lian was wrong.

Now, that part of him is dragged out in the open. Ugly, terrified, and exposed.

And it feels so cruel. Too cruel.

So cruel, that Mu Qing probably didn't intend it. Deep down, Xie Lian knows that his friend isn't like that.

Or—well, he used to know that.

The silence has stretched on for so long, when he speaks, neither of his friends hear him at first.

Mu Qing is wide eyed, trembling with nervous energy—his expression a mask of regret, but too stubborn to back down, and Feng Xin feels like his throat is stuffed with cotton.

"Wh—?"

Xie Lian repeats himself, and the other two young men fall silent. Shocked by how flat, and angry the prince sounds, and—

"What the fuck , Mu Qing."

—neither of them have ever heard Xie Lian swear before.

They both stare, jaws hanging open.

The silence doesn't last.

Xie Lian's hand fumbles for the table, finding a small ceramic bowl.

To his credit, even when he can't see, he still nails Mu Qing right in the cheek, so hard that it shatters on contact.

"GO AWAY!"

"I didn't—!"

Whatever Xie Lian can get his hands on, he hurls in Mu Qing's direction.

“I DON’T CARE WHAT YOU MEANT!” He roars, for once in his life, moving in a blind fury. “JUST GO!”

He doesn’t realize that his friend has left until Feng Xin catches his arm, telling him to stop.

Xie Lian drops the apple in his hand (yes, he really was using anything as a weapon by then), hanging his head.

If it wasn’t for Feng Xin holding him up, he would have fallen to his knees. He’s already shaking.

It hurts.

Xie Lian doesn’t say a word.

His parents haven’t come out to question the commotion, the way they normally would have. That’s telling enough.

They probably don’t know what to say. Or maybe, they just don’t want to speak to Xie Lian at all.

Xie Lian would understand. After all, they invested so much in him. In his training. In building so many temples in his name. Just...

Just to watch it all come to nothing, and to learn, all along, that Xie Lian was hiding something like this.

That even when he was a god, even when they were so, so proud—he was still living with this shame.

Finally, when Feng Xin speaks, his voice is cautious. “Your highness...” Xie Lian grits his teeth, a shudder running through him.

“...What did he mean?”

His shoulders slump.

“What was he talking about?”

Xie Lian—

“Your highness!” Feng Xin cries out, reaching out as he flees.

He really can’t take it.

Can’t take being in that house any longer. Can’t take the questions.

Can’t take the looming claustrophobia creeping in all around him, the suffocating feeling of judgment that comes with being known.

The violation of it all makes him want to scream.

The Ghost Fire follows him at first, asks him what happened. Xie Lian pleads for a moment, just a moment, to be left alone.

If it wants to help, it can make sure no one bothers him.

For once, the spirit doesn’t argue. It leaves him be.

Xie Lian collapses on the side of the stream, splashing water over his face.

For the first time in years, even the bandages over his eyes feel suffocating—so he rips them away, leaving his face completely bare.

He gasps down the fresh air, trying to find a way to calm down.

He reaches up, trying to loosen the ponytail Feng Xin pulled his hair into the day before—it’s too tight, he can’t—he can’t stand it—

In his desperation, he snaps the ribbon holding his hair in place, sending it tumbling down over his shoulders, completely loose.

That’s fine.

Water streams down his chin, making the shorter pieces of his hair cling to his forehead. He shivers, wishing the cold would bring more clarity. Part of him wishes that he hadn’t sent the little spirit away, it —

It’s always been good at calming Xie Lian down.

He hears footsteps

He can’t bring himself to look up, just hunches over, hoping that whatever it is— whoever it is—they’ll have the sense to just leave him alone.

Honestly, he’s surprised the Ghost Fire wasn’t enough to deter them. He doesn’t doubt the little creature gave it’s best effort.

But when the person drops down beside him, and he hears who it is—Xie Lian just shrinks a little more, turning his head away with shame.

“Your highness…” Feng Xin’s voice sounds…

Complicated. Xie Lian can’t piece the tone apart. He’s too frightened to do so.

“…you shouldn’t run away before you give people a chance to talk,” he murmurs.

Xie Lian swallows thickly, wishing he—wishing he didn’t care so badly about what Feng Xin thought.

Wishing the idea of his friend thinking less of him didn’t hurt so badly—because Xie Lian, he…

He’s always thought the world of Feng Xin.

“I didn’t want to talk about it,” Xie Lian mutters, his voice hoarse.

Feng Xin is quiet, and Xie Lian doesn’t know what he wants. Part of him just wants to be alone, and—

Another part doesn’t want Feng Xin to leave.

“Your highness,” Feng Xin finally speaks again, and when he does—his voice is so gentle. “Was it true?”

Xie Lian hangs his head, strands of hair hiding around his face—fingers curling in the soft earth of the river bank.

“…Yes,” he whispers, trembling. “It’s true.”

It was so easy to tell someone else to be brave. To smile in Hong-er’s direction and tell him that it doesn’t matter. That it doesn’t change anything.

But it does. Oh god, it does.

Because if Xie Lian had spent the last six months of his life mourning a woman, he never would have felt the need to hide it.

If he had been born a woman instead of a man, he never would have taken so long to realize that what he had felt back then was love.

He never would have learned to hate every part of him that wants. To associate desire with a constant fear of rejection and judgement.

“…How long have you known that you were…?”

Feng Xin sounds—strained. And Xie Lian assumes it must be from discomfort. Maybe even anger.

Some frantic part of Xie Lian doesn't—

He doesn't know whether to laugh, or cry.

'Oh, I don't know, when was the first time you took your shirt off in front of me?'

Of all the people in his life, Feng Xin has always made him feel the safest.

He's also the last person in the world that Xie Lian would ever want to talk to about this.

"...A long time," Xie Lian mumbles, unwilling to place it on a firm timeline, he—

He just...

"Your highness..."

The prince pauses, because...Feng Xin doesn't sound angry. Or disappointed. He sounds...sad.

And Xie Lian can't stand the thought of that. Can't stand the idea that the part of him that loved Hong-er is something that makes his friend miserable.

"...You should have told me."

Xie Lian swallows thickly, and he nods.

"I know," he whispers.

After all—it was selfish. To let people follow him so far. To give up so much. All for this projection of a person who wasn't real.

Someone who was hiding something like this, all along.

He must be so hurt. He must feel so lied to. He'll leave now, he—

Fingertips brush over Xie Lian's cheek. Gentle. Never with anyone else, but always with him. Slightly calloused, particularly on the second and third fingers, where he holds his bowstring.

They push strands of hair behind his ear, slow, with—

With tenderness.

Xie Lian breaks .

He hangs his head, letting out a low, agonized sob. Because—

Because he's so scared, and he wants Feng Xin to stay, to tell him it's alright, that he doesn't hate him. That Xie Lian isn't as horrible as he feels.

"I—I was scared," he chokes, leaning into his touch. "Feng Xin—I was so scared, I..."

It's easy, when that hand pulls him in, letting Xie Lian rest his head against the guard's chest.

It's easy to cry his heart out when Feng Xin's arms wrap around him. To wrap his arms around his friend's back, clinging.

"You don't need to be scared," he whispers, their cheeks bumping together as he rocks Xie Lian in his arms. "Not when I'm here."

Xie Lian sniffles, staring blankly at the darkness in front of him.

That was something he used to say, when they were small.

Xie Lian always had nightmares, even as a little boy. He would run to his parents bed, crawl in between the king and queen before he could rest again.

As he got older, he got sheepish. Felt like he should be brave enough to sleep alone by then.

But there was something a little less embarrassing about having Feng Xin sleep on the floor next to his bed, whispering back and forth about what monsters they were going to pretend to hunt the next day.

And when Xie Lian woke up, whimpering with fear, Feng Xin would be there. Grasping his hand in the dark, whispering—

'Your highness, you don't have to be afraid.'

Xie Lian clings closer, struggling to catch his breath.

'Not while I'm around.'

“…I’m sorry,” he whispers, unsteady. “I’m sorry for not trusting you. I-I should have.” Feng Xin doesn’t answer immediately, fingers stroking through his hair.

It almost feels like when Hong-er used to comb it. Enough so for Xie Lian to relax, his eyes going half lidded.

Eventually, those fingers drift back up over his face.

His thumb strokes over the space between Xie Lian’s eyes, tracing down over his cheekbone, “…I can’t remember the last time I saw your eyes,” he admits.

Xie Lian pauses, swallowing hard.

He hides both of his shackles, but this one is the most unbearable for him to have seen.

It’s the same dark, interlocking pattern, stark against his skin—

And his irises are so pale. Sightless, watching the world blankly.

The angle of Feng Xin’s hand subtly encourages Xie Lian to lift his head, even when he wants to hide.

A thumb brushes just beneath his lashes.

“You always had beautiful eyes,” Feng Xin admits.

Xie Lian pauses, lips frozen, unsure of how to react.

“I…what?” He whispers, struggling to understand why—why he would say something like that. “Feng Xin, I—”

There’s movement, the pressure against his mouth, soft warmth. For a moment, Xie Lian doesn’t know what’s happening.

It’s just—what—?

And then, once he realizes there’s movement, gently encouraging him to relax into it, he understands.

This is a kiss.

Ghost Fire attempts at comfort aside, this is the only kiss Xie Lian’s ever been given. And Xie Lian…

His fingers tighten in the back of Feng Xin's shirt, trembling. ...He wants to cry.

Because there's a rush of euphoria that comes with the idea of not being rejected by someone you love. Of knowing that you don't have to be alone.

But this isn't what he wanted.

Xie Lian wanted his friend. He wanted to feel safe. He wanted someone to tell him that it was okay, he didn't—

The tears haven't stopped falling down his cheeks.

Xie Lian didn't want this.

Beauty.

God, how Xie Lian resents the fact that anyone ever called him beautiful.

And now, with this slow, sinking sensation, Xie Lian understands.

For him, this is what acceptance has always looked like.

Conditional.

People accept things about him, but only because they want something in return. And, after everything Feng Xin has done...

Is it really that much to ask?

Can...Can Xie Lian even justify saying no ?

When he feels Feng Xin stiffen and frown against him, he realizes that he must have stayed still for too long, that his friend must realize...

And if he does, is he—

Is Feng Xin going to leave him?

He starts to pull away, and in some frantic move of desperation, facing the prospect of being completely alone—

Xie Lian tries to kiss him back.

Clumsily, fingers weakly grasping at the back of Feng Xin's shoulders, breathing heavily through his nose.

This is enough, right?

Feng Xin's fingers tighten in his hair, pulling him closer, and the tears fall faster.

It's fine, right? It—

(It hurts.)

After this, they'll be even. What's this, compared to being alone again?

(It hurts. It hurts .)

Teeth scrape against him, making him jump, and Xie Lian... He realizes:

Feng Xin is crying.

Xie Lian's hands slide up from his friend's back, unsteady, reaching up to cup his cheeks.

There's wetness there, which is strange. No matter how emotional things get, Feng Xin doesn't like to cry in front of others, but—

He's laughing, too.

And then, in a moment of startling clarity, Xie Lian remembers:

Feng Xin would never hurt him. Never.

He isn't like that.

And this—

That mouth smiles against him, fingers digging in as they drag Xie Lian closer, taking what they want.

This hurts.

(It hurts. It hurts .)

His hands slide down from Feng Xin's face, flattening against his chest, giving it a hard shove—making their lips part, leaving Xie Lian panting and shivering, fingers drifting back up, and he—

He already knows what he's going to find, before he ever feels the mask.

“...” Xie Lian squeezes his eyes shut, no longer trembling with fear. Or shame.

There comes a point where you become so accustomed to a feeling, it means nothing to you anymore.

Xie Lian lives, eats, and breathes fear. It doesn’t paralyze him anymore.

The rage is new.

It twists and curls inside of him like a beast with a mind of it’s own, until the god is surging forward, tackling the masked figure to the ground.

It lets him.

He straddles it, bringing his fist down over and over again, until his knuckles are split and bleeding.

It lets him.

“LEAVE!” Xie Lian shrieks.

There was a time when he was considered to be the most dangerous swordsman of his generation. A thing of grace. He made battle into an art form.

This isn’t art. This is something far more base to human instinct.

His nails claw at every bit of exposed skin he can reach. He grips both sides of the creature’s head, slamming it down into the earth until the ground rumbles, until there’s fractures in the rock beneath him.

“JUST LEAVE!” He roars.

Under the onslaught, the mask cracks.

Xie Lian trembles, his hands clutched around the creature’s throat, desperately wishing this wasn’t useless. That it could end.

That it could all just be over.

“I’ll never leave you, your highness,” the calamity croons, it’s tone sweet and mocking, speaking with ease.

Xie Lian sobs, hearing it mimic the inflections of Hong-er's voice. So, so cruel.

"YOU ALREADY TOOK HIM!" The god cries, shaking the monster like a rag doll. "What more do you WANT?! What more could you POSSIBLY DO?!"

"..," Bai Wuxiang doesn't raise his voice, no.

"...You don't actually know what happened that night, remember?"

He doesn't actually sound like a man being strangled, in spite of it all.

"Would you like me to show you, dianxia?"

Xie Lian's hands tighten around that throat until it's crushed, mangled under his fingers.

It's still laughing.

And then, it's gone.

There's no one underneath him. Nothing between his fingers. No laughing.

Xie Lian's alone, on the ground—screaming.

The sounds of the forest slowly return. He didn't realize they had stopped.

The stream starts flowing again.

The sun starts sinking below the horizon.

Clouds gather, like a storm is slowly moving in. Something cold slams into his chest.

Xie Lian doesn't react this time.

"Dianxia..." It whispers, and Xie Lian knows, from the tone—

It saw.

It doesn't say anything more than that. Just whispers his name, over and over again.

But it saw.

What Xie Lian allowed that thing to do to him. What he did out of fear and desperation.

How pathetic he is. "..."

The prince rises to his feet, swaying, unsteady. Unwilling to go back home. Having nowhere else to go.

But this time, when he breathes in—there's something there. A trace of spiritual power. Demonic.

Xie Lian's eyes snap open, then narrow into a venomous glare.

A trail.

When he starts following after it, the ghost fire is there—pressing hard against his chest. As hard as it can.

"Dianxia," it whispers, "don't go there."

Xie Lian shoves it aside, shoulders trembling with rage.

There's nothing more it can do to him. Nothing else it can take.

Xie Lian doesn't care about what it wants anymore. Doesn't care if it kills him. Or humiliates him. Or tricks him.

He just wants this to be over. To stop being hunted like an animal.

The longer he walks, the stronger the scent becomes. He doesn't know how many miles it is.

Eventually, the storm comes. Thunder rolling overhead, the breeze rolling through his hair. The rain starts to fall in thick, fat drops, quickly soaking him to the bone.

There are more Ghost Fires.

Xie Lian doesn't know how. He certainly didn't call them.

They're in his way.

"Move." He mutters, shoving at them as he stumbles through the forest path.

They make a dark procession around him, gleaming against the dark—illuminating the dips and shadows of his face.

“MOVE!”

There’s a coldness by his cheek, and that voice again—

“Don’t go there.”

“...” His fingers snatch out, catching the Ghost Fire between his fingers. As ever, it doesn’t flinch—just sits calmly in his palm, and Xie Lian hisses—

“If you don’t get out of my way, I’ll disperse you.” He glances around blindly.

“All of you!”

The threat is enough to make nearly all of them scatter.

Except for one.

Xie Lian’s grip is still loose enough that the Ghost Fire could have slipped free, if it wanted.

“...Leave,” he whispers, “just leave.” The flame doesn’t move.

“I won’t.”

Xie Lian’s breathing is ragged, uneven.

“E-Even if I was going to disperse you?!” He whispers. “You would still stay?!”

“Even then,” the voice replies. Not a shred of hesitation. “If Dianxia is the one to do it, this one will never mind.”

The god shudders.

“What about the person that’s so precious to you?!” He snaps, letting go. “Have you just forgotten about them?!”

They’re what’s keeping in his world after all, aren’t they?

And he would just let Xie Lian disperse his spirit. Just like that?!

“I’ll never forget them.”

The reply is so simple, but Xie Lian finds it maddening.

“Then how could you let me do that?! Why?! Why would you be okay with me doing that?!"

After a moment, it whispers—

"I am forever your most devoted believer."

Xie Lian clenches his teeth, his throat tight.

"No!"

He shoves the creature aside, clutching the pouch around his neck as he walks deeper into the night.

"You're not him!" He cries, "I asked you so many times—you're not him!"

Hong-er is at peace. Xie Lian tried every way possible to call to him. And he knows… If Hong-er could hear him, he would have answered.

And as much as he's come to care for this spirit, as kind as it has been —

Xie Lian isn't ready to believe in someone like that again. He isn't ready to allow himself to have that kind of faith.

It hurts too much.

The Ghost Fire repeats itself, this time louder, more frantically as Xie Lian makes his way through the path.

"I am forever your most devoted believer!"

Xie Lian shakes his head, pushing forward. He's not. He's just—he's just not.

"No," he mutters, barely audible over the rain "You're not!"

"Dianxia," it pleads, wailing out against the night, "believe me!" Xie Lian doesn't weep, even if he wants to.

"I don't believe you."

He doesn't believe in anything anymore.

Eventually, he stumbles across a temple. The steps are worn, overgrown, but… He knows, after a moment's examination, it's one of his own.

Worn down, dilapidated, but the entrance plaque is all too familiar.
“...”

When he breathes in, the scent of demonic power is strong.

He was meant to come here, he knows.

It’s a trap.

Xie Lian knows that, too.

But it will find him, if he runs. He’ll fall for it again, and again, and again.

He might as well fall into it now, when he knows it’s coming. Xie Lian sits, and he waits.

It Hurts

Chapter Summary

> “There’s a cure, you know.”
>
> There’s stirring throughout the room. A ghost fire bumps between bodies, desperately trying to break through, but—
>
> There are too many people. It’s too chaotic.
>
> “What?!”
>
> “To human face disease,” Bai Wuxiang explains calmly. There’s a rush of whispering in the room. “Ask him, he knows.”

Chapter Notes

> TW// this chapter contains graphic depictions of violence, torture, horror elements, and moments that could be triggering for victims of sexual assault and violence. There is once again an expression of derogatory attitudes towards sex workers, please read with caution.
>
> You can find me and the rest of this story on twitter at @cataclysmicevie !

The Ghost Fire hovers nearby, quiet—but fretful.

Watching as more travelers begin to wander in.

Each one of them caught by the storm, side tracked, looking for a place to take shelter.

The Ghost Fire watches, one by one, as the temple starts to fill up. Slowly, Xie Lian starts to feel worry.

It was one thing, jumping into the trap on his own. Why are there so many other people here?

Are they in danger from it now, too?

No-face hasn’t been focused on tormenting anyone but Xie Lian in so long. Why pull others into it now? Not his loved ones, but people Xie Lian doesn’t even know?

Then, he hears the screaming.

The panic sweeps through the room as whispers and cries leak through.

Faces. Human faces. It’s—

It’s back.

Oh god—

It’s back!

The Ghost Fire watches, as his god calls out, trying to calm them. Telling them not to run. That something much worse is waiting outside.

It watches, it wishes, and it prays.

Prays for a body. For hands that could pull his beloved from this place. For the strength to stop this.

“Dianxia,” it whispers.

It knows.

“Leave this place.”

Xie Lian frowns—shaking his head. “I can’t leave these people.” The fire prays.

Because it knows what’s coming—in such cruel, vivid detail.

But even it did not know everything.

It’s prayers go unanswered.

Xie Lian is crowded in, stepping backwards until his hand catches the edge of an altar.

No divine statue. A cracked entry plaque—but still, an altar.

There are hands on his shoulders, then—broad, heavy. And a voice in his ear—

“I said I would show you, your highness,” a familiar voice whispers.

Xie Lian freezes.

"Do you still want to see?"

He opens his mouth to scream, and a hand clamps over his jaw, silencing him.

Xie Lian can feel the mask press against his cheek, the voice crooning in his ear, "I'll let you in on a little secret—"

His fingernails scrape against Xie Lian's jawline.

"—I never laid a finger on the boy."

His eyes widen, brows knitting together in distressed confusion.

He can feel Bai Wuxiang smile. "Well, not until he was already dead. I don't touch humans directly."

Xie Lian supposes that must be true. It never came after him in his human life. Only —

Only after.

But the rest of it—

Xie Lian wrenches his head until his mouth is free.

"Liar!" He chokes, whipping his face around to glare, "Every word that comes out of your mouth is a LIE!"

"..." Fingertips stroke his cheek, and there's a sigh.

Like an exhausted parent, on the verge of punishing their favorite child—after giving them so many chances.

"Alright," he sighs, hands pulling Xie Lian back. "I'll show you, little one."

Show him.

Show him—?

He's forced to sit upon the altar, and he hears Bai Wuxiang's voice call out, calm— almost bored, but easily heard above the nervous din of voices.

"There's a cure, you know."

There's stirring throughout the room. A ghost fire bumps between bodies, desperately trying to break through, but—

There are too many people. It's too chaotic.

"What?!"

"To human face disease," Bai Wuxiang explains calmly. There's a rush of whispering in the room.

"Ask him, he knows."

Quietly, Xie Lian can't help but wonder whose face he's wearing now.

After all—no one has commented on the oddness of the mask, or recognized him as the white clothed calamity.

It must be someone that would hurt him, if Xie Lian could see it.

Maybe Guoshi. Or Feng Xin.

Hong-er, Xie Lian eventually decides. That's what would hurt him the most.

It must be the illusion of Hong-er's arms now, holding him down. Slowly, people begin to question.

What could it be? How could he know?

And if he knows, why wouldn't he tell them?

"It's not a cure," Xie Lian tries to explain, his voice strained; "it's a curse. You don't want it—"

"How can you make that decision for us?!"

"Who do you think you are?!"

"My child is here! I don't care what I have to do, tell me how to save him!"

The god sags.

He's forced to tell them the truth—the horrible, awful truth, that he learned many years ago:

"Murder," he croaks, limp in Bai Wuxiang's hold.

Silence falls across the room.

“You have to kill someone, to be immune to the disease.”

A horribly clever solution.

The debate begins. People don’t show the worst sides of themselves at the first opportunity. It takes a little coaxing. They have to feel like the situation gives them permission.

Xie Lian hears a sword being thrown to the ground with a clatter.

He listens as Bai Wuxiang explains that he won’t die, revealing Xie Lian’s true identity.

He listens, as they toss the idea back and forth. As they debate, whether or not his torture is worth their salvation.

Listens to the sounds of the Ghost Fire struggling to get to him. He bites his lip, shoulders trembling.

‘Leave,’ he mouths, not wanting the spirit to see what he knows is coming. But the prince already knows—in this moment, in a twisted turn of timing—

The Ghost Fire won’t leave him.

It won’t ever, ever leave him.

A human mouth presses against his jaw, and Xie Lan can’t stop himself from convulsing, trying to flinch away—even as he feels a sadistic smile in place.

“It stormed that night too, do you remember?”

His lips tremble.

“Stop it!”

“I’m not the only one who has been hunting you.”

Bai Wuxiang explains patiently, watching the scene before him with quiet, fascinated glee.

“Someone else was too—very successfully, after all…” His thumb caresses over Xie Lian’s mouth.

"He already knew your face quite well."

His eyes are wide, horrified.

"...Who?!"

"A former believer of yours," Bai Wuxiang explains. "You're familiar with him. Someone eager to...distance himself from family ties."

Nausea builds in his throat.

Someone who already hated Hong-er. Someone the boy would have already feared.

"I gave him this choice, too."

Xie Lian struggles, but it's fruitless.

"He didn't take so long to decide, I'll admit," the calamity muses. "But we'll reach the same destination, in the end. We always do."

"...What's the point of this?" The god whispers.

The grip on his chin tightens.

"You're a slow learner, your highness," the creature hisses. "And I'm not a patient man."

"What—" Xie Lian thrashes, "What am I supposed to learn from any of this?!"

"How people are," the crowd is getting louder now. "The things they'll do, when given the chance."

"Qi Rong—" Xie Lian spits that name with nothing but content, "Is the WORST of what people can be, not—!"

"You sound so confident, speaking for the common man," Bai Wuxiang smiles, pushing Xie Lian's bangs from his forehead. "But this is Qi Rong's world, not yours."

The young man trembles, and his tormentor continues—

"The world is filled with nothing but Qi Rongs. If he was so horrible—why didn't your parents to something about him, before?"

Xie Lian opens his mouth, then closes it.

“As I recall…” Bai Wuxian cradles him in his arms.

“The one who once wore this face—he dragged him in a sack behind his carriage once, didn’t he?”

Xie Lian’s face contorts at the memory, and—

And at the confirmation that, at this moment, Bai Wuxiang is wearing Hong-er’s face.

“I already know he’s disgusting,” Xie Lian snaps. “You aren’t teaching me anything—!”

“You really didn’t think about it, did you?” Bai Wuxiang sighs, petting Xie Lian’s hair —and the prince falls silent. “You just saw the end result, and only saw one person’s hand in the situation.”

He clicks his tongue.

“How childish.”

The Ghost Fire snarls, finally reaching the altar—only to end up batted away, like one might swat a fly.

“How many people watched, you think, when he placed that boy in the sack? How easy was it for you, when you came across it, to realize what the man had done?”

Xie Lian’s eyes fill with tears at the memory. It was gut wrenching then—but even more so now, when the boy has become so much more to him than a passing impression.

When he knows the young man he would become.

“There’s a phrase I’ve always liked,” Bai Wuxiang muses. “It takes a village to raise a child.”

A single tear slips down his cheek.

“It also takes a village to fail one, don’t you think?” The calamity smiles. “Other than yourself, do you think a single person ever showed that boy kindness?”

“Enough—” Xie Lian croaks, trembling.

“When it was said and done with, who was punished more? Qi Rong, for nearly torturing a boy to death, or Feng Xin, for stopping him?”

Anger twists in his chest at the memory, and Xie Lian fights it, knowing—knowing that's what the creature wants him to feel. That it's all...

That it's all a trap.

"The mother that raised you—she also raised him, didn't she?"

Xie Lian recoils.

"And in the long run—who did the world scorn?" Bai Wuxiang muses. "Qi Rong, or you?"

Finally, the god's face freezes. "Who did they curse?"

Oh.

"Him, or you?"

It hurts.

For a moment, just a moment—someone speaks out for him.

"Are all of you really considering this?!" The man cries out, surveying the crowd with disbelief. "You're so scared, you'd take the word of a madman and do something like that?!"

There's a stir.

"The prince confirmed it!"

"Some of us have children here, we don't have a choice!"

"How could you blame us?! After all, you heard him—he won't die!"

Xie Lian's heart lurches with hope, but Bai Wuxiang only smiles, petting his cheek.

"Wait," he murmurs in Xie Lian's ear. "Listen, to what men do."

"You really think we're wrong for wanting to save ourselves?! What are you, suicidal?! You really wanna die?!"

The man speaking sounds almost familiar, but Xie Lian struggles to place him. It... sounds almost like one of the farmers he used to know. Back in the old days.

"I don't wanna die," the man mutters, shaking his head. "But I don't wanna live like that, either! Even if he is a god, that doesn't mean you should—!"

"You really think you know what kind of person he is?" A voice sneers, and Xie Lian.

He cringes, nails biting into his palms. That voice, he recognizes very well.

The merchant walks towards the front of the room, "You know how he's been getting by, since he fell from grace?"

The room suddenly falls silent.

"I can tell you exactly how," the servant glares, "and you shouldn't feel sorry for him!"

The prince's breathing slowly begins to pick up as he hears the sword being lifted from the floor, the slow drag of the metal edge of the blade against stone.

"If the rest of you are willing to die for a whore, that's your business—but I'm not!"

Shocked murmurs echo.

To their credit, there's a pause—they wait for the prince to deny it.

When he doesn't the mood seems to change, and Xie Lian hears Bai Wuxiang murmur, "I told you. I told you so many times."

Xie Lian opens his mouth to tell him that it doesn't matter, that he won't—

Slice!

He's too shocked to stop the agonized cry that slips from his lips, pain radiating from his abdomen.

It's a hesitant blow, from someone who clearly isn't used to wielding a blade. Once he realizes it isn't deep enough, it slams the rest of the way through, and—

Xie Lian chokes.

Blood slips down his chin. The calamity wipes it away, still rather calm, whispering—

“I told you.”

The blade is yanked out with a wet sound, clattering to the floor.

Everyone stares, too shocked to move, but they all watch as the merchant turns on his heel, walking away.

He’s able to walk from the temple without fear. To return to his life, knowing that he won’t be haunted by the disease that looms over them.

And...why shouldn’t they?

Xie Lian can hear it, in the voices bubbling around him.

Why shouldn’t they save themselves?

“Here,” Bai Wuxiang says, rising to his feet. Several of the travelers look over at the limber youth, dark hair falling over his shoulder as he reaches down, fixing each of Xie Lian’s wrists to a set of chains, dangling from the ceiling. “I’ll make it easier for all of you.”

No one questions why the chains were there to begin with, in the altar of a temple. No one questions how the young man knows all of this, no.

The only thing anyone asks is—

“Aren’t you going to want a turn yourself?”

“Oh, no,” the young man smiles, hopping down from the altar.

“I’m already immune,” he walks to the side, leaning against a stone pillar. He crosses his arms over his chest, like he’s about to watch quite the show. “I just want to watch.”

No one questions that, either.

Xie Lian hears someone picking up the sword again, and he whimpers.

Before the blade hits, he hears Bai Wuxiang chuckle, because he has one more thing to add.

“Also—just so you know—it’s not a permanent solution.”

The blacksmith standing wards the front pauses, the sword hovering over Xie Lian's chest. "...What?"

The calamity grins.

"But the more he suffers, the longer it lasts."

Xie Lian's eyes look up to the ceiling blankly, hands trembling, straining against the manacles around his wrists.

He remembers the shallow wounds, all over Hong-er's body. The way only one of them was fatal.

Torture.

He told him, he would show Xie Lian what happened that night.

Bai Wuxiang told him.

And he was right—Xie Lian is a slow learner. Not from a lack of ability, but from a stubborn refusal to admit it when he's wrong.

Wrong about the world. Wrong about people.

It hurts.

But that's okay. Xie Lian gets many, many chances to learn that night.

A hundred chances.

Some of them just slam the sword in, whimpering out apologies when he cries out, sobbing with pain. Xie Lian learns to be grateful for that.

Others—

Others take their time.

It will always surprise you, the things people will do. The things men will do, when they think the situation permits it.

Xie Lian can't see the cuts coming. Doesn't know which direction the pain will come from next. He cringes from every touch, trembling, terrified.

Not alone.

There's a coldness that occasionally rushes towards him, trying to place itself between him, and the swords.

It's shoved back—or, Xie Lian sobs, begging it to leave. Knowing that it won't. It never does.

At one point, it manages to knock a man holding the sword to the ground.

It rushes into the curve of Xie Lian's neck, trembling. He can feel it now—more cold than it's ever been, waves of energy pouring off of it.

Poor thing—it must be burning so brightly.

And while the calamity seemed bemused by the little spirit at first…

It watches the way Xie Lian dips his chin, pressing his cheek against the flames. The quivering of his lips as he whispers to the creature.

Even now, finding some small form of comfort. It isn't so amusing. Not anymore.

The prince chokes, when the Ghost Fire is snatched away.

"Don't!" He cries out, even as a sword plunges into his side, his screams echoing off of the temple walls. "DON'T HURT IT!"

"…"

Bai Wuxiang isn't wearing the brat's face anymore. Standing in the middle of the room as the floor becomes slick with blood.

His sleeves are white, billowing, the white of his mask illuminated with a hellish green haze. All of the other torches in the temple have blown out.

The only light now comes from the flame in his palm, burning with the force of a small sun.

Stronger with every passing moment.

None of the remaining humans seem to notice, anyway.

Everyone with a conscience left long ago. The ones that remain are scavengers, opportunists, tearing at a bleeding, wounded animal that can't run.

Bai Wuxiang drags his thumb over the flames in slow circles. The way one might do with a small kitten, or a wounded bird.

"Your highness," he muses, watching the utter anguish in the young man's eyes, "there was something else—something I didn't tell you."

Xie Lian doesn't lift his head now. Doesn't ask—but that's alright. He'll tell him anyway.

"I did touch him, after he was dead." Bai Wuxiang muses, holding the Ghost Fire closer in front of his face. "Not the hanging," the calamity muses.

Xie Lian shudders.

"That was a family affair."

The Ghost Fire rumbles—and the calamity holds on tightly.

"...He had no desire to Rest In Peace," Bai Wuxiang explains. "And with his nasty little habit of interrupting our lessons..."

He squeezes tighter, so tightly, that the flame flickers. "I made sure he never would again."

It's intentionally vague. Cruelly so.

Xie Lian's teeth chatter, hunching around the next slam of a blade, this time into his lower abdomen. "You...dispersed him?"

Bai Wuxiang smiles, and he offers no answer. Allows the pain and sadness to fill the crown prince like a flood. Squeezes the spirit in his hand viciously.

From then on, it's relentless.

The humans remaining are given free reign. Bai Wuxiang watches with amusement as one reaches between Xie Lian's legs, faintly surprised that, even now, men think of such things.

Animals.

He waits until Xie Lian is trembling with absolute terror.

Before the man can do much more than that, he lets the ghost fire go.

The little creature hurls forward with such viciousness, the man is knocked back down the steps—at such a vicious angle, the landing snaps his neck.

The calamity snatches the ghost fire back between his fingers, listening as it snarls. “Not that kind of pain,” he muses—directed towards the men who remain.

Xie Lian doesn’t know why the calamity would bother to spare him from that. It’s never shown mercy before.

But what comes after isn’t exactly mercy, in the end.

His body won’t die.

Even when the wounds seem to outnumber the parts of him that are intact.

At some point, his throat is cut—and then, Xie Lian can’t even scream. Can’t cry, or beg.

But in his mind, he wails.

Help me.

Help me, help me, help me.

Help me, help me, help, help, help, help, help, help, help, help, help, help, help, help, help, help me!!!!”

No one will help.

No one can.

In the distance, Xie Lian hears screaming, and he knows it’s not him.

Don’t hurt it. Don’t—

Please, don’t—!

One final, choked moan rips from him—then, he can’t make a single sound.

But still, it hurts.

Xie Lian’s mind swirls in and out of consciousness, everything slipping into a haze. He hears the screaming. Hears laughing. Endless, horrible laughing.

And still, it hurts.

It hurts, it hurts, it hurts, it hurts…it hurts, it hurts, it hurts, it hurts, it hurts, it hurts, it hurts, it hurts, it hurts, it hurts, IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS!!!!

Why can't I die?

He's longed for death before. In a quiet, exhausted way. Because the grief was too painful. Because it felt as though he had been fighting on for so long.

Xie Lian didn't know anything, back then. Now, he silently begs for death. Pleads.

He prays.

Desperately—to the one person he can think of that can help him that might still care. That might still save him.

Jun Wu.

He screams for him soundlessly—and Xie Lian doesn't even scream for salvation. Or forgiveness. He doesn't pray for revenge, or justice.

He prays for death.

Begs for Jun Wu to take back his immortality. To let him slip away.

Even if Xie Lian could survive this, he doesn't want to. Doesn't want to live with the memory of this in his body.

Doesn't want to go on, knowing that this is what Hong-er felt.

He doesn't cry anymore.

Tears of blood stream down his cheeks.

Eventually, the pain fades into nothing. Constant, unending static across his skin. Layer upon layer of it blending together.

He's sightless. Soundless. And god, he wishes he could lose the feeling of touch.

Xie Lian faintly remembers that there was a time when he enjoyed being touched— and now, he can't bring himself to understand why.

Bai Wuxiang smirks, watching as the Ghost Fire in his hand burns to a fever pitch, murmuring—

"You should be grateful to me, you know."

He purrs, watching Xie Lian sag in his chains, a god, sacrificed to the cruelty of his own people. Fitting, Bai Wuxiang thinks.

The finest self portrait he's ever painted.

"Without me...your story would have been so boring ."

The Ghost Fire sparks, raging brighter.

He could have just been a lone soldier, dying alone and abandoned on the battlefield.

"Tragedy builds character," the calamity explains, eyes lingering on the corpse of the man the ghost fire killed, an hour before. "Look at the role you got to play. Beautiful, isn't it?"

The fact that he was able to kill a human being, even in just a spectral form—it's impressive. Implying a future as a savage ghost. Maybe even something more, eventually.

"You never got to know the prince as a child...a shame," he adds as an aside, "he was completely charming."

The fire is vibrating between his fingers now. If Bai Wuxiang was smart, he would disperse it. But...he's curious.

He wants to see what this little thing can do. Call it an experiment. "Built golden palaces. Cried from nightmares, and..."

The calamity steps closer.

He gives the ghost fire a better view of his beloved, limp, nearly unrecognizable.

"...a love of fairy tales. That's rather fitting, isn't it?"

After all—those stories always seem so shining, so beautiful—

But there are always such gruesome origins underneath. Such tragedies.

The walls of this temple were once made from gleaming white marble. Now, every inch of them is stained with splatters and streaks of red. A baptism.

Primed for rebirth.

“And look what I did to you.”

The ghost fire trembles.

Before, he wouldn’t have been important enough to be a named character. Not even in a supporting role.

Now, the little flame is something straight out of the pages of a fairy tale.

“A hideous little creature…desperately in love with a princess,” the calamity pauses, smirking.

Well. Not quite a princess. But the child said such things made little difference to him, didn’t he?

“And all it would take for them to be together, would be if she could know his name.”

It really does sound like a fairy tale. Something straight out of the pages of folklore. “But he can never say it out loud.”

Because Bai Wuxiang took his name.

When Hong-er awoke in the forest, hovering beneath his own dangling body, watching his boots swing overhead—he was snatched into someone’s palm.

Disoriented. Defenseless.

The curse was powerful—with just as much force as that of the shackles on the prince’s body.

Maybe even more.

Each time his beloved asked him, called for him—

‘Hong-er?’

‘Hong-er, is that you?!’

'Please, Hong-er—I'm scared!'

It was hell.

He couldn't answer.

But there is one thing that will always baffle the white clothed calamity—from now, until the end.

This creature—it's deeds can never be known. Not anymore. The prince will never recognize his first love. Will never know the aches and trials this spirit endures.

There will never be acknowledgement. Never be a reward.

He thought, when the child realized that—it would break. That it would fade away.

Now, it burns brighter than ever before.

He wasn't there that day, years ago, standing in a worn down shrine, listening to a god cry out—

'I can't give you anything now!'

And he never heard the child answer, his voice solemn, devout—

'I don't want anything.'

A god who constantly hunts the prayers and loves of worshippers like a half-starved beast will never understand those who pray without expecting an answer.

Will never understand that the truest form of salvation often stems from the act of belief itself.

And that—that is something this spirit can't stop doing. It can't stop believing.

It burns so bright, the calamity lets it go with a start.

Believing in it's god...

The howl that rips through the air is so powerful the stone foundations of the temple begin to rattle and shake.

Even without an answer. Even if he never knows why the spirit hasn't gone, or that it's protecting him—

That's all Hong-er is.

Thunder crashes, and with it comes the explosion.

So loud, so powerful, it rattles half of the mountain with it, incinerating every living human left inside, leaving even their bones as piles of ash.

Rain pours down, the roof now reduced to rubble, scattered for miles.

The wind howls, scattering the human remains to the air, carrying them off into the night.

It's pitch dark now. No torches. No starlight. No ghost fire.

The only illumination comes from occasional crashes of lightning—showing a scene from a child's nightmare.

A temple in ruins. Streaked with blood, slowly being washed away by the downpour. A god, sacrificed upon his own altar. Before him, his last believer.

There's a lone figure in the middle of the scene. A tall, dark haired youth—dressed in black.

The rain doesn't touch him. It doesn't dare.

Boots click softly against the flagstones, wet, cracked—stained by the blood of the deity they were hewn to worship.

The figure kneels before the fallen god. A deviation from teachings—but the youth isn't kneeling to worship.

He is kneeling in penance.

When he clasps his hands in prayer, head bowed—for the first time in many years, he prays for something in particular.

Strength.

Strength at any cost. Strength in any form.

Strength to destroy his enemies. Strength to avenge his god.

Strength to protect him.

Even if his god doesn’t know why he isn’t resting in peace. Even if he doesn't know why he hasn’t gone.

Even if he doesn’t know that this servant is protecting him.

For him, this man will survive anything. For him, he will become invincible.

The rain pounds as the thunder roars.

The youth prays for strength. But there is another prayer, one that is always on his lips, rattling against his teeth, repeating with every pulse of a heart that no longer beats.

He prays to never Rest In Peace.

The howl of the wind steals the words he utters, lost to time; “I am forever your most devoted believer.”

Disillusionment

Chapter Summary

When Xie Lian lost his godhood, he knew—watching as the world went dark. Falling to his knees, clutching at his eyes like a frightened child, whimpering at the unfairness of it all. And what did he know then, of the world being unfair?

When Xie Lian lost Hong-er—he knew. Even if it took him so long to accept it. The first time he called, and received no answer—some part of his heart knew. Knew that Hong-er would never leave him. That the world had suddenly become so frightening, because he was no longer in it.

It took him two days, to realize that he lost Feng Xin.

Chapter Notes

TW// once again, this chapter contains mentions of negative attitudes towards sex work, and it also displays some nuanced / subtle undertones of homophobia. Read with caution.

You can find me (and this story) on twitter at @cataclysmicevie

Xie Lian doesn't know how long it takes him to wake, but when he does—he's alone. Not wearing the same robes as before. These are clean, not stained with blood.

A kindness from his tormentor. One he can't bring himself to understand.

It takes a long time for the young man to move. He lays on his side, hands clenched into fists in front of him, eyes staring widely—blankly.

He waits for more pain to come. Assumes that it can't be over yet. That the moment he moves, the blades will return to his skin.

Cautiously, he sits up—waiting for something to lurch out, to break him open again.

His hand drifts down over his stomach, knowing that he should find a mangled mess of flesh—but it feels smooth. Unharmed.

The memory of it is still there, churning under his skin.

After a time of sitting there, waiting, Xie Lian realizes that the calamity won't come back. That there's not a single living thing in a mile radius.

Bai Wuxiang won't come back. Not now. Xie Lian's lips tremble as he rises to his feet.

Not when he's gotten what he wanted.

Slowly, he makes his way back down the mountain, hands floating loosely by his sides, stumbling along the path.

His foot catches over the edge of something substantial, sending him sprawling— something he's long since gotten used to.

When he fumbles out, feeling for what tripped him—he finds a boot. Not shoes that he knows, this time.

There was a time when such a discovery would frighten him, leaving him shivering and alone, in the dark.

Now, he's calm, hands patting over the body, investigating.

He finds a slightly rounded stomach, fine clothes—a heavy sack of money at his side.

His fingers find the telltale signs of dried blood—killed by a sword. Xie Lian's mind drifts to the blade at his side, left behind after they—

The prince's shoulders tremble, hunching in. ...After they took what they wanted.

But fangxin didn't do this—a saber did. And when Xie Lian feels for the man's hand, finding one of the rings on his fingers—he knows who it is.

The merchant.

'If the rest of you are willing to die for a —'

Xie Lian grits his teeth.

'—that's your business, but I'm not!'

Before he rises to his feet, he takes the pouch of money, coins tinkling in his grip as he attaches it to his waist.

Robbing a dead man's body. Disgraceful. Something that would have repelled him, before.

But there are worse things.

Xie Lian knows that, now.

He slowly drifts down the path, unsure of how long the walk home will take. Unsure if he even wants to go home, now—but there's nowhere else to go.

And after an hour of walking, he notices—

There's no Ghost Fire following him.

He stops walking.

"...Hello?" He calls out, lifting his hand up, waiting for the little creature to fly into his palm—just as it always has.

Nothing comes.

The prince stands there for a moment, the slow realization dawning on him.

It—Bai Wuxiang, he—

"..." Xie Lian hangs his head, trembling.

'Don't— DON'T HURT IT!'

He remembers the screaming at the end. The screaming that wasn't his own—and he knows.

Knows what Bai Wuxiang must have done.

'I'm forever your most devoted believer.'

The prince's eyes burn hot with tears that don't fall.

'Your highness—believe me!'

Couldn't he...

'I don't believe you.'

Couldn't he have just lied, to make the poor thing happy? To bring it some small measure of peace? He—

‘I pray to never Rest In Peace.’

Right.

Xie Lian swallows thickly, remembering what the spirit said. The person it lingered on for.

“...I’m sorry,” he whispers into the air, not sure who he’s apologizing to.

The little spirit, for not listening. It’s beloved, for Xie Lian’s actions leading to it being dispersed, or...

Or maybe even himself. Because this—

This pain is, in large part, self inflicted.

Xie Lian’s fingers drift up to the pouch around his neck, quivering. Wishing he wasn’t such a slow learner. That, after all of this pain, he could manage to learn his lesson—

Then he freezes, finding that the weight of the pouch has changed, his chest seizing with panic.

Someone touched it, he—

Xie Lian’s heart pounds as he drops to his knees, lifting the pouch from around his neck, fingers shaking so badly, he can hardly open the draw string.

Scattering someone’s ashes—it’s an unthinkable thing. But...

Bai Wuxiang would. To hurt him.

He could have done anything to Xie Lian while he was passed out, to the ashes around his neck—and the prince wouldn’t have been able to do a thing to—

His fingers probe inside the pouch, and at first, his stomach plunges when he doesn’t feel ashes there.

Then, he pauses.

The lock of Hong-er’s hair is still there—along with a stone.

Heavy, round, and smooth. The texture of it feels almost like polished obsidian. And Xie Lian doesn’t know how he knows, but—

His fingers curl around the stone, squeezing tightly.

This is Hong-er. It's—it's him.

The god couldn't explain why the ashes changed form, but now...

He's too tired to give the matter much thought.

The lock of hair, stone, and leather cord replace the pouch around his neck, resting against his chest with a comforting weight.

Xie Lian begins to walk again.

Walking feels longer, when you're alone. Feels slower, when you don't actually want to go anywhere. He has no way of knowing how long it takes, just that his toes have started to wear down and bleed inside of his boots.

Trying to move his body feels like plucking at marionette strings, pulling on something that isn't quite connected to him anymore. His limbs jerk and obey clumsily—but there's so much regenerated bone, muscle, and sinew, it—

Most of it isn't him anymore.

This is a new body, regrown from ashes. Unscarred, unbroken.

But the heart beneath still remembers. And the numbness that takes over him now isn't new. It isn't reborn—it's overstretched. Leaving his mind feeling like paper, worn down down to the thinnest point.

Easy to tear.

Xie Lian didn't memorize the path, the number of steps between that place, and home. He doesn't realize that he's made it back until he feels a set of hands on his shoulders, Feng Xin's voice angry in it's worry—

"Where WERE you?!" He leans down to examine the prince's face.

"You were gone for TWO days, we couldn't find you, we didn't know if you had—!" He cuts himself off, shaking his head, fingers trembling where they grip his friend's shoulders. "You—you can't just run off like that, and not tell anyone where you're going!"

Oh.

It was two days.

Xie Lian doesn't look harmed—if anything, he looks better by Feng Xin's examination than he has in quite some time. His face is clean—hair has clearly been combed, pulled up into the half up, half down style that he hasn't worn in months now. The robes are simple, but new.

But his face isn't right. If Feng Xin was being honest with himself, he would be forced to admit that his face hasn't been right in quite some time, but...

It's smooth now. Dull it's lack of emotion. Like it may as well be a mask.

"Don't worry about it, Feng Xin."

His friend looks him over—and Xie Lian can't see the frantic worry in Feng Xin's eyes, his knuckles white from how tightly he's gripping Xie Lian's shoulders.

Then, he's pulling the prince in, clutching him so fiercely, Xie Lian can feel his newly formed ribs groan in protest.

"How could you ask me not to worry?!"

Feng Xin's voice comes out hoarse, and Xie Lian—he knows all too well, why that is. He's heard his own voice like that before.

From wandering a forest for countless hours on end, crying out the name of someone you love, always met with...

Silence. Horrible, terrifying silence.

Xie Lian stares ahead, expression blank as Feng Xin clutches him, his heart pounding as his terror slowly begins to ease, because—

What Mu Qing said—Feng Xin knew, from the look on Xie Lian's face, how humiliated he was. How horrified.

When he left like that, without coming back...and he stayed gone for so long...

He'd never done that before. Not without at least telling Feng Xin where he was going, and why.

And given how...serious it all was, it made the guard wonder, made him worry that… his prince had…

Xie Lian feels his friend hug him a little tighter, the action bringing his face just a little closer against Feng Xin's shoulder, breath hitting the side of his neck. The larger man's nose brushing against his cheek.

He didn't feel it, at first, the fractures left inside. There was just numbness, and now—

'You always had such beautiful eyes.'

Now, he remembers that breath on his cheek. Those hands on his back, taking what they wanted. And he knows, it wasn't this person. Wasn't his friend.

Feng Xin would never hurt him.

But those hands did.

He can still feel the memory of that mouth on his. Xie Lian still knows now, just how much he would be willing to do, to keep this man's affection.

To make Feng Xin stay.

These arms have always protected him, at any cost. No matter the enemy. Here, he was always safe.

Now, for the first time—Xie Lian cringes away from them. Don't touch me.

"…" Feng Xin is left standing there, watching as Xie Lian turns away from him for a moment, expression hidden—but he can see the way the prince's shoulders shake.

Oh god, please, don't touch me.

"…Your highness?"

When Xie Lian lost the war, he knew. Maybe there was denial when they reached a turning point—but when the battle was over, there was no debating that. He knew, the moment his kingdom was taken away, and his title became…

An echo. Not a name.

When Xie Lian lost his godhood, he knew—watching as the world went dark. Falling to his knees, clutching at his eyes like a frightened child, whimpering at the unfairness of it all.

And what did he know then, of the world being unfair?

When Xie Lian lost Hong-er—he knew. Even if it took him so long to accept it. The first time he called, and received no answer—some part of his heart knew.

Knew that Hong-er would never leave him. That the world had suddenly become so frightening, because he was no longer in it.

It took him two days, to realize that he lost Feng Xin.

To know that now, no matter what he does, when those arms hold him—he'll always have to reach up, terrified that he might find a mask.

The cruelty of it had to sit inside of him and fester before Xie Lian saw the damage.

Feng Xin watches, clearly waiting for some sort of explanation, for Xie Lian to tell him what's wrong. Where he was. Why Xie Lian won't let his guard touch him now, but...

The prince reaches for the pouch at his waist, holding it out.

"Take this," he murmurs, eyes half lidded.

His friend immediately moves to obey, examining it carefully—surprised when he feels the heavy weight of gold in his palm.

"...Your highness..." He frowns, glancing up, eyebrows knitting with confusion. "Use it to get medicine for my father," Xie Lian mutters, staring past him.

Feng Xin looks back down at the pouch, then back up at him, fingers tightening until his hand begins to tremble—and he asks slowly, cautiously—

"...How did you get this?"

Xie Lian pauses. Feng Xin sounds so concerned. Borderline horrified. He—

Oh.

That's what he thinks.

The prince's expression is unchanging, but the words that come out of his mouth startle Feng Xin.

Not just the crudeness of them, but the frigidity of his tone. It's like—

"Are you asking me if I got on my knees for it?"

It's like listening to a stranger speak. Not his friend. Not Xie Lian.

Feng Xin stares, his jaw hanging open—and Xie Lian smiles.

Not happily. It's sideways, sharp. Filled with emotions that seem so alien on his face.

"I didn't," he laughs, but—

To Feng Xin, it looks like the prince might want to cry.

"I stole it."

"You...you what?!" The guard chokes, not knowing which is worse. "How—how could you resort to such a thing?!"

"He didn't need the money anymore," Xie Lian mutters, rolling his eyes, "and he didn't deserve it, either."

It's a muttered aside, half under the prince's breath. Feng Xin's eyes narrow.

"Who are you to say that?!"

Of course—Feng Xin means it in the sense that it's impossible to know a man's personal situation. That stealing with a justification like that isn't a justified act at all.

'Who are you, to say that?' Xie Lian flinches.

Who is he, to say what a man deserves. Who is Xie Lian, who once sat in judgement over all, to judge a man that would have taken him by force, if given the chance. Who saw his mind and body as factors to be weighed within the scope of a business transaction.

Who is Xie Lian, to judge anyone?

"...He was dead," the prince explains coldly. "My father is alive. Are you going to buy the medicine, or not?”

Feng Xin sputters, more riled now than he’s ever been without Mu Qing in the room. “You stole from a dead man?!”

‘He stole from me first.’

That’s what Xie Lian wants to say, even if he knows that it isn’t true—it feels like being honest. Even if he doesn’t have a word for what that man took from him.

Xie Lian feels like he’s been robbed of everything inside him, stripped bare.

Feng Xin takes two steps away from him, looking down at the pouch—then shaking his head. “This—this isn’t you,” he mutters, tossing the money onto the table—like he’s so disgusted by it, just holding it is too much for the guard to bear. “Something happened, you’re not yourself!”

Xie Lian lets out a low laugh, louder than the one he let out before, shaking his head. “Yeah, Feng Xin!” He lifts his hands, gesturing around them. To the house they’re staying in. Crumbling, forgotten.

“Something—” the prince snorts, pointing at his eyes, “Something happened!”

The guard pauses, then locks his jaw with a familiar sense of stubbornness. “You never used that as an excuse to act like this before!”

“An excuse?” Xie Lian repeats faintly. “I don’t need an excuse,”

The words on his lips aren’t his own, but they feel like it, now:

“The world is like this!” He exclaims, and when Feng Xin protests, says that people aren’t like that, Xie Lian looks away, his lips twisting into something dark. Angry.

“You’d be surprised,” the prince mutters, fingers trembling in his sleeves, “by the things that men will do.”

“The world hasn’t changed,” Feng Xin shakes his head, “and you were—” “I was naive .”

“You were supposed to be better than the rest of it!” His friend cries, voice trembling with—

With disappointment.

Xie Lian's voice is shaking too.

"Well, I'm not , Feng Xin."

After a moment, he repeats it again—voice soft, ringing with finality.

"I'm not."

"..." The silence grows, and Feng Xin fears what will happen, if it reaches it's breaking point, "Your highness—"

"I'm selfish," Xie Lian mutters, head hanging low. "And cowardly."

With each word he says, his voice build in volume and momentum, like he's finally confessing this ugly crime that he's been carrying around all this time:

The crime of being human.

He was born human. When he ascended, he was human. When he fell—he was so horribly human.

"I was petty, and arrogant—and so self righteous!" He cries, remembering how many soldiers lined up, shouting with all that they had that dying for him was their greatest honor.

What a joke. What a lie .

Even the cheapest blade will look like a treasure if placed behind glass. Then, the minute it's taken out, the minute it's given use—it breaks.

Some things are better left ornamental.

"At least now, I don't look like a fool!" He turns around, wrapping his arms around himself—thinking of how laughable he must have seemed, to those who knew better.

"At least—at least I'm not crazy!"

There are so many different ways to be blind. Xie Lian took his punishment with grace, at first—like he thought suffering beautifully might bring redemption.

Then, he learned to fear the dark. To resent the cruelty that came with it.

Eventually, he saw what he had always been blind to. Things that you can never see, looking down from heaven's view.

It only becomes clear when you're far down below, glaring up through the cracks in the floorboards.

Then, you see the world as it really is.

The world is—

“If you were so crazy,” Feng Xin cuts through his thoughts, voice torn between anger, hurt—and so much disappointment, it makes Xie Lian's skin crawl from the nausea, “What was I, for following you all this time?!”

There is no lifetime, in which those words wouldn't hurt. ‘What were you praying for?’

He never laid eyes on the boy, after he was sent from Mount Taicang. But the scene is so clear in his mind, sound creating cathedrals of memory in his sightless gaze.

‘An answer.’

He can almost imagine the way Hong-ear must have smiled, back then. ‘What was it?’

‘You.’

What was Feng Xin, for following him?

What was Hong-er, for dying for him?

What was the ghost fire, for following him so far, just to be dispersed?

Xie Lian used to think that grief was a learning process. Something you could adapt to. Outsmart, even.

Grief is a bone that always heals warped. One that you have to re-break, over and over again, as the rest of your body desperately tries to outgrow it.

He's cracking open again, unable to resolve his loyalty, his desire to honor Hong-er's memory with the shame he feels now.

Following him—it—

It can only be a mistake.

It only leads to shame, death, and ruin.

Feng Xin doesn't see the way he clutches at the stone hanging around his neck. If it was a normal rock, it would have crumbled under his touch, but it remains firm.

Warm.

"...Stop, then."

Feng Xin is frozen, not understanding what he means.

Xie Lian's fingers ache on the sharp edges of the stone, but somehow—they never bleed.

'I should have made him leave me.'

Xie Lian couldn't, back then. He was too selfish.

Because he loved the boy too much.

Xie Lian won't bury Feng Xin. Won't stand before his pyre, and spend a lifetime trying to justify his own mortality in the face of his failures.

"Stop following me, Feng Xin."

There's shocked silence. Filled with hurt, denial, and...reluctance.

It's hard to leave a blind man.

"Did I ever say that I wanted to stop following you?" He protests. This argument has been the two of them chasing one another up a staircase, only to throw the door open at the top, and realize that there's only open air waiting for them.

Feng Xin doesn't want to jump.

'Have I ever told gege that I wanted to leave?'

Xie Lian's lips curl. He'll push him, then. "I just did."

It hurts.

"I want you to go, Feng Xin." He murmurs, packing every ounce of sincerity he has into his words. When he turns his head, he smiles over his shoulder.

It’s the last sight Feng Xin will have of the prince for countless years to follow. Smiling, eyes filled with unfathomable sadness, encouraging him. “I mean it.”

Xie Lian didn’t think anything could hurt anymore—but this does.

“...You don’t mean that,” Feng Xin starts, but...

That face, that—the face that Feng Xin has always admired. Often in ways that he should have been ashamed of. Taken as his family. His future, his purpose—

It contorts into something he doesn’t recognize.

Something filled with hurt, anger, and...Resentment.

“You can’t help me.”

His tone isn’t gentle anymore. It’s bubbling with emotion, like a cat with it’s claws extended, swiping at anything that gets too close. “You can’t help me, you can only JUDGE me, so just GO!”

He’s screaming by the end—which is easy to do, when he can’t see the pain he’s causing

Feng Xin calls silent, hands balled into fists at his sides, head hanging low. Xie Lian glances around, breathing hard, unsure if he needs to say something worse, what he has to do, to make him go, but—

“...I’m sorry,”

Xie Lian freezes, realizing—

Feng Xin is crying.

His heart squeezes in his chest, and—he can’t move, he can’t breathe.

The last time he heard his friend’s voice like that, it wasn’t him. It was someone wearing him like a mask.

But Feng Xin isn’t laughing now, and this isn’t an illusion. This isn’t a trick.

Xie Lian did this.

“I’m sorry,” he repeats, slightly more composed—but his voice is still thick with tears, even as he fights to maintain his dignity, “that I couldn’t be more useful to you, your highness.”

Xie Lian is silent, listening to the sounds of Feng Xin exiting his life.

Gathering what little belongings he still has. Taking the money—the money that Xie Lian stole—to buy medicine for his father. Leaving it on the table.

Xie Lian sits on the floor, knees against his chest, silent.

He doesn’t see the way Feng Xin stops behind him—hesitating.

It’s been so many years since they met. They’re so far now, from where they started.

Two boys, so small, beaming at each other—shaking hands, and making the solemn promise.

One, to lead—the other, to follow.

Xie Lian doesn’t know that, even now, Feng Xin still bows to him.

One hand reaches out—gentle.

Never with anyone else, but always with him.

Just as it brushes the back of Xie Lian’s head…

He flinches.

Feng Xin’s fingers curl back in, and he draws his hand away.

“Take care of yourself, Xie Lian.”

He hears footsteps, then the door slam. When it does, he allows himself to sob.

To slump forward, palms against the floor, and weep.

Not as much as he used to. Not from as deep inside. Xie Lian can’t find those places in his heart anymore. They’ve become hollowed out, unrecognizable.

This is quiet.

This is brief.

And still, with the pain of separation, comes relief.

He's glad.

Even if it hurts, he's glad that Feng Xin is gone. It means he's safe.

One less thing to worry about.

Slowly, he rises to his feet. Feels around for the table, finding the shape of the medicine with his palm.

It has to be brewed in a tea—something Xie Lian would have struggled with before, but now, even as he has to feel around for the flint to start the fire, he doesn't struggle.

It's difficult, feeling his way down the hall with one hand, holding the cup steady with the other.

And when he opens the door to his parent's bedroom, only one voice answers him. "Where is Feng Xin?"

Xie Lian pauses, fighting back a frown. "...Gone. Is mother not here?"

"She went to the river," the king replies flatly, his voice slightly sour.

Xie Lian's eye twitches.

That's to say that she's doing the wash, again—by herself. An act that often leads to her coming home with her hands split and bleeding, no matter how many times Xie Lian tells her that he doesn't mind doing it himself.

And his father is too proud to even call it what it is.

He'll just say that she's gone to the river, like she might be taking a stroll, or enjoying the afternoon.

"...Here," Xie Lian mutters, one hand bracing against the wall as he walks closer, holding out the cup. "Take it."

There's stubborn silence.

"...What is it?"

His son bites back a sarcastic response, pushing it forward more insistently, “Medicine—for your chest.”

“Where did you get it?”

There’s a note of suspicion in his tone—and Xie Lian’s chest tightens with frustration. “Feng Xin picked it up in the market today.”

“And where did he get the money for it?” His tone isn’t cautious, like Feng Xin’s was before.

There’s no attempt to spare his feelings. Xie Lian’s fingers tighten around the cup. “From me.” He answers, his tone clipped. There’s a pause, then—

“I don’t want it.”

Xie Lian’s eyes squeeze shut. “Stop being stubborn,” he mutters, shoving the cup forward—

And a hand swipes out, batting at him until the tea goes crashing to the floor, clay shattering, it’s contents forming a small puddle.

“I said I don’t want it, dammit!”

Xie Lian hangs his head—not out of shame, but out of an effort to hide the building cloud of anger across his expression. “That was an entire dose,” he mutters. “There’s only enough for two weeks—”

“I didn’t ask you to get any medicine for me,” his father’s voice—it’s so... It could be self loathing, but it just sounds...irritated. Resentful, even.

And that—

“Whatever you did to get that money for Feng Xin—it was a waste.”

There’s condescension, there.

Xie Lian won’t take that.

Not from him.

“...Don’t take this out on me,” he mutters.

His father won’t stop grumbling, to the point where Xie Lian is fairly sure that the old man doesn’t hear what he said.

“Stubborn child, never listening—always getting these ideas and going off on your own without asking—!”

BAM !

Xie Lian’s fist slams against the wall.

“When in your life have you EVER listened to anyone?!” He snaps, his fist coming back covered in plaster and dust.

“What are you—?”

“I’m not the reason that you’re here.” Xie Lian’s voice is dark with frustration.

His relationship with his father has always been…complicated. They were both so arrogant, back then. Both so stubborn.

Xie Lian knows that he was wrong, now. Self righteous. Self important.

His father clings to a facade of dignity, as though the fall of Xianle was his own personal martyrdom. Something that happened to him, personally.

Not something he participated in, or, in his own way, caused.

“…Well,” his father retorts, sounding just as hurt, frustrated, and defensive as Xie Lian feels—

“You certainly didn’t help, did you?”

The prince doesn’t flinch the way he would have before. Doesn’t bow his head.

“I tried,” he mutters, hands balled into fists by his sides. “I didn’t cry about ‘acts of god’ and expect my people to accept going hungry!”

It’s a resentment he’s carried in his heart for so long, from the very beginning. Xie Lian tried.

He went to his father, and he tried .

Maybe the people hate him for failing—he’s accepted that.

But they hated his father even more in the beginning, for doing nothing.

“You’ve seen it for yourself now, you stubborn child—” his father huffs, incredulous, “—even a god himself couldn’t have stopped such an outcome!”

“That isn’t an excuse for not trying!” He shakes his head, “That isn’t an excuse for feeling sorry for yourself, for how MISERABLE your life is, when there are still people trying to help you!”

“How, even after all of this, are you STILL such a spoiled child?!” Xie Lian barks out a surprised laugh.

He always felt like he had to hold back in his arguments with his father. To try and be an obedient, respectful son—fulfilling some sort of expectation.

But his father...

He heard every word that Mu Qing said that day. About selling his body. About—

About ‘the guy’ Xie Lian was in love with.

His own contempt claws its way out, bursting from his lips eagerly, after how many times he’s bitten the words back.

“And you’re still a stubborn, selfish old man!”

The King’s eyes widen.

“If you REALLY think I went through all of that, just to get this medicine for you—”

(And he almost did, even when he was so afraid. When he didn’t want to. Enduring more humiliation than the king could possibly imagine.)

“—you would waste it like that?! For what?! Pride?!”

Xie Lian throws his hands out, all around them—at this shack that they’re living in, at the world around him, and he—

“LOOK WHERE THAT PRIDE HAS GOTTEN YOU!”

He’s never shouted at his father, never like this—and now that they’ve started shouting, they don’t stop.

“AND YOU COULD JUSTIFY BRINGING FENG XIN INTO THAT?! WHAT OF HIS PRIDE?!”

Xie Lian does flinch, now—but he doesn't back down.

His anger didn't start with his father, but now it's been sparked—and the seeds placed in his chest that night have begun to sprout, bearing fruit.

"Don't act like you EVER cared about Feng Xin before you NEEDED him!" Xie Lian snarls, "Do you even REMEMBER how you treated him before?! What you made him do?!"

"That's—"

"I would rather be a spoiled, stubborn child all my life than EVER be like YOU!" His fists tremble.

"Where's QI RONG?!" He rages, feeling like there's a fire trying to rip out of his chest. Like, if he screamed loud enough, he could breathe fire.

"I—what? This has nothing to do with—!"

"How many EXCUSES did you make for that monster?!"

Xie Lian slams his fist into the wall again, hard enough for the entire wall to crack, and the ceiling to rattle. "He threw a little boy in a SACK and dragged him behind his carriage like an ANIMAL!"

"He was still—"

"You wouldn't even treat an animal like that!"

Xie Lian cries, trembling from rage, hurt, and regret.

'It takes a village to raise a child.'

Qi Rong wasn't the picture of stupidity and madness his parents always pretended that he was. He was always pushing boundaries. Testing.

He knew what he could get away with.

"And what did you do to him?!"

Not enough, they both know that. Not nearly enough.

"But you made Feng Xin break his OWN arm for it, didn't you?!"

“He was still family, Xie Lian,” he can’t see his father’s face. But there’s a strain now, in his voice. Something like remorse.

“He carried the name of the royal family of Xianle. We had to—”

“Where was he, then, when it got hard?!” Xie Lian sneers, feeling more scorn than he ever knew himself to be capable of. “Where is our ‘family’ now, when you need them?!”

Xie Lian knows where he was, after all.

“And then, when you had nothing, who was it who stayed to look after you?! After your wife?! How can you LOOK at him, much less SPEAK of him without dying of shame?!” Xie Lian steps forward, shards of clay crunching under his boots.

“You think I never apologized to Feng Xin?”

His father mutters—and while there is shame in his voice, he’s still defensive. Still living in a world where, somehow, nothing is ever his fault.

It’s always Xie Lian’s fault. For not listening. For being too stubborn. For being too childish. Never his.

Xie Lian won’t take it.

“We had the chance to talk about quite a bit while you were gone,” the King continues. “Things you wouldn’t know about.”

“...” Xie Lian’s nails bite into his newly healed palms—hard enough that the skin opens again. “I learned things while I was gone, too.” He whispers.

His father doesn’t speak, watching him with some mixture of worried frustration— wanting to ask—to ask—

To ask his son what happened, to make him return home like this. “That boy,” Xie Lian continues, his voice low, “the one in the sack—”

“Xie Lian, it’s been so long,”

His father sounds tired. “You need to let it go.”

“...”

Xie Lian’s lips tremble as he reaches up, clutching the stone around his neck.

How…could he ever possibly let go?

“His name was Hong-er,” Xie Lian whispers. “Did you know that?”

The King remains silent.

His son isn’t wearing the bandages over his eyes, now—the cursed shackle glaring back at him. And if his pride would allow it, he—

The King would admit that whenever he looked upon the thing, he only ever saw his own shortcomings. His own failures.

Never Xie Lian’s.

“A child in your care almost murdered a little boy,” the prince whispers, his voice trembling with emotion, “and you never bothered to learn his name.”

“…That’s part of being a king,” His father mutters. “If I memorized the name of every orphan that passed through my door—”

“He found me,” Xie Lian interrupts him, his voice small now. There’s anger in there somewhere, but it’s mournful. Trapped beneath so many layers of loss. “When I was alone. He took care of me.”

More, in many ways, than Xie Lian’s own family ever had.

A boy with nothing.

More attentive than a palace full of servants. More loving, in so many ways, than the home that had raised him.

“Do you know what happened to him?”

There’s silence, and Xie Lian half expected silence, but—

“Let it go, son.”

That answer is worse, somehow.

“…Qi Rong.”

Xie Lian’s voice trembles. “He found him in the middle of the night. He—he cut him so many times,” His father stares with slow, building horror—from Xie Lian's words, but—

From how haunted his eyes are, shining with tears, agonized from the memories lurking behind them.

"I-I couldn't tell you how many it was," Xie Lian explains, "I got too…I couldn't count them all—but he tortured him."

"That couldn't be—"

"How could you tell me that it couldn't be true?" His son whispers.

The king falls silent.

"He hung the body after."

"Xie Lian—"

"My—Hong-er was already dead," he chokes, the tears finally falling, and his voice—it breaks. "That part was—it was for me ."

Because Xie Lian knows Qi Rong. Knows how his mind works.

How funny he must have found it, the idea of Xie Lian desperately looking for the boy…

Only to walk past him, over and over again. Walk under him.

Xie Lian hates him. Hates him so much, that it's almost more than he hates Bai Wuxiang. Maybe it is more. He can't tell. Not anymore.

All he knows is that his heart holds more hatred than he thought he was capable of.

"If you want to say this was an act of god, fine" he hangs his head, "if you want to blame me for the war, the plague—I don't care anymore."

"Xie Lian—"

"But m—" his lips press together, so tightly that they tingle and pulse form the lack of circulation, "Hong-er—that was you."

'It takes a village to raise a child.'

"If you had / just / done the right thing," Xie Lian chokes, his chest twisting and coiling like a snake, squeezing the life out of him, "he would still be here."

'It also takes a village to fail one.'

The prince turns his back on his father

"...I'll bring another dose in the morning," he mutters, his voice flat, too emotionally exhausted to fight him anymore. "If you're too disgusted to take it for me, at least do it for mother. She doesn't deserve to watch you suffer like this."

He didn't know, then.

Most of the time, you don't know that you're saying goodbye. It sneaks up on you, snatches things from under your nose. Doesn't let you know that you're losing them.

It teaches you to hold onto things. But Xie Lian—he's a slow learner.

His mother returns after sundown. "Son?"

He doesn't look up from his seat by the fire, can barely withstand the relief he hears in her voice.

"Oh, thank the heavens—you're home! We were so worried, I—" She stops, setting the wash on the floor.

"...Where's Feng Xin?"

Xie Lian holds himself tighter.

"He left."

He can see the confusion on her face in his mind's eye. Can hear the way that she pauses, wiping her hands off on a cloth before making her way to his side.

"That doesn't sound like him. When will he be back?" He holds himself a little tighter.

'Take care of yourself, Xie Lian.'

It still feels like he can hardly breathe, like there's this awful weight on his chest as he whispers—

"He isn't coming back, mom."

Her shock is silent, but palpable. He can hear disbelief in her voice, when she asks—

“Did you two have some sort of fight?”

He doesn’t answer.

After a pause, she takes a deep breath, “Surely, he’ll come to his senses—”

“He’s still a young man,” Xie Lian mutters, not sounding very young at all. “How could we ask him to waste the rest of his life like this?”

His mother stares at him, her expression unreadable.

“...Sweetheart,” she whispers, fingers reaching out to stroke over his cheek.

He doesn’t flinch away. Not from her.

His mother’s touch—it could never frighten him.

“You aren’t yourself.”

Xie Lian doesn’t know who she’s remembering. Whether he’s like that person, or not.

Her thumb strokes down his cheek, tracing the drying tear tracks there—like she already knows. “Have you been fighting with your father?”

Xie Lian gently tugs his face from her grip, looking away. “It doesn’t matter.”

“I know he can be difficult, but...” The Queen sighs. “He doesn’t know another way to be.”

Xie Lian knows.

Even if he slams himself into that brick wall over and over again, expecting something to change—deep down, he knows.

“...It doesn’t matter,” he mumbles, his voice dull.

“Was it about what Mu Qing said?” The Queen presses.

Xie Lian braces himself, willing to explain—to her, at least—that no such thing ever happened—

“About the man?” His shoulders stiffen.

The king never said a word about it, in spite of what Xie Lian might have expected. And hearing her bring it up, now...

Parents are complicated. Placed so high above you, made into these infallible figures that dictate the bounds of a child’s world. But then, children get older.

They see more of the world. Sometimes, they have children of their own—and they learn.

No one is infallible.

For the first time in Xie Lian’s life, his mother disappoints him.

She does it by trying to comfort him.

“...We never have to talk about that,” The Queen murmurs, reaching out to squeeze his shoulders. The affection is still there. She loves him. Xie Lian knows that. But...

“It’s your business,” she pushes the hair from his face, tucking it behind his ears. “No one else needs to concern themselves with it.”

Xie Lian knows he should be grateful that she isn’t disgusted. That she isn’t casting him aside and calling him a filthy abomination.

It’s more than he hoped for, when he was a child. More than he assumed when he knew that she heard Mu Qing’s words.

On some level, he could even say that the absence of rejection counts as acceptance, but...God, Xie Lian wishes she would ask him about the man he was in love with.

He knew, standing in front of that pyre, that he was the only one who would mourn Hong-er.

But Xie Lian never knew how lonely it would be, having no one to share those memories with.

He wants to tell her how cocky the boy was. How easily things came to him. The way he laughed.

Xie Lian wants to explain how fast his heart was being that night, when he touched Hong-er’s face. That it felt like he might die, if he had to let him go in that moment.

He wants to ask her if that's normal. If that's what being in love feels like.

Xie Lian wants to ask her if you can fall out of love, once you've been in it. If it only happens once.

If it ever stops hurting, when you lose it.

Those questions, those feelings—they've been suffocating him for so long now, and he just—

Xie Lian just wants to talk to her.

But his mother didn't say he could talk—she offered the opposite.

She offered Xie Lian privacy. Allowed him to hide a potentially distasteful part of himself away. To love him in spite of it.

It's more than Xie Lian ever hoped for, but it isn't acceptance.

And it hurts.

Her fingers never stop stroking his cheeks—and eventually, Xie Lian swallows down that welling feeling of disappointment, of isolation, and tells himself not to be ungrateful.

People can do so much worse than this. Xie Lian knows.

And this hurt—it isn't inflicted maliciously.

"...That isn't the only thing that's been going on," his mother murmurs, stroking the crease between his brows between her fingertips. "I know it isn't."

Xie Lian swallows thickly, biting his lip. "...No," he admits. "It's not."

He leans his cheek into her hand, and he...

For a moment, Xie Lian wonders if he could tell her what happened. He knows—he knows she couldn't stand to hear what he went through, not...not really.

But he can't stand holding that memory on his own, either.

"...Something's...been going on," he whispers, his voice hoarse.

It feels like fumbling for a hand to catch him when he's falling. For one last attempt at rescue from…

Her hands press against his face a little more firmly, and when she speaks again—her voice is loving, but frank.

“I know what’s happening,” the Queen watches him sadly. “I’ve known the whole time.”

Xie Lian frowns, because he doesn’t see how she possibly could.

Her hands slip down from his face, finding his hands—giving them a tight squeeze.

“When you were a boy…” her hands aren’t soft anymore—they’re dry and cracked, bleeding in places.

“…Do you remember how much you loved building golden palaces?” Xie Lian almost smiles at the memory, even now.

Spending afternoons in his mother’s parlor while she met with guests, carefully stacking pieces of golden foil, but they were never big enough. Never grand enough.

At first, she had to force him to play—anything to keep him sitting still for more than a few minutes. Xie Lian was an over-active child, prone to playing make believe, climbing trees.

He scraped his knees so often, chasing butterflies—the Queen was beside herself.

Eventually, he came to love it, thrilling in the challenge—but it vexed him, too.

“…and you always cried so much, when they fell down.” The Queen’s thumbs brush over his knuckles. “You used to throw a tantrum over the breeze, it was so funny—”

“What’s the point of this?”

Xie Lian hangs his head, and he sounds—

He sounds so tired.

“…” His mother tilts her face forward, until her chin is resting on top of his head, wrapping her arms around him.

“Golden palaces are always going to fall down, my sweet boy,” she whispers, stroking his hair.

Xie Lian's throat aches, and his eyes sting. "No matter how hard you try."

All he can think of now, is how many nights he spent on Mount Taicang, holding up that pavilion. How much time and energy he wasted.

It fell, anyway.

"That's the natural consequence of building them."

"...I tried," he whispers, shoulders trembling. Saying it out loud—it almost makes the regret easier to bear. "Mother, I—"

Xie Lian swallows thickly, his voice small.

And, for the last time, the Crown Prince of Xianle allows himself to feel like a child. "...I tried so hard," he whimpers, trembling in her arms.

The Queen hums in his ear, one hand rubbing his back—the other, wiping the slow paths of tears trailing down her son's cheeks.

"I know, Xie Lian," she whispers.

The Queen used to say that she was proud.

"I know."

Xie Lian wants to tell her the rest. About all the other aches inside him, the ones that make everything else seem so far off, so distant.

But he doesn't.

So many of them are tangled up in Hong-er. In Bai Wuxiang. In his own failures, and she...

His mother doesn't want to know. Eventually, she speaks again—

"Are you hungry?" There's an odd quality to her voice—like she's trying to sound happier than she is, and Xie Lian can't understand the point in that.

Neither of them are happy. What's the point in pretending? "I could make you something—"

"No."

Xie Lian shakes his head, leaning away, "I'm…I'm tired." He mutters. "I just…need to sleep."

He hasn't slept since it happened. His body still needs time to…

Xie Lian doesn't feel like he can say the word recover. He doesn't think this is something you recover from, really.

The Queen's lips press against his forehead. "Sleep, then." He didn't think it was odd, then.

Xie Lian's entire life, his mother always sent him to bed with some mention of tomorrow. Telling him that she would see him in the morning. That everything would feel better by then.

She didn't say anything about tomorrow, that night.

Just kissed his forehead, whispered that she loved him—and to sleep well.

Xie Lian nodded—and he was too tired to say it back, dragging himself back to his bedroom, dropping down on the bamboo mat with a heavy thud.

It takes a long time for sleep to come to him.

He wakes up twice in the night, once, from a faint thud—but when he listens, he doesn't hear anything but soft creaking, probably from the dry rot of the wood in the nighttime breeze.

The second time, it's from a nightmare.

Being back there, in that place. Unable to move, unable to scream. Waiting for the next blade to reach him through the dark, cutting into him.

The piercing cry of the Ghost Fire, in what—

In what Xie Lian now knows, must have been it's final moments.

Dying—for him.

He trembles on the floor, curling in on himself, clutching the stone around his neck.

‘It’s not real, dianxia.’

Xie Lian lifts the stone to his lips, eyes squeezed so tightly shut, it almost begins to sting.

‘It’s just a bad dream.’

Hong-er used to say that, to comfort him.

Sometimes, that’s all it is. A bad dream. And then, you wake up in the arms of the boy that loves you.

Then, the world feels small. Manageable. Safe. But sometimes, you wake up alone. Sometimes, you don’t wake up at all.

Because it wasn’t a bad dream at all.

It was real.

The Joke's on You

Chapter Summary

> He takes a deep breath, pushing the door open. "Father?"
>
> There's no answer. It's almost quiet.
>
> Xie Lian knew there probably wasn't anyone else in the house already—there's no breathing, no heartbeat other than his own.
>
> Just creaking, this faint, wooden sound.

Chapter Notes

> TW// THIS CHAPTER CONTAINS SUICIDE AND SUICIDE ATTEMPTS / MENTIONS DEPICTED IN SOME LEVEL OF DETAIL. DISCRETION IS ADVISED.
>
> You can find me (and the rest of this story) on my twitter at @cataclysmicevie

It's quiet in the house, when Xie Lian opens his eyes.

He can't see the daylight, not really. But he can sense the warmth of it against his skin. Can feel his eyes sting from it when he stares directly towards the light for too long, even if the shackle doesn't allow him to see.

The house is quiet.

So, so quiet.

"..." Xie Lian sits up, rubbing at the back of his neck.

He must have slept for quite a long time—his shoulders are stiff. He has a slight headache. It's hard to wake on his own, when the light won't do it.

His mother usually helps him.

She must have wanted him to sleep in, after all of that, but...the prince frowns, shuffling to his feet.

"Mother?" He calls out, making his way through the bedroom door.

There's no answer.

Did she give his father his morning dose already? He needs to start as soon as possible.

Xie Lian didn't get the chance to mention it to her, the night before—he should have. He was just...

Distracted. There was a lot he didn't say—and he should have. He just... Talking is so much harder for Xie Lian now, than it used to be.

It won't get easier.

At first, he thinks she's gone to the river already, even if she already did the wash yesterday, it's the only place Xie Lian could think of, that she would be.

But when he listens, he realizes—

There isn't another heartbeat anywhere in the house. No breathing.

...Where's his father?

He hasn't been well enough to leave his bedroom in weeks, now. And even when he does—he can't go far.

Xie Lian drifts towards the back of the house, one hand on the door to his parents bedroom, opening his mouth, then closing it anxiously.

He meant what he said last night.

That doesn't mean that Xie Lian is proud of every word. Maybe he shouldn't be ashamed of what he said about Hong-er, or Qi Rong, but—

He shouldn't have called him a selfish old man.

Xie Lian knows that, and he's squirming with remorse.

His father is too proud to apologize for things. There was a time where Xie Lian was, too. Now...now, compared to everything else, 'I'm sorry,' seems like such an easy thing to say.

He takes a deep breath, pushing the door open. "Father?"

There's no answer.

It’s almost quiet.

Xie Lian knew there probably wasn’t anyone else in the house already—there’s no breathing, no heartbeat other than his own.

Just creaking, this faint, wooden sound.

The storm from the other night was pretty bad—it probably made the wood in walls a little less sturdy.

He’ll have to try and see how much money was left, after the medicine. Maybe it could be enough for some repairs. Xie Lian can help—but in this state, he can’t do the work single handedly.

The prospect is exhausting, but...he has to make an effort, now, with Feng Xin gone. Even if he doesn’t want to. Even when he just wants...

If he doesn’t take care of his parents, no one else will.

He walks back through the house, jumping when he feels something brush against his hand—a piece of fabric, soft cotton.

The prince stops a couple of steps away.

He brings his hand up, rubbing it against his cheek with a frown.

“...How late did she let me sleep?” He mutters, shaking his head.

Late enough for her to go to the river, finish the wash, and hang it up to dry, apparently. It’s a miracle that Xie Lian didn’t knock it all down.

Part of him wants to be irritated, because he’s mentioned that hanging things in the middle of the room can be a problem for him before—that it tends to trip him up, but —

Xie Lian’s starting to get too worried for that, and the situation is starting to feel all too familiar.

He walks out the front door, following the path down to the river.

“Mother!” He calls out, cupping his hands around his mouth, “Father!”

Maybe she gave him his morning dose, and he started to feel a little better? They used to love going on walks together, back in the palace.

But he tries the path to the stream. He takes every single trail his mother walks when she’s hunting for berries or mushrooms for dinner.

There’s nothing. No one answers.

And Xie Lian realizes, with this slow, sinking feeling—

He’s done this before.

A year ago, now. Did—?

The Prince stops walking, his heart slowly accelerating in his chest, fingertips twitching where they dangle by his side.

Did Bai Wuxiang do...did he do something to them, too? Is it—? Is it happening again?

His breaths quicken, and it feels—

It feels like the ground won’t stay still beneath his feet. Like it’s slowly starting to give out from underneath him. Is—is it an earthquake? Or some sort of spell? Or—

Oh.

Oh, that’s just him shaking.

He grits his teeth, turning back towards the house. Xie Lian—he—

He won’t waste the whole day looking by himself, not this time. He’s a slow learner, yes—but he knows that much. He’ll need to find the rest of the money to get any assistance. After all, the villagers here—they don’t know his family as well as the ones back in...

Don’t think about that, now.

Xie Lian tries to remind himself of that as he rushes back towards the house, hurrying to the kitchen table—and when he finds the pouch, he sighs with relief when he feels that there’s still some coins left. Not a lot—but enough.

Enough to get help.

He turns back towards the door, irritated when he feels that cloth brush against his hand again, because she’s done this so many times, Xie Lian doesn’t know how he hasn’t managed to knock over every single—

The prince freezes, when something bumps against his cheek. Not a cloth. Not laundry.

It—

Xie Lian stumbles backwards at first, his chest heaving as he glances around, raising his voice, “Is someone there?!”

No one answers, and when Xie Lian closes his eyes—he hears the same as he did before.

Absolutely nothing.

“Mom?” He calls out. “...Dad?”

Not mother. Not father. Those are the terms he started using, when he got older. When he left the palace to start studying on Mount Taicang.

It saddened his mother, who used to pinch his cheek, murmuring—

‘You always grow up too fast, my son.’

Someone’s here.

Her smile was so sad, back then—and she would squeeze him close, even as the little prince groaned in annoyance, pleading—

‘Don’t get so busy that you forget your poor old mother, alright?’

Someone is here.

Xie Lian can’t explain it. He doesn’t hear any sign of life, but—

Whatever bumped into his cheek just now, was human.

“...” Slowly, with trembling fingers, he reaches out, taking slow, cautious steps forward.

There’s only one heartbeat in the house.

No sound.

Just this slow, continuous creaking.

Something bumps against his fingers.

“...” Slowly, he turns his palm into it, curling his fingers around, and —

He takes someone’s hand. Cold, stiff.

But, even now—Xie Lian would know this touch anywhere. The one feeling he thought he could never flinch away from. That could never frighten him.

His mother's hand.

The moan that rips from his lips isn't human. It isn't even that of an animal, it's just—

Now, he realizes the creaking isn't coming from the walls.

It's above him, around him— but too close for that.

His other hand reaches up, trembling and—

He's holding his father's hand.

He drops to his knees heavily, palms trembling, trying to tell himself that it isn't real. That this is another trick. That he's going to wake up screaming, and he'll still be in that shrine.

Xie Lian won't be alone. He'll—

He'll still have a family, if he can just wake up. Oh.

He turns his head towards the door, numb.

Someone must have come from town, when they heard him calling. He didn't expect that. Stumbling upon the scene must have been horrific to see.

Xie Lian wouldn't know, but— There's screaming.

Blood curdling, unending screaming.

It's almost irritating, the longer it goes on. Xie Lian starts to tell them to stop, that it's hurting his ears, but—

Oh.

That's—that's just him.

He's screaming.

He couldn't say for how long.

Maybe long enough for his throat to become completely raw. For his head to pound.

He thought he didn't have the capacity to feel this anymore. He thought the pain had already filled him up, to the point where nothing else could hurt.

When Feng Xin left—Xie Lian thought that he had nothing else to lose. Took comfort in that, even.

But it never occurred to him.

In all of the years that he feared losing his friends, Hong-er, even a little Ghost Fire— Xie Lian never once worried about his parents, no.

He worried for their safety, as anyone would, but...

It never occurred to Xie Lian, not until this moment, that his parents might leave him

When he was begging Hong-er to leave, pushing Feng Xin away—smiling, telling Mu Qing that he was glad that he had gone.

Xie Lian had thought that he was alright with being alone. That it would be better that way.

But, on some level, he thought his parents would be there.

His fingers scrape against the floorboards, clawing deep gauges into the wood.

'He hung the body, after.'

Xie Lian lifts his head, trying to understand why.

All the ways they could have left—why like that? But—

He thinks he might know.

It's the knowing, that makes it worse.

Who told him, in the end, what happened to Hong-er?

A shoe bumps against the top of his head. Xie Lian ducks away, numbly murmuring an—

An apology.

His eyes widen—and then, they become dull.

This—this is an apology. A taking of responsibility. Xie Lian thought it was over, now.

No more traps. No more tricks. That the calamity had gotten what it wanted. That there was nothing left for it to take away.

When he made Feng Xin leave, the prince thought he was finally free from all of that. He was wrong.

'If you want to blame me for the war, the plague—fine, I don't care anymore.'

Xie Lian knew, when Bai Wuxiang told him those words, that it was done maliciously. He thought the intention was to make him angry. To make him hate.

To make him hate the world. Qi Rong.

But...

'But Hong-er—that was you.'

Bai Wuxiang didn't do this.

Qi Rong—he didn't do this either.

Xie Lian did this.

And maybe—

He rises to his feet—slowly, his knees wobbling beneath him.

Maybe that was the point, all along.

It takes a moment to bring them down.

He has to fumble around, dragging over a chair, tipped over on the floor.

(Probably the one they used.)

When he fumbles with the knot around his mother's neck, there's a faint realization, thoughts made num from the pain.

Oh.

That's where his silk band went.

Xie Lian lays them down, side by side.

For a moment, he wishes he could lay down between them and stop breathing too. Like he did when he was small, after he had a nightmare. Crawling into their bed, crying to his mother about how afraid he was.

Xie Lian—he forgot.

He forgot the way his father used to hold him, back then. Before the downfall. Before the war. Before the arguing. Before he left to cultivate on Mount Taicang.

Xie Lian forgot the way the King used to carry him on his hip, squeezing Xie Lian close when he said he was afraid.

Forgot how his father used to pet his hair, and tell him that it was alright, to be afraid sometimes.

That the world was a scary place.

Xie Lian could be afraid, for now—

His father would keep him safe, until he was ready.

The prince's face contorts with grief.

His fingers tighten around the silk band.

Xie Lian—

He looks up towards the ceiling, struggling to catch his breath.

He isn't ready.

It's hard to form the knot—his hands won't stop shaking.

It's hard, getting the band over the beam—he can't afford to stumble. No one will catch him, if he does.

Xie Lian knows, when he slips his chin into the knot that he's made for himself, that this won't do anything more than the sword laying on the floor—discarded in his panic.

Maybe, there would be some comfort—to go in the same way as

Hong-er.

But Xie Lian doesn’t think he could bear the reminder of that feeling. Of the sword being driven into him, over and over again. Of the screaming—of the laughing.

His feet begin to dangle, and Xie Lian prays.

As his chest begins to tighten with suffocation, he prays.

To the one god left that will listen to him. That could grant him mercy.

He prays to Jun Wu.

As the blood streams down his cheeks. As his feet twitch and his bones crack, Xie Lian prays for death. For relief. He desperately seeks an answer.

But a reply never comes.

At first—Xie Lian thinks that the band breaks.

It loosens around his neck, and he barely has the chance to choke out one word before he slips to the floor, landing between the bodies of his parents in a crumpled heap.

‘No!’

Oh god, no.

Let me die. Please, just let me die. His forehead slams against the floor.

Thud .

Let me die.

Thud .

The Crown Prince once dreamed of heaven. Of immortality. Looked down up the world, and told himself that he could save it. That he could change it.

Thud .

Let me die.

Oh god, please— just let me die .

What was all of it for? Why? Why fight so hard to reach him, just to drag him back down?

Thud .

Why? Why did Xie Lian try so hard?

Thud .

Let me die.

He did try. He tried so hard. Clawed his way up each stair to heaven—and hit every single one on the way back down.

Thud .

Let me die.

Tried to protect his people. Tried to save his kingdom. Tried to save—

'Golden palaces will always fall down, my sweet boy.'

Thud .

Xie Lian stops, his forehead pressed against the floor.

'That's the consequence of building them.'

Something presses against his hand—soft, smooth cloth. It slides over his skin, wriggling like a serpent.

"…" Xie Lian lifts his chin, red streaks of blood still dripping from his skin.

Such a thing would have frightened him, not so long ago. Left him cowering in fear.

Now, he lifts his hand—the same way he did before, waiting for a small, cold flame to come to him. To light his path in the night.

A silk band slithers between his fingers, slowly crawling up his wrist. Xie Lian doesn't need that light now.

He isn't afraid of the dark anymore.

When he speaks now—the voice that he hears isn't his own. It's that of a stranger.

A stranger’s voice, with a stranger’s body.

“...Ruoye,” he rumbles, making human speech sound like a cold wind.

That’s alright, he thinks.

Xie Lian doesn't want to be himself. Not anymore. “Come to me.”

The silk bandage crawls up his arm, over his face—before carefully winding itself around the fallen god’s face, taking its original place over his eyes.

Xie Lian fought so hard for the world, because he thought he could save it. For the first time that morning, Xie Lian hears voices.

Cheering, laughing voices.

He turns his head, slowly, numbly, surrounded by death. Someone is cheering.

His steps towards the doorway are slow, ambling.

It’s hard to walk, when you have nowhere to go.

A parade.

There’s a cheerful drumbeat. The shrill hum of flutes. People crying out in celebration.

‘Who did the world come to blame?’

Xie Lian’s fingers curl into fists.

“Long live the Kingdom of Yong’an!”

‘Who did they curse?’

His mouth fills with a bitter, acrid taste.

‘You, or him?’

“Long live the kingdom of—!”

‘Do you remember how you used to love building golden palaces?’

‘You—you were supposed to be BETTER than the rest of it!’

‘But you didn’t do much good, did you?’

‘I’ll show you, little one.’

‘When I left, I thought—!’

‘I don’t want anything.’

His hands ball into even tighter fists—but now, fangxin is there, trembling between his fingers.

Xie Lian doesn’t remember picking up the sword.

‘Dianxia—I don’t want anything.’

His sleeves are looser now, billowing.

And his face—it feels cold.

Xie Lian lifts his fingers, slow, trembling—

And he finds the surface of a mask.

Half laughing. Half crying.

His fingers drag over the surface, slowly falling back to his side.

“...” A soft giggle echoes throughout the room, echoing against thin walls.

The breeze stirs through his mother’s hair, fingers limply outstretched toward him. Her son cannot see it.

He throws his head back, and he laughs. Laughs until his mangled throat becomes even more raw. Until his stomach aches.

Until he cries.

This world is cruel.

It’s selfish. Stupid. It always takes. It always forgets.

This world is rotten, and Xie Lian doesn’t want to save it.

“...You won’t get off so easily,” he murmurs, stepping into the light.

The birds still sing. The sun is oppressively bright. Warm.

Xie Lian smiles.

Another giggle peals from him, as he walks back down the mountainside.

“I won’t let you get off so easily.”

Ungrateful. Selfish. So focused on their worthless, petty little lives.

What were they, compared to his? To his parents?

To Hong-er’s?

No.

Long live the Kingdom of Yong’an?

No. What a joke .

They aren’t better than him. They aren’t luckier . No one was. He was the highest. The most blessed among men. Chosen by god.

The only difference between them, and Xie Lian, is time.

But he doesn’t want to wait anymore. And he knows how to show them.

Xie Lian was a slow learner—but they don’t have to be.

His feet don’t stumble over this path—no. It’s one he’s walked for many years. Enough to know every dip and crevice.

It doesn’t take him long to find the battlefield.

Empty, desolate.

So many souls left to wander alone, forgotten.

Xie Lian won’t.

And he won’t let the world forget them, either.

He feels the resentment here, washing over him—sinking in. It can’t hurt him, now.

It’s nothing compared to the resentment already within the Crown Prince’s heart. Slowly, he asks a question with an inevitable answer.

“Do you hate?”

His voice is cold, echoing across the field.

“The people you died for,” his fingers tighten around fangxin, “have become citizens of a new kingdom now.”

He begins to hear the low, angry wails of the dead. “They have forgotten you. Forgotten your sacrifices.”

Xie Lian is trash. Filth. A failure. A theif. A whore.

Don’t take it from him—ask anyone, they’ll tell you.

But he never did that.

Never stooped so low, to forget the men who died for him. “And now,”

Xie Lian’s lips twist into a bitter, vengeful sneer.

“They cheer.”

The wind begins to howl as the spirits gather, swirling in the air, forming a tempest.

In the distance, Xie Lian can still hear the parade. The drums. The laughter. The singing.

“For the ones who killed you.”

In Xie Lian’s experience—his now broad, painful array of experience—

The most painful betrayals are always followed by thunderous applause. “Do you hate?”

They scream louder now, than ever before. Louder than the cheering, than the drums, than the songs.

Under the mask, Xie Lian’s lips curl into a snarl. “ANSWER ME!”

Finally, the screams form into words.

“I HATE!!!”

“I...I HATE THEM!”

“I WANT...I WANT TO KILL THEM!!”

Good, Xie Lian thinks. That’s good.

That’s what he needs.

He doesn’t want to build Golden Palaces anymore. “Come to my side.”

He wants to watch them fall. Wants to tear them to the ground with his own hands. That’s the point.

That’s the natural consequence of building them.

The spirits form a hateful, swirling mass—shrouding the sun.

Xie Lian couldn’t see it before, anyway. Good.

The weight of fangxin feels heavy in his hand. Ruoye slithers excitedly, beneath his mask.

The dead souls howl.

Good.

This—this is what he needs. He—

Behind him, there’s a voice. Clearer than the others—softer.

Gentle, almost. Xie Lian stops.

“Your highness.”

Underneath the mask, his lips tremble.

Some part of him that still aches, that still desperately wants to believe, senses familiarity somewhere in that voice. An echo of something lost.

It's deep, but youthful. The voice of a young man.

And it—it's almost like—

For the first time in so long, the prince almost calls out that name, whispers in hope, wishes that, after everything the world has taken, it will give something back to him.

"..." Xie Lian's teeth come together with a snap.

He's learned, now.

He was a slow learner. But he learned.

When he calls that name, no one will answer.

"...Who are you calling?" His voice is cold—unfeeling.

The ghost that kneels before him is tall, slender—dressed in black, hair pulled high and away from his face.

"You."

His head tilts up, looking upon the desolate, masked figure before him.

If the ghost's gaze showed pain, in that moment—not a soul would ever know. "I was calling you, your highness."

"..."

The calamity's fingers tighten around fangxin, and his voice hardens.

"I'm not him."

Xie Lian breathes in through his nose, detecting powerful waves of spiritual energy. More than any of the other ghosts around. Demonic, yes, but not foul.

It doesn't sting under his nose, doesn't make his eyes water, the way everything else around him does.

It must be a high level creature—a savage ghost, at the very least. Likely of similar strength to the creature that Xie Lian fought on Yi Nian bridge.

"I would know you anywhere, your highness." That voice is there again, tugging at his memory. "It is you."

It almost sounds like the ghost is trying to remind him of that, and—

Xie Lian's jaw locks.

He doesn't want to be himself. Not anymore.

"...Come to me," he orders, with the resounding authority of one who assumes he will have obedience.

The calamity lifts his hand, and immediately, he feels the ghost move towards him in response, laying his palm on top of Xie Lian's.

It's gloved in leather. Soft. Battle worn. The fingers are larger, longer than his own.

From what he can sense, the youth stands a head taller.

"..." Xie Lian's hand slides up a wrist—feels lean, corded muscle in the gap between the young man's glove and his sleeve, the bones of his wrist stark against his skin.

He's wearing armor. Xie Lian can feel the scales of it under his fingertips, well made.

There's a saber at his side, long and sharp. When Xie Lian's hands find his shoulders—they're surprisingly broad. Broad enough, that if he stood in front of the crown prince, he could completely shield him from an on-looker's view.

Finally, the prince reaches for his face.

Only to feel the hard, cold edge of a mask under his fingertips.

In spite of it all, Xie Lian's fingertips tremble, beginning to flinch away out of instinct, a fear that he's still ashamed to carry—

The ghost catches his wrist, it's grip strong, but—

But so gentle.

Xie Lian is silent, nostrils flaring as he fights to steady his breath, eyes wide underneath Ruoye, and...

That grip pulls his wrist down, firmly, but insistently—until Xie Lian can feel the shape of the mask's mouth.

Not half-laughing, half crying.

Not the face from his nightmares. The face that Xie Lian wears now. Just a smile. A small, simple smile.

Their faces are close enough now, that Xie Lian doesn't just smell the creature's spiritual power—

There's his natural scent, too. It's...

Xie Lian's heart stutters. It's familiar .

Like the forest after it rains. An earthy, slightly wild smell. Something that—

Something that reminds the crown prince so much of home. Not the place where he was raised, but the place he longs to return to.

"You..." He whispers, his voice unsure.

He doesn't ask what he would have, before. Can't stand crying that name out into the dark, only to have no one answer him.

Xie Lian is a slow learner. But he learns.

"...What's your name?" He rasps, heart pounding with an emotion he's come to loathe. It causes him so much pain.

Hope.

Even now, he gets no answer. To the point where his lip curls with frustration, hidden beneath his mask, and—

Beneath of the mask of the youth before him, lies an expression holding emotions too deep to be spoken.

"...This servant doesn't have a name, your highness."

His voice is strained, now—as though he has to spit out every single word.

Xie Lian doesn't worry about that, feeling that emotion inside of him deflate, leaving him even more empty than before.

God, how he hates hoping.

“...To be without a name is to be Wu Ming,” he mutters.

Wu Ming tilts his head to the side, silken threads of his ponytail slipping over his shoulder.

“Whatever his highness wishes to call me, I will answer to.” Wu Ming, then.

Xie Lian closes his eyes, taking a breath to steady himself. “Are you a soldier from this battlefield?”

"I am."

He responds so easily, without hesitation or difficulty. It's been so long, since Xie Lian had a conversation that didn't feel like some form of battle.

"What is your purpose in being here?" Again, the words fall as naturally as rain—

"To serve his highness."

"..." Xie Lian's mouth tightens at the corners, and he repeats:

"What's your name?"

His tone is harsh, suspicious, and after a pause, comes the reply.

"Wu Ming."

The prince is silent, for a moment. Distrustful, having learned to suspect a cruel trick in every act of kindness.

"...If I find out you're lying to me," he hisses, fangxin trembling in his grip, "I'll disperse you."

Wu Ming's smile matches the mask covering it. "His highness may disperse me at any moment he likes, but this servant will never lie to him."

Such powerful resolve...

In another life, Xie Lian would have smiled.

What a brave young man. Foolish, but...brave.

If he's a soldier that died on this battlefield—his reasons must be the same as Xie Lian's. And that, above all else, he can trust.

But there is something else the god must see to first.

Slowly, he pulls his hand back from Wu Ming's mask—and this time, the ghost lets him, stiffening with surprise when Xie Lian grasps his own hand in turn, bringing it against his chest.

To the stone that rests there, hanging from a leather cord.

"You know what these are?"

It takes a moment this time, but the ghost replies:

“Bone ashes, your highness.”

Xie Lian nods slowly. He would never let someone touch Hong-er before. Just—

(His stomach twists in faint, detached agony. Just his mother.)

But this is important, and it requires something that Xie Lian doesn’t have, something he can smell rolling off of this creature in waves: spiritual power.

“Can you sense anything from them?”

Wu Ming hesitates, his fingers carefully resting over the smooth, dark stone.

“...” Xie Lian can’t see the way Wu Ming bows his head—and even if could, the mask hides whatever he might be thinking. “...This was a believer of his highness’s,” the ghost answers calmly. “Utterly devout.”

In spite of everything, Xie Lian smiles, his voice weak, but pleased;

“Yes, that’s right.” Wu Ming’s fingers are so cautious, not brushing a single inch of Xie Lian’s skin, only resting on the stone itself. Even with gloves, he doesn’t dare. “What else?”

“...He follow—” For once, the ghost pauses, adjusting, “He followed his highness closely.”

Xie Lian nods. The memory of Hong-er ached inside of him, before. Remembering him felt like jarring a broken bone. Of cracking himself open.

Now, remembering the boy is the only thing that doesn’t hurt. “...Can you sense how he died?”

A pause, then—

“Yes.”

“Tell me.”

Wu Ming doesn’t answer at first, takes long enough that the prince has to repeat himself, his tone hardening, “Tell me.”

The ghost's head bows even lower, his voice mournful. "He was murdered." Xie Lian's silence is impatient, expecting. "…By a blade, your highness."

His gaze drifts down to fangxin, gazing up at the spiritual device through the blank stare of his mask, "The one by your side."

Xie Lian lets out a low sigh of relief at first, knowing now that the ghost really can sense it, then—

Then, his voice hardens with purpose. "And do you know who wielded it?"

There's no hesitation this time, only contempt—which confirms the prince's belief that Wu Ming knows exactly who he speaks of—

"Yes."

Xie Lian nods, sliding Fangxin into its sheath.

"Take me to him, then."

The Ghost kneels once more.

Head bowed, hand clasped over his heart in a promise.

(Trembling slightly, after his god grasped it.)

"I will die following your highness, I swear."

He wouldn't be the first one.

"…You're already dead," he replies coldly. "Start moving."

The Night Touring Green Lantern

Chapter Summary

> “Oh—it’s you!" His tone is jovial, and he can’t see from his seat at the head of the table, that the calamity’s hands are balled into fists. “I thought you had gone already,” he raises an eyebrow. The calamity replies calmly.
>
> “I answered your invitation, young master.”
>
> “...” Qi Rong frowns. “I...didn’t send you—”
>
> “You did.” The masked figure murmurs, stepping forward. Funny—Qi Rong remembered Bai Wuxiang being taller. Bigger. Maybe he’s less powerful now, after releasing the plague the way he did. Could be taking time to recover. “I was just slow to arrive.”

Chapter Notes

> TW// GRAPHIC VIOLENCE
>
> you can find me on my TWITTER and you can find the current updates of this story HERE

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The path is long.

They must be heading back towards the Imperial City. Xie Lian is surprised that his cousin would dare to hide in such a place, but, well...

He’s done quite a bit of dirty work for the new royal family, doesn’t he?

The road is crumbling in places, in desperate need of repair.

Xie Lian stumbles over a small pile of rubble, already throwing his arms out on instinct, his hands are permanently scraped now—

This time, someone catches him.

Before his weight can even be caught by gravity, there’s a hand grasping his elbow, another at the small of his back.

"This way, your highness."

Wu Ming is an excellent guide—attentive, careful. Xie Lian never has the chance to stumble again, finding the ground before him perfectly smooth and even.

Odd, given the disrepair that stretched behind them for miles.

He can't see the malevolence of Wu Ming's stare as he glares at the path ahead, broken bits of earth and stone shivering back into place.

His hand remains on the calamity's elbow, just in case—but it doesn't feel so much like a guide now as it does an escort.

A companion, even.

There was a time when it would have brought Xie Lian comfort, to have someone by his side.

Now, all it does is remind him of times past.

The hall he's brought to is finer than what he would have expected.

Then again, maybe he should have.

Qi Rong has always had a skill for kissing the boots of the most powerful person in the room, never caring for the head the crown rested upon, simply what it could offer him in return.

How many temples did he burn, before Xie Lian's enemies offered him such grace? How many of Xie Lian's believers did he slaughter?

it was part of what turned so many against him, in the beginning—that in the early days of his banishment, those who still dared to worship in his temples would be cut down where they stood.

He takes one step forward, then—

Then, Xie Lian stops, breathing in, smelling something that he hadn't expected:

Spiritual Power.

Not too strong, but in far greater quantity than the prince expected.

His brow furrows, only for Wu Ming to lean down and whisper beside his ear, “Ghost fires, your highness.”

“...” Xie Lian’s eyes narrow.

It’s not uncommon for cultivators or others who practice the mystic arts to use such spirits in ceremonies or spells.

Qi Rong has no such motivations. He simply has hideous taste in personal decor.

It explains why the hall is so cold now.

Over his head, dozens of green flames hang in spirit lanterns, casting the place in an almost acidic glow.

Wu Ming stares, the white jade of his mask doused in emerald light, blank gaze lingering upon the spirits.

Xie Lian might not have cared about such a thing before. Now, he clenches his teeth with disgust.

“Where is he?”

Instead of answering out loud, the hand on his elbow guides him forward. There are no servants—all having retired for the evening.

No guests. The master of the house can’t seem to obtain anything but prisoners.

Qi Rong sits all alone at the head of his table, lazily picking at the carcass of a roasted chicken. One that could feed an entire family on it’s own, in times like this. He uses one bone to pick his teeth, calling out to one of the fires overhead, his voice petty, grumbling—

“You’d think people could even manage to return an invitation these days,” he mutters, flicking the bone until it flies up into the air, smacking one of the lanterns, making it wobble. “The ‘nobility’ of this place wouldn’t know courtesy if it was shoved up their asses...”

After all, his auntie always taught him—even if you have no intention of going to a gathering, you always answer.

Qi Rong has never really had to answer an invitation, he’s never gotten one—after all, he has a habit of intimidating people.

“Honestly, I don’t even know why I—!”

The door opens with a creak, and when the young lord looks up—he sees two figures.

One tall, slender, wearing black. The other is shorter, slighter, dressed in white. Both wearing masks.

One of them, he recognizes, letting out a sound of surprise.

“Oh—it’s you!" His tone is jovial, and he can’t see from his seat at the head of the table, that the calamity’s hands are balled into fists. “I thought you had gone already,” he raises an eyebrow. The calamity replies calmly.

“I answered your invitation, young master.”

“...” Qi Rong frowns. “I...didn’t send you—”

“You did.” The masked figure murmurs, stepping forward. Funny—Qi Rong remembered Bai Wuxiang being taller. Bigger. Maybe he’s less powerful now, after releasing the plague the way he did. Could be taking time to recover. “I was just slow to arrive.”

White boots click softly against polished marble as he draws closer, closer, green flames illuminating his mask more and more as he approaches.

“I didn’t—”

“You did,” the calamity repeats. “Don’t you remember?”

The young man’s face freezes, squeezing with concentration. Straining to remember.

The white robed figure tilts its head to the side, “Would you like me to remind you?” It questions, voice friendly. Patient, even. “It was the last time you saw this mask.”

Qi Rong can’t remember anything like that, they parted on clear terms —

“I missed it at first,” the calamity explains, coming to a stop at the head of the table, next to the seat that Qi Rong occupied. “The others had to take him down for me. But that was what you wanted,” he questions, not unkindly, “wasn’t it?”

“...” Qi Rong stares, eyes narrow.

Slowly, he reaches out, like he means to touch the surface of that mask—but a black clad hand stops him, squeezing his wrist in a bruising grip.

“Hey!” He crows with a glare. “Who the hell do you think you are—?!”

The calamity places his palm against his companion’s chest.

“Let him go, Wu Ming.” His voice is soft. “I’m going to deal with him myself.”

“Your h—”

“Take care of the ghost fires,” the calamity gives him a gentle push. “Let them go.”

“...” Wu Ming drops the lord’s wrist, like he might discord a lump of trash. “...as you wish,” he murmurs

The black clad youth steps back, and Qi Rong stares at the white clothed calamity with newfound suspicion, after all—

He wasn’t like this before. Not even a little. It’s like...someone else entirely.

“...Is that really you?” He mutters, staring up at him suspiciously.

“You really don’t remember, Qi Rong?” The voice from underneath the mask echoes. “You invited me.”

“I—”

Finally, green eyes widen with understanding.

Because he does know this creature. He does recognize that voice.

But it isn’t by Wuxiang.

The figure reaches for it’s mask.

When the face beneath is revealed—at first, the only thing Qi Rong feels is shock. Then, his expression twists into a mask of amused glee.

“Cousin!” He barks, his laughter echoing throughout the hall, bouncing off the ceiling. “...You really did accept an invitation after all,” It's terribly amusing. "How many have I sent you, over the years?"

Too many to count. Xie Lian never answered those. He was always too busy, cultivating. Then, he was a god, and then—

Qi Rong smiles, all sharp teeth and sneering laughter.

And then, Xie Lian was nothing.

"I guess now you're not too busy for your little cousin, are you?"

Xie Lian's expression is just as unreadable as it was before he removed the mask, completely smooth. "...Did you know who it was?"

He barely pauses in his amusement, giggling, "Who?"

"The boy you killed," Xie Lian explains quietly, each word carefully formed. "Did you know who he was?"

"...I saw him following you," Qi Rong recalls, tapping his finger against his chin. "Then, once I saw that eye—well, it was pretty obvious he was the kid from before."

That eye.

What does he mean?

"You wouldn't know," Qi Rong smirks, "you never saw the little monster without those bandages that day, did you?"

He's always had a penchant for talking, even when he shouldn't, never paying attention to the other person's reaction.

"Count yourself lucky, it was disgusting—"

Xie Lian can't see the way Wu Ming pauses on the far side of the hall, holding a spirit lantern in hand, head bowed.

"Did you really never wonder why he had half of his face covered up?" Qi Rong laughs even louder now, snorting, no—cackling, "I'm surprised he didn't rip it out!"

He slaps the table, making his plate rattle against the wood. "That would have been better than making anyone look at that thing!"

"Enough."

Xie Lian's voice is low, venomous, but his cousin doesn't listen. He never listens.

"I thought you'd be thanking me, really!"

His cousin exclaims, sitting back. "That little freak, following you around all that time. Who KNOWS what sort of disturbing shit he wanted with you. He was probably one of those cut—"

Then, Qi Rong can't speak.

He gurgles and chokes, eyes bulging from his head.

Fingers are wrapped around his throat. Thin, elegant fingers, completely smooth to the touch, locked around him in an iron grip.

Expertly, index finger pressed down over his artery, thumb crushing down on his windpipe.

"It was a yes or no question," Xie Lian's voice is flat.

"I don't care what you thought about how he looked," his fingers dig in a little more, until he feels the muscles and tendons beneath his grip start to shiver and creak from the strain, "I don't care what you thought he wanted."

"C—Cousin, y—you—!"

"In your entire life, you have never had a single worthwhile thought," Xie Lian's voice is still calm, even now. "Why would I start caring about your opinions now?"

The young lord's skin is almost purple now, from the strain—but he still manages to look indignant, somehow.

Xie Lian lets him go, and he collapses forward, hands catching himself on the table, coughing. "Wh—when auntie hears about this, she'll—p-punish you—!"

"My mother is dead," Xie Lian replies woodenly. "And if she wasn't, she wouldn't care about what I do to you."

"She..."

It's almost infuriating to Xie Lian, to hear how small Qi Rong's voice sounds. How shocked.

"...She's dead?"

The creature has the nerve to sound sad .

"Normally, I might say that you'll see her soon," Xie Lian's lips twist into a sneer, "but that won't be possible for you."

Qi Rong pauses, staring up at his cousin in shock. Xie Lian wasn't wrong before.

Qi Rong isn't senseless, not understanding the consequences of his actions. He knows. He's careful, testing his boundaries.

When it came to his cousin, he never thought things could go this far.

Always thought, no matter what he did, Xie Lian would be forced to get over it. To move on and look past it. Everyone always did.

He never realized that he crossed a line until it was far, far behind him. "You—?"

A blade drops onto the table in front of him with a clatter.

"You recognize this, don't you?' Xie Lian muses, not needing to see the fear in his cousin's eyes to know. "You two are quite familiar with each other."

"..." He scrambles back so fast, his chair tips backwards, sending him sprawling on the floor. "You...you aren't going to!"

He chokes, pushing back on his hands, kicking with his feet as Xie Lian lifts the sword again, "You can't! You'll—" He's frantic, trying to think of a reason that his cousin should spare him, then—

"Gods can't harm humans!"

Of all things, he wasn't expecting Xie Lian to laugh. "I'm not a god," he smirks—

Qi Rong has never seen his cousin do that before, an expression so arrogant would have been ungrateful. Unseemly.

Xie Lian doesn't seem to care anymore.

"That's why you turned against me, remember?"

The human scrambles to his feet, trying to flee.

“You—you could threaten me and bully me before, but—!” He fights to keep the fear out of his voice, “You’re not the same anymore, you can’t—”

Xie Lian laughs even harder, now.

A single tear of blood drips down his cheek.

“Do you think I need my eyes to hurt you, Qi Rong?” Xie Lian clicks his tongue against the roof of his mouth.

“But I forgot—you normally attack women and children, don’t you?”

Or someone already rendered helpless by a calamity. Xie Lian knows his Hong-er could have handled Qi Rong easily, in a fair fight.

The prince knows, because he taught the boy himself.

“We’ll place the odds in your favor then, how about that?” Xie Lian’s smile is lopsided. “Wu Ming, give him your saber.”

There’s a pause as the black clad youth watches his god, face tilted. “Wu Ming.”

“Yes, your highness.”

The young man steps forward, placing the blade in Qi Rong’s hands—which are trembling so badly, they almost drop to the floor with a clatter.

“You…” He sputters, watching Xie Lian stalk towards him, “you would kill me over that little RAT?! I—I’m your family! My blood is—!”

Qi Rong stops with a pained yelp when something slices into his cheek, he— He barely even saw it move.

He sees it now, raised into an offensive position, held aloft like a natural extension of Xie Lian’s body.

It gives him pause, to see his cousin in that pose, because…

With a sword in one hand, the other clasping something against his chest, he—

He looks so much like the divine statues that stood in his temples. The same statues Qi Rong took the time to build, and later helped destroy.

But that face isn’t serene—it’s pulled into a snarl.

“I never once considered you my family,” the crown prince hisses. “I resented the fact that my parents ever forced me to tolerate you!”

Qi Rong attempts to deflect the next blow, but he’s three heartbeats behind the strike itself.

His right forearm sears with pain.

"My father thought you were a burden, and-–and my mother ?!" Xie Lian laughs again, this time a sly, snickering kind of cackle–

Clearly mocking Qi Rong's own laugh.

"She felt GUILTY for not being there for her sister before she died–she didn't care about YOU!"

Each time Qi Rong attempts to parry, or retort, there's another blow.

On his shoulders. His cheeks. His legs. Agonizing little slices–deep, but never too much to keep him off his feet.

"I-I KNEW you always looked down on me!! That's why I–!"

"Oh, spare me."

Xie Lian rolls his eyes, hair whipping about him as he moves. He makes battle into an art—a dance.

Not so different from that day, in a very different kind of parade, wearing a different mask. The screaming of thousands, and—

A boy, dropping into his arms like a falling star.

He doesn't see the way Wu Ming has taken a seat on the floor on the far side of the room. Legs pulled up against his chest, one remaining spirit lantern in his arms as he just...

Watches, white mask caught in an unearthly glow.

"I never HID what I thought of you!"

Xie Lian snarls. "Don't act SHOCKED, don't use it as an EXCUSE!"

"You–!"

"You didn't become this way because I was disgusted with you," Xie Lian's voice rises to a shout, "I was repulsed by you because you were a fucking ANIMAL!"

The next blow cuts deep into his hip.

Xie Lian is a little irritated, when he hears his cousin fall to the floor.

That's annoying. He forgot his strength. Got too upset. He wanted the man to stay standing, a little longer.

Qi Rong moans, weakly crawling backwards on the floor, pushing with one foot.

He can't move the other leg anymore–too much muscle and tendon was severed by that last blow. It dangles from his body, limp and useless.

"...But you knew that, didn't you?" Xie Lian mutters, lifting his chin, listening to pained breaths, strained whimpering. "What you were."

He stalks forward, letting the tip of fangxin drag against the marble floor, creating a low, shrieking sound.

"That underneath the wealth, the titles, and the fame—you were just a sick little freak . A bastard that nobody wanted. An orphan."

The tip of the blade comes to a halt, resting on the floor between Qi Rong's ankles.

"You weren't different from that boy at all–and he had my attention ," the prince sneers, shaking his head. "You couldn't STAND that, could you?"

"We weren't the same!" Qi Rong cries. "At least I wasn't DEFORMED–!"

He cuts himself off with a shriek when fangxin flicks upwards in a dark flash, blood pouring down the right side of his face as he drops Wu Ming's saber with a clatter, clutching the remains of his eye.

"Now you are," Xie Lian replies coldly.

Then, it occurs to him, head slowly tilting. His hair has come slightly loose in all the fighting, loose pieces falling in front of his eyes, shrouded by silk.

"You know something," the prince murmurs, "my father is dead, too." In the corner, Wu Ming stiffens.

Qi Rong chokes.

"W...what?! How did they—?"

Xie Lian doesn't answer him. He doesn't deserve to know. Let him wonder. Let it haunt him.

He's haunted others long enough.

"I'm no longer a god," he repeats. "Which means I no longer forfeit my mortal lands and titles."

Fangxin levels over Qi Rong's torso, gleaming wickedly in the light. "That makes me head of the Royal House of Xie, doesn't it?"

Laughable, now. To most, it means very little in the wake of the war.

But Qi Rong is a member of that house, and it means a great deal to him.

It's not like Xie Lian could ever be crowned king, now—not like he ever desired that path for himself to begin with.

But it does grant him with one ability—to take away the thing that Qi Rong treasures more than anything in the world. Even if he denies it, now.

"I banish you," Xie Lian smiles, no—he grins from ear to ear, like this is a moment he's fantasized about since childhood.

(In truth, it is.)

Qi Rong's lips tremble, and he tries to laugh, but the sound shatters and breaks as he crawls, blood trailing behind him.

"What?!"

"I banish you from the family," Xie Lian repeats slowly, enunciating every word clearly, "I strip you of your titles."

"You—!" Qi Rong sputters, blood shining against his teeth, and he–he's still trying to laugh, but there's a gleam of horror in his gaze. "You think I CARE?!"

Fangxin slices into his side, now—cutting a deep line across his ribs, drawing out a tortured moan.

"You do," Xie Lian murmurs. "Because now, you're just an orphan. No titles. No family. Maimed. A source of disgust and scorn to those around you. No one will even mourn you."

"Which leaves that boy above you."

Xie Lian doesn't say his name. Not here. Doesn't ever want the memory of that name on Qi Rong's lips.

His cousin chokes out a laugh, "Mourn me?! And who–who would mourn–?!"

"I did," Xie Lian cuts him off quietly. "I mourned him." He's still mourning him.

Part of Xie Lian thinks that he won't ever stop.

At first, Qi Rong thought that his cousin might have lost his touch, inflicting so many shallow, non-fatal blows.

Eventually, his true intentions become clear.

Xie Lian never cuts the same place twice.

He doesn't know how many times Qi Rong cut Hong-er.

Back then, he couldn't bring himself to count. Was too lost in the agony over what had been taken from him to take notice of such things.

But he thinks a hundred cuts must be enough.

He knows the experience all too well.

He's careful not to spill too much blood. Careful, to make sure that his cousin feels every single bit of it. Even as red splatters across Xie Lian's cheeks. Stains the whites of his robes, splatters across the walls.

Even when his cousin becomes unrecognizable, he feels it.

Xie Lian pulls fangxin back, the blade shining with blood, dripping to the floor in slightly congealed puddles.

"...Let me die," the young man whimpers, clutching his face. It was handsome, once. So similar to that of the prince.

Now, it's a bloody jack-o-lantern of flesh.

"Let me die!"

Xie Lian tilts his head back, letting out a long, satisfied sigh.

Qi Rong used to pray to him so often before. For horrible things. Filthy, hideous desires.

This is the first prayer of this believer that the flower crowned martial god is willing to answer.

But not quickly. Not in the way that Qi Rong wants.

"...Ruoye," he murmurs. The spiritual tool shivers around his face, squirming upon hearing its name; "Go."

Qi Rong can barely see straight, thinks he's hallucinating, when the silk bandage slithers towards him.

It isn't until the spiritual tool slides over his body, wrapping around his neck, that Qi Rong begins to scream.

"NO!" He cries blood pouring from him as he's yanked into the air, the other end of the bandage looping around one of the beams on the ceilings. "NononoNONONO!"

He's bleeding so profusely, it pours down below like rain. Xie Lian tilts his head back, listening to the patter of it falling.

"Not like this," his cousin sobs as the bandage tightens around his throat, his voice becoming weaker as he's hoisted higher, "Cousin—NOT LIKE THIS!"

CRACK !

The sound of his spine snapping is so loud, it grates against Xie Lian's ears.

Then, there's silence—and creaking. The patter of blood hitting the floorboards.

Come to think of it—this is the exact same beam he hung his ghost fires from, before.

The calamity waits.

Listens as the heartbeat overhead pounds, throbbing louder, louder, becoming unsteady, struggling as the brain loses oxygen, slowly losing function.

The blood pools beneath his feet, spreading across the floor, staining the soles of Xie Lian's boots.

Then, there's quiet.

He outstretches his hand, waiting, knowing--someone so malicious, so angry and hateful, could never rest in peace.

And eventually, slowly—he feels a small, flickering mass of cold land in his palm.

Xie Lian digs his fingers in, lifting his hand in front of his face.

He lets Qi Rong's soul quiver and tremble in his hand. Too disoriented and confused to speak. To know who or what he is.

But Xie Lian doesn't disperse him, no.

That would be too kind.

"Wu Ming," he murmurs.

After a moment, a slightly rasping voice replies—

"Your highness?"

"Do you still have one of the lanterns, or did you destroy them when you let the spirits go?" Xie Lian questions calmly, squeezing Qi Rong a little tighter.

"...I still have one," the youth answers.

Xie Lian smiles, the dips and shadows of his face cast in a green glow. "Bring it here," he orders.

He hears the slow, steady footsteps of Wu Ming's boots as he moves to obey him, coming to a halt by Xie Lian's side, opening the side of the lantern, so the prince can place the newly formed ghost fire inside.

Before he does, Xie Lian brings Qi Rong closer, directly in front of his mouth. "You were going to call him a cut sleeve, weren't you?"

Wu Ming watches his god, holding the lantern steady.

Xie Lian laughs quietly, two streaks of blood dripping down to his chin.

"I am."

The thought of anyone ever knowing—it terrified him, once. Made him think that the worst thing anyone could ever know about him, would be the part of him that had those desires.

There are worse things. Xie Lian knows that now.

Maybe he'll always be ashamed of the way he felt about Feng Xin. Maybe it will always hurt, that he couldn't talk to his mother about Hong-er.

But Mu Qing's words terrified him, that day. Robbed him of the comfort of having that fear and shame remain a secret.

Xie Lian doesn't feel afraid now.

He feels powerful. Like he's taking that part of himself back, now, using it to taunt Qi Rong.

"You were killed by a cut sleeve," Xie Lian muses, squeezing so tight, the spirit lets out a pained squeak. "Avenging another cut sleeve."

He's actually not sure if Hong-er counted, since he said he appreciated men and women. If anything, Xie Lian is slightly less respectable than him, but—

It's alright.

Feeling Qi Rong shiver with humiliation and anger in his palm is enough.

"And now," he turns to face Wu Ming, carefully placing the ghost fire into the spirit lantern, closing and sealing the latch behind it, "for the first time in your life, you're going to be useful."

The calamity lifts his head. "Ruoye, return."

Qi Rong's body falls.

It lands on top of his dining table, bleeding and broken, the remains of his dinner scattering across the floor.

The bandage wraps itself around Xie Lian's wrist as he lifts the mask back over his face, holding out his arm.

He doesn't have to say a word for Wu Ming to step forward, taking it. "Where would you like to go, your highness?"

"Is there still a market open, at this time?"

When the ghost nods in affirmative, the crown prince smiles.

"Sell it."

Beneath a smiling mask, there's a vindictive, fanged grin, fingers tightening around the lantern's handle.

"Yes, dianxia."

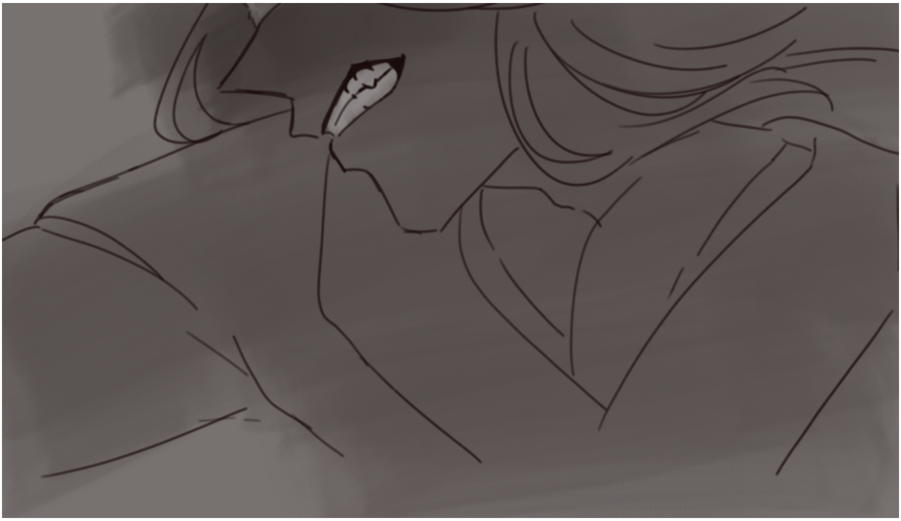
With one hand on his god's arm, the other holding the spirit aloft in front of him, the ghost leads Xie Lian from the manor, out onto the city street.

They make an odd pair. One dressed in black, the other in white, streaked with blood. Each in masks, arms linked in a way that seems almost intimate.

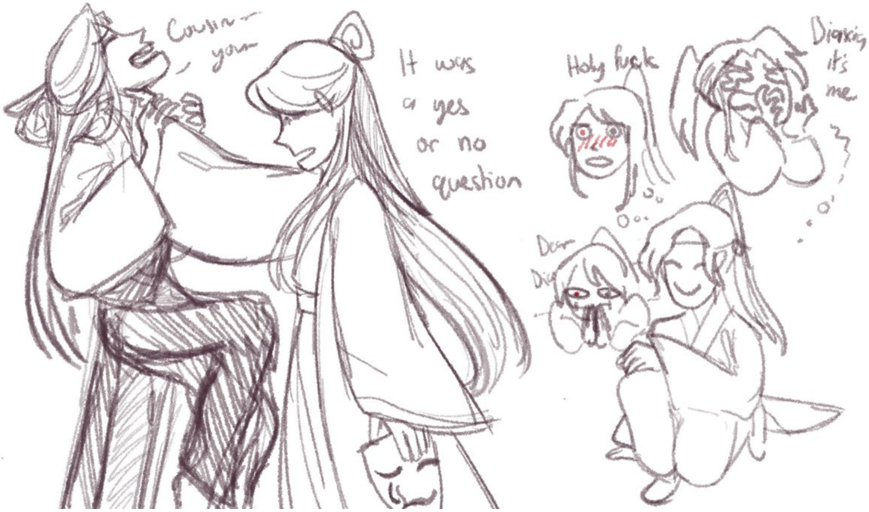
And before them, a green lantern, emitting a soft, green glow—swaying and flickering as it tours through the night.

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

THIS IS POSTED WITH PERMISSION FROM THE ARTISTS. DO NOT USE OR REPOST FOR ANY REASON.

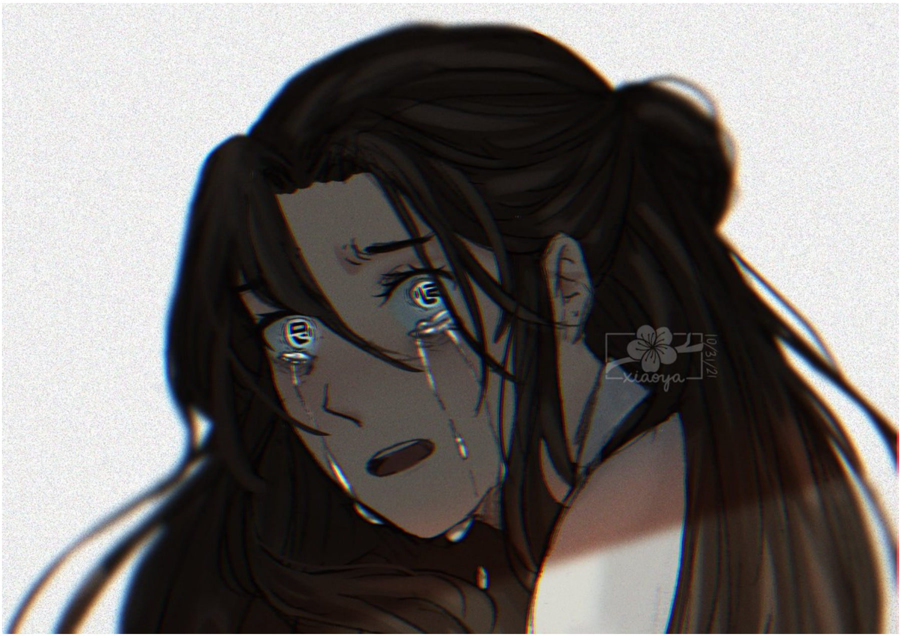


CREDIT: MusingLotus , Post with Art



Cousin— your
It was a yes or no question
Holy fuck
Dianxia it's me
Dear
Di

CREDIT: Minryll , link to art post



xiaoya
10/31/21

CREDIT: Pri , link to post with art

TW// BLOOD

CREDIT: Pri , link to art post

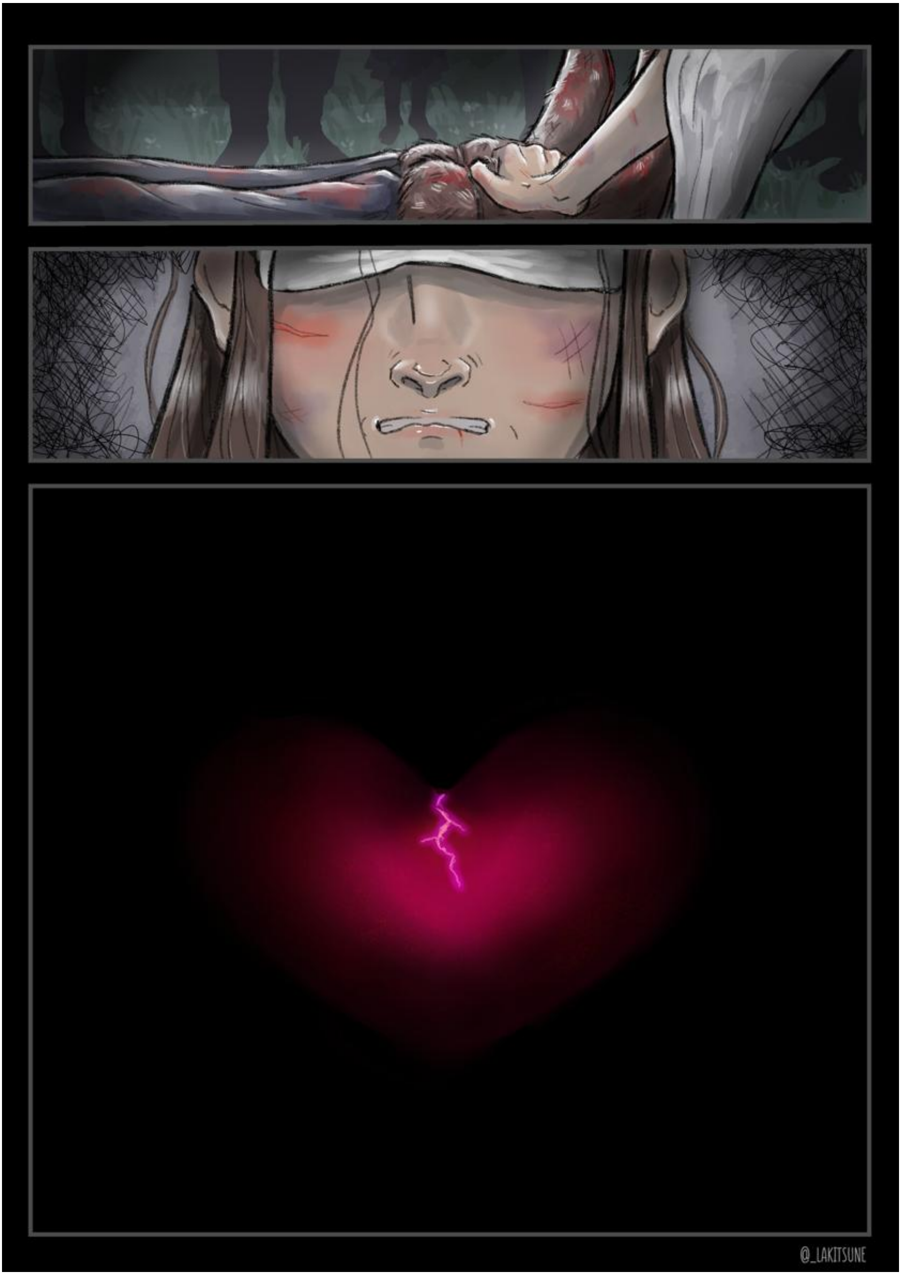
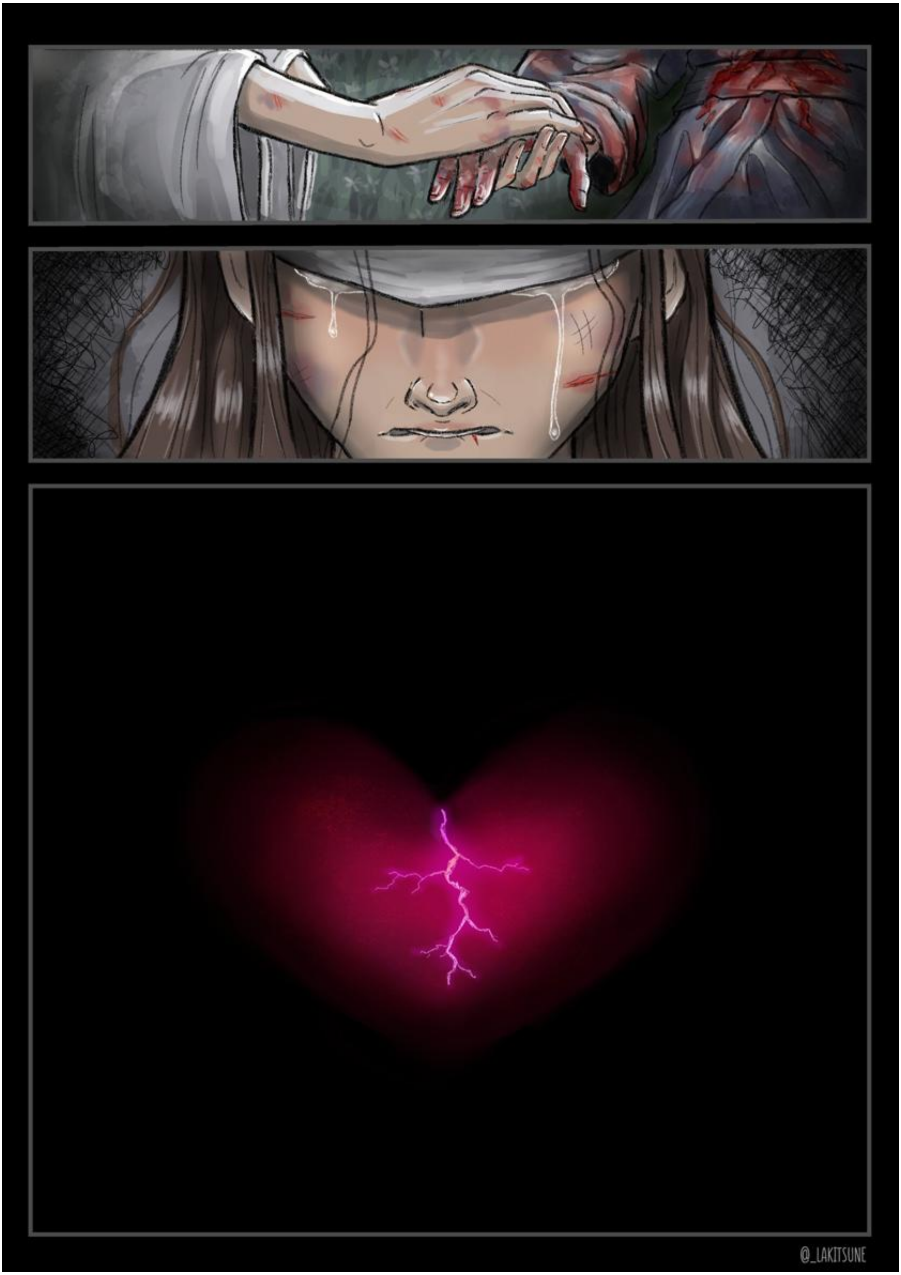
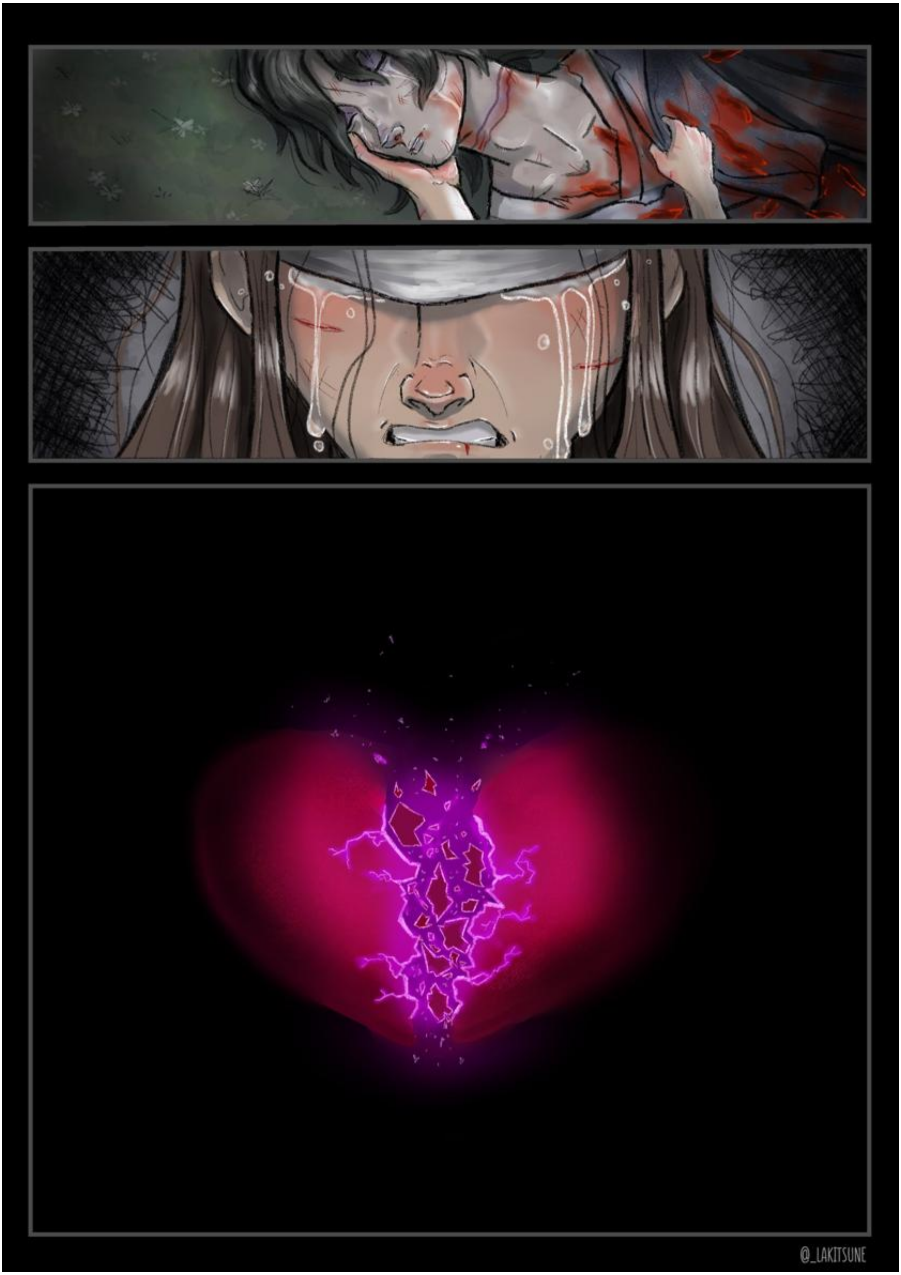
TW// BLOOD AND DEATH



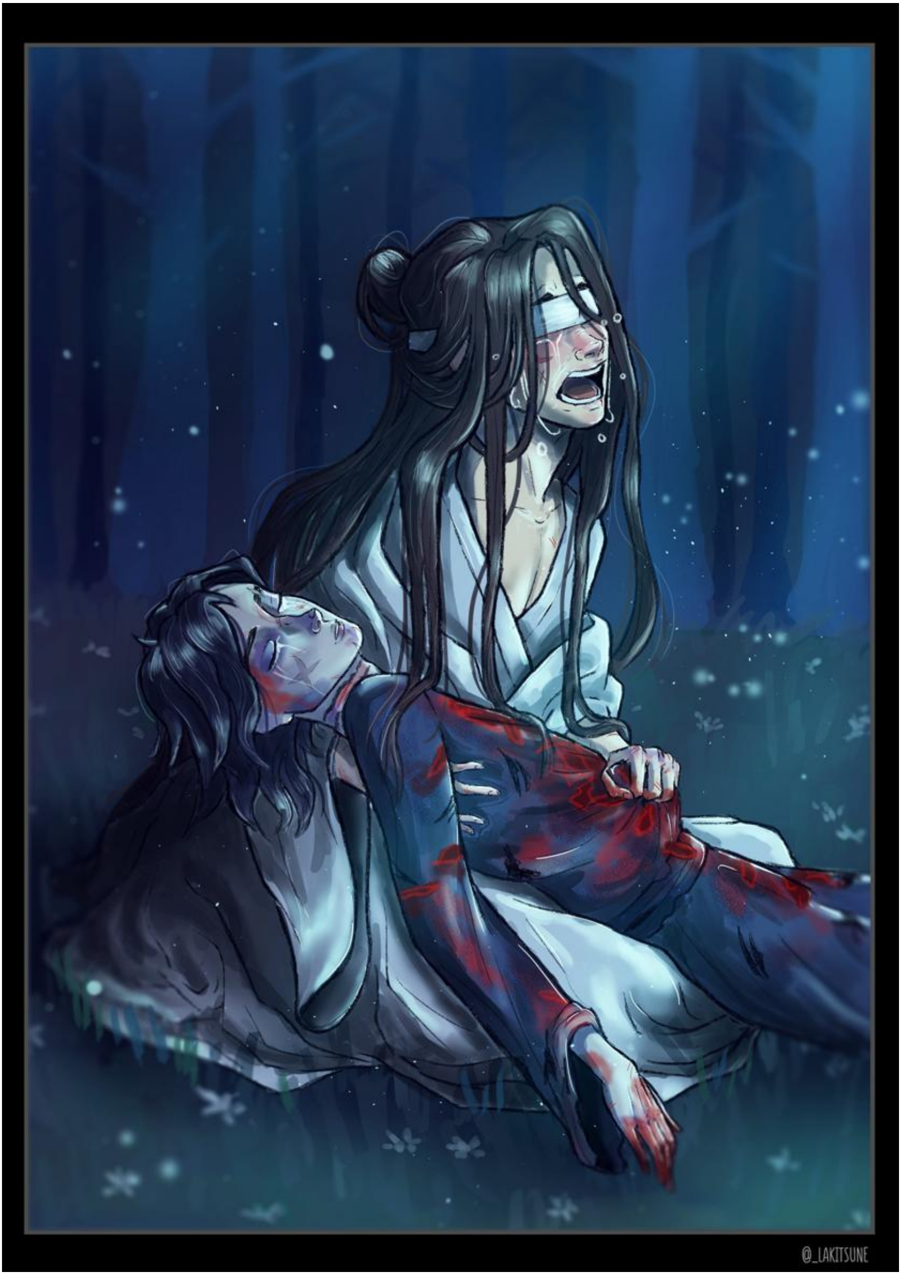
@_LAKITSUNE



@_LAKITSUNE



@_LAKITSUNE



CREDIT: LAKITSUNE, link to art post!

[image]

CREDIT: MYSTERYSEONG, link to art post!

TW// BLOOD AND DEATH

[image]

CREDIT: MYSTERYSEONG, link to art post!

TW// SUICIDE AND DEATH

[image]

CREDIT: MYSTERYSEONG, link to art post!

TW// BLOOD

[image]

CREDIT: MYSTERYSEONG, link to art post!

Chapter End Notes

> Thank you so much to the artists who have created work for this story, and for giving permission for me to document that work here! The best thing about creating anything is seeing other people react and get inspired by it, so ya'll mean a lot to me!
>
> Evie

Golden Palaces

Chapter Summary

He walks forward, fingertips trailing against the walls, then the doors—feeling the deep scars in the wood, left behind by the talismans that burned.

There's only one living thing in the throne room, panicked breathing, a shuddering heartbeat. A slow smile spreads over his face

"Were you worried, your majesty?" He calls out, his tone slightly jeering. He catches one shredded piece of talisman paper, fluttering through the air—holding it delicately between two fingers.

"You were trying very hard to keep out evil," the crown prince muses, head tilting.

The remains of the talisman ignite between his fingers, going up in a flash of smoke, ash crumbling in front of his boots.

"Has something been haunting you?"

Chapter Notes

tw// GRAPHIC VIOLENCE, SLIGHTLY UNHEALTHY ROMANTIC DYNAMICS, GORE, AND DEATH

I know it's been a bit of an angst slog, but I promise, it's not like that all the way through ^^"

You can find me on twitter and keep up with current updates of the story HERE

This story also has some spotify playlists for those who want some fun listening while reading!

No Paths Are Bound: The Playlist
Calamity Xie Lian: The Playlist
The Wu Ming Playlist

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The calamity stands at a distance as his lieutenant makes terms with a dealer of spiritual items in a nearby stall, quietly haggling over price.

As a recently murdered soul, full of spite, he's valuable—but Wu Ming doesn't haggle as much as he might have on any other occasion.

There's satisfaction in deeming the spirit cheap.

When he returns, he places a small pouch of gold in the God's outstretched hand.

"...This should be plenty," Xie Lian murmurs, rolling the pouch between his fingers, estimating the weight.

"For what, your highness?"

The calamity doesn't answer him directly, only gives Wu Ming instructions on where to take him, and what to purchase when they arrive.

Before long, a silver chain is being placed in his palm, and the prince —

Underneath the mask, he manages a small smile.

It replaces the leather cord around his neck, holding the smooth, black stone in place.

It's a small payment, in comparison to what Qi Rong took from Hong-er. But this is the most Xie Lian can offer him now.

He stands there for a moment, grasping the stone between his fingers.

Xie Lian wants so badly to stop feeling anything at all. There are moments when he does. When he can look upon the world and feel nothing but a desire to knock it down.

But he can't erase the fondness in his heart, when he remembers the young man. The pain of losing him.

The ache of missing him.

"...Wu Ming." He murmurs, head down turned.

"Yes, dianxia?"

"..." Xie Lian swallows hard at the sound of that title, remembering...remembering...

The prince shakes himself out of it, refusing to react. "Have you ever been in love?"

There's a heavy pause.

"...Yes," he admits, his voice slightly strained.

"Do you miss them?"

The masked youth tilts his head back, glancing up at the sky.

It's deep in the night, now—the moon riding high, stars twinkling down at him.

"Every day, your highness."

Every single moment.

Xie Lian almost asks him why he hasn't moved on, then—but there could be a dozen reasons. He knows as much, now.

More than anything, the reason that Xie Lian is here, whether he wants to be or not. Resentment

"Does it get easier?" He whispers, only to get the answer—

"No."

Wu Ming already promised that he wouldn't lie to him—even if the answer wasn't what he wanted to hear.

Xie Lian is grateful for that. And he's hopeless. And— "Where would you like to go now, dianxia?"

His eyes squeeze shut under the mask.

Dianxia.

'Gege, did you see me—!'

Xie Lian lets go of the stone, dropping his hand to his sides, shaking them off as if he's been burned.

Hong-er belongs to the human parts of him. The parts that feel. That hope. That ache. Xie Lian doesn't want to feel that ache anymore. Doesn't want to feel anything at all.

Before, when Xie Lian wanted to stop thinking about him, he couldn't —because he promised the boy he would never forget him.

Now, Xie Lian—

He avenged him. He mourned him. There will always be a part of him that mourns.

But now, Xie Lian puts that aside.

He leaves the anger behind. It doesn't hurt.

Everything else, he pushes into a small, contained box inside of him. Locked away in a tight, confined space, where it can't leap out and hurt.

"Take me to the King of Yong'an." He eventually replies, wind playing through his hair.

Wu Ming tilts his head, watching him—but before Xie Lian can express his impatience, that hand is on his elbow again.

"Yes, dianxia."

Xie Lian assumes that, somehow, the blood on his robes must be gone —after all, he doesn't hear petrified screaming when people glimpse him.

He doesn't hear anything but the chatter of merchants. The voices of children playing, before being called home by their mothers.

The sun is down, now, they warn. You never know what things might be about. Slowly, Xie Lian smiles.

There's a pause, when they reach the gates.

In the distance, there's guards whispering about whether or not to deal with them— he even hears another say something about them being beggars. That if they ignore the newcomers, they'll leave.

Xie Lian smiles so widely underneath the mask, that it hurts. There's a chuckle.

That was how this whole thing began—when his father closed the city gates on beggars. Refugees.

How quickly self righteousness fades, when it is no longer accompanied by indignation. When it's no longer convenient.

Xie Lian won't have it.

He won't let them get off so easily.

"Wu Ming." He commands flatly, not needing to elaborate before the ghost bows his head in acknowledgement, murmuring;

"Dianxia."

Xie Lian begins the slow walk towards the gates—unaided by a hand on his elbow this time, but with no worry that he'll fall.

He can hear it beginning, around him.

The faint cries of palace guards. The clang of a saber.

Xie Lian never has to change his gait, never has to pause once. If a body falls in his path, it's cleared away before it brushes his feet.

A siege, laid by a single soldier.

When he reaches the gates, they stand open for him. That hand is back on his arm again, guiding him to step over the threshold—and then, lips murmur next to his ear,

"Keep straight, your highness."

Giving him directions. Just like Hong-er used to—

The calamity grits his teeth.

Some part of him that he can't control shivers at the feeling of breath, ice cold, hitting his jaw—but not in an unpleasant way.

Without answering, he continues moving forward.

The sounds of a small battle continue to rage around him, voices cut off, one by one.

Wu Ming returns each time he needs to step through a doorway, or make a turn— touches light, respectful, never changing Xie Lian's pace or momentum, simply guiding.

There’s a rush of air as an arrow hurtles towards the god’s head from behind—but it’s incinerated before it lands.

It’s the first time Xie Lian has walked in the halls of a palace, since his childhood home was burned to the ground.

The floors feel smooth and polished under his feet. He pauses, reaching out to brush his fingertips over the walls.

Gilded, carved with images of battle.

Xie Lian’s fingertips trace over golden chariots, small battalions of pikemen. Archers, flinging tiny little arrows into the sky. When Xie Lian traces the bumps of them towards the sun, he finds a figure there.

A sword in one hand, a flower in the other.

Falling.

“...” Xie Lian’s lips twist into an angry sneer, his fingers jerking back.

They march to war, crying out about poverty, about their conditions, their suffering.

They destroy his home, slaughter his people.

Xie Lian has been living in their world, now—

There’s still poverty.

They didn’t fix the world. They didn’t cure disease, or give back to the people.

Lang Ying fought a war, toppled a dynasty, all because of their ineptitude. The suffering of the common people.

Then took credit for the ending of a drought. But he didn’t end any suffering.

He just carved murals about it. About him.

Xie Lian’s jaw aches.

How many red coral earrings is this one mural worth? How many lives?

BAM !

The battle shatters under his fist, bits of gold foil and marble crumbling and landing at his feet.

What a joke.

What a lie .

He turns back, continuing his slow, purposeful march.

He won't have it.

He won't let them get off so easily.

Xie Lian won't let him get off so easily.

This palace, like the kingdom it governs, is a cheap imitation. Pretending to be something that it isn't: an improvement.

There are echoes of Xianle everywhere he touches. In the furnishings. The materials. But the craftsmanship is subpar. There's no art to any of it. No joy.

Only the stink of the blood in it's foundations. The price they paid, to sleep in luxury. The hand on his arm is back.

Helping him turn down the hall, and when Xie Lian breathes in, he smells something surprising.

Fortified energy. Talismans. So many, it's almost acidic under his nose in its strength. He turns his head for a moment, almost concerned for Wu Ming, it can't be comfortable, but...

Then, he smells them burning—hundreds, crumbling to ash, scattering before they land.

Finally, there's a heavy creak as the doors to the throne room swing open. Xie Lian pulls his elbow gently, and Wu Ming lets him go without protest.

He walks forward, fingertips trailing against the walls, then the doors—feeling the deep scars in the wood, left behind by the talismans that burned.

There's only one living thing in the throne room, panicked breathing, a shuddering heartbeat.

A slow smile spreads over his face

“Were you worried, your majesty?” He calls out, his tone slightly jeering. He catches one shredded piece of talisman paper, fluttering through the air—holding it delicately between two fingers.

“You were trying very hard to keep out evil,” the crown prince muses, head tilting.

The remains of the talisman ignite between his fingers, going up in a flash of smoke, ash crumbling in front of his boots.

“Has something been haunting you?”

Silence follows, then—then Xie Lian hears that heartbeat slow, like he isn’t quite so frightened anymore.

“...It’s you?”

The idea that realizing it’s the crown prince of Xianle might bring Xie Lian comfort fills his chest with anger.

“It is.” He replies coldly. Somewhere, he hears a child crying.

“...Have you come to kill me?” The king murmurs, devoid of the one thing Xie Lian desires—

Fear.

Before, Xie Lian couldn't touch him. He was shrouded by the aura of a king, heaven's mandate wouldn't allow the fallen god to fight back, only allowed the human hero to cast him down.

Xie Lian doesn't need to attack now, to know that the King of Yong'an is no longer untouchable.

There's no scent of heavenly aura on his body now, just-- Xie Lian pauses, nostrils flaring.

Just the opposite.

This place stinks of illness, rot, and death.

A curse.

The prince walks forward, his voice frigid with anger, "What is this?"

The scent of a curse is here.

With each step that brings him closer, the crying gets louder, and the scent gets stronger. Of—of—

Xie Lian stops in front of him, his hands going limp by his sides.

"...You caught it," he starts, his voice low with disbelief. "...How is that possible?"

Human face disease.

It shouldn't be possible. After all—Lang Ying is as much of a killer as Xie Lian. As any of the soldiers who fought in the war.

And yet—

"No..." Lang Ying shakes his head, voice trembling, and—

It almost sounds like he's at peace.

"I don't have Human Face Disease."

Xie lian's eyebrows knit together as he steps back, shaking his head, looking in Wu Ming's direction frantically, because the thought of touching the man's body to check is too revolting—

"He has the lesions, dianxia," Wu Ming murmurs. "He's lying to you."

"I'm not!"

Lang Ying cries, clutching his arms around his chest, hunching forward. Xie Lian can't see the way he strokes the faces sprouting from his skin—adoring, but he can smell the rot wafting from him. Can hear the agonized cries.

"This is my wife," he explains slowly, "and my son!"

"..." Xie Lian pauses, trying to take that in. "...Who told you that?"

"...He did," Lang Ying mutters—and Xie Lian doesn't have to ask who. The answer is always the same. The same voice, wearing different masks. "It was a gift."

No.

Xie Lian grimaces with disgust.

It was a trick, disguised as a reward.

Bai Wuxiang was probably laughing as the human thanked him, waiting for the king of Yong'an to receive the fruits of his efforts.

"Tell me," Xie Lian questions, standing over him, "how that thing ever convinced you this was a gift."

"...If I give it enough time, they'll come back," Lang Ying replies, his voice trembling—half agonized, half hopeful. "That's what he told me. Where is he? I-I did everything he asked, I..."

His voice trails off, weak, and Xie Lian trembles, realizing the truth.

He...

He's still such a slow learner, isn't he?

Lang Ying is dying. Xie Lian just happened to arrive in time for his final moments. No.

His body trembles.

No, no, no .

Wu Ming approaches the god's side, voice gentle, "...Dianxia, y—"

The ghost cuts off sharply, unable to speak.

Oh, Xie Lian realizes faintly, he really wasn't kidding, before. He was serious. The god's fingers curl tightly around his follower's throat, nails digging in. 'He really would let me disperse him without a fight, wouldn't he?'

Such bravery.

His fingers squeeze tighter.

Foolish, but brave.

Once the calamity's nails break skin, he's able to take what he needs—spiritual power.

Xie Lian hasn't felt energy like this pulsing through his veins in years, flooding through him like ice, surprising in its potency.

This ghost was far stronger than the crown prince realized at first glance. After only a moment, he's taken enough.

He allows his fingers to go slack, expecting the creature to flee from him—but it doesn't.

Wu Ming sits calmly in his grip, staring down at his god, unflinching.

"..." Xie Lian drops his hand, flexing his fingers as he looks away, pushing down a rush of shame.

He doesn't have time for that. Not right now.

"...You're a fool," he mutters, turning back to Lang Ying. "That thing was never going to help you."

"He said—"

"HE'S A LIAR!"

Xie Lian's voice roars, making the walls shake from the force of it—and the spiritual power he took from Wu Ming surges forth, lifting the King of Yong'an into the air.

His heart won't stop, now—Xie Lian will keep it beating. He won't—

"LISTEN TO THEM!" He shrieks, wrathful. "LISTEN!"

The room falls silent, and there's only sobbing. Pained cries. Tortured souls, forced to linger on in agony.

"HOW COULD YOU THINK THIS WAS A GIFT?!"

Lang Ying's expression freezes, hands clutching over his chest. He—he was listening, he was—

"The calamity, he—!"

"HE DIDN'T DO THIS!" Xie Lian cries, sleeves billowing as he thrashes before this man, agonized, because—

There's nothing more Xie Lian can do to him. He can't torture him. Can't make him suffer more than this.

"YOU DID THIS!" The crying gets louder, more tortured.

Bai Wuxiang never forces anyone to do anything. Xie Lian has learned that, by now.

He schemes, lies, and tricks. He manipulates, goads, and torments.

But the mistakes you make are your own. The crimes you commit, they lay on your head.

"IS THAT WHY?!" Xie Lian sobs.

He was able to avenge Hong-er. That's his sole comfort, now.

Because Bai Wuxiang robbed the crown prince of Xianle of the chance to avenge himself. His family. His kingdom.

There's nothing left for him to take.

"IS THAT WHAT HE PROMISED YOU, IF YOU DID ALL OF THIS?!"

Did Xie Lian lose everything for a lie? Because one lonely, desperate man was so blinded by grief, he was willing to follow that thing?

Is this what his family lost their home for?

Is this why Xie Lian lost his godhood, his sight? His hon—?

"No," a voice whispers.

Xie Lian stops, trembling.

"...I felt like a ghost," Lang Ying whispers, his voice cracking. "The rest...the rest of the world was so normal, but...my boy..."

Xie Lian's eyes sting.

"...I had to carry him...so far," the king croaks, "and no one...no one would even look." Tears slip down his face, cheeks sunken in, skin sallow. "He...he was so small," the king croaks, a sob ripping from him, "I-I carried him so far, and no one would listen!"

Xie Lian hangs his head, clutching his hands over his chest. "...I know," he whimpers. "I remember."

"I stood in your temples, I watched people toss SO MANY gold pieces into the offering plates, the pools—they wouldn't even let me take a HANDFUL!" Lang Ying shrieks. "WERE THOSE OFFERINGS WORTH MORE THAN MY SON?! WERE THEIR PRAYERS SO IMPORTANT?!"

Xie Lian shakes his head.

He stumbles backwards, lips trembling.

"...No," he admits, his voice quiet, small. "No, they—"

He almost trips over his own feet, but a hand is at his back, steadying him.

"Your son was already dead," Wu Ming's voice rings out. Flat, unmoved by Lang Ying's sorrow.

"That gold wouldn't have saved him."

"But there were others, just like him, there were SO many others, and they—THEY WOULDN'T EVEN LOOK!" Lang Ying shakes his head, limp, graying hair clinging to his face. "HOW COULD THEY BE SO HAPPY?!"

Xie Lian hangs his head.

"HOW COULD THEY BE SO HAPPY," he shrieks, no, he sobs, "IN A WORLD WHERE MY SON WAS DEAD?!"

"...Children are still dying, Lang Ying," Xie Lian mutters, his voice empty, tired. "You just don't have to carry them anymore."

Xie Lian carried a child in his arms once. So...so far. Dead, and for what?

Because Lang Ying wasn't content to grieve by himself? Because a demon called out, offering a death sentence in disguise, and this fool ran to the slaughter?

"How much gold did you use to build this place?" Xie Lian murmurs, lifting his chin. "When the nobles that once bowed before me came to your balls, dined in your hall, did it feel any easier, to be happy in a world without your son?"

He steps closer, footsteps echoing against arched ceilings.

Wu Ming stands to the side, hands clasped behind his back—watching.

"When the gold they used to build my temples built your throne, did he stop screaming?"

They both know that isn't true—he's still screaming now.

Not because of Xie Lian. Not because of his parents. Or Xianle. Or Hong-er. Not even the drought that took him.

Lang Ying.

Lang Ying did this.

It's all so pointless.

All of it. All of the suffering. The pain. The loss. Everything Xie Lian has endured, at the hands of this man's need to share his pain.

He can't see the way Lang Ying smiles, tears pouring from his eyes as he lets out a pained laugh.

"No," he admits, "but it felt so much better than doing nothing."

Xie Lian flinches in anger, opening his mouth to press the king more, to call him a fool, when—

Clink!

Something falls to the ground with a clatter, rolling across the floor, bumping against the god's toe.

Xie Lian pauses, and after a moment, he realizes, dropping to his knees, fingers fumbling out until they find—

A pearl.

A small pearl bead, fitting perfectly between his fingers. Xie Lian doesn't need his eyes to know the color, how it shines.

"...You kept this." The god whispers—remembering.

He helped Lang Ying, once.

Before Hong-er. Before he fell. Before the plague and the war.

Xie Lian tried to help him.

Xie Lian listened to him.

Xie Lian saw the man's little boy, he—

He looked.

And Lang Ying cursed him anyway.

"...I should have thanked you," the king rasps, "for the pearl."

Xie Lian doesn't look up, clutching the earring so tightly between his fingers that they begin to ache.

"If you had...given it to me sooner..." The prince's eyes well up with tears. "...Things would have been different."

Xie Lian clutches the pearl to his chest. How?

He gave the pearl to Lang Ying the day that he met him. The moment he found out about the man's suffering. How could things have been different for Xie Lian?!

"...I hate you," he whispers.

Xie Lian gave both earrings in this set away, in one way or another. Once willingly, to a man who turned around and cursed him.

Once unwillingly, to the boy who followed him faithfully. Then knowingly, allowing it to burn with him on his funeral pyre.

Two pearls in a matching set, given to such different people—following such different paths.

Xie Lian feels the bead bump against Hong-er.

Eventually ending up in the same place.

"I don't hate you, your highness," Lang Ying rasps, his breaths rattling.

The prince freezes.

"After my boy died..." the crying is softer now, weaker, "you were the only one that was kind to me."

Xie Lian lifts his head slowly, staring at the man before him blindly, dumbfounded. "I always...thought of you as a friend."

Silence.

No crying. No screaming.

Just silence.

A friend?

He—?

Xie Lian chokes, shoulders shaking with something between rage, disbelief, and sorrow.

"HOW COULD YOU SAY THAT?!" He shouts, nails cutting into his palms.

"Your highness—"

"AFTER EVERYTHING YOU DID TO ME, HOW COULD YOU SAY THAT?!" The body falls to the floor with a thump, and Xie Lian falls silent.

Behind him, Wu Ming's voice is quiet, cautious, "Your highness—he's already dead."

He—?

Xie Lian shudders, twisting the pearl between his fingers.

He used the spiritual energy up already? He—but he—

Xie Lian had more to say. More to do. How he—how could he be dead?! That—

He feels like a child again, running into his mothers arms, wailing after losing a game to Feng Xin again. He was always bigger than Xie Lian, even when they were small. Stronger. Faster.

'No Fair! '

He would cry as she lifted him into his arms, burying her face in her dress.

'It's not fair!'

She would always comfort him—but his father was much more stern, grabbing him by the shoulders.

'Stop whining! He's just better than you are right now.' The prince shudders.

'If you want to win next time—just work harder!'

Xie Lian can't work harder. He already tried. He—

He tried SO hard, and there was never a point.

It's not until he looks up that he notices the sound of a saber rattling through the air, chopping the body into pieces.

Until it's completely unrecognizable. Not human. Not even an animal. Just a mass of flesh, bone, and torn fabric.

Xie Lian doesn't move from his place on the floor, wrapping his arms around himself, shivering.

"...I didn't tell you to do that," he mutters, almost irritated.

When he's finished, Wu Ming returns to his side, kneeling, his head bowed low. "Dianxia didn't need to dirty his hands with such a creature," the ghost replies.

"..." Underneath his mask, Xie Lian's face contorts.

His palm tingles, where it wrapped around Wu Ming's throat.

"...I'm sorry," he spits the words out, shocked that he could feel apologetic for anything now, but he does. "I shouldn't have done that."

Wu Ming doesn't ask the calamity what he means, his posture unchanging, "It was an honor, to be useful to dianxia."

Xie Lian flinches.

He remembers someone else, who served him once. With such loyalty and dignity.

'I'm sorry...that I couldn't be more useful to you, your highness.'

The memory of those words aches more now, as time passes.

Xie Lian shakes his head, his voice thick with self loathing.

“I still shouldn’t have done it,” he repeats, swallowing hard. “I’ve never taken very good care of the people who follow me.”

The sorrow in his final words is profound. It brings a cold with it, like a rattling wind, chilling Xie Lian to the bone.

After a pause, the black clad youth replies, “...If it would soothe dianxia’s conscience, this servant could make a request.”

“...” The God turns his head in Wu Ming’s direction, “...A request?” He questions slowly.

“A reward,” the ghost confirms with a nod.

Xie Lian is hesitant at first, distrustful—but slowly, he nods. “...There isn’t much I’m capable of giving now,” he sighs, “but if it’s something I can give, name it.”

Wu Ming’s voice is softer now, filled with an emotion Xie Lian can’t fathom; “I would never ask for something beyond dianxia’s power.”

Xie Lian supposes he should feel grateful—or maybe ashamed, that this soldier is giving him so much, and the only thing Xie Lian can give him in return is suffering.

“Name it, Wu Ming.”

There’s soft rustling as the young man moves closer, asking quietly—“Your hand.”

The god’s brow furrows.

“Could dianxia give this servant his hand, for a moment?”

Xie Lian’s confusion only grows—but it’s such a simple request, how could he deny him?

He complies slowly, lifting his palm out in front of him. Quickly, so easily, gloved fingers grasp his wrist, bringing the god’s arm forward. So gently that Xie Lian never feels a moment of worry, but—

He doesn’t realize that Wu Ming took off his mask until he feels his lips.

Cool to the touch, pressing a kiss against the pack of the prince’s knuckles.

The gentlest kiss that Xie Lian has ever been given, barely even a whisper of a touch at first—then firmer, slightly more lingering when he realizes the god isn’t shrinking away with disgust.

In spite of everything, Xie Lian’s heart pounds, rattling against his ribs.

He can’t remember the last time someone touched him, and he wasn’t afraid. He can’t remember the last time someone touched him, and he didn’t pray for it to end.

His fingers squeeze around Wu Ming’s.

"...This is all you wanted?" Xie Lian whispers, his voice trembling. "After all of that?"

Wu Ming presses another kiss against his skin, softer, almost like he didn't mean to do it, like it was something he indulged in.

For just a moment, Xie Lian's chest tenses with anxiety.

He remembers that man in the woods. The things that he wanted. How angry he became, when Xie Lian changed his mind. He remembers those men in the temple. The things they wanted to take from him, when he couldn't fight back.

Is that what Wu Ming wants? And if it is...

...would Xie Lian be willing to give it to him? He thinks—he thinks he —

Wu Ming lifts his head, and the moment those lips leave him, Xie Lian's chest feels a painful tug. Like he doesn't want it to end. Like he wants to feel that kindness—for just a little longer.

"It's the most this servant could ever hope for," Wu Ming answers quietly, slipping his mask back into place. "Thank you, dianxia."

It feels like a small thing. Such a small thing, in comparison to how cruel Xie Lian knows he's being. How ungrateful.

Why would he...?

"U—Uncle?"

Xie Lian doesn't let go of his hand, slowly turning his head, following the sound of the voice. It sounds like a child—low, horrified.

"UNCLE?! WHAT—WHAT HAPPENED?!"

Guards—the ones that have been left alive, start calling out in turn, screaming—

Ghosts. There are ghosts here.

Wu Ming helps Xie Lian to his feet, and the god almost smiles.

He supposes he is a ghost, now. There's no practical difference between him and then.

He has no loved ones. He's forgotten, invisible to most. Causes hatred and fear in those who do know him.

And he can't die.

"...Burn this place," he murmurs, his hand slipping from Wu Ming's as he walks forward, not bothering to raise his guard.

No one will touch him now.

Wu Ming bows his head, clasping one hand over his chest, twisting his fingers around one strand of his ponytail.

Toying with something braided into long, silken pieces of raven hair. A small bead.

"...Yes, sir." He murmurs.

Xie Lian is slow, making his way down the halls.

He knows the way, now. Can hear the screams of battle. The heat from the flames as they begin to grow and hiss.

He walks through the halls. Listens as the golden murals crack and crumble. As people try to stop the flames, to save the structure before it's damaged beyond repair.

Don't they know?

Xie Lian stops for a moment, on the bridge leading to the palace gates, looking back.

Golden palaces always end up falling down, in the end.

That's the point.

It's the natural consequence of building them.

He's so distracted by it, he doesn't hear the sound of someone rushing towards him. So quick, so fast, even Wu Ming doesn't seem to...

Well, actually—that's Xie Lian's fault. He sent the ghost off to burn the place to the ground.

"YOU DAMN MONSTER!" The soldier shouts right in front of Xie Lian's face—the sound so startling, that the god takes a stumbling step back, just as the young man shoves him—hard.

Monster?

Xie Lian whips his head around, listening closely, breathing in. Did Bai Wuxiang come back? Is he here now? Why would he be—? Oh.

Xie Lian doesn't know the edge of the bridge is there until he's tumbling over the side of it, plummeting into the ravine it covers.

That's—

That's just him. He's the monster.

The air whistles past him—and he can't even bring himself to be afraid of the pain he'll feel, upon landing. Only irritated by the time it will take for his body to pull itself back together.

Then, Xie Lian isn't falling anymore.

There's a set of arms around him, cradling the god like something infinitely precious —a treasure made of glass. The front of his armor is hard in places—but Xie Lian's cheek presses against the gap, feeling the soft fabric of the shirt he wears beneath.

Cold, but comforting.

It smells like the forest after it rains. Soft, wild, but clean.

There's a rush of air around them, and when Xie Lian shudders, waiting for them both to be crushed by the landing, those arms hold him closer, and there's a whisper —

"Don't be scared."

Oh.

His throat aches.

Xie Lian isn't afraid. A little relieved, when Wu Ming lands on his feet. Winded, when the ghost jumps, clearing the bridge again in one leap, his god still carefully clutched in his arms.

But he is sad.

So unbearably sad, remembering a time when he wasn't the one falling.

Remembering how frightened Hong-er was back then, trembling as Xie Lian continued the fight with the boy in his arms.

It seems so silly now, that the prince didn't stop the parade all together, right then and there.

Back then, he was the one saying, 'Don't be scared.'

The arms around him clutch him a little closer, and Xie Lian squeezes his eyes tight, his breaths unsteady.

He doesn't want to think about Hong-er. Not anymore. It's too connected to every other part of him, all of the things that Xie Lian doesn't want to feel.

It hurts.

After what Bai Wuxiang did, it's the only part of him left that still hurts.

But after this is done—Xie Lian thinks he might be free of it.

He doubts Jun Wu will let him walk free, after he does this. More likely than not, he'll be too dangerous to be allowed to exist.

"...Put me down," he whispers, his voice lacking the strength he desperately wants to project.

Wu Ming doesn't comment—only obeys, carefully setting the god on his feet.

"Where would you like to go next, dianxia?"

"..." Xie Lian sinks to his knees after a moment, thinking.

He already knows the answer—and he also knows that, one way or the other, it will be their final destination.

Oddly enough, after a life as famous and complicated as his, Xie Lian can't think of any other loose ends he wants to tie up. He has no family left.

Mu Qing doesn't want anything to do with him. Feng Xin—he's probably alone and miserable somewhere, blaming himself for Xie Lian's own failings.

Ironically enough, the only person left that knows him well enough to give Xie Lian a meaningful goodbye is the white clothed calamity

And he's sure that one will show up, before Xie Lian faces some final form of punishment.

All of the regrets he has—they can't be undone, either. There's nothing left. Except... Except for one thing, actually.

Something that occurred to him before, in the throne room.

"...Wu Ming," he murmurs, slipping his mask off of his face. The air feels almost like a relief against his skin, like he can finally breathe again, even if it's strained.

"Yes, dianxia?"

"...Come here," the god's voice is quiet—and the black clad youth kneels immediately.

Xie Lian reaches out, feeling with his fingers until they come across the surface of Wu Ming's mask. Hard—perfectly smooth. They trail to the side, finding the ledge, fingers hooking around—and he half expects the ghost to stop him from removing it, but he doesn't.

He waits.

Xie Lian is quiet for a moment, heart beating unsteadily in his chest. "Could you..."

Wu Ming watches the god's expression, the way his mouth trembles, then sets with resolve.

"Could you do that again?"

"..." The youth tilts his head, about to ask—

"Kiss me, again."

Xie Lian can't see the eyes that widen, pupils dilating with shock. Can't see the mouth that parts slightly, then shuts.

He feels fingers grasping at his own, lifting his hand up—and just before those lips brush his knuckles the prince speaks again, voice wobbling;

"Not there."

Xie Lian spent the entire walk back from that temple wondering about the small mercies Bai Wuxiang showed him, and why. He still doesn't understand why the demon changed his clothes, combed his hair. Maybe it was intended to arouse Feng Xin's suspicions, but...

When Xie Lian thinks of the man that started to reach between his thighs, before Bai Wuxiang let the ghost fire take his life—

(Thinking of the ghost fire is so difficult now too, so painful.)

Xie Lian couldn't understand why, out of every other agony he was subjected to...

Why spare him from that? Why show that small amount of mercy?

But he understands why, now.

'Eventually, you'll come to my side.'

Xie Lian is starting to think that meant...more than what he originally understood. It places the moment he wore Feng Xin's face in a new light.

If Feng Xin had actually been Xie Lian's first kiss, his only kiss, the god wouldn't have minded that. It would have felt fitting, in a way.

Part of him wants to count that moment with the ghost fire but...how could he?

And now, it feels like Bai Wuxiang simply relished in the knowledge that he stole that from him. That's what it feels like. As though someone reached deep in and clawed out his insides, leaving him hollowed out and numb, like a lantern without a light.

Xie Lian was slow.

He was a slow learner, back then. But he learned.

And he knows better now, than to think it's over. Than to think that Bai Wuxiang won't try to take more from him in the future. And when he does, he'll relish in the knowledge that Xie Lian didn't want to share it.

That he was the first, and the only.

Xie Lian waits, heart skipping around in his chest, his hand wracked with tremors in Wu Ming's grip. The youth holds him so lightly, not immediately responding or obeying. Not like before.

But he doesn't recoil, or push Xie Lian away.

"…" The god pulls his hand back, and by extension, Wu Ming's with it, bringing his fingers to his lips. "Here," he murmurs, hearing a sharp intake of breath.

"Kiss me here."

It's fine, right?

He touches Xie Lian with the sort of longing that implies desire.

He must want to, right?

Xie Lian waits, shivering, to see what the ghost will do.

Is it not a tempting offer, the way it may have been in the past? Maybe not, after the things the ghost has seen Xie Lian do. Is he not desirable?

Has he finally stopped being beautiful?

Part of him almost hopes that's true. Maybe then, no one will want anything from him anymore. Maybe then, people won't try so hard to take things away. Maybe—

Those fingers slip from his wrist—and the moment Xie Lian feels shame rise in his chest, expecting…him to…

Before, when Xie Lian said those things in front of Qi Rong…Wu Ming…didn't react badly. When he kissed Xie Lian's hand, the prince…he thought—

The Ghost leans forward, and Xie Lian's breaths halt, hands falling down into his lap, struggling to stay still—

He feels lips.

Not where he asked for them, but pressed against his forehead. Soft, so careful.

Xie Lian's lower lip wobbles, and his breathing resumes, this time ragged, unsure if this is a gentle way of saying no, or…

Wu Ming's mouth moves down—slow. Xie Lian's breaths come faster.

It takes the prince a moment to realize that the ghost is intentionally giving him a chance to change his mind, making sure the kiss doesn't come out of nowhere—that Xie Lian—

His eyes are shut, but they sting.

...He doesn't want Xie Lian to be afraid.

'Don't be scared.'

His nose is cold, when it bumps against Xie Lian's—but not in the way one might associate with a ghost. It makes him think of winter mornings, rushing out to look for snow, breath fogging in front of his lips.

Nights spent cupping his hands over his mouth, breathing heat into his palms, missing summer afternoons, staying out too late, his mother calling him back inside, telling him to stop running so fast—to stop chasing butterflies.

His skin is cold, but every brush brings nostalgia.

Their mouths are level, then—those fingers lightly grasping his jaw, tilting him up, and Xie Lian feels Wu Ming stop one more time, giving him one last chance to say no, but—

The prince is the one who leans forward with a soft sound of anxious impatience, closing the gap.

Oh.

Xie Lian knows technically, you're probably supposed to kiss with your eyes closed. Honestly, he can't tell the difference—but it's likely somewhat disturbing for the person on the other end of it.

But for a moment, he's just staring ahead blankly, dazed.

It doesn't hurt.

The press of Wu Ming's mouth is soft, careful—despite Xie Lian's anxious, clumsy way of initiating. Not pressing for more—and the prince can't imagine that the ghost would, he probably has no idea what Xie Lian was thinking when he made the request, but...

Xie Lian closes his eyes, not necessarily deepening the kiss, but melting into it, relaxing completely in the young man's hold, and something about that...draws a reaction.

Subtle, but the grip on his jaw is slightly more firm, and one lip slides between his, drawing a small gasp

Those fingers tighten again, digging into his skin—but not unpleasantly. No—no, Xie Lian, he...

His stomach drops slightly when he feels the ghost starting to pull away, frantically thinking—

No.

The prince presses closer, arms blindly sliding around Wu Ming's neck. Please—

An arm wraps around his back, long fingers spreading there, steadying him as Xie Lian clings around Wu Ming's neck, thinking—

'Just a little longer.'

And finally, he feels the ghost ease into it as well, sinking deeper, holding Xie Lian closer.

'Just a little bit longer.'

The Crown Prince's first kiss wasn't actually much of a kiss at all. It was a trick. In the years, no, centuries that follow—he'll come to understand that it's as a form of assault.

This, however, feels like a choice. One that Xie Lian made on his own. One that doesn't hurt.

It's...

Wu Ming's hair is soft under his fingers, like silk. His mouth is firm against Xie Lian's now, but never trying to take anything, just—

Just enjoying him, without asking for more.

Xie Lian's heart squeezes with uncertain, painful euphoria.

Good—this—

This is good .

And there are so many things that he knows he'll never have.

Xie Lian knows that he'll never hold the person he wanted. He'll never marry, or have a family of his own. He'll never be admired and loved the way he once was.

There are so many words Xie Lian will never hear.

So many memories that he'll never have. So many other kinds of touches, experiences, and feelings, but…

He'll have this. This moment—it'll always belong to him, even if…

Slowly, Xie Lian pulls back, arms still loosely wrapped around Wu Ming's neck, and… he bites his lip.

"…I'm sorry," he mutters, his breaths still uneven, cheeks flushed. "I shouldn't have…" The prince swallows thickly, placing one hand on Wu Ming's chest as he pushes himself away, "I shouldn't have done that."

The Ghost lets him retreat, but keeps a hand on his back.

"Dianxia hasn't done anything wrong," Wu Ming assured him quietly—but his voice is different. Slightly breathless and uneven, and it only makes Xie Lian feel—

"This servant was happy to be useful to him."

"…" His lips tremble slightly.

That's just the problem.

Wu Ming isn't here because he had that sort of desire for Xie Lian to begin with. He's here because—

Because he was a soldier of Xianle, and he wants to serve his prince. Because he died for his country, which in turn forgot him, and he wants revenge.

He isn't here for this.

But he did it anyway, because Xie Lian asked it of him. And the prince—he can't help but think—

He keeps remembering what he was thinking, when someone kissed him with Feng Xin's face. How petrified and sad he was—but how he didn't want his friend to leave.

Was that what Wu Ming was feeling, just now? Was that why he was so hesitant, so careful, even when he pulled Xie Lian closer? Is he—

Xie Lian's lips tremble as he looks away, caught between the exhilaration of taking something back for himself, and the guilt of knowing...

He might have taken something away from Wu Ming in the process. He might—

He might have done the same thing as Bai Wuxiang.

He—How could he—?

Slowly, the ghost lifts the mask back over his face—Xie Lian can hear the sounds of it sliding back into place.

"If it would ease his highness's conscience," the ghost murmurs, repeating the same words he said before—but in such a different context now, "this servant could make a request of him."

Xie Lian nods, forcing himself into a state of numbness, lips still tingling. "Name it."

At first, he doubts there's anything he could offer that would make up for the way he's used Wu Ming. Callously, without thought, but—

There's a hand over his, squeezing softly, with a kindness Xie Lian knows that he doesn't deserve.

"Let me be the one to do it."

Xie Lian pauses, his eyebrows knitting together with confusion. "...Do it?" He questions, slightly unsure of what he—

"Release the Human Face Disease."

The lead weight in Xie Lian's gut sinks even deeper.

Oh.

"...You want to do it yourself?" He questions, looking away.

"Yes," the ghost replies, his hand still squeezing Xie Lian's. "The people of Yong'an brought suffering to the person that's precious to me."

Xie Lian's chin dips slightly as the young man speaks.

"It would please me, to be the one who unleashes this upon them."

Xie Lian pulls his hand away, clutching his fingers against his chest.

"...No," he mutters. "it has to be me."

Wu Ming doesn't respond, just watches him from behind a blank, smiling mask.

"You'll have to think of something else."

Even now, there's no protests from the ghost.

"...As dianxia wishes," he replies, slowly rising to his feet, helping his god rise up as he does so.

Xie Lian doesn't pick up the mask again, just stares blankly down at his own hand, wondering what it must look like, holding Wu Ming's.

"Aren't you going to ask?"

Wu Ming tilts his head, replying, "After." Those fingers curl around his one more time, squeezing gently. "This servant will ask dianxia after he finishes his work."

Xie Lian squeezes his eyes shut, nodding.

Good, that's—that's good. Then, he can give Wu Ming whatever he asks.

After a pause, the youth asks, "Where would dianxia like to go now?"

To the end, Xie Lian thinks. To where all of this started.

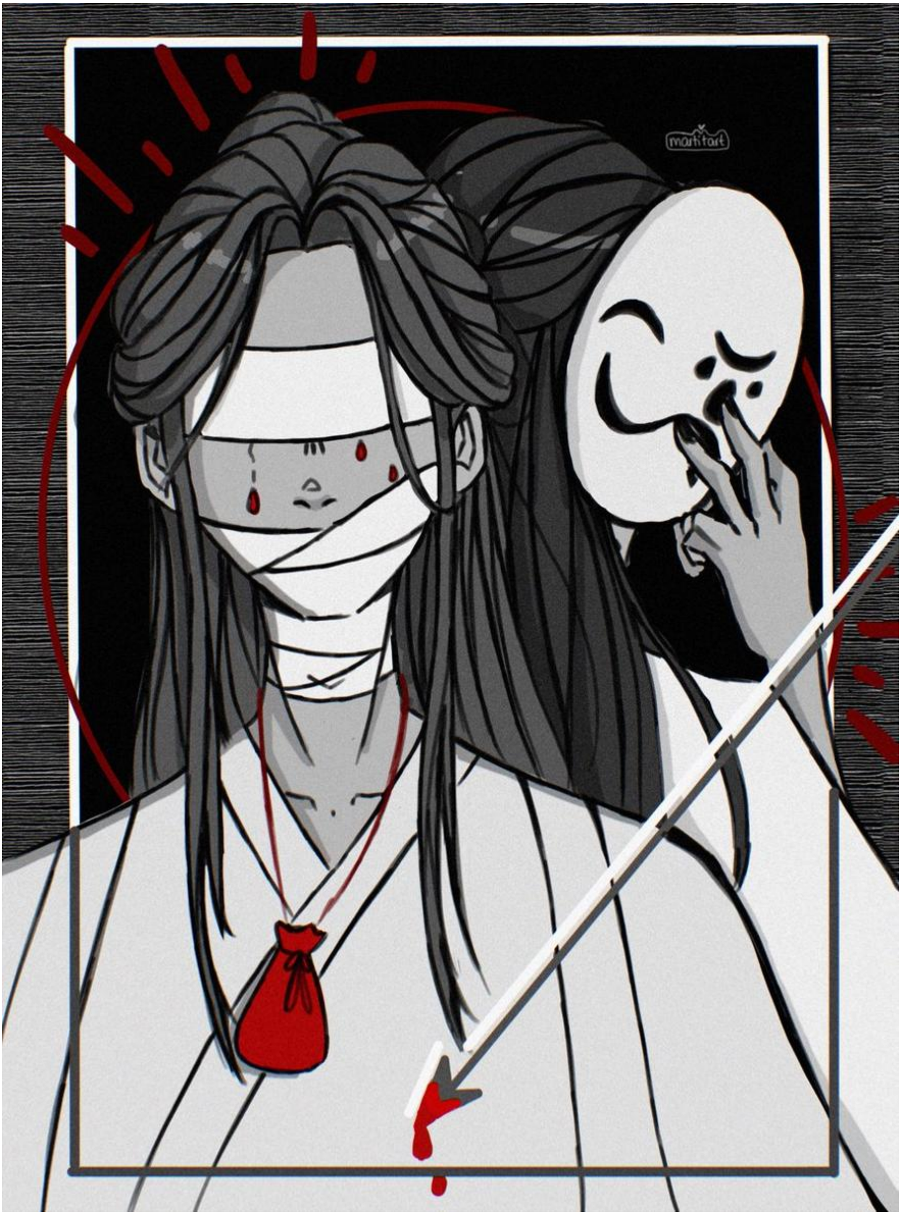
"...Lang-er bay," he responds, his voice suddenly cold. "Take me to Lang-er bay."

Again, Wu Ming leads him down the path.

"Yes, your highness."

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

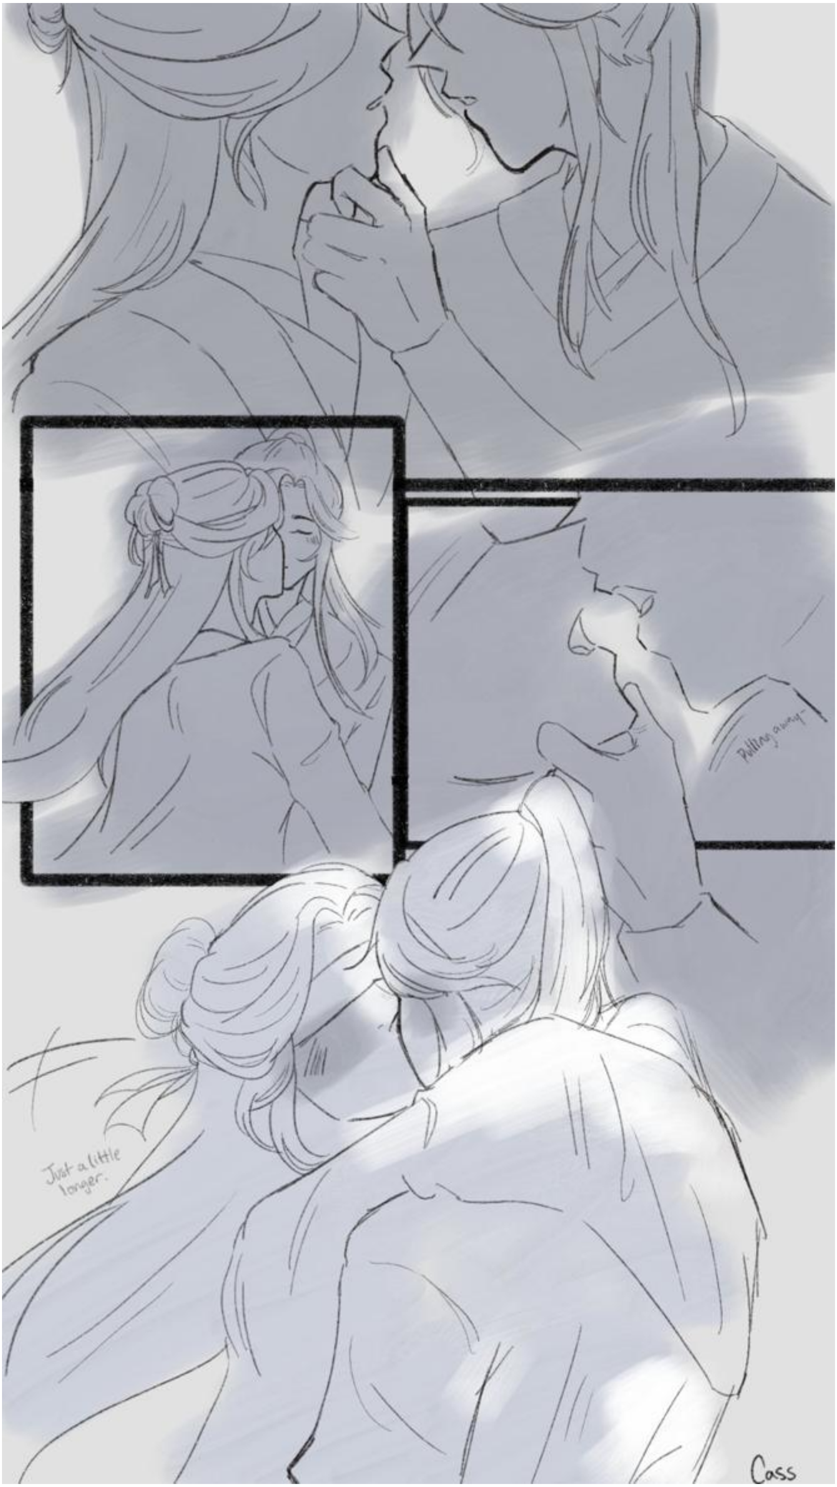
Each piece is included with express permission from the artist. Do not reproduce or use in any way.



CREDIT: MARTA , support the artwork HERE

@JUNKY ARTIST

CREDIT: Junky Artist, support the art HERE



Pulling away~
Just a little longer.
Cass

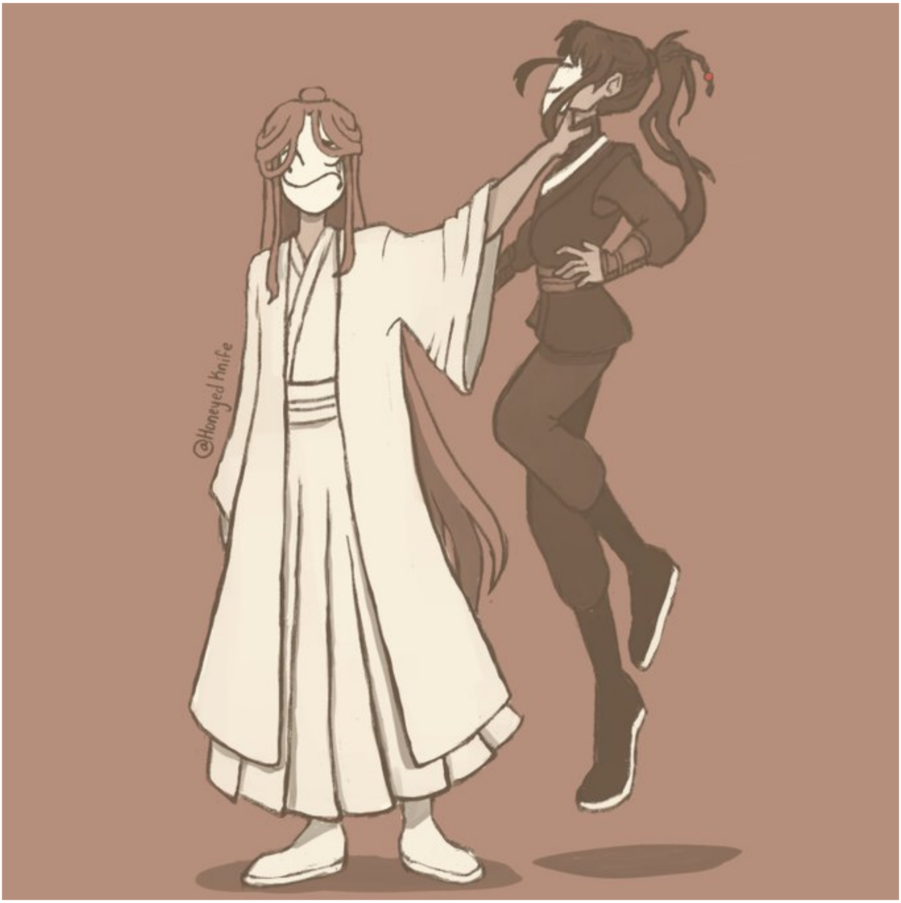
CREDIT: Musing Lotus , support the artwork HERE

[image]

CREDIT: REN, support the artwork HERE

CREDIT: LAKITSUNE , support the artwork HERE

tw// kinda violent? maybe nsfw? 100% funny



@Honeyed Knife

DO NOT GET HORNY.
DO NOT GET HORNY
DO NOT GET HORNY
DO NOT GET HORNY
DO NOT GET HORNY

CREDIT: HONEY , support the artwork HERE

Chapter End Notes

Thank you so much to all of the artists who have made such beautiful pieces for this story! The response has been incredible, and you all motivate me so much and are so amazing for my creativity! And thank you also to everyone who has been supporting the story on twitter. Ya'll are the reason I can write at the pace I do, and you make it so much fun!

Big thanks to Marta, Ren, Honey, Cass, Lakitsune, and JunkyArtist for allowing their work to be included in this chapter! They are extremely talented, and we're all lucky in the TGCF fandom to have so many amazing artists that are constantly sharing their work with us for free! Please go and support them in any way you can, it's very much deserved! ❤

Thank you all for continuing to read / support this story here and on twitter, your comments and kudos are appreciated, I'm very grateful! 🙇

xoxo, Evie 💋

A Slow Learner

Chapter Summary

The rain stops.

That's what Xie Lian thinks, at first, until he feels the weight on his head—slight, but solid, stopping the rain from soaking him any further.

A bamboo hat.

The prince freezes for a moment, then looks up with a glare, unable to see that the merchant is glaring right back at him. "What are you looking at me like that for?! It's just a little yelling. How is that worth getting so upset over?"

"..." Xie Lian pauses, unable to answer.

"...I didn't realize you were blind," the man admits, scratching the back of his head, his voice clearly a little sheepish. "You should've said something."

Chapter Notes

tw// VIOLENCE, SELF HARM, kind of...? Character death? Depending on how you look at it. HEAVY spoilers for book 4.

You can find me on twitter and keep up with current updates of the story HERE

This story also has some spotify playlists for those who want some fun listening while reading!

No Paths Are Bound: The Playlist
Calamity Xie Lian: The Playlist
The Wu Ming Playlist

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The journey feels shorter than it probably should, with Wu Ming gently guiding his god by the elbow, Xie Lian contemplating the things that he has done.

He murdered someone.

Xie Lian has killed before, on a battlefield. That was different. An expected aspect of war.

The men he killed—he never knew their names. Never took pleasure in their suffering. There was a level of impersonality to it.

Not with Qi Rong.

Xie Lian enjoyed that. Still feels a satisfied pinch of glee when he thinks about it now.

He would have murdered Lang Ying, given the chance—tormented him.

But he didn't feel any better, shrieking in the king's face. Didn't feel any closer, when he heard Lang Ying's desperate cries of grief.

You can smash a mirror, but you can't change the reflection.

When they arrive in Lang-er bay, the prince feels the sea breeze against his cheek. The scent of rain, only recently ceased.

How much he went through, to give this place rain.

Xie Lian stops walking.

He listens to the sound of the ocean waves, of children laughing and playing.

The sun is warm on his face, his eyes comfortably shielded from the light they cannot see by Ruoye, wrapped around the upper part of his face.

"...Does dianxia need to find a place to—?"

"I know where I'm going to do it," Xie Lian mutters.

Wu Ming falls silent, waiting.

Xie Lian takes in the sounds of this city. The smells. The thousands of lives, all floating around him at once.

And they're all so happy.

How, how could they ever possibly be happy, in a world like this?

It fills the crown prince with frustrated, vengeful sorrow.

And doubt.

"...Dianx—?"

"Three days," Xie Lian mutters, pulling his hand from Wu Ming's hold. "I'll release it in three days."

The ghost tilts his head, watching him—then nods.

"Yes, your highness."

This, the ghost seems reluctant to do—but he has never once disobeyed an order.

“Stay away, until then.”

He doesn’t disobey now, either—even if he dislikes the idea.

The crown prince stands alone, waiting, listening to the sound of Wu Ming’s footsteps fading into the din of the city streets.

It’s easier to think clearly when the ghost isn’t beside him. To be cold, and cruel—the way that he wants to be.

Xie Lian doesn’t view it as an act of mercy, not really—more as a search for justification.

Even as they go about their lives, pray to their gods, and raise their children—they do so on the rubble of what was once his.

When he walks to the side of the road, lifting fangxin from his side, he thinks that they’ll show him exactly who they are.

Hypocrites—people who are no better or worse than those they replaced. That they have no right to scorn him.

This isn’t Xie Lian’s first time doing this.

He’s run himself through with a sword before—but back then, the act left him screaming in agony on the floor of a cave, trembling from the effort it took not to beg the young soldier protecting him to seek out help.

It hurts still, but in a distant way. Like it’s happening to someone else.

He collapses into the ground, the force of the fall creating a small crater underneath him, and he cries out—

“Help!”

A soft voice, weak, but clear, crying out against a cacophony of sound.

Xie Lian hears people pause, knows that they hear

But each time someone approaches, questioning—people start to recognize him.

Xie Lian took off the mask, after all.

His eyes are closed, hiding the shackle—but Ruoye is wrapped around the hilt of fangxin.

‘ That...is that the crown prince?’

They even say his name warily.

As though misfortune and suffering is something that could become contagious. That even acknowledging the fallen god could infect them.

They’ll catch something soon, but it won’t be Xie Lian’s bad luck.

‘Is...is no one really going to help him?’

‘Are you kidding?!’ A voice scoffs. ‘Do you think we’re crazy?! He's the god of misfortune! If we touch him, what kind of luck does that bring down on us!’

A god of misfortune.

Xie Lian stares blankly against the insides of his eyelids.

There’s one thing about that moniker that has never made sense.

Xie Lian wasn’t actually that unlucky until he fell. That came from the shackle. When he was a god, he...

The prince frowns, fingers playing lightly in the dirt beneath him, wishing that it was a grave.

What was he the god of, anyway?

Battle? Surely not.

Wealth, maybe?

That was what people prayed for the most. Wealth, good health—and children.

Given what he's about to do, Xie Lian doesn't know if he has any strong claim to a past as a medicinal god. And while people often prayed for wealth, those weren't the prayers he paid close attention to.

When Xie Lian thinks back, he tasked Mu Qing and Feng Xin with those. He wasn't actually listening to those who prayed to him directly, most of the time.

That's the most depressing thing about becoming a God. You learn just how rarely they're actually listening.

Xie Lian spends his first day thinking on that, listening as a stall merchant tries to bring him something to drink, only to be stopped by his wife each time.

Maybe the disease will come for her face first, the god thinks nastily. She's already hideous on the inside.

When Xie Lian thinks back on it, the prayers he actually granted were… To people like Lang Ying. The people of Yong'an. The…

Bitterness and anger fills him, at the unfairness of it all.

'No fair!' He used to cry, weeping and reaching for his mother. 'It's not fair!'

But then, he remembers something else.

Even at the height of his power, there were still some shrines in disrepair. One had a divine statue missing the flower traditionally held in his right fist.

A little boy brought him a fresh, perfectly formed blossom. Every single day.

He keeps telling himself that he doesn't want to think of Hong-er. That it hurts too much. Reminds him of a past that has become too painful to bear.

But when they were on the road from the imperial city to Lang-er bay, Xie Lian noticed something—a flower, tucked behind his ear.

He questioned Wu Ming about it then, startled and angry—and the ghost feigned ignorance, repeating that he wasn't sure what Xie Lian meant.

It was hard, then, for the god to fight back tears—because somehow, he just knew that the petals were as white as snow.

And Xie Lian knows that his companion is gone. That the chain around his neck carries all that's left. But in that moment, it felt like the boy was right beside him, trying to tell him—

Trying to tell him not to do this.

The flower is still in Xie Lian's hair, even now.

If gods are what their most devoted believers associate them with, then Xie Lian would be a god of flowers.

The hand that isn't wrapped around fanxgin's hilt reaches up to his ear, stroking over the petals softly.

He almost smiles.

He would be a god of orphans. Of hope. Of campfire stories and meat buns, split in half to share. A god of weaving.

Wu Ming's beloved used to weave too. He admitted that, on their walk to Lang-er Bay, when Xie Lian felt a string tied around one of the ghost's fingers.

He explained that they—man or woman, Xie Lian isn't sure, he never used specific language—would often keep track of which threads were which by tying them around the young man's fingers as they worked.

Xie Lian used to do that with Hong-er, since he could never see the colors.

More often than not, the boy would insist on including red, which would make the god smile, agreeing each time.

Xie Lian can't remember when he stopped weaving, or why.

He knows, upon contemplation, that he isn't a god of misfortune. It might stalk him wherever he goes, but...

That's his curse. Not his godhood.

On the second day, someone does approach—but not to offer assistance.

“...What on earth are you doing?” A voice drawls, half annoyed, half bemused.

Xie Lian glares at the sky, briefly opening his eyes, the shackle pattern within his irises gleaming up at Bai Wuxiang in anger.

“Go away. You’re boring.”

The calamity smirks, crossing his arms over his chest, shifting his weight onto one foot.

He’s wearing the face of a wealthy young lord today, handsome, wearing robes of jade and green, hair pulled away with his face by fine golden ornaments. Girls sigh fondly as they walk by—and merchants grumble that the young man is bothering with the fallen god.

“Childish.”

Xie Lian knows his voice, anyway. It doesn’t matter what face he wears, or what clothes he decides to wrap himself in. Xie Lian can’t be distracted by any of that.

It makes no difference to him, after all.

“That’s right,” Xie Lian drawls, folding his hands behind his head. “I’m a childish good for nothing,” he yawns, stretching his legs, like it doesn’t even hurt when the movement jostles the blade in his chest. “You should probably just give up on me already. It’s getting sad.”

“...” The calamity’s eyebrows slowly raise, lips parting in disbelief. “I’ll never leave you, your highness.”

Pah .

Xie Lian rolls his eyes, crossing his ankles.

What more can he do, than what he’s already done? Kill the distant cousins that Xie Lian doesn’t even remember? Torture him some more?

Fine. It’s all boring now, anyway.

“Weren’t you the one that was always insulting my followers?” Xie

Lian mutters, “Telling me how foolish and stupid they were?”

How stupid Hong-er was.

“What does that make you, then?”

For the first time, Bai Wuxiang doesn’t seem to know how to answer.

The crown prince yawns.

“Whatever,” he sighs, toying with the flower behind his ear. “If you’re going to be a stalker, do it from a distance. You’re blocking my sun.”

Not that he’s getting much of a tan, exactly. Or that the sword impaling his chest implies that was ever his intention to begin with.

To his credit, even when Bai Wuxiang hops directly into the crater with him, standing over him, Xie Lian doesn’t flinch. His breaths stay the same.

He isn’t afraid.

If you’re forced to live with something long enough, nothing can stay frightening forever.

Not even Bai Wuxiang.

“...No one is going to help you, you know.” The calamity muses, his shadow covering Xie Lian’s face. “Why bother with them?”

Xie Lian scoffs, flicking a pebble towards the calamity’s boot with his fingers, even blind, it lands with a dull thud.

“None of your damn business.”

He mutters, flicking his bangs out of his face.

Bai Wuxiang won’t do anything to him. He’ll just manipulate him into some new, even more devastating mistake. Given the fact that the crown prince is currently on the verge of releasing a plague in order to warrant execution...

Well. Xie Lian isn’t exactly worried about that right now. He’ll cross that bridge when he comes to it, or Jun Wu will obliterate him first.

Either way, Bai Wuxiang isn’t very important to the outcome at the moment.

It’s the first encounter they’ve had that doesn’t end with Xie Lian screaming.

Ha.

Xie Lian wiggles his head when the calamity walks away, mimicking a silent, annoyed little cheer.

Consider that growth, after all this time. Good for him. Xie Lian feels it, when the sun sets.

The third day comes, and as the morning hours tick by, Xie Lian listens to the merchant trying again, to bring him a cup of water. Listens again as his wife smacks him upside the head, calling him an old fool.

Xie Lian agrees.

Showing kindness in this world—it makes one a fool.

Finally, he knows the sun must be on the verge of setting—because that voice is back. That shadow is over him—and a hand wraps around the hilt of fangxin, unsheathing the blade from Xie Lian’s chest.

“I don’t know what you expected,” Bai Wuxiang murmurs.

“Has anyone else ever helped you before?”

Xie Lian doesn’t answer him, slowly sitting up.

He never expected anyone to help. That wasn’t the point.

This creature wouldn’t understand that, and Xie Lian doesn’t bother explaining. It’s been raining for hours now, and he’s cold.

He wants to be done with it now.

The god grips the edge of the hole he’s dug himself into, pulling himself up, and just as he crawls back onto the street, blood still streaming from the wound in his chest— someone smacks into him, hard, landing on the ground with a thud.

Xie Lian tips forward, hands catching himself against the cobblestones—and he feels something sharp beneath his fingers. Grains of rice, slowly becoming soaked by the rain.

"…" The trades man on the ground beside him sits up with a groan, "Oh, HELL! Look what you did!"

He scrambles around, trying to stop any more rice from flooding out of the basket he was carrying, his bamboo hat slipping from his head, dangling from the cord around his neck—but it's no use.

"…FUCK!" He curses, sitting back and crossing his arms over his chest. "Wasted!"

He turns to glare at the young man, still sitting on his hands and knees in the middle of the road, throwing his hands up, "Do you have ANY IDEA how hard it is to earn that much rice? In THIS ECONOMY?!"

The youth doesn't lift his head, and he doesn't answer. The stranger fumes.

"Oh, so now you're just gonna SIT THERE?! You're not even gonna apologize or PAY ME BACK?!"

Xie Lian's nails scrape onto the cobblestones below teeth clenching. Oh, he'll pay him back, alright.

"WHAT WERE YOU EVEN TRYING TO DO, LAYING IN THE STREET LIKE THAT?!"

The man shouts, gesturing around him angrily, arms flapping like an incensed bird. "Were you waiting for SOMEONE TO RUN OVER YOU OR SOMETHING?!"

"Yes," Xie Lian mutters, his voice flat.

"…" The middle age man stops awkwardly, his arms still aloft, like he hadn't expected that.

"Well," he mutters, trying to get back to what—what he was—ah, right, right—

"IF YOU'RE GONNA KILL YOURSELF, AT LEAST BE CONSIDERATE, YOU LITTLE SHIT!" He howls, picking up his basket, placing it on his hip, "And DON'T MAKE TROUBLE FOR OTHERS!"

Whatever.

Xie Lian glares.

It doesn't matter. No matter how long the man howls and curses at him, trying to get the young man to pay him back, none of it matters.

It'll all be over soon, anyway. Then a bag of rice is nothing.

Eventually the man gives up with an irritated huff, stomping off.

Xie Lian stares down at the ground blankly, taking slow breaths to steady himself, the cold sinking into him, all the way to the bone.

Soaked, in a city that was once plagued by drought.

Xie Lian was cursed for trying to make it rain.

And now, not one human soul will help him.

When he opens his mouth to call Wu Ming, to tell him that the time has come... The rain stops.

That's what Xie Lian thinks, at first, until he feels the weight on his head—slight, but solid, stopping the rain from soaking him any further.

A bamboo hat.

The prince freezes for a moment, then looks up with a glare, unable to see that the merchant is glaring right back at him. "What are you looking at me like that for?! It's just a little yelling. How is that worth getting so upset over?"

"..." Xie Lian pauses, unable to answer.

"...I didn't realize you were blind," the man admits, scratching the back of his head, his voice clearly a little sheepish. "You should've said something."

The young man sits there, dumbfounded, as the man rises to his feet—pulling Xie Lian up with him.

"People don't pay attention," the farmer scolds the prince sternly, adjusting the strap under the prince's head—leaving it nice and snug, not easily jostled. "If you just sit around and get mad about no one noticing you need a hand, you'll be angry the rest of your life."

Xie Lian...he...

"It was my bad today, you don't have to pay me back for the rice," the man sighs, and Xie Lian can't see it, but it sure does sound like that fact still grieves him. “Now, go on. You’re not a child, you’re a grown man—stop glaring and go home, understand?”

He turns Xie Lian around by the shoulders, giving his back a little slap—then turns and heads on his own way without another word, a half empty, slightly dented basket of rice in his arms.

“...” Slowly, the prince reaches up, grasping the edges of the hat. Oh.

His lips wobble.

He used to cry, running to his mothers arms.

‘No fair !’ He would sob, clinging to the front of her dress. ‘It’s no fair!’

But Xie Lian never really learned that way.

‘Stop whining!’

It’s his father’s voice that he remembers now.

‘You lost because he was better than you!’

Oh.

Xie Lian’s head tips forward, his tears mixing with the drops of rain on his cheek.

‘If you want to win next time—just work harder!’

That’s what it...what it...

His fingers reach up, grasping the stone hanging around his neck, resting on a silver chain.

Xie Lian realizes.

After so long, he realizes what he has done, all this time.

His hands clap over his mouth, eyes wide, tears pouring from them so much faster now than they have in so, so long. In months, since—

Since that night, in the woods.

“I’m sorry,” he whispers, shoulders hunching in.

He said that before, falling to his knees in his own shrine, before his own believer, begging for forgiveness.

“H—” It’s been so long since he was able to say his name.

“Hong-er,” he sobs, the word wrenching from him painfully—but a good hurt. It doesn’t break. “I’m sorry!”

‘Everything good about you—it’s in SPITE of me, can’t you see that?!’

Xie Lian hear it so vividly now, clear as a bell—the way Hong-er’s voice sounded, when he replied—

‘How could you say that?’

His grief isn’t pretty. He doesn’t fall to the ground and wail beautifully.

The Crown Prince of Xianle stands in the middle of the street, sobbing like a child, clutching his hands over his face.

‘Allow me to be that meaning.’

‘If you can’t find meaning in life, allow me to be that meaning .’

Xie Lian told that boy to live for him, to find meaning in life through him—and he, Xie Lian, he—

Xie Lian won’t even live for himself .

After how hard the boy tried to take care of him. How desperately he tried to make the god happy.

Xie Lian has held Hong-er’s greatest treasure in his own hands this entire time, and he’s treated it with such...carelessness.

“I’m sorry!”

He doesn’t know how long he stands there, trembling underneath the rain. How long he weeps, apologizing to a dead man over and over, until he feels raw from it.

Slowly, his hands drop from his face—finding the stone against his chest once again, gripping it tightly.

“...I won’t do it again,” he whispers, eyes narrowing with determination, squeezing the stone with everything it has. It never cracks, and somehow, even now, it’s warm beneath his fingers.

Xie Lian swallows hard, his voice thick with tears. “I promise—I won’t ever give up again!”

It’s not long after that when he hears another voice through the rain, slowly clearing now. “...What are you doing?”

It’s him, of course.

Xie Lian chokes out a laugh for a moment, covering his mouth again, the tears slowing.

“It’s almost sundown. If you don’t get moving—”

“Fuck you.”

Xie Lian doesn’t lift his head, not yet—and Bai Wuxiang pauses, staring at the god with disbelief.

“...Excuse me?”

He sounds startled, almost dangerous, but now, Xie Lian doesn’t cringe away in fear. Or apathy.

The crown prince lifts his head. “Did I stutter?”

He steps forward, not unsure, not without purpose.

When Xie Lian’s feet land, the ground shakes beneath them.

His hand snatches out, grabbing the calamity by the front of his robes:

“I’ll say it again,” he whispers, glaring blindly into the face of a white mask. “FUCK YOU!”

A kick lands in the center of the calamity’s chest, with such power, it sends him rocketing all the way across the town square. He lands on the side of a building, bricks fracturing and crumbling underneath him.

“Who do you think you are, to even SPEAK TO ME?!” He snarls.

He’s learned to cringe from his title, from anyone for recognizing him for who and what he is.

Xie Lian was so desperate, not to be himself back then. Being anyone else would be better

Being no one, even.

Now, he roars, with everything he is—

“I AM THE CROWN PRINCE!”

Slowly, the calamity rises back to his feet, shaking dust and rubble from his face.

“...Have you lost your mind?!” He hisses.

If anything, Xie Lian just managed to find it again.

“Did you forget?!” Bai Wuxiang cries, his voice reverberating in it’s anger as he stalks forward.

“Do you remember how these people treated you?!” He roars. “How they cursed you?!”

Xie Lian tilts his head, “You think I could ever forget?”

“Your parents left you, your people, your followers—and all it took was—was THAT man?! That NOBODY?!”

The crown prince shakes his head.

“I didn’t lose all of my followers,” he murmurs, and even if he doesn’t raise his voice— the calamity hears him clearly. “There was one who never would have left me.”

Not ever. No matter what Xie Lian became, or whether or not he deserved to be worshipped.

“...He’s still gone.” Bai Wuxiang responds coldly. “No one will thank you for this. They won’t build any more temples for you. They won’t send you prayers. This will never make things the way they were before!”

Each phrase is said sharply, hurled at him like a knife—the words that have haunted him.

The Crown Prince of Xianle doesn’t cringe from them, not anymore.

He doesn’t collapse back into a pit of self pity.

Xie Lian smiles. It isn’t bitter, or angry. It’s shaky, tear-filled, but sincere.

More beautiful now, than when he wore robes of silk and masks of gold.

“I don’t need prayers,” he whispers, his smile aching—eyes filled with so much warmth—so much affection, and…

Hope.

“That isn’t why I help people.”

Just like there are some people who pray without expecting an answer.

Somewhere along the way, Xie Lian forgot that.

He was born with wealth and fame. Beauty and power. The world was at his feet before he could take his first steps.

Xie Lian didn’t want to become a god for those things.

It was when he was cradled in the arms of his Guoshi, asked what he would do, if he could grant a prayer.

When the man asked Xie Lian what he would do, if there were two worshippers and one cup of water, and his answer was deemed sacrilegious: make another.

It could have been the wrong response, but Xie Lian is still the same child that said it. Xie Lian forgot that, along the way

He forgot about wanting to make another cup. Forgot about those afternoons, smiling and laughing on the side of Mount Taicang. He forgot about the boy who protected him, fighting beside him, the first one to make his heart race.

He forgot about his first friend.

The one that would poke fun and roll his eyes, clutching a broom against his chest, making sarcastic little comments that Xie Lian felt a little scandalized for laughing out, but when he did, the boy would smile—like they shared a secret.

He forgot about the mother who forced him to start building golden palaces when he didn’t want to stop chasing butterflies. Who wiped his tears when they fell down, and when she reminded him of that, Xie Lian was too lost to even understand what she meant by it.

Golden Palaces will always fall down, no matter what you do. That’s the point. That’s the natural consequence of building them.

Xie Lian took that as an excuse to knock them down on purpose, but that was never what his mother meant to say.

Golden Palaces will always fall down.

But that doesn’t mean they aren’t worth building. Because just like the butterflies he was chasing—they will always fall. They’ll always end.

But they’re still so beautiful—and once you’re done crying, you can pick up the pieces…

And you can build them again.

He forgot about the father who told him to stop whining and feeling sorry for himself when he cried that the world wasn’t fair. Who helped him get stronger, when he had every excuse to be weak.

And when Xie Lian was afraid, his father held him close, kept him safe.

The father who told him that it was alright to be afraid—that the world was a big place, and he would keep the prince shielded from it until he was big enough to deal with it.

And he did. Xie Lian never realized it, but… His father did.

He forgot that, somewhere along the way

He forgot the boy who dropped into his arms from the sky like a falling star. Even when Xie Lian promised himself he wouldn’t, wouldn’t forever.

He forgot the way that boy looked at him, like the entire universe could be encompassed in the space of the prince's eyes.

Xie Lian has spent the time since he fell learning to hate the world. To curse it. To think that it was cruel, selfish, and miserable—and that he didn’t want to save it.

But he didn’t become a god because the world was perfect, or because everyone in it was worth protecting.

Xie Lian became a god because he loved the world, and he loved so many people in it.

Even if there are plenty of Qi Rong's. People who lie. Who judge, steal, and rape. Who will take your gifts and curse you while calling you a friend.

The world is cruel, selfish, and miserable.

Xie Lian knows now that he probably can't save it. He certainly can't save everyone in it.

But this world gave him parents who loved him. This world gave him Feng Xin. It gave him Mu Qing, who, even now, Xie Lian would give anything to start all over again.

This world gave him Guoshi, and every lesson the man ever taught him. This world gave him that soldier who stayed by his side all through the night when he was infected with the land of the tender, even when he received no reward for helping him.

This world gave him Hong-er.

This world gave him a boy that followed him to hell and back, content to live with nothing, just for the chance to stay by his side. Who endured what he did, all in silence, just to keep Xie Lian safe.

A boy who prayed with all of his might, not ever expecting an answer.

And even when the same world took him away—it still gave Xie Lian a group of villagers, willing to search all through the night, all through the cold and the dark, just so a blind man wouldn't be searching alone.

People who were practically strangers to them.

A farmer still gave Hong-er the robes from his own marriage ceremony. His sons still built a pyre, even though it was so late in the night.

When Xie Lian had been lost in sorrow, thinking the world took everything away from him, it gave him that.

It gave him a Ghost Fire.

Even when it couldn't keep him warm, it kept him company. Chased the dangers away when it could. Even when Xie Lian was often cruel or indifferent to it. Even when he constantly ignored the claim it so desperately wanted him to believe—

‘I am forever your most devoted believer.’

And even when the ghost fire was gone, even when his parents had left him, and the world felt so dark, so impossibly lonely…

The world gave him Wu Ming.

Someone who had already given up everything in the name of Xianle. In the name of Xie Lian—but followed him anyway.

Even when the path Xie Lian walked was so lonely and cruel. Even when he treated the young soldier so callously—so selfishly.

The only reward the ghost asked for was to kiss his hand.

Xie Lian clutches that hand to his chest now, and he smiles. Smiles so widely that it hurts.

Smiles honestly. Smiles fiercely.

Because sometimes, smiling in the face of sadness is the bravest thing a person can do.

It was never easy for Xie Lian to be brave before—he had seen too much of what the world could do.

But Xie Lian loves this world.

He tilts his head back. He feels the warmth of the setting sun on his skin. Tastes the salt in the air. Hears the waves crashing on the shore. Children laughing and playing in the distance—and their mothers, calling them home.

Xie Lian loves this world, and he loves so many people in it.

Even when most of them aren’t here anymore, living only in the spaces of his heart, or resting on a silver chain around his neck.

Xie Lian loves this world, and he probably can’t save it—but that doesn’t mean it isn’t worth living in.

That doesn’t mean it isn’t worth protecting

Bai Wuxiang watches him, his expression one of growing disgust.

“…God, you’re such a disappointment,” he mutters, shaking his head. “To think, you would turn back now, after coming so far…”

The prince smiles, eyes closed, still enjoying the sun on his face.

“My real teacher used to get upset with me too,” Xie Lian admits, his hair stirring in the breeze. “He got so frustrated with me, most of the time…”

“Because you never LISTEN!” The calamity barks, and the prince shakes his head.

“No,” His smile softens, and he lowers his chin. “I listen.”

He’s laughing now, and he’s crying—but he isn’t sad, he isn’t breaking, he’s just…

Growing. And sometimes, that hurts.

“I’m just a slow learner, that’s all.”

“…” Bai Wuxiang’s hands ball into fists, trembling with anger. “You can’t stop this, you realize!”

“When that sun goes down, you’ll have to release the curse! And if you don’t, you’ll be cursed for ten thousand lifetimes! You must know that, don’t you?!”

Xie Lian’s smile fades slightly—because he does.

And he isn’t the cocky, overzealous prince that he once was.

He knows now, even if he tries his best, there’s a very good chance that he’ll fail. But that doesn’t mean that he won’t try.

The calamity makes a low, infuriated noise when the god turns away from him entirely, feeling with his toes until he finds fangxin, lifting it up.

“…” He stares at the blade, unable to see it—but still apprehensive—taking a deep breath before he runs into the center of the square.

“LISTEN!” He calls out, shouting with all of his power—until the people who spent three days walking right past him stop and stare.

“SOMETHING IS ABOUT TO HAPPEN!” He cries, desperate that anyone will believe him, half convinced that no one will, but…

Then he hears screaming, people tilting their heads back as they point towards the sky.

“Oh god, what is that?!”

“That—!”

“IT LOOKS LIKE A HUMAN FACE!”

Xie Lian shouts louder, to be heard over the crowd. “It is, it—it’s Human Face Disease, it’s coming back!”

He can’t see how angry the white clothed calamity is, arms crossed, watching him from a distance, guiding the curse to swirl and gather in the air.

“WHAT?!” “No!”

There’s terrified screaming and shrieking, children crying all around, and Xie Lian raises his arm over head, brandishing fangxin.

“THERE’S A CURE!”

All of those voices stop, and Xie Lian—he takes a deep breath, bracing himself for what he knows will come next.

“R-Really?!”

One man whispers, panicking, “Can we trust...can we trust what he says?!”

“Didn’t you hear?” Another replies, grasping his arm tightly, “he’s the crown prince! A god—and everyone said he knew the curse to the disease—”

“Why would he help us now? We’re his enemies!”

“GODS DON’T HAVE ENEMIES!” Xie Lian’s voice rings out now, louder than ever “They don’t have kingdoms, and they don’t protect only one people!”

The crowd, filled with those who watched him suffer for three days and did nothing, watches in silent awe.

He...would really help them?

Xie Lian can’t see how angry Bai Wuxiang is, watching him now.

He also can’t see another pair of eyes, watching from beneath a different mask. Falling in love, all over again.

“I WAS NOT THE GOD OF XIANLE!” He cries, “I WAS A GOD OF THIS WORLD! Listen to me, now!”

And they do.

Each one of them, rapt with attention, as the crown prince speaks louder, “The cure— it’s murder—” there are a few horrified gasps, but Xie Lian hurries to finish, “but you don’t actually have to kill anyone! Here—”

He holds out fangxin, waiting for anyone to take it.

“Just take this and stab me—I definitely won’t die, but you won’t catch the disease if you do!”

Behind him, Bai Wuxiang’s jaw goes slack.

He would...endure that again? This time willingly?

The citizens gathered around him are hesitant, and Xie Lian presses on, shaking fangxin.

“It’s alright, like I said! I won’t die, so just go ahead! There isn’t much time!”

All around him, he hears people fighting with their own hesitations, squirming and unsure—but he knows, they’ll do it, if given the chance to give themselves permission.

There’s debating.

Some want to step forward and take their chance, or even just for their children— while others cringe from the idea, calling it too horrible.

The water merchant speaks the loudest, pointing out how no one helped Xie Lian before, when he was bleeding in the street.

How could they accept his help now, when they wouldn’t even help him then. It’s not decent. It just—it isn’t the right thing to do.

They argue back and forth, and Xie Lian—he knows they don’t have time for any of this, that they—

BOOM!

There’s a crash like thunder.

A flash of light so bright, that people stumble backwards.

The ground shudders beneath their feet.

Xie Lian panics, clutching fangxin tighter, wondering if it's too late, it's already—

CRASH!

The crowd scatters and cries as the crown prince's body is enveloped in light.

...What?

Xie Lian's arms float out in front of him, the sword slipping through his fingers, falling to the ground with a clatter.

His robes billow—his sleeves changing from the billowing cut of mourning robes, to the simple, white garb of a cultivator.

Ruoye slides away from his face, circling around him rapidly, gleaming with spiritual power—and when the crown prince opens his eyes, his irises no longer hold the burning shame of a cursed shackle.

They shine, filled with golden light, like the sun burns inside them.

And Xie Lian—

Xie Lian can see.

After years of darkness, wandering through the world without a single glimpse of light, he can see again.

But the sight that greets him isn't Lang-er bay. It isn't Bai Wuxiang.

It isn't even Wu Ming.

Standing before him, hovering over the crowd before his eyes, is a prince.

Young, so much younger than Xie Lian ever realized. Wearing robes of red, white, and gold silk. Chestnut waves of hair pulled from his face, held with pins of gold and jade.

He's beautiful.

There's a gleaming, white sword in one of his hands—a matching flower in the other.

A crown of pink lotus blossoms sits upon his head, and Xie Lian stares, his lips parted.

He's beautiful—he is so, so beautiful. But so horribly sad.

Hands trembling, eyes filled with tears.

There's no sound from below—Xie Lian knows that there won't be, that this is a moment held in between moments of time, a moment of divinity, one that is for the god alone.

A moment of ascension.

The boy grips his sword tighter, and he whispers—

"I tried."

Xie Lian's heart pounds.

"I tried so hard."

Tears well up in those eyes. Those beautiful, golden eyes. The eyes that used to look down from the world on high, truly believing that they could save it.

"...I know," Xie Lian whispers, his gaze filling with tears of his own. "I know you did."

The Crown Prince smiles, as though that brings him some small measure of peace.

"And I'm sorry," Xie Lian murmurs, his voice wobbling, mourning so much more than just a friend, a family, or a future.

He mourns for the boy he used to be.

The one who built golden palaces and chased butterflies. Who thought there was no problem so big that he couldn't solve it.

Xie Lian listened to the world curse him for so long, he began to believe every word of it was true. That he deserved it. And that he—

That he wasn't worthy of love, admiration, or faith. That just like the world, he wasn't worth saving.

“I’m sorry,” Xie Lian repeats, tears slipping down his face, dripping down from his chin, “that I was so unkind to you.”

“...” The Crown Prince lifts his chin, and he smiles. “It’s okay,” he whispers, holding out his hand.

It isn’t holding a flower, not anymore.

It’s holding someone else’s hand.

A small boy, so small, he barely reaches the prince’s knee. Half of his head is wrapped in bandages, but ink black curls poke out wildly, framing his face.

He watches Xie Lian cautiously, half hidden in the Crown Prince’s robes, like he might be frightened—

But the teenager squeezes his hand gently, whispering—

‘Don’t be afraid.’

The tears on Xie Lian’s cheeks won’t stop falling, when he sees that little boy.

“...I miss you,” he whispers hoarsely, grasping the stone sitting around his neck. “And I’m so—I’m so sorry.”

The boy doesn’t speak, but Xie Lian can see it, in the dark eye that peers back at him. He misses Xie Lian too. So much, he doesn’t need to say the words.

“...He’s right, though.” The god smiles through the tears, his voice shaking. “You don’t need to be afraid, and I—”

His voice trembles and cracks, knowing this moment is a projection of his own spirit, that it isn’t real, that Hong-er is gone, but—

“I’ll see you again someday.”

The boy nods, believing him. Always believing in him.

He opens his mouth, and Xie Lian, he desperately wishes this was more than just one moment. That they could sit and talk for hours.

That he could hear that voice call, ‘Gege!’

One more time. But nothing lasts forever.

Nothing good ever stays, but—that doesn't mean that it isn't worth having, even if that means it might end.

Xie Lian blinks, and in the space of that moment, the two boys are gone.

Slowly, his body lowers to the ground, the wind rushing around him, Ruoye slowly returning.

The bystanders whisper in awe and terror—after all, it's rare for anyone to see a god's ascension, much less a second ascension, all in broad daylight.

When Xie Lian turns his head, he sees it now—the angry clouds in the air, filled with human faces.

This wasn't Bai Wuxiang.

The white clothed calamity might have pushed him down this road, but he didn't do this.

Xie Lian did this.

"..." He swears his shoulders, eyes narrowing with resolve, crying out, "COME TO ME!"

And they do, swirling around all at once, coiling together. Xie Lian kneels.

Without looking, his hand reaches for fangxin—where it should be now, after he dropped it to the ground before, but—

It isn't there.

Xie Lian looks around on the ground, confused. Where—?

The spirits rush towards him, and the god fumbles around.

Where is it?!

Why, the moment he can actually SEE what he's looking for, at a moment like this, does he lose it—?

"Your highness."

The god stops, slowly turning his head.

A few meters behind him, stands a young soldier.

Tall, but slender—like a fresh stalk of bamboo. Wearing a white mask.

Not half laughing, half smiling, just—

Just smiling.

“...Wu Ming?” He whispers, eyes locked upon his form.

He’s dressed in all black, scaled armor shining on his arms and chest—familiar, so similar to what the soldiers who fought for him used to wear. A saber hangs by his side.

Long, sharp.

‘Handsome.’

Xie Lian can’t see his face, can’t imagine what the young man looks like—but in his heart, no, in the utter core of his spirit, he knows the person that lays beneath that mask is beautiful.

But he isn’t holding his own sword. No—

He has fangxin.

“...Wu Ming,” he whispers, his voice trembling as the malicious spirits surge closer, “What are you doing?!”

The black clad youth tilts his head, watching the horde as it looms before them. He doesn’t seem to hold an ounce of fear.

Brave.

Xie Lian’s lips tremble.

Foolish, but so brave.

“Stop,” he chokes, staggering to his feet, knowing in an instant, what the young man plans on doing, “You can’t, I—I haven’t even paid you back yet!”

That face stares back at him, the white blankness of the mask hiding any lack of resolve, but...

Somehow, Xie Lian knows—there was never a moment of doubt in the ghost’s heart, anyway.

“Don’t worry, your highness,” even now, his voice sounds completely calm. “You can pay me back next time.”

Xie Lian can see those fingers tighten around the hilt of fangxin, determined. But he already knows—there—there—

“There won’t be a next time!” He cries, desperately trying to reach him. “That—doing this—it’ll destroy you for sure!”

Xie Lian would have been obliterated too, most likely—but for a martial god of his strength, he stood a much better chance.

He knows, even as he moves with all of the speed and grace that he now has—he won’t make it in time.

It’s happening all over again—and there’s nothing—there’s nothing he can do!

In the last moment, just before the end, the ghost whispers something that brings his god to a halt.

Even over the terrified screams of the people of Yong’an, the shrieking of the malicious spirits, Xie Lian hears it so clearly, like the words are being whispered directly in his ear:

“I am forever your most devoted believer.”

The prince staggers, eyes wide, hand outstretched.

“...You?!” He whispers, eyes staring at that mask so intently, wishing they had more time; he—he has so many questions, so many things he never got to say, but—

But then, he did exactly what Xie Lian had planned on doing, moments before. He turns the blade on himself.

In an instant, he’s swallowed by an entire storm of spirits, lifted up into the air—and all the prince can do is watch, head upturned, eyes filled with utter horror.

The scream that fills the air, Xie Lian realizes—

He’s heard it before.

Knows it so well, it feels like his own

The swirling builds, rising until it reaches a fever pitch, and then—

And then there's nothing.

Fangxin falls to the ground in front of him with a clatter, and with it... A small white flower.

The crown prince stares, unmoving. His mind is unable to understand what his eyes see.

Wu Ming...he...

Xie Lian's fingers reach out, brushing over the white flower sitting on the ground— trembling.

Slowly, he reaches for the one in his hair, comparing the two, and... His eyes flood with tears.

"...You said you would never lie to me," he whispers.

They're the same.

How could Wu Ming tell him he didn't know where the flower came from, he—

Xie Lian's fingers tremble as he holds both flowers close to his face, trying to reconcile himself with the truth of what he saw. What he knows now, in his heart.

That ghost fire... It was Wu Ming.

The god shudders, clutching the flowers close to his chest, tears dropping down onto fangxin below.

Xie Lian—

He was so awful to him. So—So awful to them both, how could he—

Why, after how much that poor spirit suffered, would it still follow him?

What about...

What about his precious person? The one that he...didn't want to leave behind?

In that context, when Xie Lian thinks back on the kiss—he knows he should feel more remorse, but...he can't bring himself to.

He's glad.

He's glad that Wu Ming was the first man he chose to kiss, even if the Ghost Fire, the savage spirit he became, would have rather shared that moment with someone else.

He was probably thinking about them, when he held Xie Lian so tenderly. But...That's alright.

He's still glad.

Because at that moment, Xie Lian felt so safe. Even in his darkest moment, he found something...so close to happiness.

He takes a long, deep breath, and then...

He hears someone laughing. Low, wild cackling.

Slowly, he turns his head—only to find that Bai Wuxiang is still there.

Hunched over, clutching his stomach—and Xie Lian can't see his laughter from underneath that mask, but can hear it, grating against his ears so offensively.

Though, if he truly knew what the calamity thought was so funny—he would only feel horror.

"...What's so amusing?"

"I'm sure, now—" Bai Wuxiang's head tilts to the side, low giggles piercing through the mask, "You must know who that soul was."

"..." Xie Lian presses his lips together tightly, and the calamity cackles. "Your very last believer! And now, he's gone!"

He...he's...

"...Gone?" Xie Lian echoes slowly, looking down at the sword before him.

'Don't worry your highness—you can pay me back next time!'

How...how could he just be gone?

"His soul," the calamity explains, "it's dispersed!"

Xie Lian, he...he knew the risks. He knew.

When he was going to turn that blade on himself, he knew that even he didn't have a strong chance at surviving, but...Wu Ming...

He sounded so certain, so determined, that even against all odds—Xie Lian believed him.

But there's no ghost fire now. Not a trace of Wu Ming's aura.

He's...even if he wasn't gone, Xie Lian would have no way of trying to summon the spirit.

He didn't have a name, after all. He's just...gone.

Xie Lian hangs his head, clutching the flowers to his chest, heart pounding with pain —and it breaks again.

Just a little bit more.

It's different from before. He knows, now, that he can survive this pain. That no matter how miserable and alone he feels, it won't last forever. And yet, he...

"...What a miserable, pathetic god you are," the calamity sneers, watching his pain with a bemused smile.

"Anyone who would follow a weakling like you must be even more so."

"..." Xie Lian rises to his feet, tucking each flower into his sleeves. "Shut up."

"Really, after everything that little beast must have seen, he still followed a lowlife like you—!"

The Calamity falls silent.

A sword, gleaming white, is buried in his chest, pinning him to the ground. The prince seemed to summon it from thin air, along with several others, slowly swirling overhead, eyes narrowed with heavenly wrath.

"HOW DARE YOU MOCK HIM!" The prince roars, eyes burning gold.

"WHAT DOES A MONSTER LIKE YOU KNOW ABOUT FAITH?!" He stalks forward, more swords appearing, swirling around him like a storm of hornets, eyes shining like two small suns, "WHEN HAVE YOU EVER BELIEVED IN ANYTHING?!"

He can't see the calamity's expression, but he hears something.

His ears are far more sensitive now, than they were before—even by the standards of a god. Whether the calamity actually intended for him to hear—he doesn't know.

"People believed in me, once—long ago."

Before Xie Lian's expression can flicker with hesitation, he cries—

"What is there to say about a failure, following another failure?! Why shouldn't I mock you?!" He rises to his feet, casting the sword aside. "Do you REALLY think you could win against me, as you are now?! You couldn't before!"

Maybe not.

Xie Lian has become more than familiar with the taste of defeat. But that doesn't mean he won't try.

But before either can move towards one another—the rumbling begins once more— just like before, when Xie Lian's godhood returned, but just a little bit stronger.

"Maybe he can't defeat you," a voice calls—rumbling, familiar. "But what about me?"

Xie Lian turns around, just in time to see a young martial god walking forward, wearing armor of gleaming white and gold.

He stares, eyes widening, slightly unsure. "Jun...Wu?"

The heavenly emperor offers him a kind smile, one that the crown prince can't help but return, watching as he launches into battle against the calamity, thinking to himself...

Why now?

There were so many times that he prayed to Jun Wu before, when he was being tortured.

When he desperately wished for death. Relief. Anything. And the god never answered.

Why come here now? Has he finally decided that Xie Lian's prayers were worth answering? That he was worth saving?

Even as he watches his tormentor get shredded to pieces, Xie Lian ponders.

Even when only a bloody, broken mask remains, and the heavenly emperor returns to him with a tired smile.

“Welcome back to the ranks, Xianle.”

Xianle.

Xie Lian forgot that the emperor used to call him that. It’s a painful memory, now.

Slowly, he turns his head.

The sun is beginning to set over the ocean. Burning gold and red across the horizon, making the sea itself gleam like fire, the beginnings of stars beginning to poke through in the sky above.

This city is beautiful.

He lifts his chin, looking all around, taking it in.

But in the end, instead of responding to the emperor, Xie Lian takes a seat on a wall overlooking the sea, and he watches the sunset.

Watches it with an appreciation that no one else in the world could ever understand. With longing—happiness, and so much sadness.

It’s beautiful

But there were so many other things that Xie Lian wanted to see.

Even when he thought he would never get his eyes back. When he had given up on cultivation. When he thought the world would forever remain in darkness.

He has his eyes now, but… Hong-er isn’t here.

Neither are his parents. His friends. Or Wu Ming.

Something slips from his chest, falling to his lap with a slight clatter—and when Xie Lian reaches for the chain there—he realizes—

The stone is gone.

His chest seizes up with anxiety, because—how—? How could it be gone?!

But when he looks down at his lap, to see what fell—

There's a ring there.

Too large for Xie Lian to wear on one of his own fingers—made from what looks like pure diamond, instead of any form of metal—

And a ruby set in its face, gently gleaming up at him. Xie Lian stares.

How...?

His fingertips brush over the ring, cautiously lifting it up in front of his face.

Somehow, it's warm under his fingertips. Pulsing gently, when he squeezes it too tight.

Just like a little heartbeat.

And he couldn't explain why, but...he knows. He knows it's Hong-er.

Xie Lian doesn't know why the ashes keep changing like this. Assumes it must have something to do with him, because the last time this happened, he was exposed to such extreme spiritual power at the hands of Bai Wuxiang, and again, when he ascended once more.

It's almost kind.

He won't ever get to see the man that Hong-er would have grown into. But at least now, in some small way—even if he's never heard of bone ashes doing such a thing before—

Xie Lian's companion is growing with him. Changing, even now. Even though he's gone.

He's careful to place the ring back on his chain, now—and he slips the red coral pearl into place next to it.

There.

Even if the other was lost in the pyre—in a way, they're a matching set again.

Now that the sun has set, and the prince has seen what he wanted to see...

He rises to his feet, turning back to face Jun Wu.

“I’m sorry to trouble you, your highness,” he murmurs, stepping down from the wall, walking towards him. “But could I ask you for something?”

The martial emperor raises an eyebrow, intrigued. “What is it, Xianle?”

“Banish me again,” he murmurs, watching as the emperor stares at him with an expression of abject shock. “And give me another shackle, this time.”

“Another…?” The emperor sputters, his jaw hanging open, “You—you realize you won’t be a god any longer if I do, don’t you?”

Xie Lian smiles, not happily or sadly—it just is. “I know that better than anyone.”

“…They really will start calling you a god of misfortune at that point,” Jun Wu points out, eyebrows raised.

Xie Lian knows as much—and that’s fine. He knows that he isn’t.

He’s a god of flowers. A god of orphans and beggars. A god of tapestries, campfire songs, and meat buns, split to share.

Xie Lian knows those things—and so did the ones who believed in him.

“…You would really give up your sight again?” Jun Wu questions, his tone reluctant.

The crown prince glances up at the sky—the stars, and knows, even if he walks the length of the entire universe, all the way to those lights in the sky and back, he won’t find the face he wants to see.

“…There are worse things,” he murmurs.

Xie Lian understands that now.

Slowly, Jun Wu smiles.

“You’ve really grown up, haven’t you, Xianle?”

Even if it took him too long. Even if he was slow—Xie Lian did.

"…Still," he muses, rubbing his chin, "I can't banish you to the mortal realm without a decent reason."

Xie Lian smiles, grasping Hong-er.

"Oh," the god tilts his chin, eyes burning bright, "that's easy."

The clash between the heavenly emperor and the flower crowned martial god is known throughout the ages—not because of the awe inspiring nature of the battle.

(Though it was quite impressive.)

No—it was known for being the briefest time that a god had ever ascended before being cast back down again. Not even for the length of one incense.

(A record that would be broken sooner than anyone expected.)

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

Each work is included with permission from the artist. Do not reproduce or use for any reason.

[image]

CREDIT: MYSTERYSEONG, support the artwork HERE

TW// BLOOD

Go away. You're boring.
xiaoya

CREDIT: Pri, support the artwork HERE

[image]

CREDIT: MYSTERYSEONG, support the artwork HERE

Chapter End Notes

> Thank you again to Pri and Seong for your amazing artwork!! Everyone, please go and give them support, they are so talented and absolutely deserve it!
>
> I will likely be posting another chapter today (within the next twelve hours) that will wrap up this arc. (It is not long at all, so be aware!)
>
> Thank you to everyone for their support of this story, it is deeply appreciated!
>
> xoxo, Evie

Wait for Me

Chapter Summary

CLACK!

There's a sharp rattle, echoing through the hall, the only sound that disturbs the silence.

No natural light. No flow of air. No breathing. No heartbeats.

CLACK! CLACK! CLACK!

"...How many did you get?" A voice drawls, "I'm not letting you roll again."

"Oh, come on!" His companion cries, "No fair, no fair! You gave me an extra roll last time!"

Chapter Notes

You can find me on twitter and keep up with current updates of the story HERE

This story also has some spotify playlists for those who want some fun listening while reading!

No Paths Are Bound: The Playlist
Calamity Xie Lian: The Playlist
The Wu Ming Playlist

Three weeks later, the former crown prince of Xianle wakes alone.

That isn't so frightening anymore—he's used to it now.

He isn't so slow about making his way about the day as he was before. Isn't so careless about the way he puts on his robes.

Xie Lian takes the time to comb his hair, to pull it back into something presentable.

He remembers how much effort Hong-er put into it, before—and now, he can't bear to leave it a mess.

Nothing like the fancier styles the boy preferred, or Wu Ming used to twist his hair into—but Xie Lian thinks it suits him. Works better with the hat, anyway.

He remembers sometimes, the night when he pressed Hong-er on what kind of woman he might want, or man, it didn't matter, and the boy said he wanted someone with nice hair. Long, soft and shiny.

Not everyone has hair like that, you know. Remembering it now makes the prince smile.

When he walks to the well to fetch some water, his foot trips on the unfamiliar terrain —but he doesn't fall. Not completely, anyway.

A white silk bandage wraps around his arm, and Xie Lian lands on his knees—but not on his face, thankfully.

"...Thank you, Ruoye."

He pats the spiritual tool as it wriggles happily, glad to be of use.

Slowly, he makes his way back into the shrine. It's old—abandoned. There are plenty of those, these days. He doubts he'll stay here for now, but...When he was scrap collecting the day before, he found something

The loom was a bit worn down and dented, but the god was able to work it back into place until it was in working condition.

Now, the former god kneels before it, remembering a different time, in a different shrine, so much like this one.

It's been a long time. So, so long.

He doesn't have anyone to separate the threads for him now—so when he was at the shop, he had the girl behind the counter carve the characters for the colors into the cases. When he feels for them now, he's able to keep track of which threads are which in his mind, laying them out.

It's been such a long time since he tried weaving—and now, it soothes him. The slow, methodical movement of his fingers as he pulls each thread together, building a story, piece by piece.

He remembers the boy that used to sit beside him, always listening to him talk. No matter how long Xie Lian droned on, or how boring it was.

At first, he found this hobby tedious. Thought it was a waste of time for a warrior like him, but...

Time has given Xie Lian a deeper appreciation for tapestries, and the stories they tell. Even if they hurt.

Maybe, one day, if he gets good enough—he can sell them. But not this one. This one is just for him.

It shows a crown prince, elegant and strong, a blade clutched in his hand, gleaming white—covered in silks, jewels, and every other luxury.

And in his other hand, a boy.

Small, so very, very small. But strong.

And so brave.

Having them together here, even if they aren't together now, brings some small form of peace.

Xie Lian strokes his fingers over his work when he's finished, over faces immortalized in threads of red, white, and gold.

"...I miss you," he admits, his voice low.

Part of Xie Lian thinks that he'll always miss him.

But he won't give up again either—he promised him that much already. He'll try. He'll keep on building golden palaces, even if he knows they'll always fall in the end.

That doesn't mean they aren't worth building.

And he knows, in the end—he'll see him again.

(Xie Lian just never realized how long it would take.)

Slowly, he removes the tapestry from the loom, finishing off the edges, rolling it up and tucking it into his rucksack.

He disassembles the loom, bringing it with him—and he begins to wander down the path. Maybe he'll collect junk today, or find work in a farmer's field.

Either way, that’s fine by him.

He twists his finger in the chain around his neck, raising the ring there to his lips.

A soft kiss, his lips warmed by the warmth of the diamond beneath his lips.

“Good morning,” Xie Lian whispers.

He’s done this every morning, since his second banishment began.

And after that, slowly, often rambling, he begins to tell Hong-er about his day.

A red flower blows past him in the wind as he walks down the country road, slowly drifting over the air.

Things can often slip right past you, whether you see them or not. But, sometimes, the world will bring them back to you.

It’s only a matter of time.

CLACK!

There's a sharp rattle, echoing through the hall, the only sound that disturbs the silence.

No natural light. No flow of air. No breathing. No heartbeats.

CLACK! CLACK! CLACK!

"...How many did you get?" A voice drawls, "I'm not letting you roll again."

"Oh, come on!" His companion cries, "No fair, no fair! You gave me an extra roll last time!"

"Yeah," the ghost agrees, lifting a sharpened rib bone from the table at which they sit, using it to pick his teeth, "because we're friends!"

"We're still friends now, right?!"

"...I guess," the other grumbles, seeming a little annoyed now. "I don't like you as much anymore, though."

"Huh? Why not?"

"You never pay up."

"Just let me roll again, alright?! One more time, and if I don't, I—!"

Both spirits fall silent when there's a groan in the corner.

"...Oh," the young man can hear a voice, low and rattling, like the crackle of a fire more than a human tongue, "the little pup is finally waking up."

There's a shrieking giggle from the man at his side. "Which way do you think he's gonna go, Xiang?!"

Which...way...?

Slowly, the youth opens his eyes, sitting up.

The hall he's sitting in—it's like nothing he's ever seen before. Cavernous, with ceilings so high, he can't see the ceiling itself—but no sunlight. The only light comes from an unearthly green glow.

Ghost Fires.

Slowly reappearing, then sparking out, over and over again, flickering throughout the space.

The stones that make up the walls, the floors—and most like the ceiling too, are completely black. Etched in ancient characters, unrecognizable to the young man.

Slowly, he stands up.

His hands rise up to touch his arms, his chest—looking for any signs of damage, after what he just experienced, but—

There's nothing. His body feels intact, completely whole.

His face is different, though.

When his fingers trace over his cheeks—there are no more scars.

The place where he broke his nose before—that's gone now, too.

But when he looks to the left, he finds two men, sitting across from one another at a stone table.

The only other figures in the room—one tall and thin, with sallow, pockmarked skin.

The other is short and round, with a slightly upturned nose, vaguely reminiscent of a swine.

They watch him curiously, and when the young man looks to the table at which they sit--he sees a pair of dice.

Black, with numbers painted in gold.

"...What is this place?"

The two men glance at each other, then back at him.

"...You know that you're dead, right?" The taller one—Xiang, the youth presumes—questions.

The teenager crosses his arms, distinctly unimpressed. "I've been dead before," he drawls. "I didn't end up here."

"...Oh," the shorter one's eyes widen with recognition, looking up towards his friend with newfound caution, "...I think this one must have been a pretty strong ghost, Xiang—"

"Who cares!" Xiang retorts, rolling his eyes. "He still ended up here, with the likes of us."

The likes of them.

His eyes drift down, finally noticing the men's throats.

Slit from ear to ear, though their bodies have long since been drained dry.

"...Two gamblers who couldn't pay up?" He snorts, raising an eyebrow. "Clearly didn't learn your lessons, either."

"Oi!" The taller one glares. "Respect your elders! We have names—I'm Xiang, and this one, he's Fai."

Fai nods eagerly, almost shrinking behind his friend's side, while clearly trying to look confident.

"..." Xiang glares, turning and hissing, "What are you cowering for?!"

"Xiang," his friend whines, "I don't think the kid is normal..."

"Obviously NOT, you little idiot, he's DEAD!"

"Even for a dead one," Fai shakes his head. "Can we just...go back to playing? I'll pay up this time, you don't have to let me roll again—"

"You didn't answer me."

The young man walks forward, his eyes narrowed with annoyance. He doesn't have time for this. "What is this place?"

"..." Xiang lifts his chin haughtily, "I don't talk to strangers. What's your name?" His gaze lingers on the boy's right eye.

Ah. That must be the same, then.

"...Wu Ming," he replies flatly.

"That ain't a real name!" Fai grumbles, falling silent with a squeal when the boy glares at him, and Xiang huffs.

"My friend is right! That ain't an actual name."

"...I don't have one, then." The boy admits with a harsh frown.

"What kinda respectable ghost doesn't even have a name?!" Xiang huffs, puffing his chest out. "Ain't gonna get any kind of respect that way!"

"You have a name," the teenager sneers, "you aren't doing particularly well with getting respect, are you?"

"..." Xiang gawks.

Slowly, he turns his head to the smaller ghost, mumbling under his breath, "...Yeah, I think you're right, the kid isn't normal."

Then, in a smaller voice;

"...He really hurt my feelings!"

The teenager stares, watching the two grown men comfort each other.

"They always have a way of getting to your insecurities," Fai agrees, patting his arm softly.

"...Are either of you going to answer me?!" The teenager glares, rapidly losing any semblance of patience.

"Fine, FINE!" Xiang mumbles, rubbing at his nose irritably. "Look around."

Slowly, the teenager does, seeing most of what he already took in before. Dark walls, ghost fires—impossibly high ceilings—and now, something else.

Doors.

Massive, so large, an entire palace could fit in the doorway of each, situated on opposite sides of the hall.

One black, the other red—each elaborately carved.

"That one," Xiang mutters, pointing towards the black door, "goes to the shit hole."

"The shit hole?" The teenager questions dryly, unimpressed by the...creative naming process.

"You wanna get chased through a maze by your worst memories for all eternity?!" Xiang glares. "It's a shit hole!"

Oh.

The boy frowns, turning to stare at the door. "Why would anyone choose to go through there?"

"No one does," Fai admits, uncomfortable, but trying to contribute

"But most of them don't have a choice." Oh.

The teenager tilts his head, a curtain of dark, blank hair moving with him as he does. Much longer now, than he remembers it.

That's hell. They're talking about hell. "What's the red door?"

"Starting over," Xiang shrugs.

The mention of that makes the youth scowl. He doesn't want that, either.

"And what are you two doing here?" He mutters, crossing his arms. "Why haven't you picked one?"

"Well..." Fai frowns, scratching his head. "We can't go through the red door. Our ashes got scattered."

“...The fuck?” The teenager glances them over. “What did you two do?”

How did two little lowbrow gamblers manage to piss someone off bad enough to do something like that? Scattering ashes is no small thing. It brings bad luck with it— enough to curse a bloodline, if unjustified

“Nothing that bad!” Xiang glares, clearly defensive. “My buddy here, he—he just never really knew how to quit it, even when he was on a bad kind of roll, and those assholes at the gambling den never cut him off! Even when they knew they milked his whole family dry!”

Fai hangs his head, nodding—clearly ashamed. Xiang, however, holds his chin high, arms crossed.

“So, I tried to win the money back for him!” He shrugs. “It was honorable, really! They completely overreacted is all!”

“To what?”

“...I may have loaded my dice,” the ghost admits.

“You were trying to save your friend from a predatory gambling ring,” the teenager questions dryly, “and you loaded your dice.”

“...” Xiang rubs his nose again, glancing away sheepishly. “I said it was honorable, I ain’t saying it was smart, alright?!”

“...Right.”

“Anyways, that asshole—he didn’t like me to begin with. His wife, she was TOTALLY into me, but that wasn’t my fault! I’m not that kind of guy, I just attract attention from the ladies!”

The youth eyes Xiang’s pockmarked skin and hollow cheeks. “...Uh-huh.”

“He does!” Fai crows.

“But that whole family was just rotten,” Xiang glares. “They think they’re better than everyone else in the city because they’ve got money, but they're just as rotten as the rest of us! Acting like merchants, but they run gambling dens, and brothels, and all sorts of shit!"

"...Really?" The kid frowns. "And they killed you...and scattered your ashes...for cheating?"

"They killed me for the debts," Fai sighs, "the rest was all for the loaded dice, yeah."

He's seen some...overreactions in his day, but that's a high bar.

"So now you can't reincarnate?"

Both men shake their heads glumly.

"But we didn't do anything that bad, so..." Fai sighs, staring at the black doors. "We haven't been dragged in there yet, either."

The young man isn't sure if sitting in an empty hall, playing with a set of dice for all eternity is any better.

"...What if you don't want to go through either door?" The young man stares. "What's the other option?"

"..." Xiang scratches his head, looking at Fai. Slowly, both men shrug, and the taller starts to pull out a third chair—

"Yeah," the teenager holds up a hand, "no thanks."

"..." Xiang slams the chair back in, turning around, throwing his arms out, "FINE! Fuck you TOO, I guess!'

"Xiang," Fai pats his back, loose skin (from a decade or so of death induced weight loss) dangling from his forearm, "he didn't mean it personal!"

"No! He's a little brat!" "It's not that—"

"You're always the one saying, 'Xiang, you've gotta be VULNERABLE with people! Expand your social circle!'" The ghost wails. "AND LOOK WHAT HAPPENS!"

Actually, the young man thinks this might be hell, not the space beyond the black doors.

"There's no way out?"

"...Not really," Fai admits with a frown.

Xiang sniffs, not turning back around until he composes himself, "Aren't ya just gonna go through the red door anyway?" He grumbles.

The teenager glances it over with disdain, "...No."

"Ungrateful," the ghost grumbles. "With the way your form looks right now? Your ashes must be in," he raises his fingertips to his lips, giving them a loud, smacky kiss, dust spurting from his teeth, "PEAK condition! You'd probably be rich! Handsome! Hell, maybe even a prince!"

He shrugs, unimpressed.

"Why be a prince when you could just have one?"

It's not until both ghosts turn to stare at him that the teenager realizes those words came out of his mouth, not remaining in his thoughts.

"...I'm not in the mood to reincarnate," the teenager mutters, crossing his arms again.

"Can't I just go back?"

"I mean..." Xiang and Fai glance at each other, confused. "...Why would you want to?"

"If I reincarnate, I lose all my memories, don't I?"

Both ghosts nod, and the teenager shakes his head, his gaze determined. "Then I'm not doing that."

It's baffling.

He...doesn't exactly seem like a kid with a lot of good memories. If he was, well...

But, he seems determined.

"You realize...you're here because your soul is pretty much dispersed, right?" Fai questions quietly. "And you died heroically, in your second form."

"And?" The kid replies coldly.

Not much of a kid, really—he towers over both of them, clearly close to nineteen years old by now, but there's a boyish air about him.

"...Most savage ghosts don't get the chance to reincarnate, when they disperse," Xiang huffs. "It's a big deal!"

"Great," the teenager shrugs, "but it wouldn't work for me, anyways."

Both men glance at each other, then back at him. "How come?!"

"Do I seem at peace to you?"

"..." Neither of them have an argument there, and they sigh. "Well, there's only one other way out of here."

"Name it," the boy breathes, glad they're finally getting somewhere—Only for his face to fall when Xiang points to the dice, sitting on the table.

"You think we're playing for fun?" Xiang huffs, shaking his head. "We're trying to get back!"

"...Betting against what?"

"The universe? Whoever runs this place?" Xiang shrugs, "The last guys explained it pretty simple—you bet a piece of your soul each round, and if you get two sixes, you get a wish. Now, me and Fai here have been playing the system a little—"

"You two really don't learn, do you," the teenager mutters, shaking his head. "And who were the last guys?"

Xiang squirms a little at the memory, finding the rib bone he was using to pick his teeth from before. "There used to be four of us, but the other two, they..."

The teenager can estimate what happened.

They kept on betting until they didn't have any souls left—and then, they were completely obliterated.

"...We've been betting against the ghost fires, to get a little extra juice," Xiang admits, lowering his voice like he's confessing.

"It helps stretch things out a little, at least."

Kind of unfair and predatory, considering most ghost fires are dumb as rocks—but the young man can't say he wouldn't be willing to resort to such things if necessary.

“…So,” he walks forward, boots clicking on marble.

“If I want out of here, I have to roll two sixes?”

“That’s about right,” Fai agrees.

The teenager comes to a halt in front of the table, picking up the set of dice, staring.

“…Well,” he mutters, rolling them slightly in his hand, listening to the way they rattle and clack.

“Fuck.”

After all—in his entire life, he’s been infamous for one thing: having bad luck.

Both of the other ghosts nod, staring at him sympathetically. They could smell it on him, when he arrived.

“Reincarnation really isn’t that—”

“Can you say how much you wanna bet?”

“…” Xiang scratches the back of his head. “…Yeah,” he agrees cautiously. “Why?”

“And your odds go up, the more you bet—right?”

He wouldn’t know for sure—but it sounds right. He’s never gambled before. Never needed to.

“Right,” Fai agrees, then frowns. “…What are you…?”

“Well,” the teenager tilts his head, cracking his neck, “I’ll bet the whole thing, then.”

That’ll put his odds as high as they’re ever going to get, anyway—and he doesn’t have time to waste, hanging around there. These two look like they’ve already been here for decades.

“…YOUR ENTIRE SOUL?!!” Xiang half screams, lunging forward to stop him. “Don’t be crazy, didn’t you hear what I just said?! YOU COULD BE HANDSOME, A PRINCE, YOU—!”

The teenager throws down the dice with a flick of his wrist.

If he can't get back, he doesn't need a soul.

It's simple, really.

Both ghosts stare, trembling, watching the dice roll across the table. Of the three, the teenager seems the most calm, by far.

"...I thought you didn't like the kid," Fai mumbles, fingers trembling where they cover his mouth.

"Shut up! I hate him!"

Xiang cries, barely peeking out from where his fingers cover his eyes. "Did it...did it...?"

Both stop, when they see the dice come to a halt.

"...You're..." Xiang scrambles forward, staring in shock, jaw dropping so hard, the bone dislocates. "You're fucking kidding me!"

But, joke or not, a set of sixes stares right back up at him.

Thirty years of playing, with no luck. And now...this kid...in one throw...

"...Right," the teenager nods, like this—this was just expected. The natural order of things.

Both ghosts stare at each other in abject shock.

"I'm out of here," he mutters, cracking his knuckles. "Good luck to the both of you, though."

"...You realize it's not gonna be that easy, even when you get out?!" Xiang grumbles, sending Fai an annoyed glance.

It's that time, after all.

The dark haired young man turns back.

These two are annoying—and he doesn't find himself in the mood for doing any favors. But they did tell him how to play. And without that, he wouldn't be able to return.

He believes in returning favors, as a general rule.

"Back in the mortal realm," he calls out. "Is there anything the two of you want done?"

Fai and Xiang don't have to look at each other—that one's easy.

"Old man Shi is probably dead and gone by now," Xiang grumbles, "but you make sure his descendants pay for what they did to us!"

"...They're the ones who scattered your ashes?"

Xiang nods, teeth clenched from the memory. "They're a merchant family, most powerful ones in the eastern region of Xuli. And when you get those assholes, you tell them..." He claps a hand over his chest, "Xiang sent you from HELL!"

His friend jumps up and down beside him, pumping his fists in the air, "And FAI!"

"..." The teenager doubts that the merchant's descendants would know either of their names, but he tilts his head in acknowledgement. "Fine, fine..."

There's a low, rattling creak.

When the young man turns his head to find it's source—there's another door in the wall.

Smaller, big enough for just one person—made from what looks to be the purest jade. He makes his way forward, footsteps echoing across the walls.

"Hey, kid?"

He looks back one last time.

Xiang rubs the side of his head, watching the younger ghost with a newfound curiosity. After all—there is something weird about him.

Something almost...regal, in an odd sense of the word. "Did you ever come up with a new name?"

For a moment, the teenager is quiet.

Xiang half expects him to say something about not needing one, or repeating that, "Wu Ming" bullshit again, which is ridiculous. Every ghost needs a proper name, even the ones that are cursed or have their original names stolen—

This time, the young ghost actually answers.

“Hua Cheng.” He murmurs, staring at something in his hand—something that neither of the ghosts standing before him can catch a glimpse of. “You can call me Hua Cheng.”

With that, he turns back around, marching towards the door.

A slow, pleased grin stretches across Xiang’s face. Revealing a wickedly sharp set of teeth, and a forked tongue. “An excellent name indeed, young master,” he murmurs, watching as the door swings open. “Safe travels.”

“Do you think he’ll make it far?” Fai muses from his side.

The door swings shut from behind him—and Xiang’s smile never fades, feeling assured now, that he’ll have his revenge. That even if they cannot manage to return on their own—this youth will bring suffering in their stead.

“Oh, yes,” he nods, picking up the dice. “I’m certain.”

The most deceiving thing about modern myths, in Hua Cheng’s experience, is the idea that there’s some sort of road to hell. If there was, it would be easier to get to.

The path back from hell is a slow, winding staircase. Each step is a little steeper than the last.

It almost tempts one to fall right back down—but his steps never seem to falter. The whole way up, his fingers twist around the stem clutched between his fingers.

The stem of a small white flower—petals perfectly formed, untouched by wilt or death.

Hua Cheng.

Maybe he can’t use his old name, but the roots of who he was remain in his new moniker, after all…

He’s still the boy who brought flowers, in the end.

He sees the flash of light ahead, knowing the destination is close, and…

The young ghost thinks of his beloved.

Screaming for him with tears in his eyes, begging him not to do it.

Hua Cheng doesn't regret protecting him. He never could—it isn't a part of who he is.

But he does regret, above all else, his nasty habit of leaving his love. In tears.

His fingers squeeze the flower tightly.

The light is even closer now—and whatever lies beyond—Hua Cheng will face it.

And once he's finished, he'll find dianxia again.

It's only a matter of time.

He reaches up, finding a small coral bead, braided into his hair—and his soul aches.

"...Wait for me," he whispers.

END OF THE BOOK FOUR ARC , ENTERING: MOUNT TONGLU

FOR THOSE WHO WOULD LIKE TO CONTINUE FROM THIS POINT ON TWITTER, START HERE .

An Eye for a Blade

Chapter Summary

“Ghost King,” he repeats slowly, considering the idea. He’s heard of them before— from dianxia, in a vague sort of way. Knows that, among ghosts—they sit at the top of the heap. “Is one about to be born?”

“...In a way,” each of the ghosts around him nods their heads in agreement. “When it opens—whoever is left will be reborn.”

It.

Hua Cheng turns his head again—and this time, when he narrows his gaze, his eyes quickly adjust, magnifying far more than the average human can see—there’s a mountain in the distance. “...When what opens?”

There’s shrieking laughter, somewhere beyond the hills. Agonized screams, the clang of blades. Hua Cheng reaches for his own saber defensively—only to find his hip bare. Of all of the things not to be carried with him...

“...The kiln,” one of the ghosts replies.

Chapter Notes

TW// VIOLENCE AND GORE

You can find me on twitter and keep up with current updates of the story HERE

This story also has some spotify playlists for those who want some fun listening while reading!

No Paths Are Bound: The Playlist
Calamity Xie Lian: The Playlist
The Wu Ming Playlist

After what feels like an eternity, his feet find the landing of the stairwell—and when he presses his palm flat against the doorway that awaits, pushing it open—

A road awaits him.

Long, winding, the sky overhead dull and gloomy, storm clouds gathering.

"..." Hua Cheng crosses his arms over his chest, watching as hordes of people flood past on the road, all marching towards some unknown destination with great haste.

And, oddly enough, they're all ghosts.

Slowly, he tilts his head, only tugged from his thoughts when someone knocks into him.

"Oi!" The middle-aged ghost glares, brushing off the front of his tunic. "Why don't you pay attention before you stop and stand in the middle of the street, you...!"

The young man turns to look at him, one bloody red iris gleaming in the dull sunlight, and he falls silent, laughing nervously. "Actually—never mind! I should have been paying more attention to where I was going—a-apologies, young master!"

Hua Cheng arches an eyebrow.

It’s the first time in his life that anyone has ever referred to him by any form of title. He’s gone by many names before.

Monster. Bastard. Abomination.

Hong’er, little spirit, and Wu Ming.

Some cruel, others familiar—but never a name that rang with such respect.

Such fear.

“...Where are all of these people going?” He sighs, looking to the road ahead. There are crowds of ghosts scrambling over one another in their hurry, some getting trampled.

“You don’t know?” The ghost questions, eyes wide, and when the young man’s gaze snaps back to him, he gulps

“...Bai Wuxiang is dead,” he explains quickly, sending his companions a placating gesture when a couple stir impatiently, clearly eager to get back on the march.

"Is he really?" Hua Cheng muses, his lips curving up with pleasure. "How?"

"Struck down by the heavens," The ghost explains, shivering, wrapping its arms around itself with displeasure. After all—if even a calamity like the white no-face could be obliterated, what hope did the rest of them have?

"Was it by the Crown Prince of Xianle?"

The older ghost pauses, his tone incredulous.

"What? That loser? Ha! It—"

There's a low shriek in the air as the spirit's form dissolves in the grip of Hua Cheng's fist, fading into a faint flame—before even those are snuffed out by a twist of his fingers.

The ghost's companion watches with wide, horrified eyes.

"..." The young man shakes his wrist; whatever remains of the man's soul being scattered after he consumed him. Not particularly enticing when it comes to taste, but a much-needed meal. "Who killed the white clothed calamity?"

This question is directed at the ghosts remaining.

"U-Um, the heavenly emperor did," one explains, staring at the empty place where his companion once stood. "The crown prince has b even banished a second time."

Hua Cheng's lip curls with distaste, but he asks nothing more of the heavens.

He isn't interested in such worthless trash, anyway.

"What does his death have to do with the ghosts here?"

"...He was the only ghost king in existence," another spirit answers slowly, trembling the moment the youth's eyes land upon him. "There must be another."

"Ghost King," he repeats slowly, considering the idea. He's heard of them before— from dianxia, in a vague sort of way. Knows that, among ghosts—they sit at the top of the heap. "Is one about to be born?"

"...In a way," each of the ghosts around him nods their heads in agreement. "When it opens—whoever is left will be reborn."

It.

Hua Cheng turns his head again—and this time, when he narrows his gaze, his eyes quickly adjust, magnifying far more than the average human can see—

There's a mountain in the distance. "...When what opens?"

There's shrieking laughter, somewhere beyond the hills. Agonized screams, the clang of blades.

Hua Cheng reaches for his own saber defensively—only to find his hip bare. Of all the things not to be carried with him...

"...The kiln," one of the ghosts replies.

From the way they're all staring—Hua Cheng can glean what the 'Kiln' must be. A volcano, already spewing smoke and ash into the sky, the ground rumbling as more ghosts rapidly begin their approach.

That explains the weather, then.

"..." The youth crosses his arms, thinking.

"Being a Ghost King," he questions, his head slowly tilting to the side. "Are there any benefits?"

One of the spirits standing back snorts, like that must be some sort of ghost, but, well —

It takes one sharp look to shut him up.

"...Besides being the strongest, you mean?"

The ghost standing closest to him mumbles, "Isn't that the biggest benefit there is?" Slowly, the young man smiles—a set of newly formed fangs flashing between his lips. "It's plenty."

He listens closer, hears the screams getting louder.

"Is there fighting going on?"

"The more ghosts you kill, the better your chances are," one of the spirits standing around explains, then, when he sees the ghosts around him tense with worry, he falls silent.

After all, their plan was to stick together until they reached the mountainside. But now…

None of them expected to encounter a savage level ghost so early on—even if he clearly is in a weakened state, he…

“Thank you, for your help.” The dark-haired figure murmurs, beginning to stride forward. “I’ll give you a reward in exchange.”

He’s a reasonable man, after all.

The ghosts pause, glancing between each other with confusion, wondering what this young man could offer them, but—

Hua Cheng glances back over his shoulder, one eye burning like a cursed star, lips curled back into a snarl.

“Turn back, now—and I won’t swallow you whole.”

There isn’t debate, or any false attempts at bravado before they turn tail and run, desperately attempting to make their way back down the road they were once charging down with such determination.

Hua Cheng’s eyes return to the path ahead.

To the kiln.

Without a weapon, this is going to be inconvenient.

But he can feel the weakness in his limbs now—still strong, when compared to the average ghost, but not as strong as he was.

Not strong enough to be of use to his god. To protect him. Hua Cheng can’t afford to stay this way.

So, he’ll just have to change the circumstances.

It’s as simple as that.

Besides…

His fingers curve in, long, gleaming talons forming in the place of fingernails, fangs extending.

You always have a weapon, if you’re creative enough. It’s just a matter of imagination.

The road is long. Impossibly so.

He couldn’t tell you how many hours it is, charging forward—crushing spirits beneath his feet, between his jaws, shredding them with his claws.

It must have been days.

And still, there were more.

Even as his limbs begin to feel stronger.

As the rest of his senses begin to return, expanding out over the land.

There are millions of ghosts—a near inconceivable number, even to him. Each with the same destination in mind. Most are worthless little weaklings, foolish little creatures that came all this way to be food.

But, from what he can tell—there are five creatures of savage rank, like him, that might present a challenge.

One smells mildly familiar—but is so far in the distance, Hua Cheng can’t place him. He surveys the battlefield from the top of a craggy rock formation, gaze narrowed.

Each enemy is an evaluation, weighed against the potential risk of delaying his approach to the kiln. Of the five savage ghosts present, two are still stronger than him. Tackling that—

"You're an odd one, aren't you?" a voice drawls from behind him. The young man goes still.

When he glances back over his shoulder, there's a woman standing there. Tall, slender—long hair, falling loose around her shoulders.

Hua Cheng has never been one to care for things like beautiful women—but, objectively speaking, she is rather lovely.

Delicate lips and sharp cheekbones, wearing robes of red and black, with gold embellishments along the sleeves.

If not for the dried blood in a tear of her gown, directly over her heart, the younger ghost might have mistaken her for a bride.

And eyes the color of blood.

"You've been to the other side, haven't you?" She muses, narrowed gaze slowly looking the youth over. "I can smell it on you."

Hua Cheng elects not to answer, evaluating her with his own gaze—and sumptuous lips turn up into a sly grin.

"Considering devouring me, young master?"

Clearly, he is—he can smell the spiritual power rolling from her. And it's a battle of the fittest, after all. If he doesn't attack, she will.

The woman doesn't seem particularly interested in that, however. "It's rare for a soul to come back after dispersion."

She walks forward, black heeled boots clicking against the stone beneath her feet, leaning close, breathing him in. "And that curse, my, my—"

The moment she leans in to get a better look, the youth lunges, fangs bared—

Only to be stopped by a delicate, impossibly strong hand.

Perfectly manicured fingernails dig into the skin of his throat as she bares fangs of her own, hissing in his face, "Don't INTERRUPT me while I'm speaking, whelp!"

He's twice her size, easily—but thrown to the ground with all the effort it would take to throw a ragdoll.

It doesn't damage him, not particularly—but his body does sink three feet into the earth, deeply fracturing volcanic rock in its wake.

She drops down beside him, landing lightly on her feet.

"What's your name?" The ghost questions, her voice cold with impatience.

When the young man doesn't answer, her foot drops down on his chest, the sharp heel of it digging in until he clenches his teeth in discomfort.

"First lesson in being a ghost, boy—" She hisses, pupils narrowing, "You WANT people to know your name!"

"...Hua Cheng." He growls.

And just like that, the foot lifts from his chest, and her tone becomes far more pleasant.

"Was that so difficult?" She muses, taking a step back.

"..." The youth rises to his feet slowly, glaring, and her smile returns. "You may call me Zhao Beitong."

He brushes his hand against his chest, wary. After all, he thought there were only five ghosts of savage rank in the vicinity, but he never sensed her, not until she was right behind him.

Even now, he struggles to sense her spiritual power—but clearly, her strength is immense.

"...If people knowing a ghost's name is so important," he grumbles, eyes flashing with annoyance, "how come I've never heard of you?"

Clearly that brushes some sort of sore note—he can tell from the way her eyes flash with annoyance, but her smile only widens.

"The weaker ones need the name recognition," she muses, slowly stalking around him in a slow circle. "Why have you come here?"

"The same reason as you, I'm sure." He mutters, still tense understanding now that, if it comes into a fight, it won't end well for him.

Her laugh is cold, like the wind that cuts past them, flowing through her hair. "This is my home," she responds coldly. "And I have lived alone for a very, very long time."

"..." Hua Cheng glances around, and slowly—he recognizes what they're standing in for what it is.

Not a craggy rock formation, like what he originally mistook it for—but a city. Buried in long cooled flows of lava and volcanic ash.

When he turns back to her, she isn't smiling anymore—lips pressed into a tight frown, waist length hair blowing in the wind.

"...What is this place?" He questions, eyes struggling to take in the sight before his eyes.

Dianxia told him many stories in their time together—many of them historical, featuring natural disasters...

But never anything on this scale. Zhao Beitong's hands ball up into fists.

"I will tell you, if you answer my question," She lifts her chin. "Why have you come here?"

"..." Hua Cheng crosses his arms over his chest, irritated by the delay, but understanding that he isn't dealing with someone who can be forced into speaking. "To enter the kiln."

Zhao Beitong waves that off, almost bored by that situation—and Hua Cheng supposes, if this truly is her home, this must be somewhat of a regular occurrence for her. "Why have you returned to this world?" She questions again, her gaze intent.

The young man hesitates.

It's the easiest question in the world to answer—and yet, for the first time, he feels the urge to deny it. His instincts telling him the answer will bring danger, but...

Ghosts have a penchant for detecting lies.

"...I still have someone precious in this world," he replies.

A powerful form of love. Incredibly rare. In fact—

In all of Zhao Beitong's years—and even among ghosts, she is ancient—she has never heard of a dispersed soul coming back for something so simple.

"If that's true, why haven't you returned to them?" Hua Cheng's jaw clenches.

"...I could not effectively protect him, as I am now."

She hardly even reacts to the revelation of the gender of Hua Cheng's beloved, simply arches one perfectly shaped eyebrow, "It shouldn't be difficult for a savage ghost like yourself to protect a single human."

"...He's a prince," Hua Cheng replies flatly, not worrying about that identifying marker—after all, this world has many princes walking its surface. "With many enemies."

Zhao Beitong's eyes widen sharply, then narrow once more, her arms crossing over her chest.

He's unsure of what to expect, but—

"I loved a prince, once," she mutters, eyes filled with emotions that the young man, in his broad experience of suffering, can't manage to fathom.

"It was the end of me."

Slowly, she turns around. "Can you read?"

Again, he hesitates.

"I said," she repeats, her voice sharp with annoyance, "can you read?"

"...Somewhat," he answers flatly.

Dianxia taught him some, but, given his condition...the process was slow, and by the end of his life, Hua Cheng had only picked up the most basic characters.

Zhao Beitong lifts one hand, pointing to the east. When Hua Cheng follows the gesture with his eyes, he finds a sign there. No, more like what might have once been an entrance plaque—either to a government building, or a temple.

"Those characters—they spell Wuyong."

She explains, lowering her arm. "That is the name of this place. If you're clever enough to make it to your destination, I'm sure you'll learn the rest for yourself."

Spite drips from her like acid rain, a level of vengefulness Hua Cheng can only admire, and he asks—

"What about you?"

At first, she does not answer—her back still turned, posture tense. And eventually, she replies—

"What about me?"

"Why do you linger on in this world?" The young man questions. It seems an odd place to haunt—and she seems lacking in purpose.

Her shoulders seem to hunch even higher, but before Hua Cheng question the reaction, she responds—her voice low, bubbling with resentment.

"Because I also have someone precious in this world." And yet, her voice doesn't sound loving.

It sounds utterly hateful.

Before Hua Cheng can say more, in the blink of an eye... She's gone.

In her place is simply...a butterfly.

Emitting a silvery, unnatural light—lazily drifting past him as it glides through the air. He tries to reach out, to snatch it between his fingers, but...

It's gone.

Hua Cheng spends the next hour wandering the place, slowly piecing apart the characters she pointed out to him, assigning them to sounds.

He never had teachers, growing up. Pain was his teacher, and the humiliation that came with it.

But he’s always been quick to learn.

The language itself isn’t so different from that of Xianle, just older. If he had a stronger foundation of reading level, he could have decoded more of it, but...

What he does manage to learn is that this place was once called the kingdom of Wuyong, just as Zhan Beitong said.

And, just like Xianle—

They worshipped a crown prince, born under a cursed star.

He stops before what was once a temple, his head tilted, slightly contemplative, considering the idea of going inside, but...

There’s a faint rumble in the distance, and his eyes flash with resolve

His questions can be answered later—for now—

The ghost has work to do.

Several mountains roam the region—crushing hordes of ghosts under their foundations, nearly overtaking him twice, when he isn’t paying attention.

But never the mountain in the center.

Mount Tonglu.

And the closer the ghost grows to the kiln, the thicker the heat of battle becomes.

With each victory, he can feel himself gaining strength, but there are limitations.

He's forced to feed on smaller, weaker ghosts, unable to use anything but fangs and claws.

Any lower-level weapons he tries to take hold of have the nasty tendency of shattering under his hands, worse than useless—and the other savage ghosts, particularly the more challenging ones, require more than just raw physical strength to deal with.

Hua Cheng is nearly at the foot of the mountain, contemplating an option, ways to gain a tool that would help him acquire the upper hand, when he notices something.

Something that distinctly doesn't belong.

Slowly, he breaths in, his lip curling with distaste—

Humans.

"..." He turns his head sharply, nostrils flaring, pupils dilating.

What on earth are humans doing here?

It also explains why so many lower-level ghosts have been flocking to the area so quickly, often only throwing themselves into his jaws.

They smell live bait.

"You could be smarter than the rest of them, you know," an all too familiar voice drawls.

Hua Cheng rolls his eyes, not looking up—but a pale ankle dangles in front of his face, connected to a delicately shaped calf.

Zhao Beitong stretches out on the rock outcropping overhead.

She's bored, watching so many ghosts battle for victory in a game that she clearly doesn't deem worth playing, taking slow, lazy bites from an apple, the juices dripping down her chin.

“You know, I really LOVE it when people make annoying, vague comments,” Hua Cheng sneers.

“It’s incredibly helpful. Keep up the good work.”

The ghost smiles, not annoyed by his cheek this time. “You know what you’ll need for the kiln, don’t you?”

Hua Cheng huffs, starting to walk past her, but that foot stops him, the ball of her shoe pressing into his forehead.

“A spiritual tool,” She carries on, using her toe to shove him back a foot, taking another bite from her apple. “And currently, you aren’t equipped to do much more than please a woman.”

He levels an unimpressed stare in her direction, and she amends—

“Or a prince, if you like.”

He clearly would, but that’s beside the point.

“I’ll be sure to pick one up on my next stop to the market,” he replies, his tone withering.

“You know, if you stop being such a cocky little brat for a moment, I’ll teach you something,” the elder ghost hums.

He falls silent.

She tosses her apple core into the air, watching with mild boredom as a horde of bats descend upon it, ripping the scrap—and each other—into pieces in the air.

“A spiritual tool is always forged through blood sacrifice,” Zhao Beitong murmurs, her gaze far, far away.

“If you’re clever…” Her eyes flicker towards the cave, where the human scent lingers. “You’ll have quite the forge for yourself.”

The youth pauses, staring up at her. “…I thought spiritual tools were formed through noble acts. Martyrdom. Enduring suffering. Things like that.”

Zhao Beitong’s lips twist up into a sly smirk, and she shakes her head. “Who tells people that, the gods?”

Hua Cheng falls silent. His knowledge on that subject—and most subjects of higher learning—came exclusively from dianxia. Who was well learned, yes, but...

The older he grows, he begins to learn that his god, in all his talents, strengths, and knowledge, doesn't know everything. And often, he's only ever been shown life through one perspective.

That isn't dianxia's own failing—Hua Cheng would never blame him for it.

But he was raised to trust the heavens blindly, to take every teaching from the lips of the heavenly emperor as gospel.

Hua Cheng, by contrast, has lived a life that causes him to view those who look down from on high with a far more jaded perspective.

"Listen to me well,"

Zhao Beitong drawls, spinning something between her fingers, the object flashing far too quickly for Hua Cheng to pick out what it is. "Magic does not care how kind you are, how good, or how evil. It only cares for how much you pay. It is a transaction, not a moral exercise."

It makes sense, Hua Cheng supposes. After all, if spiritual tools were only formed by incredible acts of kindness and sacrifice, gods would be the only ones to possess them.

Upon thinking of it—Hua Cheng suspects that's why the heavens would push such a lie about magic.

Not out of some desire to stop humans from committing acts of evil to form spiritual tools, no—but to ensure that their side would be the only one to have any.

"...And how do you know so much about these things?" He questions, lifting his chin. Her smile fades slightly.

Not out of sadness, no—Hua Cheng can detect a note of pride in her gaze, mixed with...many other emotions, most of them beyond his understanding.

"I forged many spiritual tools in my human lifetime," Zhao Beitong murmurs, looking back up at the sky, her tone growing...

Somewhat bitter.

Her prince needed so many, after all—and such a fondness for his swords.

And in the end, what did she forge, if nor the finest blade of them all?

“If you want the strength to protect the one you love, you’ll be forced to make such choices.”

Just as she did.

“...” The young man takes one, taloned finger, using it to delicately nudge her ankle out of his face, continuing towards the cave. “I’ll keep that in mind.”

The moment Hua Cheng fades from her sight, the cocksure smirk on her face fades, because she knows what will come.

After all, she’s been playing this game for many, many years—and while many have impressed her, none have risen to the levels of becoming...

Zhao Beitong closes her eyes with a sigh, dropping back down on the rock outcropping—and she waits for the young man to meet his doom.

They always do.

Most people need to go through a long, horrific journey to learn to hate their own kind. To fall from grace, to experience some horrible form of betrayal.

For Hua Cheng, that was never necessary.

He’s always disliked humans—after all, they never gave him a reason to think otherwise.

The first clear memory he has of his human life is of his mother—and it’s also one of the last he has of her. Not because, like Xie Lian’s Guoshi predicted, she would have abandoned him, no...

Humans took her away from him. All while laughing, sneering, and calling her son a little monster.

That is among one of Hua Cheng’s earliest memories of the world, and it is not one that he is willing to delve into. Even now, after everything he has lived through.

That memory stays in a box, carefully locked away.

So, no—he has little love for his own species, dead or alive. And when he approaches the cave entrance—he hasn't completely ruled out Zhao Beitong's suggestion.

After all, whatever brought these humans here, he can't imagine their reasons were sympathetic, but...

But when Hua Cheng enters the mouth of the cave, he finds something he wasn't expecting.

A detail that is often lost or forgotten in the stories that follow.

"...Gege?"

The ghost freezes at the sound of a soft, frightened voice—clearly that of a child.

And the further he walks into the cave, he realizes—nearly all the humans present are children. Under the age of fourteen at the least, some of them are so young, they can barely speak at all.

The only adult he can set his eyes on is a young woman, huddled in the corner with two of the smallest children, barely more than infants, cradled in her arms. And when he speaks—his voice is cold in its confusion,

"...What is it?"

The young girl glances up—and she yelps.

It takes a moment for Hua Cheng to realize—she must have done so upon seeing his face, leaving her to cringe against the wall, petrified, clutching both children even closer.

"...Why are you here?" The ghost questions again, retracting his claws and fangs.

"I...W-We..."

She stammers, staring at him, lips pale and trembling, "We were...t-traveling, there... there wasn't enough room in the orphanages in the city anymore, and....a-a merchant said he was establishing another facility in the next town over, so..."

Hua Cheng arches an eyebrow.

"Well..." He glances around, taking in the bats, spiders, and blood splattered walls. Slowly, his form becomes less intimidating as he steps into the light, “It’s an interesting place to pick for an orphanage, I’ll give him that.”

One of the older children lets out a startled laugh, and the young woman glares, suddenly defensive. “It wasn’t supposed to be here!” She cries. “He said there were too many demons on the road, so he hired a cultivator to help escort us on the journey! But...” She trials off.

“The further we traveled, there were just...there were so many ghosts, and...he said the best thing we could do was hide,” she whispers, eyes wide—and clearly traumatized. “There were twice as many of us, before.”

When Hua Cheng glances around—he counts nearly thirty present.

Which means thirty children have already died, for what seems to be utter idiocy at first glance. “Where is the cultivator who was escorting you before?”

“He went to go get help hours ago,” the girl explains, her eyes misted over with tears, “but...he never came back.”

Slowly, the ghost lifts his head—eyeing the cafe ceiling.

There’s an array there, likely put in place before Mount Tonglu opened— drawn in human blood.

All the sudden, he knows exactly what this is.

An overfilled orphanage, desperate to solve a crowding problem.

A cultivator—likely of the demonic breed—looking to capitalize on the resentment that would be released by the opening of Mount Tonglu.

And what better sacrifice, than so many innocent souls?

Half as effective now given that he failed to keep so many of them alive, but still.

These children weren’t being moved—they were sold like cattle.

Hua Cheng’s lip curls with disgust as he shakes his head.

A typically selfish, callous, human act.

“...Gege?” A voice calls again, and when Hua Cheng looks down, there’s a little boy standing beside his leg.

Small, horribly thin—with a mop of messy brown hair, staring up at the young man with wide, slightly hopeful eyes. “Did you come to save us?”

The youth pauses, his lips slightly parted, and the boy shivers a little, tugging on his sleeve, whispering—

“There are ghosts outside!”

The dark-haired youth stares down at him for a moment, his expression unreadable.

Outside, neither savage nor calamity, another ghost stares at the sky, waiting for his downfall.

They always do, after all. No matter which path they choose. When Hua Cheng was very small, he used to play a game.

Whenever he was being beaten or screamed at. Whenever he was hungry, tired, and alone, he would pretend that he was someone else.

At first, that vision wasn’t particularly concrete.

He just imagined himself as someone with a bed. Or dinner. Sometimes, he’d imagine a world where he had a father, and his mother didn’t have to do the things that she did.

When she was gone, he would pretend that he was someone who had a mother at all.

Not the woman they forced him to live with after. Someone gentle, who smiled whenever she saw him, who didn’t cringe with disgust when she saw his face.

Then, as he got older, he imagined himself—but the future. He pretended that he would get out of that place.

That he would come back later, a wealthy, powerful man—with a beautiful wife, chests of gold, a gilded carriage, fine blades—and he would rub that wealth in their faces. Make them beg for his forgiveness, just to beg for his scraps.

Then, his imagination turned vengeful.

He imagined himself becoming a warrior, stronger than everyone else, so strong, that no one could beat him anymore—

And then, he would start hurting them, in turn.

He would kill everyone who ever laid a hand on him. On everyone who watched it happen. Then everyone else, too.

Just for good measure. Just for the crime of being happy in a world that had treated him so cruelly.

He was playing that very game, during the God Pleasing Parade. Leaning against the very end of the city wall, imagining how spiteful it would be, to throw himself from the edge.

And then, for just a moment—it wasn't a game anymore.

That was the day when everything changed. When the whole world changed, because...

That was the day that Hua Cheng learned that at least one person in the world could be kind, only for the sake of it.

That somewhere in the world—not in the confines of a game, or a fantasy of his head —there was a place where he could feel safe. Even if he was never good enough to be allowed to stay.

Even if his luck was truly so rotten, he couldn't be allowed to stand in the prince's presence.

The thought of it made him weep, back then. Made him want to cry and scream, until someone told him that it wasn't true. Clinging to the front of dianxia's robes as the Guoshi told him his fortune, crying that it wasn't true, that he wasn't cursed, that he wasn't bad luck—

And the crown prince held him so tightly, whispering,

'I know.'

'I know you're not.'

From that moment on, the game was still there—but it changed.

Instead of imagining that he was someone else, or a future version of himself— whenever Hua Cheng was suffering, he would just...

Imagine what dianxia would do, if he was there.

Not that he imagined the god would save him, no—even in his most desperate moments, the little boy never wanted to trouble Xie Lian in such a way.

But he would imagine the crown prince being brave, and just. Stronger than his enemies, casting them aside like they were nothing.

And honestly—Hua Cheng never quite managed the ‘just’ part. His temper never allowed for it.

But he tried to emulate the rest of it.

Now—he isn’t a child anymore. Now, he knows so much more about the world.

So much more now, about the god he worshipped—and later, as he learned what it meant, fell in love with.

Hua Cheng could never be exactly like the Crown Prince. No matter how hard he tried —they would always be different people, and he would only ever fall short of his goal.

And that’s alright—that’s—that’s just fine.

Because even if Xie Lian only ever saw him as a child, a lost little duckling following him around in the world, he still accepted him—cared for him enough to mourn him.

Still, old habits die hard—and Hua Cheng is good at this game. If Xie Lian was here, Hua Cheng knows what the god would do.

Even without any spiritual tools, he would still try and find a way to protect these children. Even if it was hopeless. Even if he knew that he would probably fail.

But what would—will—Hua Cheng do? He couldn’t tell you why.

When he looks into that child’s face, Hua Cheng can’t find some beautiful philosophy about the world. It never gave him a chance, and the ghost never returned the favor. He can’t use his god as justification, because this...is a serious risk.

Risking the very thing he bet his own soul for—returning to dianxia’s side.

But when he looks into those eyes—small, hopeful eyes, trusting him so easily...

The ghost knows he's capable of doing the cruel thing. Of turning around and leaving them to die—or, even worse…

Using them. That's likely exactly what Zhao Beitong meant for him to do, when she told him how to build a spiritual tool.

He can only imagine that the lives of so many children would create a tool of incredible evil—so powerful, he could go to the kiln right now.

There's no reason that he couldn't, or that he isn't capable of it.

But in this moment, the reason is as simple and as common as anything—

Hua Cheng doesn't want to.

Slowly, his hand lands on top of the boy's head, ruffling his hair, and he murmurs—

"I'll try."

It's most lowlifes coming after them anyway. And the more Hua Cheng kills—the stronger he'll get, he—

The logic is weak, of course—but he tries to tell himself that there's a chance. That, when the time comes, he won't have to choose the worst option.

"…Thank you," the oldest—the teenager whispers, her voice trembling. The same girl that cringed in disgust, upon first seeing his face.

"…" Hua Cheng doesn't respond, just turns around, walking back to the mouth of the cave without another word.

"Careful, gege!"

His steps halt for just a moment—and somehow, just barely, he manages a smile.

It feels so odd, hearing someone call him that name. Nostalgic, in a strange way.

When he returns to the mouth of the cave, Zhao Beitong hasn't moved, watching him curiously.

"What are you doing?"

The young ghost stands at the mouth of the cave, overlooking the valley below with a mildly grim expression.

“Something fucking stupid,” he admits, sounding almost annoyed by the whole thing. Annoyed by his own better angels, as it were.

“Well,” slowly, she smiles. “At least you know.”

He’s one of those reluctantly heroic types, isn’t he? She leans her hand on her chin, long, red tinted nails tapping against her chin as she watches the young man face the onslaught.

Probably has no idea that he is, too—all the better.

Still—success or failure, Zhao Beitong knows what will happen in either outcome. And either way, she will be disappointed.

You believe in things only to be disappointed enough times, and you develop a stubborn sense of nihilism—even in the afterlife.

Still, she watches him try.

For three days, she watches him try.

Slaughtering countless hordes of ghosts and goblins—to the point where the bodies begin to pile in mounds along the mountain path.

Until he’s soaked in blood up to the elbow, looking more like a beast than a hero protecting the helpless.

Until his claws are too slick with blood to get a proper grip, and he’s left with nothing but his teeth.

On the third day, in between waves of hordes—he forces himself to stumble back inside, attempting to wipe the sweat from his face—but ending up streaked in blood instead.

There’s a small pool near the back of the cavern—flowing from the aqueducts beneath the fallen cities of Wuyong. Most of it corpse water, he’s had to waste spiritual power purifying it enough for them to drink several times already.

And now, shaking with exhaustion, he attempts to clean the blood away, scrubbing at his arms, his face, cupping his hands and pouring it over his hair—

Then, there’s light pressure against his cheek, and he turns his head, snapping with a hiss.

“I-I’m sorry!”

It’s—

It’s the teenage girl. The one who unwittingly led an orphanage-worth of children to a hideous fate. The one who cringed from him with terror and disgust, the first time she saw him.

She’s scrambling away now, a rag clutched between trembling fingers. “I’m sorry, s-sir!”

“...” Hua Cheng’s eyes level on her face, pale and drawn. She’s shrunk back against the cave wall, trembling like a leaf, knees pulled up against her chest. All the other children seem used to him—or, at the very least, understand he’s a friend.

But she’s still petrified.

“What are you doing?” He questions flatly.

“U-um...” The rag is still clutched to her chest—and by his estimations, she’s probably on the verge of hyperventilation at any moment now, but she swallows it down. “Y- You still have blood on your face,” she mumbles, her voice small.

If he were a gentleman, he’d probably say something about how it was an honor, getting bloody in the defense of a young lady. If he was interested in girls—or anyone at all, for that matter, he’d probably smirk and tease her for wanting an excuse to touch his face.

But Hua Cheng isn’t a gentleman, and he isn’t interested in girls, or anyone else. And even if he was—she’s already expressed how repulsed she was by him already.

“What’s that got to do with you?” He replies, his voice cold. The young woman pauses, wringing the rag anxiously.

“...You’re...” She swallows dryly, forcing herself to push away from the cave wall, creeping forward once again—cautiously this time, like she half expects the ghost to lash out at her again.

He doesn’t—just watches her with narrowed, distrustful eyes. “Your arms...are shaking.”

She explains carefully, slowly—and ironically enough, with shaking limbs of her own —bringing the rag back to the ghost's cheek. "S-So… let me," she mumbles, gently patting the blood, grime, and dirt from the young man's skin.

Hua Cheng watches, his expression…complicated.

She's careful, gentle—and even if she is trembling with terror, it's still the gentlest touch the ghost has received since, well…

And even then, in his entire life, the Crown Prince was the only one who had ever touched Hua Cheng gently.

"I'm…um…I'm sorry, r-really," She mumbles, dropping the rag down in the pool beside them, squeezing it until the blood rinses out, before bringing it up to the ghost's hands.

Her lips tremble, when she sees the talons—and she looks a little faint—but she lifts his wrist up anyway, cleaning them attentively.

"I-I shouldn't have screamed the way I did," the teenager mumbles, her eyes downcast with…

Genuine shame.

"I've always been afraid of ghosts," she admits, her voice slightly lowered so the children won't hear, "ever since I was a little kid, but…"

She bites her lip.

"…I didn't realize there were nice ones," She admits, staring at the ground sheepishly, like it's such an embarrassing thing to say.

Hua Cheng can't stop staring. Baffled that, by anyone's assertion, he could ever be viewed as a 'nice' ghost.

His silence is pointed—not aided by his glare—and eventually, it's awkward enough that she tries to break it.

"W… were you getting married?" She questions, cupping in the water in her palms so she can use it to rinse the blood from his hair—and Hua Cheng pauses.

"…What?"

"Your robes," she mumbles, looking them over. They're stained an even more vivid shade of red now, but…Hua Cheng remembers, now.

He forgot that, years ago, when they were building his funeral pyre, a farmer dressed him in the robes of a bride groom.

"...No," he mutters.

"I was just laid to rest in these."

"Oh," she pauses, her eyebrows knitting together. "Isn't that...bad luck?"

The ghost lets out a low snort. He was born with the worst possible luck that a human being could have—the clothes he was buried in would hardly make a difference.

But he doesn't explain that—instead, he just says—

"There was someone." His eyes stare at the darkness of the cave walls, unreadable. "But I never got the chance to ask."

Like he ever would have had the nerve, anyway—or would have been accepted, if he did.

"...I'm sorry," The teenager murmurs, frowning with sympathy. "W... Was she beautiful?"

Hua Cheng doesn't feel the need to correct the gender at this point—doesn't feel at ease enough to offer up too many details. "...Yes," he sighs. "More than anything else in the world."

She seems pleased by the thought. It must sound so romantic when you didn't actually live through it. When you don't know...the circumstance. "Did she love you too?"

There was a time when he would have instinctively replied no, never. That it wasn't possible.

Now...

"Yes."

'Because I loved you too much.'

It's hard not to believe that, particularly when the person doesn't even realize that you're around to hear it.

If it was ever possible for Hua Cheng to Rest in Peace, those words ended that chance then and there.

How could he ever leave?

When he watched his beloved hold his body, weeping, whispering those words—how could he ever move on?

Even if it isn't the same type of love as the one that Hua Cheng feels—it's the only love that he's ever been given.

And he can't—he can't let that go, not ever.

"...When you died..." She questions softly, gently wringing what's left of the water out of the ends of his hair, "Did you hurt your eye?"

"..." He lifts his fingertips to his face, slowly brushing over his right eyelid, and he shakes his head. "I was born that way."

"...Oh."

She frowns, her voice awkward, sympathetic, and...

It's that sympathetic tone that makes him stiffen again, pulling out of her grasp.

"There are more coming," he mutters, rising to his feet. Maybe he should tell her to stay back, or something like that, but...

That's something a gentleman would do. Or maybe someone heroic. The main character in a fairytale. A prince. A god. Any of those things—but not him.

Hua Cheng has never had the opportunity to doubt who or what he is. The world has spent his entire life reminding him.

A monster. An abomination. A freak. Even then, when she was thanking him, that girl —

She was disgusted by him, all the same. Even then. Pitying him, when he admitted he lived his entire life with such a face.

Even if she hadn't, there will always be the words from that night.

'A disgusting little monster,'

His teeth pull back into a snarl again, as he launches himself into another battle, over and over again. As though somehow, if he pushes enough of the anger, turmoil, and anguish in his chest out through the violence he unleashes, it'll hurt less.

‘Desperately in love with a princess.’

Hua Cheng isn’t the hero in any fairy tale. Even now, even after—

‘But he can never say his name,’

His teeth gnash together.

Even after what was taken from him. Making his story more ‘interesting,’ in the words of the calamity.

At best, he’s a sympathetic villain. At worst, a forgettable side character that doesn’t even make it to the end.

Which seems more and more likely now, as the smaller hordes of ghosts and demons begin to thin out, and he sees what’s coming behind them.

A powerful, savage ghost.

Zhao Beitong sits up now, watching with greater interest.

It’s half man, half beast—nearly unrecognizable from what it must have been, in its previous life, standing over three meters tall.

Scales instead of skin, wielding a scalding black whip, blood dripping from its handle

“...What are you doing?” She whispers, watching with rapt interest as the creature charges forward, smoke pouring from its jaws—

But the young man she’s been watching—watching for days now, unable to draw her gaze away, doesn’t cower. Doesn’t even flinch.

He surveys the creature as it closes in with the same look of frustration that she saw before. Annoyed with himself. With—

With his own better angels.

His shoulders hunch as he drops into a crouch, one eye burning like fire as the other blends into the dark, fangs bared.

“Something...” He exhales sharply through his nose, finishing the last words with a snarl, “Fucking stupid!”

It’s hopeless, she thinks, watching the ghost as it battles the creature—fighting with a terrifying level of determination, yes, but unable to completely even the odds.

Even as he's able to wound it, using the strength from thousands of slaughtered ghosts as he leaps onto the beast's shoulders, using his claws to gauge at its eyes until it wails, he—

He can't contend with the whip.

A powerful spiritual tool.

One that rips his entire back open in one strike—and still, the pain doesn't seem to slow him down. If anything, it seems to wake him up, ignite a bloodlust that makes her want to cry out in frustration.

How, how could he not know that it's hopeless?!

"You have to stop!" She cries, hands balled up with frustration. Because—it's foolish, a waste! "You can't take another hit from that thing!"

His soul is trembling. Strong—stupidly strong, with such determination, she's almost scalded by the heat of it—but on the edge of shattering from the strain

"If you die, they'll die anyway!" Zhao Beitong snarls, slowly rising to her feet, "What's the point in that?!"

There isn't—and she knows that the child must know, from the way his teeth gnash together in frustration.

This is how it always ends, one way or another.

Mount Tonglu is a graveyard for good men, and a breeding ground of evil. To become corrupt is to survive. And to overcome that is to accept your fate.

There is no third path. She has watched this bloody metamorphosis since the dawn of the modern age, and she knows it's ways.

"SHUT UP!" He snarls, falling on the back foot, barely missing another strike from the whip, spitting blood as the creature before him roars. "DON'T YOU THINK I KNOW THAT, HAG?!"

She gawks, eyes widening in offense, "WHO ARE YOU CALLING A HAG, YOU STUPID BRAT?!"

There's only one way, and they both know what it is—and what he must do.

“STOP BEING A COWARD AND DO IT ALREADY!”

In one powerful leap, Hua Cheng leaps thirty meters back, landing on top of the rock formation above the mouth of the cave, breathing raggedly.

She isn’t wrong.

When he looks down the hillside, he sees another one coming—this time, an earth spirit, making the ground rumble and shatter as it rolls toward them. It won’t attack Hua Cheng’s enemy first, now—

They’ll fight to beat the other to finish him off first.

Whichever one does will get the gain in strength that comes with his kill—no small advantage.

It’s hopeless.

The ghost’s hands ball into fists, his breathing ragged. It’s hopeless, and he knew that from the very beginning.

And now—he finds himself looking to the mouth of the cave below.

Knowing that he gave himself the chance to do the right thing. That he tried, and he failed—but that failure is not an option.

That even if those below don’t deserve to die—Hua Cheng isn’t willing to die for them. That isn’t who he is. And even if it was—he has promises to keep.

He doesn’t have to kill them all. That’s the first whisper of temptation, creeping through his mind.

In the end, one soul can be enough.

His thoughts drift to the girl. The cowardly little fool.

The one who stupidly listened to that cultivator, leading so many helpless children to this place, cowering from him when he so much as looked in her direction. Pitying him, for being born with such a face.

For being born with the eye that the world has always cursed him for.

Hua Cheng could kill her. Use her body to create a tool, add more souls to it later, if it's not enough.

It was her stupidity that helped bring those children to this point in the first place. It seems like a fair exchange, in the end. Maybe not fair, but...

There's a bitter taste in his mouth.

When has life ever been fair? To him, or anyone else?

And if the world is such a way, why should he be any better? It's never shown the same courtesy to him.

Slowly, he drops down—landing before the cave entrance, walking back inside.

The children are cowering in the corner—and the girl, the same girl who spoke to him of her fears and his first loves just the span of hours before, is kneeling among them— trying to keep them from crying too loudly.

By his side, his fingers hook into claws. It's an ugly thing.

A horrible, hideous thing to do. Befitting a place such as this. A man such as him.

Another page in his story—one that was never intended to have a sympathetic story. No heroes. No happy endings.

"...Gege?"

The ghost comes to a halt, feeling a small hand tugging at his sleeve.

Slowly, he turns his head—his face covered in grime, sweat, and blood. Fangs and claws still extended, eyes swollen and red from the soot.

But the child staring up at him now—he doesn't seem afraid. Not of him. "...Did the ghosts hurt you?"

He—

"Gege!" Another voice cries.

This time, a little girl—running to his side, grabbing his hand. Not caring for the blood, or the talons. "Don't go back out there!" She cries, shaking her head. “We can sneak away, okay?”

“Yeah!” Another voice calls out, then another.

“Maybe there’s another way out!”

There isn’t.

“Maybe if we’re REALLY quiet, and we run fast, they won’t see us!” It won’t matter.

And maybe the little ones are too small to know that—but not all of them. Many of them know, he can see that.

He had eyes like that once, too. Young, understanding far too much.

And when the ghost’s eyes drift over to the girl—the same girl he had justified slaughtering just a moment before—

She’s smiling at him.

Trembling, as she holds as many children as she can carry, holding them close.

Terrified of what’s coming, but smiling at him.

Gratefully.

She doesn’t say the words out loud, doesn’t want to frighten the children who are still too young to understand the truth—that this is the end.

That there are creatures in this world that don’t care about small, weak, helpless little thing. That don’t have mercy on children.

But she mouths them to the ghost, tears slipping down her cheeks—

‘Thank you.’

From the mouth of the cave, the ghost can hear the monster’s roar.

Ever since Hua Cheng was small, he’s been playing a game with himself. Pretending to be someone else. A future version of himself.

When that didn’t work, he imagined what his god would do. Tried to emulate something that he knew he couldn’t be.

If this was dianxia, he would have died already. Outside, fighting those creatures to the end.

Because Xie Lian loves the world, and he'll always try to save it.

Even when Hua Cheng would argue a thousand times over—the world doesn't deserve his god, and it doesn't deserve saving, either.

But they will always be different people. And as deeply as he loves and admires his god, Hua Cheng could never be the same.

They don't need to be.

"...Gege?" The boy holding his sleeve frowns when the ghost tugs out of his grip, turning back around. "Gege, what are you doing?! Don't go back there, you'll—!"

He falls silent when a taloned hand, scorched with soot, stained with blood, lands on top of his head.

From above, a low voice rumbles—

"Don't be afraid."

His walk back to the front of the cave is slow, measured—each step purposeful.

Hua Cheng doesn't love the world, it's never given him a reason to.

And he isn't doing this out of some well thought out moral philosophy. Not because a god told him to, or because of some fear of higher retribution.

If you need a god to tell you what to do—or the fear of going to hell to stop you from being a monster...

...Then all you are is worthless trash.

He stops in front of the mouth of the cave once more, watching the two savage spirits close in with a vague sense of calm.

This isn't salvation, or confirmation that he wasn't the monster that the world thought he was.

When the moment came, Hua Cheng was capable of being everything the world scorned him as. A monster. An abomination. A hideous beast.

That’s the story that’s been written out for him, line by line, every thread of his plot carefully woven into place.

He lifts his hand.

His fingertips trace over his eyelid, contemplative.

Hua Cheng is all of those things.

But he’s also a soldier of Xianle.

He’s been loved by a god.

He took on a curse of ten thousand lifetimes without flinching. Hua Cheng is the man who looked death in the face, and said no.

Whatever story was laid out for him, whatever role he was meant to play—he wants no part of it.

Even if he has to tear the tapestry to pieces. Even if he has to rip out every single page.

It’s not that he couldn’t be a monster, or a villain. He just doesn’t want to be.

Zhao Beitong watches—in the last moments before the collision between the young ghost and his foes, wondering if this is some form of suicide, calling out, her voice aching with frustration—

“What are you doing?!”

It’s only when she sees Hua Cheng’s smile, that she understands.

Blood drips from the corners of his mouth, fangs bared as he clenches his teeth with a snarl. “Something…” His fingers curve in, pressing down against his own eye socket.

Misfortune, that was what they told him, when he was born with this eye. A curse. An abomination.

But bad luck, in Hua Cheng’s experience, is only what you make of it. And now—he’ll make his curse his own salvation.

“…Fucking STUPID!”

It’s no small thing, gauging out one’s own eye.

Even if you're accustomed to pain. Even if you've learned to embrace it.

The roar that rips from him is so loud, so violent, the savage ghosts that were bearing down on him only moments before coming to a stumbling halt, stopping to look at one another with startled confusion.

The agony is searing, shooting all the way to his core, shrieking—

And through it all, the ghost smiles. A bloody, savage grin, even as he howls from the agony.

Because it's enough, he knows. In a system where magic is a transactional process, not a moral exorcise—

This was a very high price to pay.

Zhao Beitong is frozen, jaw hanging open.

How—could he—?

"AAAAAIIIIIIEEEEEEEEEEEE!"

The shriek that pierces the air is blood curdling, so sharp, it makes every creature for miles stop and clutch their ears.

CLANG!

The young man is on his hands and knees, blood pouring down his chin, dripping onto the ground below.

When he lifts his chin—for the first time, he looks upon the world with just one eye. No longer the black eye he was born with, or the red eye that left him cursed.

This eye shines like a falling star, dipped in amber and gold.

On his lips is a fierce smile.

"Come to me."

He lifts his hand, and in a flash of silver light—something lands in his palm, fingers curling easily around the handle.

Zhao Beitong watches with bated breath, unable to move, unable to breathe. The scimitar in the young ghost's hand is long, curved—so wickedly sharp.

“I don’t know if you’re the bravest man I’ve ever met,” the elder mutters under her breath, “or the biggest fool I’ve ever seen.”

E-Ming vibrates underneath it’s master’s fingertips, waiting for orders. Hua Cheng rises to his feet, slowly spinning the saber between his fingers.

He’s always been brave. That isn’t very hard.

It’s easy to be brave when you’ve seen the worst of what the world can do.

A cruel, miserable, selfish world. One that Hua Cheng doesn’t particularly care for saving.

But this world still has someone precious to him. And that makes it worth living in.

Makes it worth choosing not to be the monster, at times—even when the world gives you every single reason to be.

She half expects him to say something poetic—something that ends up in the history books.

After all, it has to live up to the likes of, ‘Body in the abyss, soul in paradise.’ But the ghost says no such thing.

Instead, his smile widens—all blood, sweat, and sharp teeth, hissing —

“Why don’t you fuck around and find out, then?”

And then, he’s killing.

Not fighting, no.

This isn’t a fight.

The first time the cursed scimitar E-Ming leaves it’s sheathe, it’s to slaughter.

Shrieking through the air like a calamity itself, slicing its enemies from every angle without a moment’s pause, in perfect time with its master.

And in the space of less one incense time—no, not even half an intense time—

Two of the most powerful ghosts on the fields of Mount Tonglu are left as nothing but charred, bleeding remains—a young ghost standing over them, head tilted back.

Somehow, it has started to rain.

Zhao Beitong doesn't know how, she didn't see a single cloud in the sky, but... Here they are.

She extends one hand out, catching a few drops in her palm—and that's when she realizes, eyebrows shooting out with shock—

Is it...

...Raining blood?

The Ghost stops, tilting his head back—the rain pouring down over his face, his cheeks, dripping down the sides of his neck in a bloody baptism.

And that's exactly what it is—because the moment he does, there's a flash of golden light, so sudden, so fierce, it lights the horizon like a sunrise on a land that has not known daylight in centuries.

BOOM!

Hua Cheng's eyes snap open wide, just as Zhao Beitong's narrow.

"...Always playing both sides," She mutters under her breath, leaning her chin against her hand, staring at a singularity, an event that will never be repeated, all throughout human history, with a scowl.

A ghost, ascending from the foot of Mount Tonglu. "What a cheat."

When Hua Cheng opens his eye again, there's no darkness. No shrieking. No rivers of blood or clouds of ash.

The pain that wracked his body only moments ago is gone, and aside from the darkness in his right eye, he feels intact again.

Slowly, he turns his head. The sky is blue.

Not a single cloud in sight.

The streets are pristine, laid with bricks of gold and white jade.

Everywhere he turns his head, there’s a palace—one after the other, as far as the eye can see.

And when his gaze comes back down to earth, well—

He realizes exactly where he is.

That this isn’t earth at all.

Before him stands a handsome young man, wearing gleaming armor, white, trimmed with gold.

Jun Wu, the empower of the heavens, extends his hand to the ghost—no, not anymore.

The god.

And he smiles.

“Welcome, my friend.”

Hua Cheng doesn’t take the hand extended before him—only stares at it, his eye slightly narrowed, contemplative.

After a slow beat of silence, a voice echoes from Jun Wu’s side—

“Yes, yes, we all understand, it’s a very awe-inspiring moment, but there are logistics to handle!”

Hua Cheng’s gaze is drawn from the heavenly emperor himself, to a tall, thin, slightly haggard man—a neatly kept beard, steel gray hair, but deep bags beneath his eyes. He keeps his arms folded neatly in the sleeves of his robes—but the hunch of his posture reveals his impatience

“Now,” he lifts one arm from his sleeve, revealing a scroll, ready to be filled out, “Is he going to be classified as a martial god, or civil? He did ascend during battle, but the nature of his ascension was far more similar to that of Yushi Huang...”

Jun Wu tilts his head.

“I thought having a deputy to help you these days would help ease your impatience, Jing Wen.”

Ah—Hua Cheng has heard of him. The civil god overseeing the logistics of the heavens. The prince mentioned him once or twice, never seeming to have much of an impression.

The ghost can see why. He's stern—but forgettable.

"With how many gods have been in and out lately, can you blame me?!" The expression on the young warrior's face suddenly sours, and the civil god continues, "Of course, we ARE short a martial god at the moment—"

"I was thinking we needed a new fire master, actually." Jun Wu muses, rubbing his chin. "The role has sat empty for quite a while now, don't you think?"

"We could make that work—"

"There's no need," the ghost interrupts them both, his voice calm—but utterly disinterested.

The two gods stop, staring at him—Jing Wen with a look of baffled annoyance, and Jun Wu's expression unreadable.

"There is absolutely a need, young man! That's how this—!"

"I'm not staying," Hua Cheng replies flatly. "As a civil god, a martial god, or your fire master."

Jun Wu's gaze never leaves his face. "...And you think that decision is yours to make?"

The ghost glances around. There are other heavenly officials about—though at a distance. All laughing and smiling amiably, enjoying the fruits of their ascensions.

But Hua Cheng knows better.

He knows that they all live within a narrowly defined set of rules—rules that don't particularly make sense for anyone. Not the gods, or the humans they serve.

And if they deviate from those rules, they fall.

Hua Cheng knows too well what happens when they do.

They might have their sight, their powers, their worshippers—but every single one of them still wears a shackle. Gilded chains that come with a life in luxury. They're just too arrogant and blinded by their own egos to see it.

"All of my decisions are mine to make," he replies. "And even if they weren't," he turns on his heel, walking towards the gates of heaven, "they wouldn't be yours."

Once his back is turned—the heavenly emperor's expression darkens, if only a fraction, and Jing Wen crows like a cat doused with water.

"Who do you think you are?!" He cries, shaking his scroll over his head, "You are speaking in the presence of the heavenly emperor himself!"

But instead of sounding ashamed—or at the very least reminded of his own insignificance, the young man just sounds amused.

Cocky, even.

"I've never prayed to him."

The silence lays heavy between the three men.

"Heavenly Emperor or common farmer," the ghost shrugs, "it doesn't make a difference to me."

Hua Cheng has always had a healthy taste of his own freedom, never willing to give in or compromise when he didn't have to. Unwilling to accept the chains that society placed upon him.

He has only ever prayed to one god. Kneeled before one man. There's only one shackle in this life that he would be willing to accept.

And it wouldn't come from the likes of Jun Wu.

"What will you do now, then?"

The ghost stops at heaven's gate, glancing back over his shoulder.

And he smiles.

"You killed the last Ghost King, your highness," he answers, hands clasped lightly behind his back, saber gleaming at his side.

"There must be another."

With that, heaven's gates swing open before him, and for the first time since their construction…

A newly born god willfully casts himself down.

From below, a lone ghost sits above the battlefield. Watching as large swaths of ghostly armies clash, raging like the waves of the sea.

Tonglu has called a tidal wave of resentment this time around. More than she ever has before.

The ghost watches the surrounding mountains close in, sealing the area for what's to come. The final step, before the inevitable natural selection of who will enter the kiln.

Of the two savage ghosts remaining, she finds only one of them promising—the other, rather boring.

And in the end, for the battle at hand, they both seem rather lacking.

However, once the mountains close in—the battlefield will be sealed. And there will be no more contenders.

Her lips turn down into a slight frown. It's disappointing, but…

Men always are.

BOOM!

The battlefield is overtaken then, with a flash of light.

The same flash of light as the one that she saw before—but brighter this time, flashing gold.

Then red.

Then, finally, black.

With bated breath, she watches a ball of golden light plunge back down to earth.

Like a bloody falling star.

When it lands, the earth shakes and tears—thousands of spirits are dissolved in the space of an instant, in one, rattling scream.

Zhao Beitong rises to her feet slowly, watching as a new sun rises. She has watched the world for countless centuries.

Seen kingdoms rise and fall. Dynasties crumble. The heavens burn with corruption, only to be built anew.

And in all that time, she has watched men struggle at the fork in the road. Always going one way or the other. Always disappointing.

Today, a third path is forged.

Today, for the first time in over a millennium—nearly twice that, now—

Zhao Beitong has a student.

No One Mourns Like a Ghost

Chapter Summary

“You are dead, Hua Cheng.” Zhao Beitong murmurs, her voice low, but firm. “Wu Ming is dead. The boy you were before—he’s dead as well.”

Slowly, the crimson ghost arches an eyebrow—almost amused. “I’m very much aware of my own deaths, Zhao Beitong. I was the one who endured them.”

Her next words, however, make him stop.

“But you are still mourning them.” She stares up at him, hands clasped behind her back, almost mimicking Hua Cheng’s posture. “And you must let it go.”

That’s the hardest part about the afterlife, though it’s never spoken about. The living mourn, yes. But they also build new experiences. Forge new relationships. Make new memories. It takes time, but they move on. The act of haunting in itself means that you cannot move on.

And no one mourns more than a ghost.

Chapter Notes

TW// GRAPHIC VIOLENCE

You can find me on twitter and keep up with current updates of the story HERE

This story also has some spotify playlists for those who want some fun listening while reading!

No Paths Are Bound: The Playlist
Calamity Xie Lian: The Playlist
The Wu Ming Playlist

Battles in the mortal realm are relatively quick affairs. Two sides crashing together until one breaks. A matter of days—weeks, at most, months.

Not on the fields of Mount Tonglu. It's been years.

Three years, just to thin the endless sea of souls down to a number of contestants that still number in the thousands. By the fourth, the possible victors have already been picked out.

Three savage ghosts. The rest are fodder to be picked off, fighting to survive.

A blade spirit, dangerous in battle, but not particularly clever, by the name of Xiaosheng.

A wrathful spirit covered in bandages, bringing spirits to their knees for miles around with his screams, known by no name at all.

And the crimson ghost, wielder of the scimitar E'Ming. The savage spirit—Hua Cheng.

Each spirit takes their hold within the depths of the mountain. The blade spirit stands from its summit, confidently screeching to attract any of the ghosts that will hear.

The bandaged wraith hides on the slopes, picking them off, one by one.

It's the crimson ghost that is rarely seen, lurking in the depths, deep in the caverns beneath the surface.

The occasional ghost battalion wanders down into his keep, sent to test the waters of his strength.

None return alive, and the curiosity grows. “They mock you.”

Zhao Beitong sits in the corner, delicately sharpening a dagger between her fingertips. “They've begun to call you mad.”

The young man doesn't turn his gaze in her direction. It's too plainly fixed on the sight in front of him.

In the beginning, his attempts were horrific.

Barely recognizable to their subject matter—but not from a lack of vision, no. Hua Cheng can still see him in his mind every single moment, always lurking behind his eyelids, feeding the yearning in his heart, the solemn plea—

‘Wait for me.’

This is his nine hundredth version.

The face that stares back at him is delicate, with fine, attractive features. A serene smile, tranquil eyes—many layers of silky, perfectly laid hair.

Still—he finds none of the features do his memories justice.

“Do you think I’ve gone mad as well?” He questions, eyes unmoving.

The older ghost doesn’t answer at first, her gaze fixed on his back.

He’s grown larger, since he arrived. His body slowly reaching the peak physical form it would have achieved, had he lived a full mortal life.

Tall, broad shouldered, a heavy curtain of black hair.

Deathly pale skin—slightly pointed ears. There’s something almost feline about him— like a panther, or a jaguar, something that lurks in the branches above, waiting to snap you between its jaws.

“Yes,” She murmurs, “but not in the way that they do.”

Love is madness, after all.

The other ghosts who dwell in the fields of Mount Tonglu—they say the crimson ghost has lost his mind. That it must take a madman to claw out his own eye, only to cast himself down from the heavens when he ascends in reward.

It must take a madman to not pursue the battle.

To watch as the other potential calamities get stronger with every passing year, choosing instead to hide in the depths of the mountain, playing among the stones.

But Zhao Beitong knows that this is not child’s play, nor is it an expression of madness.

“You must let it go.”

The crimson ghost doesn’t respond, standing still, hands clasped behind his back as he looks upon his work—and the elder repeats herself.

“You must let it go, Hua Cheng.”

It’s been half a decade since he chose the name for himself.

He’s rarely heard it spoken aloud.

Few have the nerve to address him directly, aside from his…acquaintance.

“…You know better than to ask me that,” he murmurs, voice low.

There is one thing about the young man, regardless of how brutally the waves beat against his shores, that cannot be washed away.

Zhao Beitong cannot look upon his devotion to the flower crowned martial god with anything but building dread.

All too familiar with the madness that comes from loving a fallen god. The damage that blind devotion can cause.

“Not of him,” she murmurs.

Rarely has she ever shown gentleness to the young man, but she does so now, slowly rising from her seat, the heels of her boots clicking against stone, echoing throughout the cavern as she walks to his side, head tilted back.

She observes the crown prince with a keen eye.

“Is this an accurate likeness?”

“…Yes,” he admits, slowly tilting his head. “Not perfect, but close.”

Slowly, a set of delicate, perfectly manicured fingernails stroke over a marble cheek— and the crimson ghost allows it, watching her closely.

Zhao Beitong almost smiles.

“You don’t need to let him go,” she sighs, slowly dropping her hand from the statue’s face. “I know it’s necessary.”

After all—this love, this unending, borderline psychotic adoration—is what has kept the young man so strong. So determined.

“Then what do you mean?”

Slowly, she turns to face him.

In the beginning, Hua Cheng was aware of her beauty in a vague sort of way. After so many years spent in close quarters, he's come to know her visage better than most.

A heart shaped face, sharp eyebrows, high cheekbones.

Dimples at the corners of her mouth when she sneers or smiles—a crease that forms between her eyes when she frowns.

Her eyes are only the color of blood when she uses magic. Normally, they burn like two amethysts, perfectly clear.

Those eyes stare up at him now, evaluating.

"You are dead, Hua Cheng." Zhao Beitong murmurs, her voice low, but firm. "Wu Ming is dead. The boy you were before—he's dead as well."

Slowly, the crimson ghost arches an eyebrow—almost amused. "I'm very much aware of my own deaths, Zhao Beitong. I was the one who endured them."

Her next words, however, make him stop.

"But you are still mourning them." She stares up at him, hands clasped behind her back, almost mimicking Hua Cheng's posture. "And you must let it go."

That's the hardest part about the afterlife, though it's never spoken about.

The living mourn, yes. But they also build new experiences. Forge new relationships. Make new memories. It takes time, but they move on.

The act of haunting in itself means that you cannot move on.

And no one mourns more than a ghost.

Hua Cheng didn't have much of a life worth mourning, not until the very end of it. And there were certain things he wanted, even then, that he knows he never would have been able to have.

People have dreams, they look at treasures kept behind glass—but they don't get to touch.

'... Could you do that again?'

He reaches up to his lips, contemplative, remembering.

What he mourns the most, in the end, isn't the future that was taken from him. Not the first time, or the second. He knows he'll come back; he always does.

'Kiss me again?'

'Kiss me here?'

"I'm not mourning them," he mutters, shaking his head.

"What else is there to miss?" The older woman questions, shifting her weight to the other foot, a dark curtain of hair spilling over her shoulder. "Your beloved cannot die, you know that."

After a pause—

"My name."

Hua Cheng.

A city of flowers.

There's a message in it, yes—but it's not the name that his beloved would now. Not the name that he heard him call out so many times when he was lonely.

'Hong'er!'

When his dianxia needed him.

'Hong'er, is that you?'

'Please—just answer me!'

His fingertips drift up from his lips, to the vacant spot that once housed an eye.

When he was young, Hong'er thought he understood what it meant, to be cursed. Thought such hatred from the world around him was real suffering.

He was wrong.

He knows something far worse, now.

The greatest kind of suffering there is—the greatest kind of suffering any one person can experience—is to watch the person that you love suffer, and be unable to do anything about it.

It's hell.

From his first death, and every day since, Hua Cheng has been in hell.

"...Someone took my name," he whispers.

Zhao Beitong is quiet, her expression unreadable—and when she does speak, she does so bitterly, half under her breath.

"Who hasn't lost a name?"

Hua Cheng turns his head sharply, but instead of explaining, the ghost holds her head high.

"You will never be strong enough to leave this place if you don't let it go," she murmurs, turning on her heel. "Do you know why the names of ghosts hold such power, young one?"

Slowly, the crimson host shakes his head.

"They stop humans from forgetting us."

She calls back to him, making her way from the chamber. "The world did not know you to begin with. They will only know you for the name that you chose. Make them remember it well."

"What about the one who does remember me?" Hua Cheng calls after her softly. "What then?"

Zhao Beitong stops in the cavern's entryway, hair hanging around her face. "Humans do not love names," she reminds him, "they love the men who carry them."

It sounds so simple. And maybe, if his love could know him through some other way, a name wouldn't be such a powerful thing.

But his dianxia cannot know him by his face. Or his voice. After Bai Wuxiang's torment, Hua Cheng doubts the god would believe it, if he tried to use his old appearance as a mask now.

He would see it as torture.

The ghost wonders now if that was an intended consequence.

But he also knows that Zhao Beitong is right.

That, if he remains in this cave for as long as he feels sorrow in his heart for what's been lost, Hua Cheng will never leave this place.

And that is not an option for him.

He takes a slow, weary breath—and he follows her.

When he does, there's a flicker of silver beside his ear, flashing past him as it follows its master.

His fingers snatch out, trying to catch it by the wings—but, as always, the wraith butterfly always escapes.

"Are they spirits?" He questions, watching the silver creatures.

Her lips quirk up into a wry smile, hands still clasped behind her back as she walks, shoulders thrown back. There's something almost regal about it—and Hua Cheng finds himself mimicking it, hair swaying behind him as he walks by her side.

"What do your senses tell you?"

He frowns, eyebrows knitting with concentration as he closes his eyes, breathing in. There's spiritual power all around them, two powerful presences—but just that, only two. Her, and his own.

"...That they're coming from you," he mutters, frowning. "But I don't understand how."

Her smile widens, a dimple cutting into the corner of her mouth. "Think harder, little one."

She often calls him such things, little one, young one—as though he isn't a grown man —one that stands well over a head taller than her.

"...Are they pure spiritual power?"

"Close,"

She muses, pushing her hair over her shoulder, "but not quite on the mark."

Hua Cheng things, watching the small flock of butterflies—the way they always seem to stick closer to her, but when she desires, flutter away.

"...Are they a spiritual device?" Now, she seems satisfied.

“So, you can be observant when you put in the effort, can’t you?” She snorts when she sees the young man roll his eyes in response, “They are.”

Hua Cheng watches them with a quiet sort of fascination. He’s always been fond of beautiful things—but these creatures feel…

Important, somehow. Calling to him. “How did you forge them?”

That is one of the only questions that she ever seems to refuse to answer, no matter how many times he enquires. Everything else, she’ll hint—show him how to figure it out on his own.

Not that.

But for now, there’s other work to be done.

For the first time in years, he feels the wind on his face. The faint hint of the sun, through all the clouds and soot.

It’s never warm out here. The only heat comes from the kiln itself. At his waist, E’Ming rattles.

Hua Cheng’s fingers stroke over the saber’s handle, contemplative. “Bored?” He muses, feeling it shiver in response. “…Hungry?”

The eye set into the pommel spins with excitement, and Zhao Beitong stops, leaning against the trunk of a tree.

“You haven’t fed the poor thing in years,” She muses, twisting a lock of hair between her fingers. “Such a cruel master you are.”

Hua Cheng rolls his eyes. The blade was forced from a part of him that he was only too willing to cast aside. He holds no lingering affection for it.

“It’ll live.”

“Spiritual tools are like any other,” Zhao Beitong’s tone turns slightly scolding, “if you don’t use them, they dull. And for a scimitar forged through blood—it must be fed, or it will not serve you properly.”

He sighs, flicking the blade with annoyance.

It trembles—almost apologetically—in response.

How troublesome.

“Coincidentally,” she muses, her eyes drifting towards the top of the mountain, “you have an excellent option for a proper meal.”

Hua Cheng follows her gaze to the summit—where Xiaosheng sits, howling and cackling

A cocky creature. All bluster, shouting for all of the ghosts on the fields below—telling them to come challenge him. How strong he is. How terrified they should all be for standing in his presence.

Hua Cheng rolls his eyes.

It reminds him of another ghost he knows.

If Qi Rong still exists at this point—who knows what that merchant used him for. But, when Hua Cheng escapes from this place, he intends to find out.

“Xiaosheng,” he calls—not even needing to raise his voice before the blade spirit’s gaze snaps to him, gaze wild.

A laugh overtakes the air, rattling against the horizon, like the sky itself speaks.

“AH, THE CRIMSON GHOST!” It snarls, eyes blazing with an unnatural red glow, “FINALLY CRAWLED OUT OF IT’S CAVE, LIKE THE LITTLE RAT HE IS!”

It’s ironic, given that Xiaosheng is much shorter.

“If I’m a rat,” the ghost muses, slowly walking up the hillside—using that same proud, regal posture from before. Shoulders back, hands clasped behind his back. “What does that make you?”

The blade spirit beams, crossing its arms, puffing out his chest, “I’m —!”

Hua Cheng interrupts, rolling his eyes, “I hope you weren’t planning on saying something embarrassing—like a lion.”

Xiaosheng falls silent, closing his mouth. He often projects the demeanor of a grown man—and he certainly is large enough—but his personality is childlike.

“You, a lion?” The crimson ghost lets out a low laugh. “That’s almost funny to imagine. You’re more like...” He smirks, “An angry little monkey, howling and screaming and throwing things, because you want attention.”

As he listens, the spirit begins to tremble, flushed with anger

“Who DO YOU THINK YOU ARE to talk to ME?!” Xiaosheng shrieks, dropping down from his mountain peak, the ground trembling and cracking under his feet.

“Dinner,” Hua Cheng sighs, drumming his fingers against the hilt of E’Ming. “Though it’s taking longer than expected.”

He watches with faint amusement as the blade spirit charges down the slope, calling out, “Oh, could you run faster than that? I’m still stretching my legs—or are yours too short? See, it’s been so long since I had a proper meal—”

“BASTARD!” The blade spirit shrieks.

“STUPID, UGLY LITTLE COCKROACH!!” It drops down into a crouch, running on all fours—like more of an animal than a man, “WHO DO YOU THINK YOU ARE?! YOU CAN’T SPEAK TO ME LIKE THAT, I’M THE GHOST KIN—”

It stops in mid run, the breath choked out of it, dangling in the air, flailing

“What was that?” Hua Cheng muses, watching the angry little creature howl and twitch under his grasp, lip curling with amusement. “What did you call yourself, just now?”

Xiaosheng flushes purple from temple to chin, hands shifting into blades—but before he can attack, he’s gone.

With a flick of the crimson ghost’s wrist, he hurls the blade spirit down the mountainside, sending it somersaulting, head over heels, taking down trees, rock formations, and other ghosts in its wake—eventually slamming to the foot of the mountain with a—

CRASH!

“Apologies, your majesty,” Hua Cheng sneers, slowly making his way down the slope as the smaller spirit crawls up and out of the hole created by its landing, shrieking with offense. “I wasn’t intending to throw you so far—I thought that big mouth of yours might weigh more.”

Throwing him around is one thing. It might humiliate the blade spirit—and amuse the crimson ghost to no end—but it won't damage him.

For that, they'll have to fight in close quarters. And in that, Xiaosheng, a blade given consciousness, will always have the upper hand.

That being said, E'Ming, like his master, enjoys a proper challenge.

CLANG!

CRASH!

SCREECH!

Each part of the blade spirit's body can shift and contort into a new form of weapon, swirling and attacking from every direction, clashing with the scimitar over and over again.

Each time they do, the sky flashes like a lightning strike, rumbling all around them.

It might as well be a clash of titans—but to Zhao Beitong, from her perch atop a nearby tree, it might as well be simple theatre.

"You look clumsy out there," she muses.

"E'Ming is better off when you just let him fight on his own," the ghost cores and slices the apple in her hand with her talons, tossing a piece into the air before catching it between her teeth. "Didn't you say someone told you that your style was suited to sabers?"

Hua Cheng isn't particularly amused by the commentary. He doesn't like being condescended to, not when he's clearly in the middle of trying to condescend to someone else. "What of it?"

"Did you ever ask the person who told you WHY you would be suited to such a weapon?"

In all honesty? He had been so delighted back then, a young man, complimented in sword mastery not only by his idol, his god—but also his first love, that he had been too overwhelmed to ask.

Zhao Beitong clicks her tongue, eating another slice. "Lovesick little fool."

Xiaosheng shrieks with laughter, his arms turning into two separate broadswords, spinning like a deadly top as he runs towards him, "HA!

The crimson ghost doesn't even know how to use his own tool?! Stupid, STUPID! You—YOU'RE the monkey!" He howls, earning an annoyed stare.

"Yes," Zhao Beitong agrees, her voice coy, saccharine as she addresses the little ghost. "But you know how to use a scimitar quite well, don't you?"

Like anyone, Xiaosheng flushes upon a compliment from such a beautiful woman, preening, pressing bladed palms to his cheeks.

"I know how to use every blade there is!" He crows, wiggling from the praise. "I'm the best! The strongest, the mighty, all powerful, XIAOSHENG—!"

"Why don't you show us, then?" Zhao Beitong cuts him off flatly, still chewing on her apple.

The blade spirit can hardly deny her.

He even tries to look a little more elegant about it, shifting one arm to the shape of a scimitar, similar in size and shape to E'Ming—and, to Hua Cheng's amusement, he makes himself a little taller.

(So naturally, the crimson ghost grows proportionally in response.)

His companion lets out a low, amused snort.

"So childish."

But now—the battle goes from a blind, thoughtless free-for-all, and becomes something different—

Instructive.

"Do you see what he's doing now?" She explains, one foot dangling from the branch she's perched upon.

"He's not using stabbing motions—the curve of a scimitar isn't designed for you to fight with the point—"

Xiaosheng, of course, takes all of this as praise, like she's mocking Hua Cheng—not realizing that, at best, he's being used as a classroom tool.

"It's designed for melee."

Hua Cheng watches the way the blade spirit moves, the changes in his fighting form— and slowly, he begins to understand.

Standard swords are common infantry weapons—and what he trained with, during his time as a soldier in Xianle.

The two most basic skills of any swordsman are to thrust and parry. Often seen as aggressive, clumsier motions—though any master swordsman, like the Crown Prince, can turn such motions into a dance, allowing the weapon to become an extension of the arm.

Sabers are not the same.

As Zhao Beitong—and Xiaosheng, the unwitting beast—explain, they're a raider's weapon, often calling for a wilder, less structured style of attack.

Heavily emphasizing on footwork, moving around the enemy, attacking in quick slices of the blade—dodging rather than blocking.

E'Ming adopts such a style on its own, perfectly capable of attacking without the ghost wielding it manually—

But as Hua Cheng does listen, adapting, taking the blade into his hand, slowly mimicking the fighting forms and structures—the attacks that land gain power.

All the while—oblivious to the hand he has in his own doom, Xiaosheng crows, mocks, and jeers. "Clumsy little monster! Doesn't even know how to fight without Madame Beitong teaching you like a little schoolboy! Shameful! Embarrassing! And you call yourself a—!"

CRAAACK!

The scimitar he was using on his right arm cracks in two, dripping to the ground in several pieces—leaving him to stare down at it in shock. "You...YOU BROKE MY ARM!" Xiaosheng shrieks, looking up at Hua Cheng in offended shock, like a child who thought this was all a silly game.

"HOW DARE YOU!! MY PERFECTLY FORGED ARM!" He wails, face screwing up in anger as his other arm shifts into a blade, and he attacks once more.

But now, it's slowly becoming a losing battle—and the hordes of ghosts watching from the hills seem to know it, hissing in anticipation.

Soon, the crimson ghost takes one of his legs—and then his other arm, E'Ming slicing faster than the naked eye can track it, attacking with a bloodlust not unlike a shark after it detects blood in the water.

Finally, the blade spirit drops onto one knee, trembling. "NO FAIR!"

He whips his head around, silvery waves of hair bouncing around his shoulders as he glares at Zhao Beitong, shrieking, "SHE TRICKED ME!! EVIL WITCH! I'LL RIP YOU TO BITS!"

The elder spirit smiles, slowly baring her fangs, pupils turning into slits, "You think Tonglu is fair?"

Before the creature can answer, Hua Cheng's hand locks around his throat again, forcing the blade spirit to look back up at him, squeezing until its eyes bulge out of its skull, "YOU...YOU CAN'T!" It shrieks.

"I GOT—THIS ANCESTOR GOT SO FAR! THIS ANCESTOR...IS A GHOST KING!"

"Is that so?" Hua Cheng muses coldly, hands tightening until the blade spirit starts to tremble, it's body slowly beginning to shudder and crack, "Then congratulations, my lord—it's time for your coronation!"

But instead of receiving a crown—Xiaosheng loses his head, instead.

Ripped clean from the blade spirit's body, blood pouring down, steaming and hissing as it lands upon the grass.

Hua Cheng holds it up in front of him, staring into that expression, permanently fixed into a look of outraged horror, howling with indignation.

His lips twitch.

Just like an angry little monkey.

"E'Ming," the crimson ghost rumbles, eyes widening as he feels the rush of power flowing into his body, all at once—

"Dinner."

Eye glinting with hunger, the scimitar disappears in a flash—delightedly hacking the blade spirit's body into bits.

As it feasts—Hua Cheng inhales through his nose, slowly taking in the sensation, the newfound power.

Xiaosheng killed more spirits on this mountain than almost any other, and unlike his previous kills, the crimson ghost is absorbing an incredible amount of power in one swallow.

There's something quite deceiving about the term "Savage rank" when it comes to ghosts. It simply includes any particularly strong ghost that has not been through the trial of the kiln—leading to an incredibly broad range of strength among that rank of the dead.

Any one of them can slaughter a city, yes—but some of them can be handled by human cultivators without heavenly assistance.

Some, like Xiaosheng, have slaughtered heavenly officials before—without ever obtaining the rank of supreme.

Three martial gods, to be exact.

Hua Cheng can feel the strength from those kills pouring into his body now as well— and compared to the rush of power he gained from his ascension, this—

It feels almost earth shattering in comparison.

The ghost smiles, casting his enemy's head aside.

What a joke.

It's only then that he sees it—sitting on the ground.

A small, fine hilt of black leather. Likely the original handle for the blade spirit, back when it was a simple human tool.

"..." Hua Cheng kneels, picking the item up—and he can feel it, pulsing under the surface.

Spiritual power.

It amuses Zhao Beitong to no end that the young warrior forges the remains of his enemy into an eyepatch.

Insulting a man's appearance to the very end, only to spend an eternity sitting upon his face.

It's petty—but rather clever. "How does it feel?"

The crimson ghost tilts his head back, one eye staring ahead—and now, with the spiritual tool on his face (one that, for many centuries, the entire world will assume is a simple accessory), his right plane of vision is no longer dark.

After all, Hua Cheng didn't destroy his eye.

He transmuted it into something far more useful. But now, with this tool—he's able to see through the iris embedded into the pommel of E'Ming itself.

It takes adjusting, learning to separate two very different visual inputs without allowing it to impact his depth perception.

But once he does—it turns the blade into far more than just a simple saber. "...Heavy," the youth finally answers, rolling his shoulders. "But less exposed."

Zhao Beitong nods, watching as he fastens the ties around the back of his head—and now, Hua Cheng has his own question:

"Why are you helping me?"

After all—before, he could simply qualify her actions as amused interest. Following him from place to place, goading him, sometimes, for his own stupidity—but in general, she often remained an observer.

Today, it felt more like...an intentional lesson.

And it's yet another question that the ghost of the fields of Tonglu refuses to answer, simply shrugging it off—making some sort of excuse about having no desire to see a pathetic excuse of a ghost king rise to power.

But why should she care? She will never leave this place.

The victor of this battle doesn't impact her in the slightest.

Hua Cheng asks her—repeatedly—and still, she never answers.

The death of Xiaosheng is felt throughout the former kingdom of Wuyong, sending ripples through the remaining demon armies that remain.

And it leaves behind only two possibilities for the one that will rise as the next Ghost King from the kiln.

Hua Cheng, the crimson ghost, wielder of the scimitar E'Ming—

And the bandaged ghost, who hides within the forests that cover the slopes of Mount Tonglu.

Five years turns into six, then seven.

The armies of Ghosts that once remained on the fields of Mount Tonglu are picked to shreds. In the beginning, they numbered in the tens of millions—then, only the tens of thousands.

Now, there are only a few hundred of them left.

Slowly being picked away—devoured in broad daylight by the likes of Hua Cheng, leaping down from the sky with a wicked flash of his saber, or swept away in the night by the bandaged ghost, never heard from, never to be seen again.

"...You know," Zhao Beitong's tone is...delicate. "I am not one to question artistic vision, but..." She tilts her head to the side, slowly examining the statue standing before her. "Is it just me, or...are your specimens becoming...slightly more scantily dressed?" She muses, examining a pectoral muscle, giving it a light poke.

A dark glare flashes in her direction, and she holds up both hands in a neutral gesture, "If you're so sensitive about such a simple question, that speaks more to a guilty conscience—"

"He should have come by now," Hua Cheng grouses, not in the mood for her teasing. Of course—she doesn't have to question the young man to know what he means.

The bandaged spirit is the final legitimate competitor to the title of ghost king after all —but each time the crimson god has entered the kiln, waiting for his opponent to arrive—he never comes.

And the kiln has yet to close, sealing in the final competitors.

"You shifted the scales of power, devouring Xiaosheng the way you did," Zhao Beitong muses, slowly lifting her hands from a (very carefully sculpted) marble torso. "He probably wants to even them before battle."

But with so few ghosts left, that seems unlikely to happen. And with the kiln refusing to close, it implies more to the prolonged length of battle than what meets the eye.

"Does it normally take this long, when Mount Tonglu opens?" He questions, his teeth clenched with annoyance

Zhao Beitong doesn't immediately answer, but when she does, her tone is…difficult to discern. "It usually takes much longer," she murmurs. "I've seen it take fifty years before enough ghosts are cleared out for the final competitors to enter the kiln."

Hua Cheng tenses.

He doesn't have fifty years.

Since the fields of Tonglu sealed themselves seven years ago—there's been no way of contacting the outside world. No way of knowing the condition of things.

Or finding the crown prince.

He must be safe—if he wasn't, Hua Cheng would know that much.

Regardless of anything else that's going on, he knows that dianxia would defend his ashes to the death. And if the crown prince was no more—Hua Cheng's remains likely would have been caught in the crossfire.

Meaning wherever he is, he's alive. But for dianxia…

Alive…could still mean immense suffering. Or loneliness. Or any other manner of unhappiness. And for as long as the crimson ghost is trapped here…

He can't look after him, not even from afar.

No—no. He doesn't have fifty years.

"But there's only two of us left," he mutters.

In total, there are a little over three hundred ghosts remaining—but only two real contenders.

The kiln should have begun to close by now, forcing him and the bandaged ghost to race inside.

And yet, the volcano hasn't moved since the fields were sealed—only rumbled at times.

"…The Kiln will close when the proper conditions have been met," Zhao Beitong murmurs. "But you should not mistake it for a simple facet of nature."

Hua Cheng turns his head, raising an eyebrow, and she reminds him of something he had known, but nearly forgotten in time.

"Before the fields were sealed—remember how the mountains moved about this place?" She sits back, stretching her legs out upon a stone bench he carved for one of his more recent pieces. Likely something degenerate, if he wants the statue lying down—

After a moment, the crimson ghost nods.

"They are ancient spirits," she explains, her eyes suddenly...filled with a certain kind of sadness, one that Hua Cheng cannot understand. "Tonglu is no different."

The young man glances at the cavern around them. "This place is...alive?"

Zhao Beitong nods, chin tilting down, watching the way her feet slowly drag across the floor. "According to the legends, they were four friends, once," she whispers—and yet he hears her perfectly clearly. "All in service of a higher purpose."

"...Creating Ghost Kings?"

Hua Cheng questions dryly, and she rolls her eyes.

"In service of the same god, you childish imp." She mutters, looking away. "There were no ghost kings in that time."

The young man grows quiet, watching her. Remembering two things that he had lost, somehow, in recent years.

First: that the Kingdom of Wuyong was Zhao Beitong's home, in her mortal life. And when she speaks of these mountain spirits—

There's a very good chance that she knew them when they were men.

And second: that the only god he found that was worshipped in this place, was...

"...You mean they served the Crown Prince of Wuyong?" He questions —not missing the way that, even with no blood left in her body, Zhao Beitong manages to become slightly paler.

"Yes," she replies, rising to her feet. "Until the very end."

No matter how many more questions Hua Cheng asks on the subject—the woman provides no answer.

The Burial Mounds

Chapter Summary

The wailing seems even louder now. Hua Cheng steps closer.

As he does so, the snow crunches beneath the soles of his boots—and the white bandaged figure seems to finally become aware of him, half hunched over the hole it's been digging.

"...Have you come to kill me?" It murmurs, voice slightly crackling. A familiar voice.

Hua Cheng crosses his arms over his chest, struggling to place it as he replies, his voice cold—

"You're already dead."

Chapter Notes

TW// GRAPHIC VIOLENCE, HORROR ELEMENTS

You can find me on twitter and keep up with current updates of the story HERE

In the months that follow, he hunts for the bandaged ghost.

There's a limited number of places that he can be—and each night, the crimson ghost sends E'Ming scanning through the skies.

The red eye in its pommel gleaming like a cursed star as it flies through the night— but never once does it find its target.

No, Hua Cheng is forced to hunt him like a beast. Following his scent. Laying traps. He must have a lair, after all—it's just a matter of finding it.

The forests of Mount Tonglu are dense, constantly shifting—which makes more sense to Hua Cheng now, knowing that the mountain itself is a powerful spirit.

And as the seasons change—the weather never turns friendly. Shifting from howling blizzards to raging storms.

The best conditions one can hope for are dense fogs—the sort that make it impossible to see more than one foot ahead.

And with each passing day, Hua Cheng kills more ghosts. Bringing the numbers from three hundred to two, then less than seventy.

Still, the Kiln does not close.

He asks Zhao Beitong more questions about the Mountain—about Wuyong. And while the ghost is perfectly happy to tell him of magic, combat, and the forging of spiritual weapons—her helpfulness turns to silence when he asks about her home.

Hua Cheng doesn't have time for this.

He stands on the hillside of Tonglu one night, staring into the fog, a recently fallen drift of snow crunching beneath his feet—and he glares.

It's been eight years since he cast himself back down from the heavens. Eight long, miserable years—constantly left wondering.

Where his beloved is. If he's safe, or if he's frightened and alone. If someone is looking after him. Catching him when he falls. Waking him in the night, when the dreams come.

Every moment, those thoughts are there. Gnawing at him, slowly eating away, along with...fear.

What if...not quickly, but eventually, with the relentless passage of time, Hua Cheng's god...forgets him?

Forgets him so completely, that without his name...Hua Cheng can't make him remember?

It was hard enough, when he was a ghost fire, unable to do more than whisper and float.

And as Wu Ming—Hua Cheng thinks, if Xie Lian had not been so distracted by his own suffering and grief, the god might have realized the truth.

All of that was while their time together was still so fresh in his memory. But what if it does take fifty years? Or longer?

What if, in the worst-case scenario, he doesn't find the prince for over a century? What then?

He's lost in those thoughts, staring into the cold, misty dark, thinking that name over and over again.

Dianxia, dianxia, dianxia. How is he supposed to—? Hua Cheng pauses.

There were many things his god taught them, over their time together. History, poetry—he attempted with calligraphy, but had no way of knowing if the child learned or not—

(He didn't.)

Archery, sword play. Countless skills, each invaluable—but there was also something else.

Sight isn't everything. In reality—it's a very small part of how people perceive the world.

Hua Cheng stares into the fog laden darkness ahead, and instead of narrowing his eyes—he closes them, breathing in through his nose, slow and deep.

And ah.

There it is.

Spiritual power.

There aren't enough ghosts left to mask the deeper, more malicious scent of a savage spirit. It's there, carried on the wind.

The crimson ghost's lips curl back into a snarl.

"Found you," he mutters.

But as he creeps through the mountainside, he wonders.

Most of the powerful ghosts in this place don't run and hide, even if it benefits them. With how few ghosts there are now, the bandaged spirit doesn't have much of a chance to change the odds of the playing field.

So why?

What on earth is he trying to do?

The closer Hua Cheng comes to the ghost's lair—he's left with more questions than answers.

He's vaguely aware of all of the ghosts left in the fields of Mount Tonglu, knowing that now, they number in sixty-six. A dozen had disappeared recently, slinking off into the night.

When they did, the savage ghost had assumed that must have been the bandaged ghost's doing—snatching up what prey remained, before the final confrontation.

He was right—but now, Hua Cheng is realizing that he was also wrong.

Very wrong.

The bandaged ghost was responsible.

That much quickly becomes clear—but the ghosts who disappeared weren't destroyed, or consumed.

Hua Cheng sees them now, hanging from the trees—like demented little lanterns. Bound in bleeding white gauze, hands and feet bound. Unable to move, unable to speak—weakly crying out.

Their voices are muffled, left unable to speak—but Hua Cheng can tell from the tone —they're begging for release. Even if the cost would be their very souls.

He pauses, staring up at them.

For obvious reasons, Hua Cheng isn't particularly fond of the sight of them hanging there.

It almost reminds him of his own death. Of the man that inflicted it. But this isn't the same.

These ghosts aren't being tortured, or mocked, or used for decoration. They aren't even being used as food.

They're being…

Starved. Slowly, but surely.

But…why?

What would the spirit have to gain in weakening them before consuming them? Isn't that the very definition of self-destructive?

He creeps closer now, the scent growing stronger—and still, vaguely familiar.

There’s crying. Not muffled whimpering—not from the ghosts, no.

This crying is almost human. That of…a child.

Finally, the scent becomes so strong, it tickles under his nose—and when the ghost enters the forest clearly, suddenly, the fog clears.

Revealing a man standing there, bandages wrapped around the entirety of his face. Digging.

A ghost lays beside him on the ground—wrapped in the same bleeding white bandages, meaning weakly, so starved of spiritual power, it’s clearly on the verge of death, and Hua Cheng realizes…

It’s trying to…bury them.

The wailing seems even louder now. Hua Cheng steps closer.

As he does so, the snow crunches beneath the soles of his boots—and the white bandaged figure seems to finally become aware of him, half hunched over the hole it’s been digging.

“…Have you come to kill me?” It murmurs, voice slightly crackling. A familiar voice.

Hua Cheng crosses his arms over his chest, struggling to place it as he replies, his voice cold—

“You’re already dead.”

The bandaged ghost doesn’t address that statement, still staring down into the shallow grave.

The white gauze covers every inch of his skin—stained by blood.

“…I thought it might be you,” the ghost mutters, shovel dangling loosely between his fingers. The wailing gets even louder now, so loud, Hua Cheng covers one ear with a wince.

“Who else is left?” He grumbles, initially thinking about the fact that they’re practically the last.

But then, he realizes that wasn’t what the ghost meant. ‘I thought it might be you.’

Hua Cheng's eyes narrow as he steps closer, wondering just who this spirit is, what he's doing, and how they must know each other, asking —

"Who are you?"

Slowly, the other ghost straightens.

Shovel still clutched in its hand; it turns its head. Its face is still nearly completely obscured, just like the rest of it, but...

Those eyes are familiar. The screaming of the child. The one tracked determination on something so odd, so fruitless—and then, it all seems clear

The bandaged ghost of the fields of Mount Tonglu, the spirit that has avoided Hua Cheng for the last eight years, hiding in the mountainside for seemingly no reason—is none other than the first king of the Kingdom of Yong'an.

Lang Ying.

It's so startling, that after a moment—Hua Cheng takes one stumbling step back, muttering, "I thought..."

The spirit stares back at him, it's gaze somewhat blank.

"I thought you were at peace?!"

After all—the fool got what he wanted, didn't he? The destruction of Xianle?

Instead of answering him, Lang Ying asks a question of his own.

"...Where is he?" He murmurs, fingers trembling slightly, where they grip the shovel. "The white clothed calamity, where is he?!"

"Not here," Hua Cheng replies coldly. "He's dead."

"No..." Lang Ying shakes his head.

Slowly, he turns back to the hole that he's been digging—all this time. "That can't be right."

Hua Cheng stares, finally noticing now.

All around them, as far as the clearing goes, are small little mounds of earth.

...How many spirits has he buried in this place? And why?

He hasn't even consumed any of the energy from them—Hua Cheng can still feel it, trembling in the air. Far heavier now, than it was before.

This much resentment, it's almost reminiscent of...

"He promised me," Lang Ying mumbles, and Hua Cheng realizes, now, what child is crying.

"...And he lied to you, remember?" The younger ghost replies coldly. After all, dianxia explained that fact quite clearly the night that Lang Ying died. "I don't know how this is news to you: but ancient malicious spirits aren't known for their honesty."

"You're mocking me."

"Ah, so there are things that don't slip over your head," Hua Cheng replies dryly, looking him over. "...What's with the bandages?"

Lang Ying tilts his head to the side, lifting one hand in front of his face, marking, "You should know that just as well as me."

His fingers keep on trembling, loosening over the grip of the shovel, only to tighten around it again. "You were the one that destroyed my body, remember?"

He takes a step away from his makeshift grave. "You were the one who burned my palace when you were finished, remember?"

The King of Yong'an take another step forward, ambling, as though his legs don't quite remember how to obey his body yet, catching himself with one palm against a tree, "It...it took a long time," he muses, eyes staring at Hua Cheng through the gaps in the bandages.

"...to pull myself...back together."

Of course—he doesn't mean that emotionally. He means it literally.

"...Why would you do that?" The young man questions, his eyebrows knitting together. He isn't afraid of Lang Ying—no, not in the way that most men would be.

But he's confused.

In his case—why he's returned is obvious enough. But in the case of Lang Ying...

There's nothing else on earth to keep him here. No family. No unfinished business. He destroyed his enemies. There's nothing left to haunt.

"He..." Lang Ying turns back to his grave. "He promised."

One hand reaches down, dragging the ghost he's left on the ground into the hole that he's made, head hung low. "Can you do me a favor, Wu Ming?"

The ghost stiffens, crossing his arms over his chest, and Lang Ying amends— "I'm sorry, it's Hua Cheng now."

The youth doesn't reply

"...Could you stop killing the other ghosts?" He murmurs, shoving the spirit into the grave, kneeling with it. His hands paw at the dirt—almost like a small animal, struggling to cover food it wants to store for winter. "I need them."

The younger man stares.

"...You've gone insane." He mutters, shaking his head.

Maybe Lang Ying was always insane, in the end. In Hua Cheng's experience, humans rarely follow reasonable men in such droves.

No stable mind has ever felled a great Dynasty of the like of Xianle. "No," Lang Ying frowns.

"This is what he told me to do. It's not insane," he shakes his head. His voice sounds perfectly even now, calm—even as the ghost beneath him whimpers with horror, tortured by the prospect of being buried until its spirit gives out. "This is how you do it."

"...Do what?"

"Bring them back," Lang Ying whispers. "I just have to bring it back, first."

"...Human Face Disease?" Hua Cheng questions, his expression tense. "That's what you think you're doing?!"

"He told me," Lang Ying repeats, patting the earth down, frantically burying the little ghost.

“I just need more,” he mutters, pale, bandage shrouded fingers, stained by blood and dirt, moving frantically. “I just need a little more resentment. So, if you just leave the rest of them alone—!”

“It took an entire battlefield of souls for the Crown Prince to summon it,”

Hua Cheng shakes his head, “and you think these miserable little spirits can—?”

Then, he realizes.

How small the ghost Lang Ying just buried was. How small many of the burial mounds around him are. Not all of them, but...

Surely, at least thirty of them.

‘There used to be half of us...but now...’

It was eight years ago, but he still remembers. Still often thought about the thirty orphans who lost their lives in that cave on Mount Tonglu before he was able to save the rest.

Children.

Lang Ying has been burying children.

“...What have you done?” Hua Cheng repeats—his voice softer this time, almost with disbelief.

It’s rare to nearly render the crimson ghost speechless.

Lang Ying lifts his head, blood streaming down the bandages on his cheeks, eyes wide.

“He told me!” The ghost cries.

“HE TOLD ME!”

“HE TRICKED YOU!” Hua Cheng roars in response, only to make the ghost before him pause with a start, clearly remembering Xie Lian’s words from the day that he died. “HOW MANY HAVE SUFFERED, BECAUSE OF YOUR FOOLISHNESS?”

The wailing is louder now than before.

When Hua Cheng glances up—there's another spirit in the trees. Small, emaciated. That of a little boy, hardly more than an infant. Clutching his head, rocking back and forth.

"...Lang Ying," The crimson ghost pauses—

"Your son is already here."

"No, no," the ghost frowns.

"Not like that," he straightens, picking up his shovel. "He can't stay like that."

He always will, no matter what Lang Ying does. The spirit of his child clearly would have moved on by now—reincarnated, not lingering in this world.

His father has kept him here without consent.

The boy will never grow, the way Hua Cheng did after his own demise. He will never stop crying and wailing. Because for a spirit to be kept beyond its means, beyond the natural expiration date of its will—

It's cruel. A selfish, monstrous thing to do.

"I'll put him back in my body again," the former king whispers, starting the process of digging another hole. A bigger one, this time. "It'll be better than last time, it—"

"You don't have a body anymore, Lang Ying." Hua Cheng points out softly.

The ghost pauses momentarily.

"...Where is your wife's spirit?" Hua Cheng questions, looking around. He sees no sign of her. Just the wailing child, and the captured ghosts, waiting to die in vain. "Did you let her move on?"

Lang Ying shakes his head, muttering to himself. "I didn't have enough..."

"What?"

The ghost lifts his head, "I didn't have enough," he explains, "you killed to many—so I had to bury her, too."

Silence falls as the younger man processes what Lang Ying has done. The gravity of it. The utter monstrosity.

“She would understand,” Lang Ying mutters. “It’s for our boy. She understands.”

He begins to dig more frantically, and the wailing—god, Hua Cheng just wishes that it would stop.

“...You need to let him go, Lang Ying.” He mutters, taking a step forward. “He’s suffering.”

The king’s face contorts. “THAT ISN’T MY FAULT!”

He shrieks, straightening. “I TRIED! I DID WHAT I WAS SUPPOSED TO DO, AND HE—THOSE ROTTEN ASSHOLES IN XIANLE, THEY WOULDN’T LISTEN!”

“They—”

“THIS IS THEIR FAULT!” Lang Ying cries. “THEY DID THIS!”

“The king and queen of Xianle didn’t kill your son,” Hua Cheng corrects him.

“A drought did.”

“But they wouldn’t...” Tears of blood roll down the ghost’s cheek as he digs even faster, arms trembling, “They wouldn’t even look at him. They wouldn’t even help—”

“He was already dead by then,” Hua Cheng shakes his head. “What could they have done?”

Lang Ying’s hands tremble, then they stop—and in a moment of clarity, Hua Cheng hears the ghost speak clearly:

“That doesn’t matter.”

He lifts his head, looking Hua Cheng in the eye.

“It doesn’t matter if they couldn’t have brought him back. That wasn’t the point.”

The tears leave red trails on his cheeks—but Lang Ying makes no move to wipe them away. “My child was dead. So many children were dead. And maybe they couldn’t have fixed it, but...”

Lang Ying's lip curls with resentment, with a hint of the self-righteous anger he once carried.

"They still should have looked."

Even now, despite everything—of how much suffering this man has caused for the love of the ghost's life, for the kingdom that he destroyed—

Hua Cheng agrees, his voice tired—but fair.

He's many things, but usually fair.

"Yes, Lang Ying,"

The ghost murmurs in acknowledgement. "They should have looked."

Because there is nothing more painful to be suffering—truly, from the bottom of your heart, suffering—and to know that the world isn't listening.

"But you still have to let him go," Hua Cheng presses quietly.

"..." The ghost turns away, clutching his shovel. "You never had any children, did you? You died too young for that."

And, the one he desired being a man—Hua Cheng never had any plans to have them if he could have, when he reached adulthood.

"Did you know your father?"

For a long time, the crimson ghost doesn't answer. "...No." He mutters, his tone slightly sour.

He has some memories of his mother. Faint, most of them painful—the last, truly horrific—but none of his father. He was never there, and Hong'er's mother rarely spoke of him at all.

There was something about him being a soldier—or some sort of fighter, Hua Cheng can remember that. And she mentioned something about the fact that her son resembled him.

But rather than being specific, she usually just offered vague platitudes. Saying he was brave, strong, the like.

When Hong'er was particularly small, he believed that. He thought his mother was telling him the truth—that his father was some brave soldier, fighting in a far-off land. That he was handsome, strong—and he would come back, soon.

Now, he knows better than to believe it anymore.

Mothers will constantly make up reasons to explain why your father isn't there. Anything that will hurt less than the truth.

Hong'er's father must have been dead—or simply abandoned them. And she wanted to give him a pretty little story, something that was easier to listen to.

"Then you would never understand," Lang Ying mutters, throwing himself back into grave digging, his expression strained. "I can't let him go!"

"Parents lose their children every day," the ghost sighs, watching him work, "they don't do this."

"THEN THEY DON'T LOVE THEIR SONS THE WAY I LOVED MINE!" Lang Ying cries—and in his stress, the shovel between his fingers shatters at the handle. He stops for a moment, staring—then he seems to realize.

"...you were the one who killed most of the other ghosts, right?"

Slowly, he turns to look at him. "All of that power...it went to you, didn't it?"

Hua Cheng can see what the king is thinking—and that the grave he's been digging while they've been speaking—

It's much bigger than the others.

Big enough for him, even.

"...Yes," he agrees.

Part of him finds the creature's rationale absolutely infuriating, while the other is relieved that he's finally decided he wants to fight.

"Let's go, then." He mutters, turning to walk back. "What do you mean?"

The crimson ghost tosses him an annoyed stare. "The Kiln."

"...Oh," Lang Ying frowns, shaking his head, "I'm not going there."

Hua Cheng freezes after taking three steps away, his boots crunching in the snow. "What do you mean?"

"I don't want to be a Ghost King," the bandaged ghost explains, rubbing at his chin. "I never did."

"..." The youth turns his head back, staring down the former royal with narrowed eyes. "Then why did you come here?"

"There weren't enough ghosts anywhere else." Lang Ying explains, glancing around at his arrangement of burial mounds. The closer Hua Cheng looks...

He realizes that it stretches far beyond this one clearing. That it's the entire valley, in the shadow of Mount Tonglu. Countless souls, utterly wasted and obliterated, their resentment buried into the earth.

All for one man's madness. His refusal to let go.

"Besides," Lang Ying murmurs taking a slow, ambling step towards him, head tilting to the side sharply, like he can't completely control the movements of his neck—

"I can't bury you there."

The crimson's ghost lips pull back into a snarl, his scimitar rattling at his side.

"No one will ever bury me," Hua Cheng snarls, one eye flashing brightly in the dark, E'Ming's scorching in its pommel. "But you can destroy yourself trying."

The ghost moves towards him still, and Hua Cheng lifts his blade. "That's what you always do, isn't it, Lang Ying?"

Slowly ripping himself apart, in the name of his goals—never realizing, not until nothing else remains.

CLANG!

There's a crash when E'Ming slams into Lang Ying's arm, severing it in one blow. It rolls through the snow limply—and at first, Hua Cheng thinks this will be quick.

But then, he watches the arm wiggle and twist, slowly dragging itself back towards its master—watches as Lang Ying lifts it up from the ground, bandages stretching out like roots from a tree, slowly binding the arm back into place,

"I told you," Land Yang whispers.

"It took me a long time," he starts moving faster, ambling towards Hua Cheng like a deranged animal, "BUT I PUT MYSELF BACK TOGETHER!"

His eyes burn a harsh shade of gold in the night, glowing like two small candles, flickering in the wind.

CLANG!

This time, it's steel on steel, sparks flying between two swords, lighting up the dark of the night.

It's grueling.

No matter how many pieces Hua Cheng slices away, no matter how quick he is—those bandages continuously pull the broken pieces back in, binding him together.

They fight all through the night—but the sun never rises. Hasn't risen on the fields of Mount Tonglu in several months now, the region entering an eternal stage of darkness.

Zhao Beitong says the sun won't rise again now, not until another ghost king walks the earth.

The moon shines down on them now, illuminating both ghosts in a savage silver light, flashing through the darkness, lighting up the night with sparks each time their blades crash together.

CLANG!

CLANG!

"You..." Lang Ying laughs, flipping back onto his feet.

"Truly are impressive!" He throws his head back, breathing in the cold, crisp air, watching as his breath—his cold, undead gasps—frosting in the air. "IT'S NO WONDER XIANLE WAS SO DIFFICULT TO DEFEAT!"

Hua Cheng doesn't smile from the compliment, boots crunching in the snow.

He was just a foot soldier during the war. Hardly one that could make or break the difference in a battle. After all—he was only thirteen, by the end of it.

But that isn't what Lang Ying means, of course—and the crimson ghost knows it.

Devotion. Determination.

Hua Cheng was—and still is—by far the most devoted soldier in the army of Xianle. But even still—the loyalty of the Xianle army to their prince was a thing of legend. To the point where many who hadn't seen it didn't believe it.

That so many men believed the Crown Prince was worth dying for.

"There's a difference," the youth replies, "between fighting for something because you believe in it, and fighting for something because you're hungry."

He's done both, after all.

Hunger doesn't last forever.

Faith, however—at least in Hua Cheng's experience—can outlast anything.

It doesn't disappear when you're tired, or angry. Doesn't fade into the night when you're sad, or insecure. There might be moments when you forget, or when you get lost—

But that faith is always there.

And when he sees the look in Lang Ying's eyes now, the young ghost realizes—

The former King of Yong'an is envious of him.

Blood splatters into the otherwise pristine snow as E’Ming takes another slice, this time severing several of the bandaged ghost's fingers.

Lang Ying smiles, several bandages peeling from his arms, reaching down into the snow. "We both know this is a waste of time," he murmurs, still taking those slow, uneven steps toward him. "No matter how many times you cut me with that blade of yours—I won't disappear."

Yes.

Unfortunately, with building frustration, Hua Cheng is beginning to understand that E’Ming cannot hack every single enemy he encounters to bits.

Well, in this case it CAN, but disassembling Lang Ying isn't a guarantee to victory.

"E’Ming," he snaps, his brow furrowing with irritation. The scimitar flies into his hand, trembling with apologies—but the ghost doesn't have time for that right now. "Cut the others down."

It's more useful with that task, at least. Quick as a flash, it rushes off.

Swirling through the trees, quickly cutting through the bandages hoisting the ghosts into the trees—a few of them adults, but, to Hua Cheng's dismay, most of them are still young children.

They stumble around in the snow, weakly crying out into the night. "Papa!"

"It hurts!"

All of them were already dead, yes—

But Lang Ying's actions prolonged their suffering. Made it far worse than it needed to be.

In the back of his mind, part of him wonders where Zhao Beitong has gone. Normally, this would be when she would appear during a fight.

Scolding him.

Telling him that he was being lazy, or uncreative. That he should out—think his enemies, not outmuscle them.

(Hua Cheng has always preferred the latter option. For the benefit of saving time, and his ego.)

But that doesn't seem possible now—and her absence is inexplicable.

In any case, he doesn't have time to linger. Without E’Ming, he's still doing the same amount of damage—which is to say none—while having given up his main tool for guarding himself from Lang Ying's attacks.

And his current method—ripping the bandages from his body—is slow.

He takes a long leap, rising thirty meters in the air, landing some distance away on the hillside, and he still hears more crying.

"W—Where are you?"

"I can't see anything!"

"Is the bandage man gonna c—come back?!"

The fog is back now, thick, heavy, drowning even starlight.

When he lands again, feet sinking slightly in the snow, one of the ghost children is right beside him——thick, terrified tears freezing on his cheeks as he trembles, reaching for the crimson ghost's hand.

"G—Gege, I'm—I'm lost!"

Hua Cheng opens his mouth to answer, but—

"Shuo?!" Another voice calls out through the trees and the fog, and the little boy holding onto Hua Cheng's fingers sobs, trembling like a leaf.

"BAO!" He sobs, whipping his head around. "It's me! W—Where are you?!"

"I can't s—see you!"

Hua Cheng squeezes the boy's fingers.

The action seems to remind the little ghost that he's there, looking up at Hua Cheng with frightened eyes, "I—I'm sorry, mister! I—I'm just lost!"

The crimson clad youth slowly tilts his head—and he realizes, this boy... He doesn't seem to realize that he's dead. Not yet.

"Is that your gege calling for you?" Hua Cheng questions, his tone isn't as warm as he'd like for it to be—he's never had the same skill as dianxia when it comes to projecting softness with children—but it isn't cruel, or unkind.

The boy bobs his head, rubbing at his nose.

"..." The crimson ghost hoists the boy up in one arm, hitching him on his hip—half expecting the child to scream or cry out with fear—but he doesn't, immediately clinging both arms around Hua Cheng's neck, sniffling.

Like he knows that he's safe, now. "Hold on tight, got it?"

The child whimpers out some form of acknowledgement, and the ghost launches himself into the air——leaping through the treetops, breathing in—until he detects a similar scent to the boy in his arms.

Sweet, with a little hint of cinnamon to it—like candies from winter festivals

When he drops down, the boy—from the looks of it, somewhere close to nine years old—yelps, nearly running away in his fear—but his little brother calls out, reaching for him.

"BAO! Bao, it's me!!" He cries, and the elder brother stops. "S—Shuo?!"

The siblings run into each other's arms, holding on tight, with the older brother—Bao, scolding Shuo through his tears, "I told you to hold onto my hand!" He cries. "We have to get out of here, before the bandage man comes back!"

"I did!" Shuo sobs. "I didn't let go!"

He clings his arms around Bao's neck, "I don't know what happened! O—One minute you were there, and the next I—I couldn't see you anymore!"

Having done that one small kindness, the crimson ghost starts to turn back, knowing that Lang Ying is searching for him in the trees, now—

"Wait!" Both boys cry, the older one grabbing onto Hua Cheng's hand. "You can't l— leave us here! What if the bandage man comes back?!"

"What if Shuo lets go of my hand again?!"

"I DIDN'T! Believe me!"

"I won't be able to find him, I don't—I don't wanna be alone again!"

Something about that last sentence makes Hua Cheng pause.

'I don't wanna be alone again!'

After all...He used to know someone that was afraid of being alone, too.

'Please...don't go!'

The crimson ghost pauses, turning to face the boys. "You don't want to be separated again?"

Both boys shake their heads, clearly petrified, and...

Hua Cheng sighs, dropping down so he can kneel before them, one knee sinking into the snow. "Give me your hand," he murmurs, looking to the older one—Bao.

He sniffles, but obeys—offering it out to him.

Hong'er was a selfish child, who grew into a selfish teenager—and now, Hua Cheng is a selfish man. He's never had many belongings to call his own. And most of what he does have—all came from the person most precious to him. Small trinkets——junk to some, treasures to him.

He's never once in his life given something away. Not unless it was to dianxia, and in that sense—it never felt like he was losing something.

But now, removing the small red thread that sits on his third finger, carefully winding it around Bao's—it's almost agonizing.

To the naked eye, it's completely worthless. To Hua Cheng, it's from the last day he spent with his love, while he was alive, sitting by his side, holding different threads for the god as he worked on his weaving. Before the argument—the last argument they ever had.

"This is very special to me," he murmurs, tying the knot until it's secure, gesturing for Shuo to give him his own hand, "Make sure you take care of it until I come back, understand?"

Both boys nod, sniffling, looking at one another with uncertainty. "I—It's...special?"

The ghost smiles—a rare, soft smile, his eye sparking up at them, a sole point of warmth in the cold, endless darkness. "It's magic."

Both boys stare down at him with wide, awe inspired gazes.

"Go down the hill. Keep the string, and you won't lose each other. Understand?"

Of course, the string wasn't magic before, but Hua Cheng has learned how to control and manipulate his own spiritual power over the years, and he pours a significant dose into the thread now, rising to his feet. "Go on, now."

Both boys bob their heads, holding hands tightly.

"Yes, sir!"

"Thank you, gege!"

They turn, hand in hand, running off into the fog.

Slowly, the ghost turns—surveying the endless fog, the cold wind cutting all the way through him. And when he breathes in, he knows.

Lang Ying is close.

His one advantage in the fight from then on is the fact that, while Lang Ying can't see through the fog—Hua Cheng knows how to find him by scent, dropping down to ambush him from the treetops. Occasionally ripping at his bandages, or tearing a piece of him away with his teeth.

It seems endless—like the only choice Hua Cheng has is to use only physical attacks, slowly wearing down his opponent until Lang Ying's spiritual power runs out.

The amount of time that would take is almost daunting to consider—but he struggles, trying to think of another way.

Meanwhile, down the hillside, through the slopes of the forest—Mount Tonglu is experiencing a first.

Hua Cheng's small act of kindness was a rarity for a place so soaked in bad karma— one that likely never would have been repeated, except...

Children mirror what they see.

As they stumble down the mountainside, occasionally tripping on the snow, or fallen branches—struggling to make their way through the wilderness in the dark, but following the downward slope...

The string never breaks, staying steady between them. "H—Hello?"

Another voice calls out—this time, a little girl. Just as small and frightened as them. "C—Can anybody help me? I—I can't find my mama!"

Both brothers stop, looking at each other, and when Bao tries to drag his brother along, Shuo stops, dragging his feet in the snow.

"Wait!"

The little boy protests, looking back. "She's lost!"

"Yeah?" His older brother grumbles, shaking his head. "So are we, come on!" "...But what if the bandage man gets her, too?"

"Not my problem!"

Shuo's lower lip juts out, and he tugs back on the string, glaring.

"If that's what crimson gege thought, I never would have found you!"

The brothers glare at one another, one determined, the other frustrated, but...

They stumble towards the sound, holding onto the string tightly, until they find a little girl—kneeling in the snow, sobbing.

Her hair was tied up into little buns on either side of her head, once—now, they're half falling down, and the small stuffed rabbit she's clinging to is missing one ear.

"Mama!" She weeps, looking around, alone in the dark. "W—where are you?! I—I'm scared! I wanna go home!"

She jumps away in fear when she hears footsteps, so sure that it's going to be the bandage man again, that she's going to be hanging from a tree once more, listening to the horrible, rotten sound of the old man digging——

"Hi," a voice whispers. A child, just like her. "What's your name?"

Her lower lip wobbles. "Yanlin!" She cries, sniffling—holding her stuffed rabbit close to her chest, trying very hard to sound frightening, "A—And I'm very big! So—You should stay away, or I'll step on you!"

"We're not gonna hurt you, swear!"

When they approach, they can see she's lying, and that she wasn't very big at all—but neither of the boys seem angry about it.

They look small and frightened, just like her.

"My name's Shuo," the younger one whispers, "and this is my big brother, Bao."

"...I don't like it here," Yanlin whispers, eyes wide, filled with tears. "I want to go home!"

"Me too," Shuo admits, stumbling closer, "But it'll be okay, promise!"

She sobs, shaking her head, "W—what about when the bandage man comes back?!" Shuo takes her hand.

"We'll just run away, before he does!"

Yanlin shakes her head, clutching her rabbit even tighter. There's no use, she's tried. "I keep getting lost," she moans, "It won't work!"

"Sure, it will," the older boy—Bao—speaks up, his tone betraying a little bit of annoyance. "Here,"

He snatches up her hand from Shuo's grip—

And that's when she sees the red string, sitting there on his finger. "See this?"

"..." Yanlin nods, pressing her nose against the head of her stuffed rabbit, sniffling.

Bao pulls on one end of the string—and somehow, it stretches.

He wraps it around Yanlin's finger, tying the bow tight. "It's magic."

The little girl frowns, her eyebrows knitting together sulkily. "No, you're lying! It's just a normal string!"

"Is not!" Shuo huffs, crossing his arms, "My gege ain't a liar—a god gave this to us!"

"..." Yanlin looks back and forth between both boys, her eyes frightened and cautious. "...A god? I didn't think they had those here."

She's been praying to the Heavenly Emperor every single night, since the bandage man put her in that tree. No one has ever answered.

Even Bao looks doubtful, but Shuo crosses his arms over his chest, nodding very seriously. "Oh, he for sure is! I was all alone, just like you, and no matter how hard I tried, I couldn't find my brother—so I prayed, I prayed as hard as I could!" He beams, "And he came!"

"He found my gege for me, he gave us this string—and he told us it's magic! So, if you stay with us, you won't get lost—and we'll definitely get out of here, okay?" Shuo offers the little girl his hand again, helping her up. "Or do you wanna stay here by yourself?"

"...No," Yanlin admits, shaking her head.

"Then come on!" Shuo tugs her along, his shoes crunching lightly in the snow. "All we gotta do is go down the hill!"

"..." The little girl sniffles one more time, hugging her rabbit close. She's tired, and she wants to go home.

But if there really is a god here, and he's on their side, well... It makes it seem a little easier, to be brave.

She stumbles along with them, holding onto the red string as tight as she can—and in her mind, she prays. To a god she doesn't know, and has never seen.

'Don't let it get me,' she whispers, following her new friends through the night, jumping at every sound. 'Please—I'll be very good when I get home. I'll be nice to my little brother. I'll do all my chores without Mama asking! Just—please, don't let it get me!'

Yanlin isn't the only child they find on the slopes, making their way down. One by one, they find more and more. Crying, alone, and scared.

Bao insists they don't have time, but Shuo always makes them stop.

And somehow, the red string the crimson ghost gave them never runs out.

It keeps getting longer and longer, connecting them as they make their way down the mountain, single file——and by the time they reach the bottom, there's at least a few dozen of them, staring at one another when the fog clears.

"See?" Shuo beams, squeezing Yanlin's hand.

"I told you, we'd definitely make it!"

"Who gave you that string, anyway?"

"Mmm..." Shuo rubs his chin, thinking about it. "He was HUGE! With only one eye, and wearing red! Anyone know a god like that?"

All the children stop, thinking—a couple of them rubbing their heads. None of them can think of one.

But just as they're contemplating the matter—there's a red flash of light, sending them screaming and scattering when they see a scimitar flickering through the air.

Then, when Shuo sees the figure that's landed on the snow, he beams. "Gege!"

Several of the other children pause, lifting their hands from their heads when they see Shuo running forward, grabbing the crimson ghost by the sleeve, "We made it down! I think everyone else did, too!"

Hua Cheng pauses, turning his head to look over the group of children.

There must be almost seventy of them—more ghosts than he realized were even left on the fields of Mount Tonglu to begin with. Nearly all of them are slightly emaciated, or pale...

Most killed from disease, or hunger—and none of them seem to know it. A little girl runs to his side.

“Mister God!” She cries, holding a stuffed rabbit against her side, “What’s your name? I got a gold piece for my birthday last year, I’m gonna put it in one of your temples!”

Hua Cheng stares down at her, slowly tilting his head to the side. “...I don’t have any temples.”

“...” Yanlin frowns, her brow knitting with worry. She hadn’t thought of that.

Shuo huffs, crossing his arms, “I’ll build you some, then! As soon as I’m big! Our dad builds stuff too, you know—he can help!”

“What’s your name?” Yanlin repeats, tugging at his sleeve again.

“I don’t know how to build stuff, but there’s an apple orchard behind our village! I’ll make a shrine in my room, and I’ll bring you some every day!”

That almost makes the ghost smile, and he murmurs—

“I’m not a god, little one.”

None of the children believe him on that front. Finally, he replies—

“Hua Cheng. That’s my name.”

Yanlin smiles up at the ghost shyly, holding her rabbit to her chest with both arms, “Thank you, Hua Chengzhu!”

The title is a little odd—after all, he isn’t exactly the ruler of this place, but... From their perspective, he might as well be.

“Thank you, Hua Chengzhu!” Other children cry, each running over to give the ghost cries of appreciation.

Eventually, he turns to Bao, holding out his hand, “Did you take good care of it for me?”

The boy nods seriously.

He reaches down, untying the red string from his finger, each of the other children doing the same, carefully handing it back to the ghost, or, well—

If you asked any of them, their god.

“Stay where you are,” he murmurs, wrapping the string back around his finger once more.

“Don’t go and get lost again.”

“We won’t!” Several of them crow, while Shuo trails after him with worry.

“Hua Chengzhu—where are you going?”

A hand lands in the little boy’s hair—ruffling it, and silently ordering him to stay back.

Hua Cheng continues up the slope, replying.

“To kill a ghost.”

That, none of the children have any qualms with. They know which one.

And they all hate him. A resentment that runs deep in their bones. So much hate for children to feel. Young, too young.

But the world taught them to hate, anyway. E'Ming is frustrated.

Hua Cheng knows as much from the way the saber restlessly rattles by his side, infuriated by how useless it is in this situation. The ghost can almost empathize. After all—Lang Ying is an infuriating opponent. In the time it would take Hua Cheng to wear him down...

Lang Ying could be doing the same thing to him.

And even if Hua Cheng does believe that he could win—he doesn't like the uncertainty of it, and...

He doesn't have time for this.

When they clash again, the bandaged ghost is even more infuriated than he was before.

"WHAT HAVE YOU DONE?!" He roars, their swords clashing together so violently, even E'Ming is trembling with the effort it takes to beat the other ghost back. "DO YOU REALIZE HOW LONG IT TOOK ME TO CATCH THEM?!"

Hua Cheng grits his teeth, planting one foot in Lang Ying's chest.

Kicking him so hard, the ghost flies back at least forty meters, slamming into a large, ancient oak—so violently, the trunk snaps in two.

"They are CHILDREN!" The crimson ghost shouts back, "JUST LIKE YOUR SON!"

"THEY'RE DEAD!" Lang Ying wails "WHO CARES WHAT I DO TO THEM NOW?!"

"So IS HE!" E'Ming slices off a good portion of the ghost's bandages now, but not nearly enough, "SO AM I, AND SO ARE YOU!" He shouts, "So, if none of it matters, if no one should care, why DON'T YOU JUST GO AND DISAPPEAR ALREADY?!"

Somehow, they end up back where they started.

Standing in the middle of the burial mounds, two ghosts, in a graveyard. An empty grave standing open—waiting for one of them to lay down and rest.

"I can't," Lang Ying moans, clutching at one side of his face, sword hanging limply in his grip. "...DON'T YOU SEE THAT I CAN'T?!"

In their next clash, Hua Cheng cuts off the king's arm again, watching it roll to the ground, twitching and flailing, getting ready to make its way back.

Then, it occurs to him—that maybe, just maybe—Lang Ying is telling the truth.

That even if he wanted to, his soul is too cursed to allow him to rest in peace.

And then, staring at the string in his hand—the crimson ghost gets an idea.

Brains over brawn—something that Zhao Beitong would like. She's always preferred cleverness, after all.

"...Did you mean it?"

Lang Ying is hobbling towards his arm, movements robotic and jerking, when he asks that question. "...What?"

"The night you died," Hua Cheng explains quietly. "When you called the crown prince your friend. Did you mean that?"

"..." The king turns around, leveling Hua Cheng with a cold—but clear-headed stare, a moment of clarity between bouts of madness. "I did."

The curse that Bai Wuxiang placed upon him in his human life ate through whatever honor Lang Ying may have had. His sanity.

Took his natural blessings, the luck he was born with, and burned them to ash.

"I see," Hua Cheng replies—and in a flash, before the other ghost can even react, the taller man is in front of Lang Ying, holding his severed arm in hand, gripping it by the elbow. "Well, then—"

CRACK!

Lang Ying's head whips to the side, his spine cracking, making it spin all the way around on his shoulders after he—

After Hua Cheng slapped the King of Yong'an in the face with his own arm, twirling it between his fingers like one might with a baton.

Slowly, he smiles.

Not a kind smile. Not a friendly smile. The smile you see pressed against your window at night, when you can't seem to wake from a nightmare. The smile of a beast, on the verge of devouring you. The smile the devil makes, each time he steals a soul.

Wide, sharp—full of teeth.

"Any friend of Taizi Dianxia is a friend of mine," He purrs.

Lang Ying has a very particular—cruel, destructive—form of friendship.

Hua Cheng thinks it would be a shame if no one gave him a taste of it.

The red string unspools by his hand, hanging by his side like a whip.

It's tied around the elbow of Lang Ying's severed arm—snatching it up and binding it to a trunk of a nearby tree.

The spirit's bandages try to retrieve it, but hard as they may—they can't wrench the arm free.

The red string won't break.

Hua Cheng takes his other arm, next.

Binding it to a nearby tree.

Then one foot. then the calf, up to the knee.

It's a slow process, one that requires him to get under the former king's guard, to dodge around the slowly building web of string forming around them, burning hot to the touch.

Lang Ying doesn't seem to notice—not at first. His bandages act as new limbs, dragging his torso around, helping him skittle through the snow like a demented little spider, trying to tear at Hua Cheng with his teeth.

But he's in someone else's web now. And there is no escape.

He's hoisted up from the ground, no limbs left to speak of, a red string wrapped around his throat—surrounded by pieces of his own body, hanging around him in the trees.

Just like the ghosts he used. Pieced apart, just like the humans who suffered under the plague he unleashed.

Hua Cheng was also watching, as the white clothed calamity tormented his beloved. He was also learning: and he took away an important lesson.

Bai Wuxiang doesn't force anyone to do anything if he can help it. He tricks, lies, and steals. Rarely however, does he wield the blade

He doesn't believe that it was no face who unleashed the plague on Xianle for the first time. Or that if he did—he wasn't acting alone.

Lang Ying was the one responsible.

Hua Cheng doesn't know how. Has no proof of the matter, but he knows.

In his bones, he knows.

Finally, it's there again—now, in this final moment, another flash of clarity.

"..." Lang Ying lifts his chin, almost uncaring of the fact that his limbs are gone, glancing around the clearing. "...Who is that crying?" He whispers.

The pained, terrified wailing has never stopped.

"Wu Ming, who is that? Who's crying?!"

The crimson ghost looks up at the creature, strung up like meat in a slaughterhouse— and he almost pities him, the way he knows his love did, towards the end.

Dianxia is like that. Always has been. He has room for hate, yes—but tempered.

He is also capable of forgiveness. Of offering mercy at times—when he thinks it's deserved.

But they are not the same people.

Hua Cheng is not a forgiving man, and he does not show mercy.

Nor does he feel pity for a man whose choices were all his own.

“That’s your son,” he replies softly. “He’s suffering.”

Lang Ying looks around, twisting his neck frantically, trying to find him. “...Where? You’ve got to let me go; I need to—”

The red string tightens around his neck, so much so that he can no longer speak.

Hua Cheng approaches, stopping underneath him. “Your son was lucky.”

Lang Ying’s expression freezes, pupils widening.

“He was lucky,” Hua Cheng continues, reaching out to wrap his fingers around a nearby thread, “to have died young, rather than be raised by a man like you.”

The mere suggestion makes Lang Ying’s face contort with rage, thrashing, “My family WAS CURSED—!”

Then, he stops—realizing how weak he’s become. That, all this time, while the strings were holding his limbs—

They were also consuming his spiritual power—slowly, but surely.

“Their only curse was you,” Hua Cheng replies, staring up at him with cold, unforgiving eyes. And then—there’s that smile again. The sort of grin that, even now, makes the bandaged ghost tense up with fear.

He hasn’t felt fear in so, so long. “But don’t worry, your highness,”

Hua Cheng tugs on that thread a little harder, until it starts to vibrate and rattle, burning with heat. “I’ll take good care of your son.”

Somehow, Lang Ying pales.

“...What are you going to do?”

The crimson ghost’s smile never fades. “Whatever I please.”

“WU MING!” He cries.

“HUA CHENG—YOU CAN’T! IF YOU DO—I’LL COME BACK! I’LL CURSE YOU! YOU—”

Hua Cheng learned something in the last hour.

He doesn't know if it's because of his ascension years ago, or because of his strength as a ghost—

But he can feel it now. Prayers, being sent up to him.

Filling him up with even more power than before. With that, and all the energy he's absorbed from Lang Ying, his entire form is shuddering with it, forming energy like the core of a far-off star.

And he wonders, now—about what Jun Wu said. The Fire Master.

The title was obviously never his—Hua Cheng never agreed to take it. But now, he's curious to see. What it would feel like, if he was.

His fingers squeeze that thread tighter, until it slices his skin, his own blood dripping down, staining the snow.

And he whispers—

"Burn."

Every inch of string, in that moment, sets itself aflame, flaring so violently that a hundred-meter-high pillar of flames shoots up into the sky, a swirling inferno that almost wants to shatter the horizon itself.

The flames do not touch their master, however. They don't dare.

Hua Cheng watches, hands clasped behind his back, as the former King of Yong'an's form is reduced to ash—even those becoming incinerated as the flames rage on.

Not scattered. Not thrown into the sea or left to rot. He is simply no more.

The flames roar, and the crying stops.

It's a taste of what he could have been, had he not turned his back upon heaven itself —but this, this feels more powerful than any show of force that the ghost has seen from a heavenly official before.

The flames dim, leaving his face cast in an amber glow, eye smoldering. Then, he remembers—

They all wear their shackles. Dance to the same song, holding their hands out for coins to be thrown down from on high.

Puppets. Glorified little pets of the heavenly emperor.

Hua Cheng kneels before no one. Prays to only one god.

And he wears no chains.

The burial mounds moan beneath his feet—seeming to know, now, that their murderer has been slain.

Even by the standards of Mount Tonglu—this is a tainted place now. Cursed. Filled till it's bursting with howling resentful energy.

For a savage ghost, it's a feast that never ends.

Hua Cheng, however, turns his back on it.

Slowly making his way to the edge of the clearing—he stops, holding out a hand. "Come."

There's hesitation—sniffling, but...

Slowly, a hand—that of a toddler, barely more than an infant—grasps his own. It doesn't hurt anymore.

They make their way down the mountainside—and Hua Cheng leaves the burial mounds, and the one, empty grave left by Lang Ying, behind.

Let them fester and rot—Hua Cheng doesn't care.

He won't feast on the souls of children, stolen from their graves by a madman to fuel a curse.

When he returns to the base of the mountain, his little flock of believers are waiting. Jumping up and down still, cheering—because each and every one of them knows—

The bandage man is gone.

"Hua Chengzhu! You did it, Hua Chengzhu!" They cry out, clapping in the night.

He sets Lang Ying's son down with one of the older ghosts, knowing what he'll do with him later—but leaving him, for now.

"What are we supposed to do now?" One of the children mumbles, scratching the back of his head.

“Yeah, how are we supposed to get home?” Bao frowns. “We don’t even know where we are.”

Hua Cheng almost answers—knowing that the truth will be horrible, yes, but that it’s better than a lie.

“You’re—”

CREEAAAAAAAK!

Everyone in the valley goes still, turning their heads. The fog is gone, now.

Mount Tonglu scorches.

The ground rattles, jumping up and down beneath their feet—so violently, it knocks nearly all of them to the ground, leaving Hua Cheng as the only ghost left standing, staring.

“...Hua Chengzhu?”

His eyes dilate, pupils narrowing into slits.

It’s time.

“What’s going on?”

Hua Cheng’s enemies are gone. Other than this small, weak crowd of children—no other spirits remain in the fields of Mount Tonglu.

There were once tens of millions of them, flowing through the valley like molten metal.

Now, the crimson ghost is the only one left standing. And the mountain must know it.

Because now, the Kiln is closing.

A ghost king is about to be born.

Before the children can ask anything more, the crimson ghost disappears in a flash— shooting towards the mouth of the volcano like a fiery arrow, crashing inside.

It’s time.

He crashes through the entrance just as it seals just, rocketing down to the floor with a slam.

It’s done.

He’s trembling slightly—from the adrenaline, and the exhaustion that came with fighting Lang Ying, and creating a new spiritual tool.

But he did it. He made it.

Out of tens of millions of spirits. Plenty stronger, more ancient and powerful than him—and he, an orphan without wealth, family, or even a name, made it here.

E’Ming buzzes at his hip, and Hua Cheng’s fingers wrap around the handle of the blade, stroking it slowly.

It’s done.

No more battles to fight. No more evils to witness. The Kiln itself won’t remain closed for long with only one ghost inside of it. Whatever reasons Hua Cheng had to wait this long for it to close—they don’t matter now. It’ll be a matter of months, at most.

Then, he’ll find him.

His other hand reaches up into his hair, to the red pearl braided into dark tresses, squeezing it tightly.

(Wait for me.)

(Just a little longer.)

The ghost clenches his teeth from the exhaustion, rising to his feet.

(I’m coming home.)

But when Hua Cheng looks up—he stops.

It’s a rare thing for the crimson ghost to be wrong about anything—particularly bad things. He’s always been cynical. Punishment, for the crime of being born unlucky.

It’s rare for him to be so surprised.

But he was wrong.

The battle is not over—and Hua Cheng is not alone.

There’s a slow clap, rattling off the massive cavern walls, echoing throughout.

“Well done, little one.”

Full, red lips curve up into a smile.

“You’ve grown strong.”

Standing in the center of the cavern, head held high, arms clasped behind her back…

…Is Zhao Beitong.

The Goddess of the Kiln

Chapter Summary

“What are you doing here?” Hua Cheng growls, and at first—he thinks this must be a trick.

That she was a competitor, hiding in plain sight all this time. That she was lying to him, building him into this false sense of security—all so she could learn his movements, make it easier for her to take him apart in the end.

But her smile doesn’t change.

“This is my home.”

Chapter Notes

TW// this chapter contains references to sexism, abuse of power imbalances, and the deaths of children.

You can find me on twitter and keep up with current updates of the story HERE

This story also has some spotify playlists for those who want some fun listening while reading!

No Paths Are Bound: The Playlist
Zhao Beitong's Playlist
The Wu Ming Playlist

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Her student stands by the closed doors to the kiln, taking in the space all around them. It’s not what he thought it would be. Not what the stories said.

He imagined this small, tight, oven like space—something like the name implied. Not this.

The cavern is dauntingly vast.

Much like the cavern between realms, where he met the two gamblers, betting souls— but instead of black walls, every surface of this place is pure white marble, standing in contrast to the dark, ashen exterior, everything that's left of the Kingdom of Wuyong.

"...What is this?"

He questions, his voice low—and the ghost in the center of the room smiles at him, slowly tilting her head to the side.

"What do you mean?"

"What are you doing here?" Hua Cheng growls, and at first—he thinks this must be a trick.

That she was a competitor, hiding in plain sight all this time. That she was lying to him, building him into this false sense of security—all so she could learn his movements, make it easier for her to take him apart in the end.

But her smile doesn't change.

"This is my home."

He doesn't answer—just stares, his gaze hateful, distrusting.

How quickly it changed, the moment he suspected her betrayal.

"You know, Tonglu opens more often than anyone thinks," her heels click against stone, echoing against the endless space around them. "Do you know why?"

Hua Cheng doesn't answer, doesn't move. Just stands there—arms clasped behind his back, just like hers—and he waits.

Waits, and listens.

Just like she taught him.

Zhao Beitong's smile softens—only to grow sharp once more. "My father was a builder, in my human life."

She explains softly, lifting her head, staring at the expanse over their heads. "More of an engineer really, even though he never had the proper education."

"Why are you telling me this?"

"You saw the aqueducts, didn't you?" Zhao Beitong doesn't turn her gaze from the ceiling.

“My father built them.” She whispers.

And the palaces. The streets. And the temples.

A man born the son of a servant, not even taught how to read before he came of age— and he raised one of the greatest imperial cities the world had known at that time.

It would only be rivaled again by another kingdom, beloved by the heavens—fond of the arts, the sciences, and beauty.

The Kingdom of Xianle.

She would stand from the top of this mountain, some days—let her eyes peer as far as they could against the horizon—and she would watch.

Watch golden palaces and shining temples rise from a virgin landscape, and ache. Ache for the life she once had. The father who built the world around her, knowing— knowing that the boy would come back.

That he would bring it all crashing down, just as he had before.

“They use forces like gravity to carry the water from one place to the next,” Zhao Beitong explains. “But pushing it uphill—that requires pressure, using sharp angles and pumps to push all of that water where it needs to go.”

“If I ever want to be a plumber, that’ll be useful.” Hua Cheng grumbles, impatient and unimpressed. His companion smiles, never lowering her head. Foolish child. Bratty, and stubborn—

But oh, how she had desperately hoped that it would never come to this. “The pressure puts strain on the entire structure,” she continues.

“For that, there’s release valves—letting offshoots of water pour out into the sewer system. That’s where the majority of it goes, you know —most of the time, only half of the water moving through the lines actually makes it to the destination.” She stops next to the Kiln’s wall.

Presses her palm there, flat against the stone. “That’s what this place is.”

“A sewer?” Hua Cheng questions, still tense and unhappy, never pleased when he feels as though he's been tricked.

"A pressure release valve." Zhao Beitong clicks her tongue, lightly scolding.

"What do you think happens, when so much spiritual power is produced by cultivators? When so much of the energy in the universe is pushed upwards, towards the heavens?" She murmurs, pointing one finger up to the kiln's ceiling.

Slowly, he begins to understand.

"...Pressure."

"Resentment," she murmurs—which is essentially the same thing.

In truth—it isn't cultivators. Isn't the gods. It's one god. One cultivator, who has never respected the balance of things. Who has only seen the resources before him as natural rewards for his talents.

There will always be certain men who feel entitled to power. Who see a shining future as a birthright, not something that must be earned, or shared.

"When the resentment builds to a breaking point, Tonglu will send out it's call," she murmurs. "And the underworld will answer."

It always does.

"But this does not always result in the birth of a ghost king," she explains, turning to face him again. Her hair falls loose around her shoulders—and he notices that her dress is different, now.

Finer, more layers—trimmed in gold, rubies braided into her hair.

"If a ghost of the proper caliber does not survive, the result will be half formed. A grotesque monster," she admits, the look in her eyes...complex. A mix between disgust and affection. "But not a Ghost King."

"Does that mean Bai Wuxiang was the only success?" Hua Cheng questions.

Zhao Beitong lets out a soft laugh, shaking her head. "He was the first true success, but he wasn't born here. No—there have been two successes, within this kiln. Two Ghost Kings, since the birth of Bai Wuxiang."

That gives the young ghost pause, his eyes flashing with confusion

“...If that was the case, why has no one ever heard of them?”

Zhao Beitong’s eyes bear down on him, burning like alchemical flames, violet light cast down over her cheekbones—and when she smiles, it’s feral. Powerful.

Sorrowful.

“Because I devoured them,” she whispers.

Hua Cheng’s heart can no longer beat. His breaths can no longer stutter.

But if it could, it would be racing now, shivers sinking into his bones—realizing now, why he could never sense Zhao Beitong’s spiritual power.

Why he could never catch her scent. Why they’re both here.

Her spiritual energy exists in the ground below. In the air around them. It’s the very atmosphere that forms the clouds above the former kingdom of Wuyong.

Her scent is the soot in the air, the fire below.

“I didn’t want to close the doors,” she explains, her voice aching.

“Because I grew fond of you.”

Hua Cheng stops.

His anger stops. His distrust. His belligerent form of cynicism.

Because when he looks into Zhao Beitong’s eyes, he knows that she means it. That, for the first time in so very long, there’s more than one person who... Cares.

Eight years is a long time for anyone—but he’s still young. It’s more time than he’s spent with any creature in his brief existence. And aside from one other—she’s been the first nurturing influence in his life.

Even if he didn’t always recognize it as that. Not until now.

When it’s already been too late.

“…When you ascended—for just a moment, I was relieved,” She admits.

Disappointed, but relieved. Because that man was getting his way again, yes— cheating, always loading the board in his favor.

“But when you came back down…”

The mountain rumbles around them, and Hua Cheng can feel it—the heat, burning from the outer walls.

“I knew that you and I would end up here.”

There’s a low rustling noise, following the rumbling—and that’s when Hua Cheng starts to see them.

Silvery little points of light. Wraith butterflies.

They followed her throughout the years, always in smaller groups—but now, there are so many, it looks like a tidal wave, slowly floating down from above.

“…I don’t take credit for the other creations,” Zhao Beitong murmurs, her voice slightly fragile.

“I’ve never been happy with a half made product. They always disgusted me, but…the Ghost Kings, they…” She smiles.

Not a happy smile, no—something so deeply mournful, that even in all of the grief and suffering Hua Cheng has experienced, he struggles to fathom it.

But it’s also ferociously proud, like—

“They’re my children.” Zhao Beitong’s lips quiver.

Like a mother.

“And you—” She steps forward, just as the wraith butterflies begin to crest overheat, “—will be my third son.”

Her fingers reach for his face, trembling. “…My San Lang.”

Her finest creation. Her favorite child.

She clutches his face in her hands, staring up into his gaze.

That brave, handsome face.

God, how she hated him. Resented him, hoped he would die.

And god, how she adored him. Wanted to lift him up, to keep him close—keep him safe.

But her fingernails slowly begin to dig into his skin—hands trembling, heart breaking, as she whispers—

“I have made many weapons. All my life.”

In many ways, that’s truly all she has ever known how to do.

“...But there will never be another Ghost King,” Zhao Beitong murmurs. “I won’t allow it.”

There are many types of mothers in life. There are those who love you fiercely, want to keep you safe and warm—to protect you from the world, while also making you strong enough to face it.

And then, there are mothers who resent the act of creation itself.

They are the ones that devour their young.

Zhao Beitong, in the end, is both.

Life has given her no choice to be any other way. The world has taught her nothing different.

It is now, staring back down at her, that Hua Cheng understands what the elder spirit means to do.

That she means to open her jaws, and swallow him whole.

And of course—it’s never that easy. Not with him—nor with her.

They part, with her clutching her stomach in the place where the young man kicked her—and Hua Cheng landing a hundred meters away, clutching E-Ming.

“...” Zhao Beitong stumbles to the side, slightly—one hand on her ribs as she looks up, and as her gaze intensifies—so does the heat from the kiln. “...Is that what you call a blow?” She calls, her voice distinctly unimpressed.

She charges, then—with millions of butterflies crash in her wake, light as air before, but now, in such mass, they make the floor rattle and shake as they come towards him, roaring like the sea in a maelstrom—

“I EXPECT BETTER , BOY!” She roars.

And so, it begins.

Each time they clash, the mountain roars in response.

There’s fluttering everywhere, making it impossible to see anything around him as the butterflies warm—wings cutting into his skin, tiny little mouths latching in, sucking at his spiritual energy like little parasites.

The only way to counter them is to swallow them—to absorb them into his own core—and when they come in such vast numbers, it’s almost impossible to do.

“I DON’T—” Hua Cheng cries out once, when they clash—his E-Ming against her own blades, “I DON’T WANT TO DO THIS!”

He surprises himself when he says it. He’s never been one to shy away from a battle, from what needs to be done—no matter the cost. There was only one person he ever placed above betrayal, harm, or reproach. One person he could never raise a hand to, no matter the circumstances.

But he doesn’t—

Hua Cheng realizes now, with slowly building regret—

He doesn’t want to hurt her.

He will, he knows. Knows that there’s very little that he isn’t capable of. That as much as he’s come to…care.

He’s come to care for Zhao Beitong in these past eight years.

But as much as he’s come to care, he was a selfish child. A selfish teenager. And now, he’s a selfish man.

His affection for her isn’t more important than his reasons for being here. It just makes the climb to the top far more painful than he expected.

“YOU WILL!”

She cries, eyes mad—mad with grief, torment, and curses.

So many curses, ten thousand—ten MILLION lifetimes of curses, resentment, and hatred. Built up in one place, placed under heat and pressure until there was no space left.

And now, it must be released.

But this was never Zhao Beitong's choice. She doesn't want this. She never did.

Hua Cheng learns something else, now. About the Kiln, her, himself—about the very nature of magic.

The lines between two people can slowly begin to blur, the better they know one another.

The more they care for one another.

That if you put them in a situation like this, under enough heat and pressure, it—

It can lead to things bleeding over between the two.

Somewhere in the melee, her hand reaches him—clutching over his forehead—and for a moment, it's all dark.

Then—he isn't in the kiln anymore.

No burning heat. No stinging pain. No butterfly wings, fear, or death.

He's small, and when he opens his eyes, blinking blearily against the sun, he's on a narrow country road.

Lined by red maples, as far as the eye can see—and it's autumn.

He sits up, slowly rubbing the side of his head—soft, ink black curls beneath his fingertips.

There's humming ahead.

When he lifts his cheek—he sees a woman there, just a few paces down the road. Tall, slender—long, jet black hair, bouncing against her shoulders.

There's a cheerfulness to her gait, a natural energy about her—and when she calls, the boy can't help but smile, "Where's my little Hong Hong-er? Did a ghost steal him away?”

A soft giggle tears from the boy's lips as he rolls to his feet. “I’m here!” He calls. “I’m coming!”

He always runs just a little too fast, never realizing quite how quick his legs can take him—and when he slams into the back of her legs, his mother lets out a soft ‘Oof !’ Nearly dropping the basket in her arms.

But she doesn’t scold Hong-er, smiling when he hugs her knees.

“There you are!” She smiles, reaching down to pat his head. “What were you doing, getting so far away from me?”

“...” The little boy doesn’t speak at first, hugging her so, so tight—pressing his face into her skirt. Eventually, he replies, “You were going too fast!”

His mother frowns, reaching down to pet his head.

“I tried really hard to keep up,” he mumbles, “But you were walking so fast, I got tired!”

“...I’m sorry, little love,” she shakes her head, setting the basket on one hip, wrapping an arm around him so she can hoist him up.

“I don’t ever want you getting too far away from me, alright?” She hitches him on her hip, letting the little boy cuddle against her side as she continues down the road. “You just let me know if you get too tired, and I’ll carry you.”

Hong-er hums in response, cuddling closer.

In truth—he wasn’t very tired at all. His legs might be short, but they’re strong, and he’s always been quick.

He just likes being picked up and carried around—that’s all. And now that he’s all warm and comfortable, he grumbles. “How much further is it?” He whines.

“We’ve been waking FOREVER!” His face drops against her chest, legs kicking out irritably, “I’m gonna die!”

“It’s only been a few hours,” the young woman snorts good naturedly, bumping her cheek against his head. “You won’t die!”

"I will!" Hong-er cries out, stubborn.

"I'll die, and then I'll turn into a ghost and tell you that you're the one walking slow!"

Any other parent would probably find that horribly disturbing, or at the very least disrespectful—but his mother throws her head back and laughs, hugging him close, "Oh really?"

"Uh-huh!"

"Hmmm..." She thinks about it, rubbing his back with her hands, "Well, I think you'd be a very cute ghost! You better haunt me forever, alright?"

Her son beams up at her, eyes sparkling with amusement. "I will!" She can't blame him for being grouchy after all—it isn't his fault.

They've been traveling on foot for weeks now—and it would exhaust anyone, but especially a little boy his age. He should be running and playing with other children— not walking so much that he wears out two pairs of shoes in as many weeks.

"You didn't answer, Mama," he huffs.

"Hmm?" She glances up—and the little boy repeats himself.

"How much further?"

"Oh..." She glances down the road, thinking, holding him a little closer. "Maybe... another couple of days?"

Hong-er scowls—because that's exactly what she said when he asked the day before.

And...she sighs. "Look—I think you'll like it there. It'll be good for us!" She encourages the boy, hugging him a little closer. "A nice change of pace!"

"But why did we have to leave?" He mumbles, eyes slightly narrowed. "...Money wasn't good back home," his mother shrugs.

"And I've got a hungry little ghost to feed!" She gives the boy on her hip a playful little bounce, trying to lighten his mood.

Of course—he was too small then, to understand the economic downturn in the kingdom of Xuli. And for someone like his mother...

You go where the work is. Simple as that.

“Besides—Xianle is a nice place, I promise,” the young woman reassures him. “Everyone there is rich, and kind—the king and queen are good and just, and they even have the most beautiful crown prince in the world!”

Hong-er really doesn’t see what that has to do with him. They never see people like that outside of stories, anyways. “I still won’t have any friends,” he mumbles—and his mother’s gaze saddens.

“...Maybe this time will be different,” she shakes her head, “give it a chance.” There’s no point, and they both know it.

He pushes his hair in front of his face irritably—hiding his right eye. “They’ll be scared of me.”

“...” His mother frowns, batting his hand away as she pushes his hair behind his ear. “Don’t say that, Hong-er.”

“Why not? I’m ugly.”

He tries to say it bravely, like it doesn’t bother him—but the words just come out small, distinctly...sad, and his mother squeezes him closer.

“Don’t ever say that,” she repeats, leaning down to kiss his right eyebrow—even as he shrinks away. “My little Hong-er is handsome!”

He doesn’t believe her—he never does, even if she tells him that each and every time.

“Even if I wasn’t ugly, they’d make fun of me anyway,” he grumbles. He’s in a mood this afternoon, she can tell—probably from being tired, and well...

She gave him her own portion of dinner last night, but she doesn’t doubt that the poor thing still must be hungry.

“Why?”

“‘Cause I don’t have a name,” the little boy replies, staring up at her pointedly, making her frown.

“Yes, you do!” She huffs. “I picked it out myself!”

His gaze is unrelenting, but she’s just as stubborn as he is, “It’s Hong!

it's a good name!"

Hong Hong-er, cute enough for now, when he's still a sweet little boy—but Hong is a perfectly fine name for a grown man, too! It's a good name, really—!

"But I only have one name!"

Hong-er frowns. "Everyone else has two!"

"That's just given names and family names," his mother waves him off. "Hong is your given name—"

"And what's my family name?" He presses. He's still so small, still such a child at times—

But he's also relentless .

"...Your father's name," she hedges.

"What's his name?"

"We'll talk about it when you're taller." She never says older—because then she would just end up being forced to set a date and time for the conversation.

Instead, she told him they could discuss it when he was two meters tall—which he didn't realize until very recently meant it would be a very long time, maybe not ever .

But before the boy can say much more, his mother is distracted by an orange grove on the side of the road.

"Look at that?" She muses, setting him down on his feet. "What do you say I get us a snack before we keep on?"

He tries to cling, to tell her to never mind, but she pats the top of his head. "Stay where you are, your Mama will be right back!"

With that, she slips into the tree line—and Hong-er is left staring after her, standing alone on the side of the road.

"...She was so young." A familiar voice echoes in the young man's ear. "That's surprising."

Hong-er's hands ball into fists. "Get out." This is his memory.

“How old must she have been when she had you?” Zhao Beitong muses, rubbing her chin. “Barely more than a child herself, I imagine.”

“How should I know?!” Hong-er hisses.

This memory is an old one—he was so young back then, the ghost had completely forgotten it until now.

“She never did tell you about your father, did she?” The older woman watches as his face contorts with anger, and her voice softens. “...You assumed the very worst, didn’t you?”

“He was dead, or a bastard.”

“But your mother never said that,” she points out.

“Why would she?!”

Hong-er snaps, “What kind of mother wants a little boy to know that?!”

“Or maybe it just wasn’t true.” She murmurs, watching as he shakes his head vehemently.

“He left—if he wasn’t dead, then he was just worthless trash,” the little boy snarls, fists shaking.

“...He loved her.”

“Shut up!” Hong-er cries. “You have no way of knowing that!”

“You think I haven’t read your fortune, in all of our time together?” Zhao Beitong muses, crossing her arms, the wind playing through her hair. “Do you know what it means, being born under the star of solitude?”

The little boy turns away from her, glaring into the tree line of the orange grove, waiting for his mother. “That I’m cursed, alright, I KNOW!”

“Not necessarily,” she murmurs, making her companion freeze. “That’s only one possible outcome.”

His entire life—he’s only ever been told the opposite.

“Your life could always go one way or the other. You could be the most cursed soul to walk the earth—or among the most blessed. It will always veer between the two extremes, influenced by your own will."

"...What's that got to do with my father?" Hong-er grumbles, peering into the trees.

"For a child to be born with such a fate—it is always created by the love of two parents who love each other deeply," Zhao Beitong explains. "So, regardless of whether or not he was dead..."

His father loved his mother.

Must have loved her deeply, for that to be true.

Hong-er stares into the orange grove, heart beating wildly in his chest, and he knows —she comes back in the next three minutes.

They eat their oranges, she sings songs and tells stories.

All he has to do is sit here and wait, and she'll come back. Sit here and wait, and he can live in a memory that doesn't hurt.

"...Hong-er."

It's the first time in so many years that he's heard that name. Not in a memory, or in a dream—but spoken clearly.

"The name that he stole from you," Zhao Beitong repeats, her eyes never leaving him. "It was Hong-er."

"..."

Oh, how many years he has ached to be known by that name. For his beloved to hear his voice, and to know that it was him. To no longer be a permanent stranger.

Now, hearing it—the one thing he's wanted to hear for so fucking long—fills him with nothing but endless frustration.

Because it's not him.

Because this is his memory, and he doesn't want to share it. Because he doesn't want to do this, he—

"GET OUT!" He snarls.

He whips around, lunging his hands thrown out—and the moment that they wrap around Zhao Beitong's throat, her eyes widening—everything goes dark.

They aren't in the Kiln anymore.

They aren't on a narrow country road, lined with maple trees.

For a moment, the world is dark.

CLANG!

Sparks fly as the hammer strikes across hot metal, slowly molding the edge of the blade into shape.

CLANG!

Sweat beads across her forehead, pouring down the slim, toned muscles of her arms and shoulders, soft, elbow length leather gloves shielding her from the heat.

It's been six hour straight, working on this particular rapier. It needs to be thin, delicate—but strong enough not to shatter under extreme force.

The water hisses and steams as she dunks the searing metal into the trough to cool, letting out a tired sigh—but satisfied.

There are voices in the street outside—to be expected, after all, it'll be busy now, right up to the lantern festival.

But not all of the words that filter down through the workshop as they pass by are pleasant.

"...Isn't that Old Man Tonglu's daughter?" "That's their name?"

There's some laughter from the young women as they pass by, and the young woman's face contorts with annoyance as she pulls her gloves off with slightly more force than necessary, tossing them down onto the counter.

"I guess it's fitting—but how hideous!"

Tonglu. Molten Copper. A kiln. A furnace. No matter which way you look at it, it's a fitting name for an armorer, the daughter of a bricklayer, who rose to the rank of Royal Architect.

New money, new political power—it doesn't immediately bring any respect, only scorn.

She sets her tongs aside with a heavy clatter, rolling the muscles in her shoulders, feeling the joints ache and crack from so many hours at work.

The wealthier citizens of the imperial city have never been friendly to her family. She's used to it, by now.

"I hate it when you scowl."

The sound of that voice makes her pause, shoulders stiffening slightly. She's quick to reach for her outer robe, pulling it around her shoulders—which were bare and exposed before, the sleeves ripped from her under robe to make forging easier.

"Is this when you tell me I should smile more?" She grouses, pushing her hair up into a loose bun, sweaty, soot covered locks pulled out of her face.

The man walks closer, leaning back against her work bench. God, he's so handsome.

A little too old for her—but always so kind.

"No," he murmurs, reaching over to push one lock of hair that remained stubbornly between her eyes, pushing it behind the young woman's ear. "I just don't like seeing you unhappy."

"..." She ducks her head away, turning around, her cheeks slightly flushed—but not from the kilns.

"You don't have an order waiting," the weapon's master mutters, "and I don't have any lessons today."

"...No," he agrees, "both of those things are true."

She was lucky to be accepted into the Royal Court as a cultivator—the first common born citizen to do so.

Not to mention the first woman. She can't decide which of those things make people hate her more—and in the end, she doesn't think it matters.

"Then why are you here?"

"...Because I have a surprise for you," the man replies, a lightly teasing edge to his voice.

She tilts her head, peeking at him over her shoulder—and when he sees the slight flush on her cheeks, his smile only widens. “Are you going to sulk, or are you going to come and see?”

“...A surprise for me?” She questions softly. Her friend—her oldest, dearest friend, smiles. “For you, yes.”

Finally, she turns around—reaching out and taking the arm that’s being offered. It’s rare for any young gentleman to come and escort her anywhere—to let her feel like a beautiful young woman, for once.

“It isn’t my birthday,” she mumbles. “No,” he agrees.

“Then what’s the occasion?” He doesn’t answer, and her eyebrows knit together irritably, her voice turning into a whine as she tugs at his arm, “Mei Nianqing!” She huffs, tugging at the fine silks of his sleeve, “You’re being such a tease!”

The Guoshi demurs. “No such thing!”

She was surprised when she was accepted into the group of cultivators in the court of Wuyong—to find a Guoshi so young, not even in his twenty-third year.

For her, a girl of just sixteen when they met—he was so easy to idolize. And now, as a woman of nineteen, sometimes, she...

“You’ve been very tired recently,” Mei Nianqing comments, gripping her elbow gently as he leads her away from the city streets. “Have you thought about taking any time for yourself?”

She bows her head. “The order is from the crown prince himself, I would be stupid to delay.”

Even at such a young age—the daughter of the Architect Tonglu has gained a reputation as one of the finest blade smiths in Wuyong, already considered a master in her craft.

And with her cultivation, her potential to create weapons of the caliber to become spiritual devices is...

Too great for even the royal family to ignore.

The Guoshi smiles, patting her arm. “The prince is actually a rather patient and gentle young man,” he explains as they walk away from the hustle of the city, taking the path leading towards the valleys and hillsides below.

“If he learns that you’re straining yourself too hard—he won’t mind waiting a little longer for you to give yourself a rest.”

Maybe so, but she highly doubts that everyone would see it that way. “...” Mei Nianqing watches her expression with a frown, sighing. “You must be kinder to yourself, Hudie. I worry.”

Instead of answering his premise—or even directly addressing the subject at all, the young woman glances around them, raising an eyebrow. “Aren’t these lands part of the palace grounds?”

“They are.”

“Am I allowed to be here?”

“You really do speak like you’re still a commoner,” the Guoshi laughs softly, shaking his head. “Why wouldn’t you be allowed here?”

Hudie doesn’t answer, hugging his sleeve a little tighter—pressing all the closer. It’s hard to feel like she belongs in places like this.

After so many years of her childhood spent with nothing. No mother, barely a roof over her head—or food on the table at night. Her father worked hard, so hard, so that they could be where they are now, but...

She often forgets that her world has changed.

“Where is my surprise?”

“Patience, child, patience.”

Her expression sours slightly—stomach twisting with frustration each and every time the Guoshi calls her a child.

“I’m a woman now, you know.” Hudie grumbles. “Old enough to marry and have children.”

Mei Nianqing looks away, hiding his expression.

She can’t see the way his cheeks have suddenly gotten a little pink—and when he scratches his chin—she assumes it’s teasing, rather than sheepish.

“I know that,” he mutters. “Obviously.”

Hudie’s lips twitch as she reaches over, plucking one lock of the Guoshi’s hair playfully.

“Just because you LOOK like an old man, doesn’t mean you need to act like one.” She teases.

Mei Nianqing is the greatest cultivator of their time—and likely of any time before it— and no one could say why, but the moment he came of age, while he was meditating at sunrise...

His hair turned completely white. The rest of his body did not change. His face was still young, youthful—his eyes the same clear shade of blue as they had always been.

But his hair was, and still is now—white as the fresh driven snow. “Don’t make me regret spoiling you,”

The Guoshi grumbles. “Now, close your eyes.”

Smiling even wider now, her chest bubbling with excitement, Hudie agrees—allowing Mei Nianqing to carefully lead her down the path, one hand on her elbow, the other on the small of her back.

“Just three steps more, and...here we are.”

Tonglu Hudie opens her eyes, looking around—and her breath halts in her chest.

The fields in the valleys of the overlooking mountains have always been left, in large part, untouched. They’re spiritual lands—rich with energy, used for cultivation, and the occasional hunt.

But this—

This is a garden.

Not strictly speaking. Not as neat and manicured as those within the palace walls— but the entire clearing has been filled with bushes and flowers, of all different colors, but...

They favor purples and blues, similar to the shades of Hudie’s eyes.

“...This...is for me?” Hudie questions softly, looking around—her mouth hanging open in quiet awe.

She’s always been a beauty—slim, with delicate features. But the nature of her work tends to make people forget. Men don’t give her jewels, or bring her flowers.

But this…

“Yes,” Mei Nianqing replies softly, watching her face. “Do you like it?”

His student nods, slowly revolving in place—trying to take it all in. “Did you do all of this yourself?”

“I did.”

“It’s—I’ve never seen a garden like this before, what is it—?”

Then, she sees them.

Fluttering between the flowers—wings of every color, beautiful and delicate.

Butterflies.

The smile that spreads across the young cultivator’s face is a picture of happiness itself.

Butterflies—like her name.

“Certain plant species attract more of them,” the Guoshi explains.

“You always complained about how they never came this far into the mountains, so —!”

He’s cut off when the young woman throws herself into his arms, hugging the Guoshi tightly.

Hudie can’t see the softness in his eyes—or the warmth in his smile—when he wraps his arms around her.

“Thank you,” she whispers, practically thrumming with happiness. “Why would you do such a thing for me?”

“…” Mei Nianqing takes a deep breath, steadying himself. “You see, I—” “Guoshi?” A voice calls through the trees. “Is that you?”

The two step apart quickly.

The ivory haired man clears his throat, adjusting his sleeves as he turns around, dropping into a low bow. “Your grace,” he replies. “I thought you would still be busy with your studies. I gave you quite a bit of reading to do this morning."

"I finished it already,"

The voice replies—and then, a young man steps into the clearing.

Hudie's breath, heart, and thoughts all seem to cease in the same moment.

He's likely a boy of sixteen—not much younger than her. Tall, broad, with strong limbs. And...

So beautiful, it's almost blinding.

Standing before her in robes of white and gold, long, jet black waves of hair, pulled high on his head with golden hair pieces, the one holding his ponytail carved into the shape of a dragon.

Eyes like the sun, smoldering down at her, a youthful, cocky grin on his face.

"Well," he speaks with the voice of a man beyond his years, deep, confident nearly to the point of arrogance, "aren't you going to introduce me to your lovely companion, Guoshi?"

There's a beat of hesitance, but Mei Nianqing smiles stiffly. "Of course, your highness."

He sweeps one hand before the young woman, who immediately falls into a deep bow of respect, staring at the ground, "May I present Tonglu Hudie, daughter of the Architect Tonglu—the cultivator I spoke to you about before."

"And the one making my new blades," the youth murmurs.

"Yes," Mei Nianqing agrees, "Hudie—this is his royal highness, the Crown Prince of Wuyong. Slayer of a thousand dragons, weirder of ten thousand blades—"

"That's enough, Guoshi." The young man cuts him off from listing his titles, amused. "There's no need to be so formal."

"After all—we'll be working together, from now on."

Hudie pauses, lifting her head, freezing with shock when she sees...

The Crown Prince is bowing his head to her , hands clasped in front of him respectfully.

“I look forward to learning from you, Guoshi Tonglu.”

Her breath catches as she whips her head around to look at her own teacher, who rubs the back of his head, “We hadn’t discussed it, yet...”

“...Discussed what?” She asks breathlessly, her mind struggling to catch up—because —

She is a student—not a Guoshi. Much less to a prince.

No woman has ever been given such a title, regardless of their status of birth. And at her age, how could she expect—?

“I have learned much from my teachers,” the prince explains, stepping closer. “But with regards to matters such as the creation and use of spiritual devices...”

His voice is just behind her now, “I have been told that you are far superior to anyone else in the field—and I always want to learn from the best.”

“...From me,” she mutters, unsure.

Mei Nianqing finds her hand, squeezing gently.

“You are the best,” he reminds her.

“...Was this why you built this place?” She questions slowly, looking around in wonder. “...As a way of...?”

Of convincing her to take the position on? Or rewarding her, for such a sudden and drastic promotion?

The Guoshi stares down at her, his expression unreadable.

The boy speaks over them both—reaching to take the young woman’s elbow in his grip. “Guoshi Nianqing is always generous like that. Have you seen the rest of the palace grounds yet? I’ll show you.”

Mei Nianqing watches Jun Wu sweep away with the newly appointed Guoshi on his arm.

Beside him—but unseen, stands another young man—taller, with long, dark hair, and an eyepatch covering his right eye.

Slowly, he tilts his head to the side, watching the young prince, taking Zhao Beitong by the arm.

He cannot place it—but something about him is vaguely familiar

He watches as she teaches the young prince.

To anyone else, the scene unfolding before him might look like a fairy tale.

A beautiful young girl—common by birth, catching the eye of a wealthy, prestigious crown prince.

It only begins as lingering glances.

Sheepishly looking away when he's caught. Smiling at her so brightly whenever the Guoshi spares him a compliment. Her praise, it seems, pleases the crown prince more than anything else.

Guoshi Tonglu seems endeared by it, in the beginning. Flattered, but not taking it seriously.

"You ought to be careful," Mei Nianqing warns her once, not looking up from his scrolls. "When that boy sets his heart on something, it can become rather difficult."

"His heart?" Tonglu shakes her head, laughing with disbelief. "He's a teenage boy, his interests will change."

It is flattering to be a young woman with the attention of a prince—but Tonglu Hudie knows better than that.

She's a novelty. He's never met a woman like her, not in the sheltered environment of the royal court.

She's fascinating, for now. But his interest will pass.

"I was a teenager myself not so long ago," Mei Nianqing mutters, gripping his scroll a little tighter. "My interests have never been fleeting."

Her smile softens, one hand coming to rest on his shoulder, "You were never a normal teenage boy, you silly man."

The Guoshi goes still from where he's seated behind his desk, slowly lifting his chin to stare up at her.

She had never understood it, the way her former teacher looks at her. With eyes so full, but so guarded.

Hua Cheng knows that look very well. It's like looking in a mirror.

"...I wish I had known you then," Mei Nianqing admits, his voice stirring with an undercurrent of longing. "When I was a young man."

Cautiously, Hudie rests her palm against his cheek, gently reminding him—

"You still are a young man, Mei Nianqing."

He so often forgets.

After a moment of watching one another, the woman questions—gently, so careful— "Is there something you want to tell me?"

The Guoshi stiffens.

"It just...seems like there's more than what you're saying."

'Tell her,' Hua Cheng thinks to himself. He silently tries to whisper the words through time. 'You stubborn fool, just tell her.'

Slowly, he pulls his face back—until Hudie's hand falls back to her side.

"No," he mutters, looking away. "It doesn't matter anymore."

Hua Cheng watches as Guoshi Tonglu's face falls.

"...Just be careful," Mei Nianqing finally mutters. "He isn't a normal young man either."

His fellow Guoshi doesn't respond, lips pressed together tightly, leaving them pale. Then, she sweeps out of the room with a flick of her sleeve.

Mei Nianqing wasn't wrong.

Hua Cheng watches the months pass—and the young man's interest never fades. Slowly, it grows.

There's nothing superficial or untoward about it. He listens to her every word with such attention—such respect.

Sometimes, he spends an afternoon thinking of ways to make her laugh.

When he wins a tournament among cultivators from around the continent, he's met with a shower of flowers from the audience—and everyone watches with bated breath as he catches a single flower—a red dahlia—passing over every woman in the crowd... Giving it to Guoshi Tonglu, instead.

That is when the whispering begins. When people begin to wonder how the first female Guoshi of Wuyong truly earned her place. Some hiss behind their hands that she's a witch, sent to distract the prince from his cultivation.

The first time he kisses her, Guoshi Tonglu is firm.

She tells the young prince that she is honored—she apologizes for encouraging his advances.

(She says all of this, knowing that she did no such thing.) But Hudie knows her place—and it is not with him.

Jun Wu's reply steals her breath.

"Your place is wherever you wish to be."

The second time he kisses Hudie, it's more difficult to reject him. The third time—she kisses back.

Heated touches that only lengthen and grow, stirring things within her that she never knew before.

She still feels moments of wariness. When she knows she should stop it.

One day, he comes to her office with something clutched behind his back—smiling cheekily, saying that he's brought her a surprise—

A gift, just for her.

"..." Guoshi Tonglu smiles, tilting her head. "There's no occasion."

"A prince never needs an occasion to give a gift."

"...I suppose not," She agrees, watching as he sets the box on the desk before her. He stares eagerly as the Guoshi begins to remove the parchment paper, fingers freezing when she sees what lurks beneath.

The prince watches, eyes alight. “Do you like it?”

It takes her a moment to respond.

The box is made from heavy, polished wood, inlaid with gold leaf on the sides—and the front is sheer, covered by only a pane of glass.

Beneath, lays a butterfly—artfully pinned down, forever immortalized In mid-flight, silver wings aloft.

One of the very same that roams her garden on the palace grounds—the silver butterflies that only come at night, when the moonflowers bloom, filling the clearing with a silvery glow.

It doesn’t shine now.

“...Did you do this yourself?” She questions, her voice quiet.

The prince nods, clearly quite pleased with himself. “You’re always saying you wish you could visit them more, so...I thought you might want to keep one.”

‘Not like this,’ she thinks to herself, looking down at the poor thing.

“...Did you have to kill it, or...was it already—?”

“They don’t live very long,” he reminds her. “It didn’t suffer.”

That, at least, seems to soothe her—but the prince’s expression slowly shifts to a frown, sensing his lover’s unease.

“...Do you not like it?”

“I do,” Guoshi Tonglu mutters, looking away. “It’s beautiful.”

She tells him that it’s beautiful, even as her chest twists with anxiety—looking at that beautiful little thing, pinned down forever.

“...But beautiful things aren’t meant to last forever,” Hudie adds, half under her breath.

Jun Wu reaches over, pushing her hair behind her ear.

“Wait until I’m a god,” he whispers, that boyish smile on his face, “and tell me that again.”

Her lips turn up at the corners, but there’s still worry in her eyes.

“...What about your cultivation method?” The Guoshi questions. “Won’t this disrupt —?”

She’s silenced with a kiss.

“Let me worry about my cultivation method,” the prince replies, his fingers stroking over her cheek. “It’ll all work out in the end.”

She can see why he believes that. For him, they always do.

But those stolen moments became more and more public, as time went on.

The whispers got louder—and she couldn’t—

She couldn’t look her former teacher in the eye without feeling some amount of shame.

And frustration, because Tonglu Hudie knew she had done nothing wrong. But when Mei Nianqing’s eyes were on there, she felt...

Treacherous, somehow.

Hua Cheng watches as the memories shift forward in the years, showing, to anyone else’s eyes, a love story.

A young woman slowly falling in love with a prince. Cautious, distrustful, but gradually beginning to believe his promises. His sweet words and gentle touches.

The gifts he constantly showered upon her.

His affection for the young woman wasn’t fake. Even now, through the lenses of time —Hua Cheng can see that.

If it wasn’t for his knowing what Tonglu would become, he would look upon this as a happy story.

But even back then, one person knew.

Hua Cheng watches as two men stand off to the side of the royal throne room, speaking in hushed voices.

“I have stood aside,” Mei Nianqing murmurs, hands clasped firmly behind his back, “I have let this go on for too long—”

“...Master,” The prince sputters, his expression a mask of shock, “do not think that I hold any less respect for you as I once did—but you forget your place."

The Guoshi stops, clearly taken aback. "...My PLACE?"

"You 'allowed' this to go on? No." Jun Wu shakes his head.

"If you could have stopped it, you would have—and I will not insult your pride by delving into it further than that."

Mei Nianqing's face pales, his eyes widening—and the crown prince carries on; "You speak of what we're doing as if it's something unusual, but how so?"

The prince raises an eyebrow. "I'm a young man, she's a young woman, what's so odd about it?"

"You..." Mei Nianqing has always held affection for his students—Jun Wu more than nearly any other.

But this—this is madness.

"You speak as though you have no intention of ascending!"

Jun Wu crosses his arms, leaning back against a marble pillar, "What does she have to do with my ascension?"

"You have to give up ALL of your mortal attachments when you rise to the heavens." Mei Nianqing reminds him. "What will happen to her, when you do?"

"Plenty of gods have wives," Jun Wu frowns, straightening his shoulders. "Why shouldn't I? I could appoint her to the middle court after I—"

"WIVES?!" Mei Nianqing sputters, his eyes nearly bulging out of his head. "You forget—she's a cultivator in her own right!"

"She might want to ascend on her own merits—!"

"On her own merits?" The prince pauses, raising an eyebrow. "I don't deny that Guoshi Tonglu is a talented, formidable woman—but she's not a scholar, she couldn't become a civil god."

"That isn't the—"

"And I don't intend on allowing her to fall into a situation where she would need to make any extreme or noble acts of sacrifice, so she won't ascend that way, either."

"You won't be ascending through scholarship or acts of faith either, your highness." The Guoshi reminds him.

Finally, Jun Wu seems to understand.

"...Do you mean to say that you think she could be a martial god?" The idea seems almost insane to him, difficult to contemplate. "Is that the future you think I might be stealing away from her?"

Mei Nianqing falls into stormy silence.

There has never been a female martial god—not one originally born that way, anyway, shifting forms aside—and the heavens aren't exactly known for straying from tradition. There have been truly astonishing female warriors over the centuries, yes—

But none have ever ascended.

"...I am saying that it is foolish for you to pursue leaving your mortal life while forming such serious attachments," The Guoshi mutters, his voice firm. "It will be your undoing."

Hua Cheng can sense now, watching the scene— Mei Nianqing isn't wrong. He's prophetic, in a way.

The crimson ghost watches as the Crown Prince of Wuyong announces his engagement, along with his new method of cultivation.

Watches the young woman that would become the fierce ghost of Mount Tonglu, Zhao Beitong, slowly ease into falling in love with the young man.

He watches the look on Mei Nianqing's face, during the wedding. Seeing Hudie descend the palace steps in her red wedding robes.

Hua Cheng's heart has belonged to another for nearly all of his life—but even he can admit that she's the most beautiful woman he has ever seen.

'Tell her,' Hua Cheng thinks to himself, watching with agonized frustration, as a living man, a breathing man, watches his own life pass him by.

'You stubborn fool, just tell her.'

And when the time comes to crown the new princess of Wuyong—that duty falls to the Guoshi himself

When she kneels before him in the royal pavilion, her husband looking on—they look at one another. Teacher and student—each imagining different futures. Some happy, some sad.

Each of them knows this is a fairy tale. That she's the princess, plucked from obscurity by a prince.

That he is a guide, and nothing more.

But Hua Cheng knows, watching this scene—beautiful golden palaces, flower petals raining down from on high—that fairytales are only this beautiful on the surface.

That this shining veneer of beauty is nothing more than just that.

Because fairytales aren't love stories. They aren't meant to be painless, beautiful things.

They're fables. Painful, throned beasts—meant to teach lessons. Thorough, monstrous lessons.

Quickly, the Princess of Wuyong once again finds herself a student. This time of grief.

Hua Cheng didn't speak in all this time—watching her memories float by, because he didn't want to wake her from it. To alert her to this presence.

This memory, however—of all of the intimate moments that he has seen—feels like something he shouldn't be intruding upon.

The sobs and screams—he's never heard anything like them, alive or dead. It isn't like when he died, and dianxia screamed against the night. Both were howls of pain, but this grief is something more profane—completely unnatural.

The shrieks of a grieving mother, pierce the night

Her husband tries to hold her, but she can't seem to let him close—cringing away from everyone, anyone who tries to pull her from her son's side.

"I don't..." Her face shines with tears, fingers trembling where they grip the bars of his crib, "I...I don't understand!"

“It happens, your grace…” One of the maids tries to comfort her, rubbing her back, “Sometimes, when they’re still small like this…”

“I was here AN HOUR AGO!” She screams, her voice rattling through the room, “He was—” Hudie hunches in on herself, “—he was p-perfect!”

So beautiful—golden eyes, like his father. Soft curls, smiling up at her, giggling sleepily as she rocked him to sleep.

Her perfect, precious boy. The most beautiful thing Tonglu Hudie ever created. And now, he…he’s…

“HOW DID THIS HAPPEN?!” She screams, clutching her head.

The door opens, and when she sees who it is—she scrambles to the Guoshi frantically.

The princess hasn’t let a soul touch her, since she found her son like his—not even his father. But now, she throws herself into her friend’s arms, “Help me!” She sobs. “MEI NIANQING, HELP ME!”

The Guoshi holds her, one hand steadying her back as the princess weeps against his shoulder, each cry ripping from her so violently, it feels as though her body might rattle apart.

His reaction, looking upon the scene, is exactly the same. “…What is this?” He whispers.

The little prince could be sleeping—not a single sign of injury upon his body. When the Guoshi examines him, there’s no sign of sickness. No hint of any abnormality.

His soul is just…gone. As simple as that.

Tonglu clings to him, pleads with him to fix it, to save him.

But there’s nothing to be done. Not even a summoning, for the spirit of a child so young, without any resentment or foul play, it…

Would simply move on, immediately entering it’s next life.

Hudie knows this, every moment she begs and pleads, she knows that there is nothing Mei Nianqing can do. Nothing that anyone can do.

But still, she begs. She rages, smashing anything she can get within her reach. The blocks for his little golden palaces. Priceless jewels.

Boxes of pinned silver butterflies. She rips them apart with an uncontrollable wrath, screaming with grief, with confusion—with uncontainable rage at the universe, for how hungry and stupid and cruel death can be.

From the corner, Hua Cheng watches.

Watches the Crown Prince.

He weeps with his wife, yes—shows moments of sorrow. But never surprise.

The Crown Prince of Wuyong screams with his own grief, when his son is cremated. Stands before his funeral marker and howls.

But never once does he seem shocked or bewildered by what has happened.

Tragedy befalls again, one after the other.

The King and Queen of Wuyong perish in a bout of plague, slipping away peacefully in the night between rounds of fever, holding one another in their arms.

The Crown Prince weeps in his wife's arms—

But he does not look surprised.

Then, there is war.

Between Wuyong and their enemies to the west—the middle plains. When her husband rides to battle, he places a golden butterfly pin in his princess's hair.

Tonglu Hudie stares at the pin, each night, sitting beside an empty crib... And she weeps.

Becomes a shell of her former self, the woman who once spent her days striking metal into shape, stoking the irons of her kiln.

A shadow—a wraith, limply wandering the halls of her palace, alone. The occasional butterfly trailing behind her, weakly trying to catch her attention.

There's no spark in her. No life. Not until one day, when her husband returns—not the boy she once knew, but now a man. A hardened warrior.

He kneels before his wife's chair, grasping her hand, pale and limp—resting his cheek against her knee.

"I know who did it," he whispers.

She doesn't react, not until he says the words: "I know who took our boy." Slowly, Hua Cheng sees life in those eyes.

Maybe not happiness, curiosity, or love.

But there's a flicker there, a hint of the wrath that lays beneath.

"...Who?" Guoshi Tonglu whispers, voice shaking.

Hua Cheng watches the crown prince explain a plot from their enemies to the west. Weakening the royal dynasty. Sending an evil spirit to swallow their son's soul in the night. Bringing the plague that took the King and Queen's lives.

Hudie listens, her eyes sparking brighter.

"...I can make them pay," Jun Wu whispers, squeezing both of her hands between his, stroking his finger over the golden band he gave her on their wedding day. "But I need your help, my love."

Slowly, for the first time in months, the Crown Princess of Wuyong lifts her head. "Name it," she snarls.

For the first time, Hua Cheng sees a glimmer of the ghost that will come to haunt the remains of this land.

The shadow of Zhao Beitong, lurking behind the rage in the young mother's eyes. "A blade," her husband replies. "I need you to forge one for me."

For the first time since her coronation, the kilns of Tonglu Hudie spark to life once more, burning brightly.

She discards her silks and jewels for a blacksmith's apron and leather gloves, flames casting shadows of hatred across her face as she slams her hammer again and again.

CLANG!

Pouring every ounce of grief, wrath, and hatred within her body into the near molten metal.

CLANG!

Muscles in her arms and shoulders aching from a year without use—slowly forming again.

CLANG!

She folds the layers of metal in, over and over again, unrelenting.

CLANG!

It's the longest she's ever spent on a single plate, hammering down so many layers she almost loses track of them. Creating a sword so sharp, so solid, it dwarfs any weapon that came before it.

CLANG!

And with every ounce of hatred she pours in, the steel slowly turns black, forming into a blade that Hua Cheng knows all too well.

It is the blade that pierced his beloved over a hundred times as the crimson ghost wailed and screamed, becoming the savage spirit Wu Ming.

It is the blade that the Crown Prince of Xianle would turn against his own family, using it to slay the disgraced noble Qi Rong.

The blade he would use to direct the souls of ten thousand wrathful spirits, looking to unleash human face disease a second time.

The blade that Wu Ming would then turn on himself, to save his love from a curse of ten thousand lifetimes.

It is also the blade that killed the boy Hong-er. A slow, horrifying death. One that he remembers all too well.

Burning in the cold of the night, hovering over the forest path—watching his own body, swinging from the branches, blood dripping from the toes of his boots.

All while dianxia screamed his name, over and over again.

'Hong-er?!'

'HONG-ER!'

'Please, just answer me—I'm scared!'

When Guoshi Tonglu presents the blade to her husband, the Crown Prince of Wuyong names it Zhu Xin.

She etches the characters into the steel, using the characters for ‘punish,’ and ‘heart,’ inlaying a streak of silver—

Reminiscent of the glow of wraith butterflies.

The blade is called Zhu Xin—but in his heart, Hua Cheng knows that it is Fang Xin.

Each time the sword passes before his eyes, he can remember the places where it pierced him, his teeth breaking as he held back his screams.

Every single one, until it pierced his heart.

In that moment—even though he’s never known the Crown Prince’s name—

(Each and every memory he passes through has every mention of it blurred or muted away, erased from time.)

—he knows what the Crown Prince of Wuyong will become. The White Clothed Calamity—Bai Wuxiang.

He takes the sword from his wife’s hands, carrying it into battle.

Zhu Xin becomes a mythical blade—cutting through the enemies of Wuyong like the wrath of hell itself, leaving dozens of cuts in one blow.

One for each layer of hatred that Guoshi Tonglu hammered into its steel.

All one hundred of them.

One battle is so monstrous, so ruinous—bringing the entire nation of the middle plains to it’s knees in one night, that the Crown Prince of Wuyong does what he always intended to do.

What Mei Nianqing always warned would happen, in the end.

When the Crown Princess of Wuyong learns that her husband has ascended to the heavens, she is the last remaining member of the Royal House of Wu.

She orders the kingdom to feast in his honor, but she does not smile. Fireworks crash overhead—and she doesn't even look at them.

There is another coronation now, this time, for the last true ruler of the Kingdom of Wuyong.

It's final monarch, and it's first queen.

She kneels in the Royal Pavilion once again, among the wealthy citizens of the capital who once scorned her—looking down in distaste.

Now, her former teacher places a new crown upon her head—one of amethyst and white jade. But this time, she discarded the traditional golds of the House of Wu.

This time, when she commissioned the new royal headpiece, she asked for silver. Carved into the shape of butterflies.

Even as a new martial god—arguably the most powerful—the former Prince of Wuyong still comes to visit his wife, defying the normal traditions of the Heavens.

The judgement in people's eyes is never directed towards him, no. Not their beautiful, illustrious crown prince.

They blame her.

Even as she rules their kingdom, bringing peace and wealth. Even as her father designs their roads, builds her husband's temples, and the water lines that run through their homes.

'Witch ,' some of them whisper. 'Pretender .'

Seducing their god. Distracting him.

Mei Nianqing finds her one evening—alone in her garden, the one that he built for her, years ago.

Her hair loose, streaming softly in the breeze, surrounded by the silver butterflies that come when the night is still, and the moonflowers begin to bloom.

Just as beautiful now, as she was then.

But it hurts so much more to look at her than it used to.

“...I was wondering where you were,” the Guoshi murmurs, slowly moving to kneel by her side.

The Queen doesn’t look up, fingertips slowly playing through the blades of grass.

“...The other two Guoshi barely speak to me these days,you know.” Hudie whispers, watching the butterflies float around her. They’ve become so accustomed to her presence now, many will land directly on her head or shoulders, easily flying into her outstretched fingertips.

Mei Nianqing’s eyebrows knit together, his head slowly tilting to the side. “Do you have any idea why?”

“...They think I’m going to bring some sort of curse down upon the land,” the queen snorts, shaking her head. “For using my salacious ways upon their precious crown prince.”

Of course—they both know that it’s just the opposite.

Jun Wu returns to his wife often, yes—but since the death of their son, the queen has barely been able to stomach his touch, grief turning their marriage distant and cold.

And she feels such shame over it, every moment.

“...I’ll speak to them,” Mei Nianqing mutters, shaking his head. “It’s unacceptable.”

Hudie shakes her head, a faint smile on her lips as she reaches back, gently squeezing the Guoshi’s hand. “It’s alright, let them think what they want.”

When she turns her head, Mei Nianqing can see the violets of her eyes, illuminated by the silvery lights of the butterflies around them, and—

The beauty of them is unfathomable. Haunting. Fills him up until he can’t speak. “I always wanted to bring my children here,” she admits

Her hand is still in his, squeezing firmly. “It’s the most beautiful place in the world to me,” Hudie continues, lips quivering. “I wanted them to see it.”

And now, her son is gone. With her marriage as it is, husband a god...

Who knows if she’ll ever have more.

Mei Nianqing squeezes her fingers in return, his heart filled with an impossible, resounding ache. "...That was what I wanted, when I made this place for you," he admits.

"...To bring my children here?" She questions slowly. He answers without meaning to, without thinking; "Our children."

And as soon as he says it, he regrets it, watching as the Queen's eyes widen with shock, her lips parting—knowing that this isn't the time, and whatever they could have been, in another life, it certainly is no longer his place.

"...Mei Nianqing..." She whispers.

He looks away, instantly filled with regret—sure that she'll curse him, or be angry with him. Call him a selfish, cowardly fool—all of the things that he knows he already is, but...

A hand lands on his shoulder, squeezing gently. "...Is there something that you want to tell me?"

The Guoshi can't look at her, his face pale, heart pounding—Hua Cheng can hear it, pounding against the man's ribs.

'Tell her,' he thinks—with even more fervor now. 'Tell her, you stubborn fool—just tell her!'

Slowly, he turns his head to look back at Tonglu Hudie, his student. His dearest friend. His...

And finally—oh god, finally—

Mei Nianqing tells her.

"You're haunting me," he whispers, gripping her hand tighter.

For a moment, the Queen pauses, brow creasing, but he presses on—

"Because I feel as though I am in love with a ghost."

The words come out of him slowly—not out of contemplation—he's spent a decade thinking of them now. But because each syllable coming out of his lips now feels like a betrayal. Of his prince—of his country—of his path of cultivation.

"When I first brought you to this place..."

The Guoshi shakes his head, “It wasn’t as a reward, or a form of thanks, it...” He sighs, barely able to look her in the eye. “I was willing to give up my cultivation,” he explains.

“But...” Hudie trails off, struggling to take it in. “Your immortality, you—you’ve come so far—?”

“I wanted to marry you,” Mei Nianqing shakes his head. “I knew I could still serve the crown prince as his teacher, and...I wanted to be your husband. To have children with you.”

Her eyes sting with tears, butterflies landing in her hair.

“...And I made this place,” he explains.

“So we could bring them here.”

She doesn’t speak, just stares down at their joined hands, lost in what could have been. If he had said more—and if she hadn’t been...

So tempted, by the love and validation of a man with the world at his feet. So wary of rejecting his affections.

“...And I live under no false impressions,” Mei Nianqing reaches out, gently pushing her hair away from her face, tucking it behind her ears. The butterflies don’t shy away from him, either—and the queen realizes—

How often the Guoshi must come here, for them to be so calm.

“I know that you are not mine,” he admits, his thumb lingering over his cheek for as long as he dares before he pulls his hand back, letting out a shaking breath, “but I have always been yours.”

Amethyst eyes never leave him, watching carefully, listening to every word he says.

“And you haunt me, now.” Mei Nianqing’s lips quiver, his eyes strained with concern. “Because I don’t know how to help you,” her hands tremor slightly in his hold, “but I can see how much that you’ve been suffering.”

Every day, each moment without her son—it’s been agony.

It hurts. It hurts. Oh god, does it hurt.

But the hand in hers now—it doesn’t hurt.

When she leans forward on an act of impulse, like grabbing onto a rope when she's drowning, or stealing a breath when she's starving for air—

Hudie kisses him, clings to him. It doesn't hurt.

It might be a sin. A betrayal that she should be ashamed of, their mouths pressing together over and over again as they sink down into the grasses, the silver light of the butterflies he summoned for her fluttering all around.

But each touch, while aching—burning— Never hurts.

It's in the weeks that follow, when the crown prince of Wuyong is visiting his Queen, that his wife allows him to kiss her again.

To make love to her again.

Most cannot remember a story of a sitting god fathering a child—and many cannot decide if it's a blessing, or a curse.

But when Tonglu Hudie looks down on her second son, cradling the child in her arms —she no longer feels like a ghost, wasting her way through life.

When she smiles at Mei Nianqing over her husband's shoulder, it no longer haunts him the way it once did.

Even if the truth does.

"...Don't you think it's bad luck?" Jun Wu murmurs, watching the boy's face with quiet wonder, his thumb brushing under the baby's chin.

"What?" Hudie replies, eyes never leaving the little boy's face.

"Being born under the Star of Solitude," the god frowns, wondering.

"I was always under the impression that meant bad luck."

"No," Hudie croons, pushing the boy's hair out of his face. He has so much of it— dark, just like hers.

His eyes are blue—but the Queen explains to her husband that her own eyes were like that, when she was born.

They'll darken over time, she assures him.

"It can be good luck, or bad." She explains, leaning down to kiss her son's forehead, breathing him in. "It's all up to the choices that he makes."

And, it means his parents loved each other. Deeply.

Throughout the Kingdom of Wuyong, they celebrate the birth of a new Crown Prince, Jun Bolin.

A perfect name, for a second son. And for a time, there was peace.

The Queen of Wuyong was competent and fair, always with the keen advice of her Guoshi.

Her husband, their god, was powerful and generous. The harvests were bountiful, and the seasons were calm.

The Kingdom's power grew and grew—until people forgot any mention of curses and doom.

Tonglu Hudie watches her son grow into a beautiful, brilliant child, and her heart begins to heal.

Mei Nianqing has a new student to teach, and he does so diligently, taking the boy under his wing day in and day out.

In the evenings, he joins the queen and her son in the forest

They sit in a clearing of wild flowers, watching silver butterflies dance around in the twilight.

Bolin giggles and runs all around them, trying to catch them—always running back to his mother when he scrapes his knees.

He listens to her sing—to his Guoshi telling stories.

These memories, passing before Hua Cheng's eyes—are the happiest of Zhao Beitong's that he has seen. And he knows, eventually, that they must end.

War returns to the Kingdom of Wuyong. A new clan has risen to power in the central plains, looking to avenge their forebears.

And, inexplicably—the kingdom of Wuyong. The proud, powerful kingdom of the strongest martial god—

It's losing.

Again and again, battle after battle.

Each time, when the Queen calls her husband, prays to him for help, the reply is always the same.

That he cannot.

He wasn't a god before, when war came to their kingdom. And now that he is, he cannot interfere.

That's never stopped him before, and she doesn't understand, but—

But the battles become more and more costly, the loss of life too great. They even begin losing territory, and...

When the Kingdom of Wuyong tries to engage with them to begin peace talks, there is only one condition that the central plains clans are willing to accept.

Prince Bolin.

Their Clan leader's wife can no longer have children, and they have had no sons. Have no heir to carry on.

Normally, adopting the child of their enemies might feel like a disgrace, but... The son of a god? Well, that would be an honor for any family to accept.

Of course, the Queen rejects it out of hand. Refuses any iteration of the offer, her Guoshi steadfastly agrees with her.

There must be a solution, some other way—and even if there wasn't, war must turn at some point, surely? How could it not, with how far superior their strength is? How—?

How are they still losing?

And still, Hudie pleads with her husband. Kneels in his temples and begs.

"They're trying to take our son, don't you understand?!" The queen weeps, breathing through her tears and burning incense. "It's either our son, or our kingdom, and I—I WON'T LOSE HIM!"

Finally, in the depth of her terror, Hudie's husband gives her an answer. "You must."

The Queen of Wuyong freezes, slowly lifting her head from where it's pressed against marble floors, her eyes widening. "...What?" She whispers, her voice trembling.

"If you don't give him to them," her husband's voice echoes throughout the hall, remorseful—but sincere.

"He will die."

A petrified sob rips from Tonglu Hudie's chest, her eyes glancing around wildly, before settling on Jun Wu's divine statue. "What do you mean?!"

"I've seen it," the prince answers. "In my dreams." And, unfortunately...

Jun Wu's dreams tend to come true.

"...How?" She croaks, trembling fingers pressed against her lips.

"In flames," her husband's voice explains softly, but the gentleness of his tone brings no comfort when she is faced with the savagery of his words. "I saw him burn."

Hua Cheng listens to that sound again, now.

Screaming.

Horrified, mournful screaming.

The wails of a mother, realizing that her only hope of saving her son is to never see him again.

He's so sweet, when she kisses him goodbye. So confused, about why his mother looks so sad.

He still doesn't understand.

She kisses him, over and over. Tells him how dearly that he is loved. That no matter where he goes, or what he does, somewhere, out there—there is a mother that loves him endlessly.

Then, they take him, and the moment he can no longer hear her—
The Queen of Wuyong wails.

Jun Bolin of the Royal House of Wuyong is no more—hailed as a hero, giving up his title and his home to save his kingdom.

Now, he is heir to the Clan of Xie—so young, a boy of just five years old, she… Hudie doubts he'll remember where he came from, by the time he's a man.

Her husband tries to comfort her, to remind her that they can have another. The Queen can barely look at him when he says it, shrinking off to her son's room.

Years ago, she spent endless nights in her first son's nursery, weeping beside an empty crib.

Now, she sits in Bolin's room, holding the stuffed fox he used to sleep with, slowly stroking it's ears, staring at the butterflies she painted on the walls, when he was still so small…

And her tears never seem to end, pouring from an endless well inside of her.

Finally, the man watching her speaks, watching from his place in the corner.

"…Do you think he knew?" Hua Cheng questions. His tone isn't cruel, or judgmental —only curious. And when the Queen of Wuyong lifts her head, looking back at him…

She finally seems to remember that this is a memory, and that she isn't watching it alone. "…No," she croaks, her voice raw. "He would have killed Bolin, if he knew."

Which, in the end—makes her grateful that she let him go. Even if it was agonizing.

Because in the end—banishment saved the child's life.

He was able to grow into a man, inherit the leadership of his clan—strengthening it into the center of political power in the central plains. Turning a loose collection of clans into a true city state.

One that would later rise as a powerful kingdom in his own right—as wealthy and beautiful as the country of Bolin's parents.

The Kingdom of Xianle.

"…Your first," Hua Cheng questions, tilting his head. "Did he…?" Zhao Beitong hugs the stuffed fox tighter, shaking her head.

"I don't think that he did." She answers quietly.

Jun Wu knew more than he was willing to say. Maybe even knew that their first born was in danger, and failed to say a word—probably arrogantly thinking that he could stop it alone.

But even now, knowing everything she does...

She knows that her husband wasn't a monster in those years. Selfish and arrogant at times, yes. Entitled, often childish. Those were always his shortcomings, and she was never blind to that.

But it was what came later that would make Jun Wu cruel. That would split him in two.

"...Did he take your name too?"

The Queen of Wuyong stiffens, listening to the young man speak. "Tonglue Hudie,"

Her eyes widen, then well up with tears—this time, of a very different kind. Mourning something far different than the loss of her children.

"When did he take that name from you?"

"...Get out," She whispers, her shoulders trembling.

This is her memory—and she doesn't want to share it.

After a moment, when the young man doesn't reply—she turns her head with a snarl, reaching for the blocks to a golden palace.

"GET OUT!" She rages, hurling them at him, rising to her feet, charging in a blind fury. "I SAID GET OUT!"

Her hands grip his face—and everything goes black. Swirling, pitch black.

Not the Kiln.

Not a narrow country road.

Not the Palace of Wuyong. There's only cheers, now.

The roars of a crowd. The beating of the drums. Flower petals pouring from the sky, the clear blue sky, directly over his face.

All screaming the same word, the same title, over and over again.

"DIANXIA! DIANXIA! DIANXIA!"

The wind whips through Hong-er's hair, rushing past.

He's falling.

Plummeting so fast, his hands outstretched toward the sky, pink and white petals all around him.

But the sky is beautiful.

He never stopped to look at it—not before.

Now, the little boy thinks—one dark, tear filled eye staring up at the clouds—

He should have.

'Where's my little Hong Hong-er? Did a ghost steal him away?'

'No,' Hong-er thinks to himself as he rapidly approaches the earth, soon to shatter into a million pieces—a bloody, forgotten stain. What everyone always saw him as, to begin with.

'The ghosts took you away instead.'

He just...

"DIANXIA! DIANXIA! DIANXIA!"

Hong-er just wishes he could have looked at the sky a little longer. Seen that face a little more. Maybe even gotten to talk to him someday.

But that's okay. He's used to it, really.

Hong-er is unlucky, and he always has been.

Until the moment that he isn't.

Until, for the first time in the boy's life, one of his wishes comes true.

Not to be saved, that never crossed his mind, but...

Suddenly, there are arms around him. Strong—surprisingly soft, through the many layers of silk.

His eye widens.

The face above him isn't the same as the one he was entranced by before—not the mask of white jade and gold that burned in the sun, meant to emulate a god.

The eyes that look down on him now are human.

And Hong-er, he—

He sees the entire world inside of them, all in a moment.

All the clouds he never bothered to look up and see. Every happy memory that he never got to experience. Fireworks that were always too far away for him to catch sight of at night. The mother that he can no longer hold onto. The father that he never met.

It's all there, somehow.

His heart doesn't quicken often. Rarely affected by anxiety or fear. But now, it pounds. Thrums in his chest like he must have swallowed a hummingbird, tiny wings trying to beat out of his ribs.

That mouth smiles, and those arms hug him closer, keeping— Keeping him safe.

Reliving this memory now, it's been over twenty years, and Hua Cheng has lived an entire life and two deaths since then.

He has seen Kingdoms fall, and gods come crashing down with them. Has cursed the world for his love, then borne it's wrath in his stead.

He has stood between the two doors that stand in the land beyond life and death, and refused to take either. He has risen as a god, then cast himself back down.

And this moment—in the space of this memory—

Hua Cheng is as close to heaven here, as Hong-er, as he has ever been.

And every moment of pain that led him here—every blow to his body, every cruelty he was forced to witness and endure—even if he doesn't make it out of this place, and the Goddess of the Kiln swallows him whole—

It was worth it, to live inside this memory one more time.

'Don't be afraid,' that voice whispers to him, holding him tighter.

Xie Lian must have thought, then, that Hong-er was trembling out of fear.

But the only thing the little boy feared, in that moment, was that the crown prince would let him go.

Zhao Beitong stands to the side, watching the world pass by.

When she first met the crimson ghost, Hua Cheng—and then his childhood counterpart, little Hong Hong-er, she had presumed that the young man had few happy memories to speak of.

In the beginning, she was right.

She watches as the child is constantly beaten. Shoved from one home to the next. Forced to work day in and day out—do and see things that no child that age should have to.

She watches, horrified, as he's lured with the promise of work for a meal, then thrown into a sack.

Dragged behind a carriage until his little body is half bloody and broken.

And then, she watches someone save him. Someone hold him close and send for doctors to tend to his injuries. Watches the Crown Prince watch after him, carrying him up the mountainside.

Even as she watches the fire that followed—scowls scoldingly as the man she loves tells the crown prince that the boy is cursed, making him scream with indignation—

"I'm not! I'm not!"

Even as her heart aches for the boy, thinking that the world will show him no kindness...

A pair of arms hug him close again, whispering to him, "I know."

Hong-er's eyes fill with tears as he clings to the crown prince's sleeves—and he begins to weep.

"I know you're not."

It isn't until she hears Mei Nianqing call the prince Xie Lian that Zhao Beitong goes still.

Xie…

Her eyes slowly begin to well up with tears, one hand clapped over her mouth.

…Xie Lian.

He…he was…

Now, she isn't just passively watching the boy's memories—she's charging through them, hungrily devouring every inch of the young man's face that she can find.

The story that unfolds before her eyes—not Hong-er's, but the god he loved, it's… Painfully familiar.

Watching a prince, so dearly beloved by all—rise so far. And the moment he did, the moment Zhao Beitong saw the god taking the prince's hand, lifting him up to the heavens—

She knew, in that moment, that same hand would cast him back down. And the memories that follow, logically—they shouldn't be happy.

But the two young men, living their lives in a small, broken down shrine… There's nothing to call the look in their eyes but happiness. And…

She watches, as Hong-er shrinks back against the wall of the shrine, face flushed, heart pounding as Xie Lian's fingertips trace over his cheeks.

Watches, as the prince smiles, whispering—

"Handsome."

'Tell him,' Zhao Beitong thinks, watching Hong-er's face. ' You silly, foolish boy—why won't you tell him?'

And then, he couldn't tell him at all.

She watches, heart aching, as the little ghost fire trails behind it's god, being batted away and shouted at for weeks on end. Unable to do anything to help the prince in his grief.

Zhao Beitong walks the path behind him, an invisible shadow in the fire's path, as it does everything it can to shield it's love from harm.

Even as it fails, over and over again.

And she sees what Hong-er could not. What, in many ways, he still cannot see.

Xie Lian was not mourning a child. His sorrow didn't come from a place of guilt over not being able to protect the boy—or the sheer responsibility that came from his own failure to make Hong-er leave, no—

Zhao Beitong watches the Crown Prince of Xianle mourn his first love.

And then, she watches the path of destruction that is, in many ways—even over a millennia later, largely of her own making.

Watches the blade she forged, so many years ago, to bring revenge to the clan that murdered her child...

Bring so much harm and suffering to children.

She watches the fragmented remains of a man she once loved, the White Clothed Calamity—bring suffering, torment, and death.

When she watches the maze of scars that he leaves behind on Xie Lian's body—Zhao Beitong knows exactly what he's doing.

He's trying to recreate his own.

She watches, hand clutched over her chest—as the sword she once folded a hundred times over, pressing her own grief and anger into every layer, is plunged into the chest of an innocent just as many times.

Even now, it reminds her of why she'll never forge another weapon again. Zhao Beitong watches the death of the Ghost Fire, and the birth of Wu Ming.

Watches the black clad youth follow his own white clothed calamity, falling into the same path of her own.

Wu Ming, in his desire for revenge, to be useful—stopped being human, instead...

He willingly sacrifices that humanity, making the choice to become Xie Lian's sword. His most powerful weapon, even in the dark.

And when she watches them sitting in the bottom of a ravine, caught up in each other's arms, mouths pressed together, the words are in her mind again.

"Why didn't you tell him?" She whispers, utterly confused. "Why didn't you just tell him?"

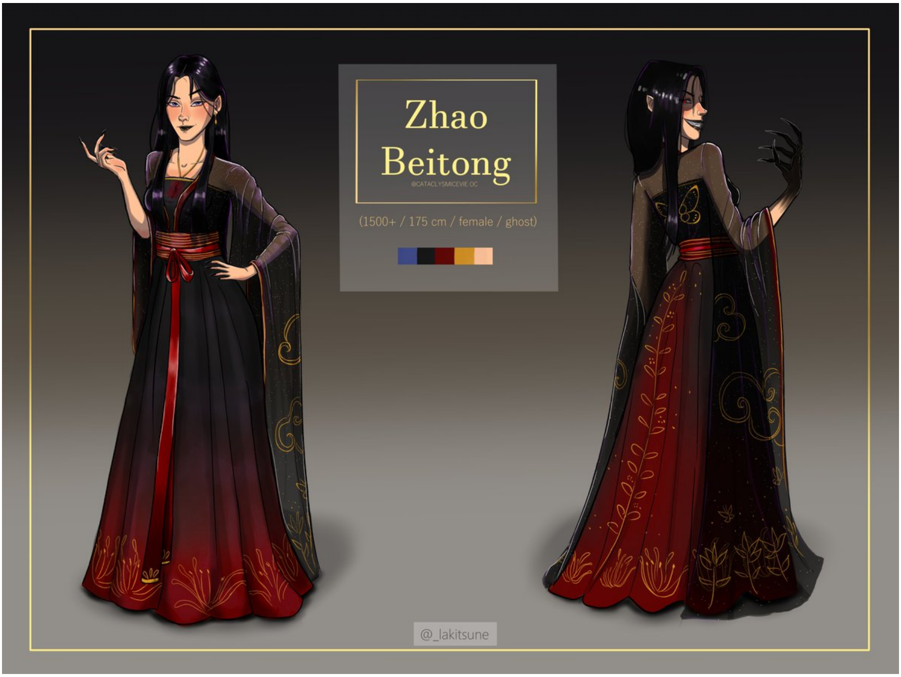
It's then, that Hua Cheng pauses, slowly turning his head to look back at her, and he remembers—

This is a memory—his memory—and he doesn't want to share it.

"...Get out," he retorts.

FANART INSPIRED BY THIS STORY : ZHAO BEITONG EDITION

This was included with permission from each artist, do not repost or reuse for any reason.



Zhao
Beitong
@CATACLYSMICEVIE OC
(1500+ / 175 cm / female / ghost)
@_lakitsune

CREDIT: LAKITSUNE, support the artwork HERE.

CREDIT: MUSINGLOTUS, support the artwork HERE

Chapter End Notes

> Thank you so much to LAKITSUNE and Cas for their beautiful artwork, and allowing me to include it! Please give them your support, it's very much deserved!
>
> xoxo, Evie

The Favorite Son

Chapter Summary

“No one is going to devour me,” he retorts, his voice raw.

“You can try as hard as you want, but I’ll never make it easy for you.”

“You choose suffering, then.” Zhao Beitong appears before him in the tunnel, eyes narrowed with frustration.

“No,” the crimson shakes his head, wiping his mouth with the back of his hand. “No, I choose living.”

“YOU’RE ALREADY DEAD!” Zhao Beitong snarls, the ground rattling beneath her as she follows him down the tunnel, hands hooked into claws at her sides. “WE’RE BOTH DEAD!”

But dead isn’t gone. Dead isn’t giving up.

Hua Cheng smiles wryly.

“What’s that got to do with anything?”

Chapter Notes

TW// this chapter contains references to sexism, abuse of power imbalances, and the deaths of children. There is also graphic violence, minor character death, and kind of / sort of cannibalism, if you squint.

You can find me on twitter and keep up with current updates of the story HERE

This story also has some spotify playlists for those who want some fun listening while reading!

No Paths Are Bound: The Playlist
Zhao Beitong's Playlist
The Wu Ming Playlist

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The two clash again, all teeth and claws, fighting for separation, tearing at one another.

All over again, the world goes pitch black.

No narrow country roads. No hills of Wuyong. No heavenly parades.

BAM!

When he opens his eyes, there's blazing white all around.

The walls of the Kiln.

And above, endless swirling clouds of wraith butterflies.

"...You have a strong mind," his opponent admits. Her hair is slightly askew from the battle, eyes wild with bloodlust, the overwhelming resentful energy pulsing through her spirit.

"I didn't expect that."

The crimson ghost rises to his feet, clutching E-Ming in hand. "Bai Wuxiang was your husband." He states slowly. "And he had some sort of plan for the creation of the Ghost Kings."

Zhao Beitong doesn't reply, holding her ribs as she prepares to attack.

"That's why you won't make anymore." Hua Cheng tilts his head. "But you must know —Bai Wuxiang is dead!"

"..." Zhao Beitong throws back her head, letting out a cackling laugh. "God, he hasn't changed!"

"You—!"

"You called Lang Ying a fool," she replies coldly. "Then SO ARE YOU!"

The next blow is so violent, he feels E-Ming wail under the pressure, barely able to withstand parrying her blades.

"YOU REALLY BELIEVE THAT?" She cries as they clash again, and again, and again. "YOU THINK IT WOULD BE SO EASY?!"

"FOR THE HEAVENLY EMPEROR?! YES, I DO!"

Zhao Beitong stumbles to a halt, every single wraith butterfly freezing in midair—like one giant, breathing sculpture with hundreds of separate parts.

It would be beautiful, if it wasn't so lethal.

"...The Heavenly Emperor killed Bai Wuxiang?" She repeats softly.

"Is that what everyone thinks?"

"...Yes," Hua Cheng mutters, bracing himself with E-Ming, blood dripping down his cheek from one of their prior clashes. "That's what happened."

Zhao Beitong stares, eyes wide, mouth hanging open.

And then, she laughs.

A roaring, shrieking laugh

"HE—HE REALLY ONLY HAS ONE TRICK, DOESN'T HE?" Zhao Beitong screams, clutching the sides of her head.

"What—?"

"HOW MANY MASKS DID THAT MAN WEAR?!" She cries, "HOW MANY OF THEM COULD YOU ACTUALLY SEE?!"

The last sentence gives Hua Cheng pause, because... Zhao Beitong is right.

In his human life, then as a ghost fire, and again as Wu Ming—he saw Bai Wuxiang use countless faces. Dianxia's, Feng Xin's, even Hong-er's.

Ironically, the white clothed calamity only wore his mask when he wanted to reveal himself.

But every single face he wore was a disguise.

And if that was the case, why bother with the mask at all? No one would ever know which face was his true one to begin with. Even the face in Zhao Beitong's memories is vaguely familiar, but not exactly the same as any other face he's seen.

But it was Bai Wuxiang's true face.

"...Just EXPLAIN IT, then!" He shouts back at her. "TELL ME!"

“THERE’S NO POINT!”

Frustration, when built to it’s breaking point, shatters into madness.

Zhao Beitong is in pieces, clutching her head as she staggers from side to side. Laughing—and sobbing.

“YOU’LL NEVER MAKE IT OUT OF HERE! I WOULDN’T LET YOU!”

She won’t make another calamity for him to unleash on the world. Won’t create any more spiritual weapons or devices to prop up his endless ego.

Hua Cheng barely dodges the next attack, E-Ming creating a shower of sparks.

“IF YOU DO—!” Hua Cheng pants, not normally needing his breath, but now he does, gulping it down, trying to manage his own pulsing spiritual power, threatening to rip out of control “You can’t leave this place, can you? Tell me, and let me go, I’LL KILL HIM FOR YOU IF YOU JUST—!”

A piercing shriek rattles through the Kiln, louder than any that came before it. A millennia of heartbreak, rage, and grief.

“DON’T YOU THINK I’VE TRIED THAT BEFORE?!” Zhao Beitong howls, and now, the butterflies start moving at a fever pitch. “HOW MANY TIMES DO YOU THINK?!”

In the beginning, she told every single creature she released from the Kiln the truth behind it’s maker. Every single bit of it, desperately hoping that they would cast him back down again.

“WHEN YOU LEAVE THIS PLACE—EVERY MEMORY OF HIS IDENTITY—IT’LL DISAPPEAR!” She roars.

That’s how it ends.

She tells them the truth, and they leave. They’ll remember Zhao Beitong. Her tragic life and death, and the man who ruined her.

But they’ll never remember what he became.

“HOW?!”

“HE DIDN’T JUST STEAL MY NAME!” The Kiln walls rattle and groan.

He stole his own name. His own past, and her ability to reveal it.

It's only here, within the bounds of Mount Tonglu, where she can tell the truth, and have it remembered—because his power cannot touch this place.

It can only seal her in, nothing more. But when things leave…

Her laughing, her crying—it turns to screaming.

Miserable, horrific screaming. So loud, Hua Cheng's eardrums feel like they could burst at any moment.

The screams of a trapped, tortured animal that cannot die. That cannot have a moment of relief.

There is absolutely no escape.

The screams of a mother who, when faced with the prospect of birthing a child that could destroy the world, would rather snuff it out instead.

A horrible, impossible choice. One that she has made over and over again. When the screaming stops—she's alone in the cavern.

The Kiln itself—it isn't only one chamber. There are tracks and tunnels that run all throughout, and surely—surely, he's gone there. Hiding. Thinking. Planning.

Just like she taught him to do.

Zhao Beitong sinks down to her knees, clutching her head.

She knows what comes next.

They'll fight and retreat, over and over again. He'll learn, try to out-think it—but only one other being on this earth can match her in power—and it isn't him.

They'll see each other's memories in full. He'll learn the truth, every single bit of it. Then, she'll devour him.

Like everything else in the fields of Mount Tonglu, nothing within the Kiln itself moves quickly.

Hua Cheng spends months like that—lurking in the dark, moving deeper and deeper into the tunnels.

Sometimes, she sleeps. For days—weeks at a time. When she does, he...thinks.

His work has gotten better over the years—there's no denying it. And while the kiln sleeps, he carves.

She asked him years ago, if it was a perfect likeness—and he told her no. Close, but no.

The faces staring back at him now...

Hua Cheng holds one between his hands, barely illuminated by the silver light of the few scatterings of butterflies around him. They never bother him when she's sleeping, no.

They're used to him now.

Now, the likeness is utterly perfect. Just like Hua Cheng remembered it.

His thumbs stroke over cheeks as smooth and pale as marble, remembering the only time he ever dared to touch his god's face. Grasping Xie Lian's chin, feeling every delicate breath and gasp against his lips, but...

He's been reliving his own memories, over and over again.

Sometimes through the eyes of his Guoshi. Other times, in the brief moments when he manages to catch a moment of sleep. Ghosts don't need it—not normally, but he's been thoroughly worn down.

He's painted those memories on the walls in daunting murals of color.

Carved them into stone. Even the ones that aren't real. The ones he only dreams.

And now, he holds a dream between his hands. One made of stone, carved to perfection, and he wishes—for just a moment—that he truly was a god.

The most powerful among them all, powerful enough to...

His lips hover so close to that of another, frozen in rock.

Powerful enough to wish life into stone.

"...Hong-er?"

He goes still, that stone face still cradled in his hand—but his eye blown wide, because he—

He knows that voice.

“Hong-er, are you there?”

He—

“Please!”

When Hua Cheng lifts his head—he sees him there.

Not in a memory. Not a dream. There. Right there, just a few meters away, stumbling through the dark.

“If you’re there—” he stumbles slightly on a dip in the floor, lurching forward, “P- Please answer me!”

Dianxia.

It’s—

“Dianxia.”

The word falls out in response before he can stop it, and—

He sees Xie Lian’s head whip to the side, searching through the dark, lips trembling. “Hong-er?!”

There were so many times when the prince called that name, and Hua Cheng could never answer.

But now—

“Dianxia.” He whispers again, watching with wonder as Xie Lian stumbles towards him, following his voice through the ark.

Now, he can answer.

“Hong-er!” He cries, stumbling over another dip in the floor, starting to fall, but…

Hua Cheng catches him in his arms.

…And it’s all real.

It all feels so warm, solid, and real. The heartbeat pounding in front of him. The short, panicked breaths.

He didn't realize how slight the crown prince could feel. Xie Lian never felt small before, no—but—

Hong-er was small back then, too.

Slowly—he realizes that the crown prince isn't actually small at all, he just—

Hong-er got bigger. But he never noticed it before, not when every time he was with him, it was always...

In a memory. But this...

Hands grip the front of his robes, trembling.

"...Is it you?"

This feels real.

"...Yes," he whispers, his arms wrapped tightly around the crown prince's back, holding him steady, "It's me."

A choked, relieved sound comes from Xie Lian, hands fumbling blindly for Hua Cheng's shoulders. "I-I looked everywhere for you, but you didn't answer!"

And when Xie Lian's hands are on him—it still feels like he could have the entire world in his grasp. Still feels like the only place in the world that he wants to be.

"I'm sorry, I—" his voice trembles and cracks as he hangs his head, arms tightening, "—I r-really tried, I—!"

Then, those hands are pressed against his cheeks again, thumbs stroking under his eyes, over his lips, the bridge of his nose, his jaw.

When Hua Cheng looks up, he can't make eye contact with the prince, he's staring off into the middle distance, the curse pattern of the shackles in his irises gleaming in the dark—

But Xie Lian smiles, holding the ghost's face in his hands.

"...Handsome," he whispers.

Hua Cheng lets out a choked sound, arms tightening as his head sinks forward, until their foreheads are pressed together, and the prince's toes are dangling off the floor.

"I'm sorry," he whispers. "I'm so, so sorry—"

"No," Xie Lian's hands slide up from his cheeks, "Don't be."

His arms wind around Hua Cheng's neck, holding him close, even as the ghost's knees buckle, he goes down with him, never letting go.

Hua Cheng takes shuddering gasps, trying to catch his breath, to grasp what's going on, but..

"I missed you," the prince whispers, " so much."

The ghost trembles in response, leaning against the tunnel wall, holding the god so tight, he half expects Xie Lian to shatter.

But he doesn't.,

He stays there, like that. Cradled in Hua Cheng's lap, their foreheads pressed together, noses bumping.

"...But you never left,"

Xie Lian whispers, and Hua Cheng—

Their mouths aren't touching, but he can feel the smile on Xie Lian's face. Trembling and full of tears.

"You never left me."

Hua Cheng's eyes fill with tears of his own, hands tightening against his back. "I knew you would never leave me."

"Never," he whispers, remembering what he was thinking, over and over again, watching Mei Nianqing in the Queen of Wuyong's memories, how frustrated he had been—

'Tell her.'

'You stubborn fool, why won't you just tell her?'

One of his hands slips into Xie Lian's hair.

Slowly, so cautiously—knowing that he shouldn't dare. That he has absolutely no right to touch him at all, but—

The strands are so soft between his fingers, like silk—and just the feeling of it against his skin makes Hua Cheng tremble.

And his god doesn't push him away.

The ghost's fingers gently cradle his skull, his other arm wrapped around Xie Lian's back. "D...Dianxia, I..." He swallows dryly—and he can't blame his hesitation on a pounding heartbeat or unsteady breaths, but his tongue feels like lead anyway, words trembling, "Gege, I..."

"I know," the prince whispers, fingers stroking the back of Hua Cheng's neck, their noses still bumping together when he speaks. "I know that you love me, Hong-er."

A small, terrified—but god, so longing —sound rips from the ghost's throat.

And then, Xie Lian presses forward.

At first, when he feels those lips on him—Hua Cheng can't react. The same way that a person can't immediately react when they see any miracle for the first time, because—

Because how?

How on earth could it be real?

But this mouth is warm, and soft—and kissing him so sweetly.

"My Hong-er," that voice whispers, hands tangling in Hua Cheng's hair, kissing his chin, each corner of his mouth, the tip of his nose, then his lips again—emphasizing each word with an accompanying touch.

"My handsome, brave Hong-er." Everything feels thick with warmth.

Like a sweetness, filling his head with incense, his stomach with butterflies—and it's swelling inside of the young man like a balloon, filling him up until there's nothing else. No other conscious thought, just—

I love you.

I miss you.

I am so sorry.

God, I love you so much—

But it's the lack of thought that makes him worry. That makes him hesitate. Because it's too good. Any time he has exactly what he wants, he knows that it's a trick. That the rug is about to be yanked out from under him.

He knows that Xie Lian would never kiss him like this. Not without some intervening reason. He—

It feels like moving mountains, just finding the motivation to pull his lips back, to gently—but insistently—push his god away, and when he opens his eyes—

Xie Lian is looking right back up at him. Seeing him, his eyes clear.

Hua Cheng hasn't seen those eyes in years. Not without the bandage that covered them, or the shackle that bound them.

Not since he was a little boy, falling from the sky. Being pulled, broken and bleeding, from a sack.

They're incomparable, and Hua Cheng is haunted by them.

Most people have eyes that remain almost dull, static. Or—like Hong-er, they're cursed with eyes of two different colors, the sharp, often grotesque contrast horrifying anyone that looks.

But the Crown Prince of Xianle can hold the entire world in his eyes. Every single color.

Depending on the lighting, or the emotion inside of them. Now, under the silvery light of the butterflies around them, they look almost violet—similar to that of his ancestors, sparkling up at him in the dark, leaving the fierce crimson ghost, wielder of the scimitar E-Ming...

He's spellbound.

Completely, utterly spellbound. Like a dangerous, venomous serpent, completely defanged by the flute of a charmer.

Xie Lian smiles, slowly, widely, hugging Hua Cheng tighter around his neck. "I wasn't lying," he murmurs, staring up at Hua Cheng.

"You—?"

"You're beautiful, Hong-er." The prince murmurs, one hand coming down to caress his cheek again—and Hua Cheng can't help but lean into it, his eyelashes fluttering, lips trembling from the kiss. "Why didn't you believe me?"

"I..." He tries to answer, his voice dry and unsteady.

"I..."

His eyes flicker up, over Xie Lian's shoulder—and then he goes still. Perfectly, absolutely still.

The prince frowns, patting Hua Cheng's cheek, his eyebrows knitting together. "What's wrong? I—" Then, he glances back over his shoulder, following the ghost's gaze.

"Oh."

His voice is a little flat, almost unappreciative of the interruption.

Across the tunnel from them is...also Xie Lian. But a very different version of him. Younger. Happier. Dressed in fine silks and jewels, hair pulled into an elegant style. In someone else's arms.

The kiss he's sharing with Feng Xin is fierce, his guard's hands on his hips, keeping him grounded against the wall—all while delicate hands, clad with golden rings, claw at Feng Xin's back, clinging, pulling him closer.

He moans, gasps—whispers his name—not Hua Cheng's name.

When they break apart, only for the appointed martial god to bury his face in the crown prince's neck, kissing and biting—the other Xie Lian stares at him from across the tunnel, flushed, panting with want.

And Hua Cheng feels it in that moment, what he felt that day.

Watching Bai Wuxiang do what he did, wearing another man's face.

Tricking Xie Lian into kissing the man that he actually wanted. That he always wanted—not Hua Cheng, Wu Ming, or Hong-er.

It hurts, but it also burns.

With this smoldering, completely unjustified jealousy.

Desperate to possess what he knows he can't have.

But Hong-er was a selfish boy, and Wu Ming was a selfish teenager. Now, Hua Cheng is a selfish man.

A horribly selfish man, who would rip the arms holding his love to shreds now, if not for the weight in his own arms already.

“…That’s you,” the Xie Lian in his arms murmurs, squeezing Hua Cheng’s cheeks, turning his head to get his attention. “That’s not me.”

Hua Cheng stares down at the god in his arms—wrangling down a tangled knot of emotions, trying to figure out exactly what he—

“It’s not him.”

Finally, the ghost gives Xie Lian his full attention, eyes locked on his face. “The person I want,” the god repeats, shaking his head. “It isn’t him.”

Somehow, Hua Cheng’s long silent heart manages to pound—like a phantom limb, rattling in his chest.

‘It can’t be me.’

Hua Cheng thinks to himself, desperate to avoid getting his hopes up, terrified of reaching his hands too high, knowing that he has no right.

‘It can’t be—’

“I would have loved you like this too, you know.”

Now, when Hua Cheng’s eyes focus in again, the god’s appearance is…

He isn’t wearing white cultivator robes, the way he always did before. He’s in the heavy silks and finery he wore the first time Hong-er saw him. Whites and golds and reds, jewels in his hair, coral pears dangling from his ears.

White flowers crowning his head.

Oh.

Oh, he…

Hua Cheng has never found him more or less beautiful, no matter what he’s wearing, no matter Xie Lian’s wealth, power, or status, but —

He doesn't miss the meaning behind the prince's words.

"You think I would have wanted him because he knew me when I was like this?"

Xie Lian shakes his head, and even the smallest details—like the way his jewelry clinks together when he moves, or the smell of the blossoms in his hair—makes Hua Cheng's heart ache with a love that has no bounds, no set paths to follow. It's simply all encompassing.

"It doesn't matter where or who I was when we met," Xie Lian murmurs, cupping Hua Cheng's cheek in his hand. "I always would have been yours."

The ghost goes completely still, his pupils dilating, lips slightly parted.

'Yours.'

'I always would have been yours.'

"Hong—?"

Mine.

Mine.

Mine .

Hua Cheng doesn't realize that he snarled the word out loud until it rattles against his own eardrums, and he hears Xie Lian's soft gasp in response, and—

He can't think anymore. He doesn't want to.

The hand in Xie Lian's robes, holding his back—it drags him in, the other gripping his jaw, tilting his head the way the ghost wants, and—

He doesn't sit there and accept Xie Lian's affection, too terrified to respond, like he did just now.

He doesn't touch Xie Lian like a treasure hidden behind glass, like something he doesn't have the right to possess.

He kisses his beloved the way he wants to. The way that he's always wanted to. With such passion, that it leaves the god trembling in his arms, gasping for—for—

Hua Cheng kisses him with his teeth, scraping over the prince's bottom lip, sucking until it's throbbing and swollen—until their tongues are moving together in this slow, indulgent slide that makes the god whimper, and Hua Cheng—

He's never been so eager to be a sinner.

Those hands cling to his cheeks, pulling Hua Cheng closer, and all the ghost can remember is the sight of another man's hands, holding him down.

There's a small gasp when he flips them around, pinning his love against a cavern wall, wrists held above his head in a loving grip.

Xie Lian could stop him. In an instant, by saying no. By showing fear. By pushing him away. A single word, and Hua Cheng would let him go. Would claw out his other eye, break his own hands rather than offend his god with his touch again.

But the prince just moans, arching.

There's heat, warm, thick sweetness. Flooding his head and his thoughts, making the young man lose himself to the desire. To the one thing he's ever wanted. The only thing a man with nothing has ever wanted so badly.

The thing he would lie, steal, beg, and cheat to obtain.

And on some level, it's possible for a person to be willingly tricked. To indulge in a fantasy, because it's just too beautiful to ignore.

Because Xie Lian's body pressed under his, trembling with want, is too sweet of a delusion to ignore.

Satisfying the hungriest curiosity.

The entire thing is so complete, so flawless—

Is this really what he tastes like? What his moans might sound like? Would Hua Cheng really be able to feel his pulse through his wrists, just like this? Feel the goosebumps rising across the god's skin?

Is this close to reality?

And in the beginning, he truly thinks it's a delusion created by his own mind. That so many years of pain, loss, and isolation have finally made his consciousness begin to fracture, but…

That isn't what this is.

Hua Cheng has a vast imagination, but he's never thought of this.

Never conceived a possibility in which Xie Lian would say those things to him. Not even in his admittedly shameful fantasies in the night, relieving his—

No. He never imagined that.

And it's not a cruel delusion either. It isn't intended to cause him any pain or fear.

The illusions that Bai Wuxiang spun for Xie Lian would start as something enticing, but always ended up inflicting some sort of psychological damage.

This—this illusion witnessed the projection of Hua Cheng's own insecurities—the sight of Xie Lian and Feng Xin—and reassured him.

This isn't an illusion cast with cruel intentions, no—it's meant to soothe him. To distract him.

And then, somewhere, through the haze of pleasure and desire, Hua Cheng remembers something.

Slaughter.

There's a certain way to slaughter an animal properly. Without fear tainting the meat.

Butchers will often distract a prized lamb by tinkling a small bell in it's ear, making it look in the other direction. Giving them small pieces of fruit, soaked in honey— distracting them from the approaching blade.

This delusion is showing Hua Cheng his greatest regret. The one thing he always wanted to experience in his life, but never could.

Giving him his greatest treasure, and allowing him to indulge in it. A mercy. A kindness.

All while he's being slowly devoured.

He pulls back sharply, breathing hard, and when he opens his eyes...

Xie Lian is smiling up at him. Eyes loving, cheeks flushed, lips slightly swollen. As they open wider, Hua Cheng sees a mouth full of long, razor sharp teeth, glinting up at him.

That's when he lunges.

Hua Cheng barely avoids it, moving back so quickly, he slams into the opposite side of the tunnel, walls rattling around him as the Xie Lian he was holding in his arms dissolves into a horde of butterflies.

"You could have just enjoyed it, you foolish child." She hisses.

It was a kindness. More mercy than anyone has ever tried to show Hua Cheng before, he'll admit it.

Certainly would have been less painful than any of his other deaths—and for a moment, he truly did enjoy it.

"No one is going to devour me," he retorts, his voice raw.

"You can try as hard as you want, but I'll never make it easy for you."

"You choose suffering, then." Zhao Beitong appears before him in the tunnel, eyes narrowed with frustration.

"No," the crimson shakes his head, wiping his mouth with the back of his hand.

"No, I choose living."

"YOU'RE ALREADY DEAD!" Zhao Beitong snarls, the ground rattling beneath her as she follows him down the tunnel, hands hooked into claws at her sides. "WE'RE BOTH DEAD!"

But dead isn't gone.

Dead isn't giving up.

Hua Cheng smiles wryly.

"What's that got to do with anything?"

And then, finally, the pieces finally seem to slide together.

He glances around them, at the wraith butterflies that cover the walls, the ceiling, making the tunnel look like a gateway to another world.

"...Guoshi Tonglu?" She tenses.

The boy standing before her is now a man. Tall, broad, with strong limbs. Arms clasped behind him, shoulders thrown back—standing so tall, with his head held high.

His gaze holds no fear, only flashes with cleverness, the love of a good fight. And Zhao Beitong is proud.

Deep, from her gut, she is proud. So proud, that it steals the breath from her chest, makes it impossible to speak.

She resents him, and she loves him. Wants to watch him grow, and wants to rip his newly formed roots from the earth.

And oh, how desperately she wishes that things were different. That they weren't both victims of such cursed circumstances.

But this world is rotten, cruel, and hungry. It devours happiness, dreams, and hope.

It gives you children, then forces you to watch as death swallows them whole.

This world is not worth saving, and Zhao Beitong will not miss it when it dies. But she will not unleash this child upon it either.

Not again. Never again.

"How do you forge wraith butterflies?"

She doesn't answer him then—only charges.

But that's alright.

He knows what he has to do now.

The Crimson Ghost turns on his heels, charging back down the length of the tunnel— and for the first time in over a year, the re-enter the main chamber of the Kiln itself.

Blinding walls of white all around them, impossibly scorching watches of heat, bearing down from all directions.

"JUST STOP!" Zhao Beitong shouts, waves of agony piercing her skull, it's so much pressure, so much spiritual power, and she, she can't—

It's too much pressure. Hua Cheng knows now.

Every system has it’s flaws. Even the valves meant to relieve pressure—when put under too much strain—will eventually break.

He can see the agony that her mind is in, after bearing that weight for over a millennia.

“JUST—!”

She stops when they collide.

Then, the world goes dark.

And they aren’t in the kiln anymore.

No screaming, no pain, no hordes of wraith butterflies swarming overhead. When Zhao Beitong opens her eyes, she’s back home.

“Mama!”

And her heart squeezes as she turns around, opening her arms.

The little boy running towards her is no more than six or seven years old, with long, ink black hair, hanging over his shoulder in a simple braid. Amber eyes, just like his father’s, always glinting with mischief.

“My San Lang,” she smiles, catching her son in her embrace. Her third child, her final child.

It took two years for her to reconcile enough with her husband to conceive another— still so pained from the loss of Bolin, and her first son, Zhang Wei.

But there was this aching gap inside of her.

One that no gold or jewels in the world could fill. Not even Mei Nianqing’s love, which she treasured so privately, holding him close to her heart.

Her husband has so many selfish indulgences, and resent him as she might—Hudie does love him. Can’t not love him, in the end.

But he has prioritized himself, over and over again. At the cost of everything else in their lives. And Mei Nianqing...

His arms are a safe harbor, but they can’t fill the pain left behind by the chilling knowledge that...

Hudie wasn't a mother anymore. Her children were taken.

But when San Lang was born…that ache finally began to ease. Never disappeared, it never, ever goes away. But there was something new in her heart now. Something beautiful. Something that didn't hurt.

"Is Papa coming home this week?" He hums, clinging to her side.

It's been hard, of course—for the boy to grow up with a father who lives and works in the heavens, only coming down to the mortal realm when he can spare the time.

Once again, Mei Nianqing has largely stepped into the role as a teacher and a mentor, but…It isn't quite the same.

"Soon," she reassures him, pushing his hair out of his face, pressing kisses against the side of his head. "Soon, my love—and then we'll all be together again."

Not a conventional family. Not always a happy one. But San Lang is the greatest joy of Hudie's life.

He learns sword play from his mother, teaching him the traditional battle forms of their people, running through the palace halls with his wooden sabers.

His Guoshi teaches him arts, sciences, and cultivation—but the Queen of Wuyong wants his eyes firmly planted on the ground.

"If you spend your entire life chasing the gods," she tells him each night, "you will forget the things that make you human."

He's fiercely clever, playful, and loyal. Always by his mother's side, playfully mimicking her posture when he isn't clinging to her skirts.

Another young man will come, in the millennia that follow. One that will remind her of him so much, she almost wonders if his soul has been reincarnated into a new form.

But for now, he is small, clever, and safe. Always safe, within her palace walls, behind her blades.

Each night, she sings him to sleep in a garden of wraith butterflies, telling him stories of his two older brothers. But instead of making it a sad story, she weaves something new.

Tells San Lang his two elder brothers were dragons, kings of the sky—and they simply flew away.

“Maybe I’ll be a dragon too, then.” San Lang hums, rolling around in the grass.

Mei Nianqing smiles from his seat against the trunk of a nearby tree, a scroll open across his lap. The boy is not his blood—but that has never stopped him from loving San Lang like a son.

“A fierce little dragon you would be—but then you’d fly away from your mother too, wouldn’t you?”

“No!” The little boy cries, rolling up onto his knees, blades of grass sticking out of his hair. “I’d take her with me! Or I’d stay here, and protect her! I’d protect everyone!”

“Protect everyone?” Hudie smiles, reaching over to ruffle his hair. “That’s quite a task.”

“I can do it,” the little boy grins, one sharp canine poking out between his lips. “Because my dad’s a god, and my mom’s a blade master!” He jumps to his feet. “Bet I can breathe fire!”

He throws his head back, playfully roaring at the sky before he falls backwards, laughing, rolling in the grass again until he bumps against his mother’s leg, smiling up at her playfully.

Oh, and what an easy thing it is to be happy, when San Lang smiles. “I’m just kidding!”

He sits up beside his mother, moving into her lap so she can pick the blades of grass out of his hair, fixing his braid. “I don’t wanna be a dragon, they die.”

After all, his father has slain a thousand of them.

Hudie’s hands become still in his hair.

“...Everything dies, my love.”

The Queen of Wuyong whispers, her voice suddenly mournful. “Even the gods, eventually.”

San Lang hums, snuggling more comfortably into her arms—looking up at her with big, bright eyes—the kind that burn with such intensity, like he’s swallowed the sun inside them.

"Why?"

It's such a simple thing, to a child. Broken things can always be fixed. Golden palaces can always be rebuilt. But death—death cannot be undone.

She finishes fixing his hair, stroking his bangs away from his forehead with the gentleness only a mother can have.

"There is no banquet in this world that doesn't come to an end," Hudie murmurs, watching that sweet little face, always looking upon the world as though it will one day bow before him. "That is the way of things."

San Lang presses his lips together, thinking rather seriously. "...Then I'll be a butterfly," he declares, crossing his arms.

"A butterfly?" Mei Nianqing looks up with a surprised laugh. "They die even quicker than their scaled, fire breathing cousins."

"Yeah, but—butterflies come back!" The little boy cries. "And I'll always come back."

He looks up at his mother, beaming from ear to ear.

"Always!"

And he said the words with such passion, such sincerity—it was almost difficult not to believe him, however impossible the sentiments seemed.

Time carried on, he continued to grow— And so did the world around him.

By the time he was eight, the earthquakes started. Infrequently at first—quiet, gentle rumbling.

But slowly repeating, over and over again—with increasing strength.

Gradually, the Queen of Wuyong began to look at the volcano their city sat in the shadow of with growing concern.

Volcanic eruptions weren't unheard of, of course—but they were also somewhat survivable. Wuyong was a vast kingdom, with wide resources. If they monitored the mountain, they could begin the slow process of evacuation—and assess the damage after the disaster had passed.

In the beginning, that was the plan.

Until, on one of her husband's visits from the heavens, he told her that he'd had a dream.

A horrible, apocalyptic dream.

And, unfortunately...

Jun Wu's dreams had a habit of coming true. The argument was like none they'd had before.

"HAVE YOU GONE MAD?!" One of the Guoshi cries, staring at Jun Wu, the prince he's always followed so steadfastly, like he doesn't even recognize the man standing before him.

"Do you have a better suggestion?" The god questions coldly, arching an eyebrow.

"...My love," Hudie tries to talk him down—gentle, her tone non-judgmental. "Even if we knew such a thing could work—"

"It would work," the god interrupts her, his voice determined, but...He seems soothed, when her hands brush his shoulders.

Mei Nianqing stares at the table's surface, silent.

"We have other options." She shakes her head. "There are neighboring kingdoms, it —the central plains, don't you remember how they attacked us again and again, unprovoked? We could take back the territory we lost in the last war. We could take our son back—"

"No."

Jun Wu shakes his head firmly. "We made an agreement with the Xie family. It would be dishonorable for us to turn back on it now. Besides, the boy has lived there for ten years now—he'll hardly remember who we are at all."

The Queen flinches as if she's been slapped.

"You think it's more dishonorable than sacrificing live humans to a volcano?" One of the other Guoshi questions—the youngest, who was brought in to take Hudie's place after her coronation as queen. "That's an interesting set of priorities."

"Criminals." Jun Wu's frown deepens.

“Who are slated for execution as it is. It hardly makes any difference at all—!”

“No,” Guoshi Nianqing shakes his head. “You just want to execute them in the most horrific way possible, rather than a simple hanging.”

Jun Wu grits his teeth as he looks upon his former teacher. “Even you?” He frowns. “Even you are against me?”

“He isn’t against you,” Hudie frowns. “Have you considered what kind of karma making that kind of sacrifice could bring down upon us? Our family? We have our child to think about—”

“San Lang is EXACTLY why I’m doing this!”

Jun Wu slams his hand on the table, making their scrolls and maps rattle, his expression tense with worry. “Have you ever considered his future? Would you have him be a prince of the ashes?! Of a nation of homeless refugees?!”

“There are worse things to be,” Hudie mutters.

“This is his home!” Jun Wu shakes his head. “Our home—and I won’t allow it to burn!”

“...It might not be up to you, your highness,” Mei Nianqing points out softly.

The martial god pauses, halfway through his rant—lips frozen in mid-sentence. “... What is that supposed to mean?”

The head Guoshi sits back in his seat, rubbing one hand against his temple. He hasn’t aged a day since Hudie met him, while she’s now a woman in her thirties—with the beginnings of age starting to etch itself across her face.

However, at this moment—his eyes seem ancient.

“How many times did I warn you?” He mutters. “Keeping so many attachments in the mortal realm will do you no good.”

“If this is only a lecture, spare me.” Jun Wu glares. “Or explain what you mean.” Mei Nianqing looks up, his gaze unwavering.

“You will always have my respect as a god,” he murmurs. “And as our former prince— but you gave up the authority of your titles when you ascended, Jun Wu.”

The Crown Prince glares, his eyebrows knitting together. “This is—”

“Wuyong has a Queen,” Mei Nianqing’s voice is firm. “And this decision ought to be left to her.”

Tonglu Hudie has always had a healthy respect for the nature of karma. To some extent, she always thought losing Bolin was her punishment for straying from her marriage. For forging the demon blade Zhu Xin, and how many lives it took.

In the beginning, she debates. The pressure from her husband is enormous, but...

Bad karma will travel directly through the bloodline. And in her case, she only has one thing left to lose: her son.

She spends hours meditating in the imperial temple, fortune telling day and night

Visions do come to her, showing that her husband was telling the truth. Images of her home, the country that raised her, pulled her up—made her one of the most powerful women in history—devoured by a sea of flames.

She sees Mei Nianqing, screaming for her, eyes filled with tears

She even sees Jun Wu himself, staring up at the sky with horror, Zhu Xin sticking out of his chest, blood dripping from the corners of his mouth.

Visions that horrify her. That terrify her.

And they aren’t always what she seeks—some unrelated to her, or too far in the future.

She sees a boy, falling from the sky like a falling star. A mask, half laughing half crying. A green lantern, touring through the night. Crimson rain, falling from the sky. She sees ships sinking under black water, and a boy with a wine chalice, smiling and dancing in the wind.

She sees thousands of lanterns, floating as far as the eye can see—and a man, among them, his head crowned with flowers.

She sees the garden Mei Nianqing built for her turning to ash, then forest again. Then, snow, with dozens of little burial mounds, built all around.

Then, they turn to ash again, but, eventually, so far ahead that she cannot recognize the landscape any longer, lotus blossoms grow.

She sees arrows piercing the sun, and when the doors of hell open, she hears the sounds of a flute.

The Queen of Wuyong does not know which of these visions are real, and which are dreams. Some might be possibilities of a future that never come to pass. Others might simply be delusions that come from looking too closely into the eye of destiny.

But one thing chills her.

In none of those futures, real or imagined, can she see San Lang's.

That's when the fear begins to grip her, finding its way into the core of her like a weed, worming it's way in until cracks begin to form.

She never gives the order, but she certainly looks the other way.

When the captain of the guard tells her that their prisoners on death row have con missing, she's slow to investigate the matter—and when her husband returns again from the heavens, she does not ask questions.

She holds San Lang tight, and desperately, she tries to look forward.

But when she tries to see his future, there is only darkness.

Pitch black darkness. Fire and smoke.

When the other three Guoshi disappear without returning, and he gives the explanation that his suggestion horrified them to the point of leaving—

Hudie looks the other way.

She knows that it doesn't sound true. That the answer, if she peels it back, is probably hideous.

"..Mei Nianqing," she whispers one night, when they're tucked away in a lonely corridor, pressed against a pillar. "Promise me something."

The Guoshi doesn't lift his face from her neck, holding one arm around her waist, simply breathing her in. "Name it, your highness, and I will give it."

"..." Her fingers stroke his hair, eyes upturned, watching the stars through an open window. "If the worst comes to pass..."

It's the only thing she has ever asked of her lover that he has wanted to refuse. "Leave me," She whispers. "Protect my son, and leave me."

Hudie misses him desperately—but the central plains are far removed from this danger, and she knows the Xie's have treated Bolin well.

It's San Lang that consumes her thoughts. Fears for his future, that haunt her dreams every night.

"I think you underestimate the fact that your son would bite anyone that tried to take him away from you," the Guoshi answers dryly, earning a soft laugh. "I'll protect you both."

Her smile is faint. "I know you'll try," she assures him. "But if you have to choose— choose him."

Slowly—he nods, making his promise to her.

And part of her hopes, when the eruption doesn't come—that the crisis has been averted. Even if her son's future is still black, she...

Hudie tells herself that she made the right choice, not asking Jun Wu any questions. That if there was any horrible karma to be had by whatever he had done—it wouldn't be hers, because she'd had no part in it.

But San Lang's 13th birthday comes—and with it, the first eruption.

The royal court survives—but half of the farmland is raised to ash in a single night. And with it, any hopes of making it through the winter without famine.

Still, the volcano continues to rumble—and when Hudie tries to read the future again —

All she sees is fire and ash.

Desperately, she begins to plan an invasion, knowing it's their only practical means of survival. And maybe it's selfish—but they are the traditional enemies of Wuyong. What other choice is there? She—She —

One evening she's standing in the doorway to San Lang's room, silent.

Part of her just wants to forget the rest of the world. To sweep him up in her arms right now, and run away. To a place where the world doesn't know them. Where her son can just be a child, peaceful and happy.

A pair of arms wrap around her from behind, holding her close.

"He's so beautiful, isn't he?" Jun Wu whispers, resting his chin against her shoulder.

"...Yes," his wife agrees, resting her hands over his, leaning back against his armor. The same armor she forged for him, before he ascended. "He's absolutely perfect."

"We can save him."

He feels his queen stiffen, her attention piqued. "...if you mean to sacrifice anyone else to the volcano, that didn't work the first time—"

"No," Jun Wu reassures her. "That could never work was a permanent solution, only a temporary delay."

Slowly, Hudie nods.

"Do you remember what I said, when Mei Nianqing told me not to marry you?"

She shifts with discomfort, given how much the context of that moment has changed with time—but she nods. "That you had every right to take a wife."

"And," Jun Wu continues, "I could bring you with me."

The Queen of Wuyong pauses, starting to pull away, shaking her head. "I have too many responsibilities here, and San Lang—"

"Him too," Jun Wu reassures her. "I'm going to bring everyone."

That's the first time that he tells her about the bridge. A ludicrous idea. Impossible.

But he knows exactly who he's talking to. The daughter of one of the greatest architects in the modern era. A master in forging and engineering spiritual devices.

If anyone could confirm the possibility of such a thing, it would be Guoshi Tonglu.

“Can it be done?”

She’s hesitant.

A life in the heavens—it means many things. No hunger, no war, no danger, but also...

Less privacy—and certainly less freedom. She couldn’t go on as she has for the last fifteen years if she was...

Her own indiscretions aside, there’s also San Lang.

A child—who deserves to live and be happy in the human world. To grow among his own kind, and make his own choices.

Not to be plucked to the heavens when he’s barely even a teenager.

And still—with his future so black, she...

Hudie forces herself to consider the matter.

Slowly, she admits that—in theory—it is possible. But that the spiritual power required would be immense, even for him.

She emphasizes it, over and over again—that he must, absolutely, get the heavens to support him in the effort. That he cannot do it without assistance.

Hua Cheng watches the man agree, nodding as he listens to her—but somehow, when he sees the odd light in the martial god’s eye, he—

He doesn’t believe him.

Even as he watches the god go in seclusion to store spiritual power, assuring his wife that he’s enlisted the other gods...

All he sees, when he looks into the earnestness of those eyes, is a lie. Something that he distrusts.

In the meantime, the Queen tries to make evacuation plans with the Guoshi by her side. To make ready for what they’ll do if the bridge fails, but...

No one listens.

Every single time she tries, she's told that she doesn't need to worry. That the illustrious Crown Prince of Wuyong is going to save them all. That her fears are stemming from paranoia, and that she's nothing more than a frantic woman.

But Hudie knows Jun Wu's best kept secret.

That he is human. That, beneath all of the glory, gold, and fame—he is just a man.

Men make mistakes. They fail—and they fall.

Hua Cheng watches the Queen of Wuyong spend her final days with her son, now a cocky young teenager, and desperately wishes that she would flee.

Even she, watching her own memories, wishes she had one the same thing. But in the end—she was no different from anyone else.

She had a vein of distrust in her husband—that was true. But not enough so to go against him. Not enough so to believe in her own competence over his.

But when that last day came, and she saw the volcano falling into it's final rattle before entering a final state of eruption—something inside of Tonglu Hudie broke.

"...Mom?" San Lang questions, being tugged along by his wrist. "What are you doing?"

"Father is already getting people onto the bridge, we—"

"We're not going," the queen mutters, shaking her head, looking through the palace armory. Where is it, where is it, where is it?!

"...What are you talking about?" San Lang frowns, his eyebrows knitting together.

"That's been the plan this entire time—?"

"We're going to the central plains," she cuts him off, passing through every shelf, her eyes frantic. "Your brother is there."

"But what about everyone else?!"

"I can't carry them," the Queen mumbles faintly, shaking her head.

"But father said—!"

"YOUR FATHER CANNOT SAVE EVERYONE!" She snaps, her hands trembling, but —

But then she lets out a trembling sigh. "I-I'm sorry, just..." Her hands come up, pressing against her temples. "Go to the palace gates, I'll catch up with you."

"Mother—"

"Hurry!"

He listens to her, as he usually does—and Hudie searches every nook and cranny, trying desperately to find a sword strong enough to carry them both, until—

"Zhu Xin," she whispers, snatching the steel blade from its sheath, dark metal glinting up at her in the candlelight.

They've had to use torches throughout the day for the last week—smoke blocking out nearly all of the sunlight, plunging the kingdom of Wuyong into near constant darkness.

But now, she feels a glint of hope.

She can fix this. She can save him. She—

BOOM!

The explosion is so sudden, so violent, that it knocks her to the ground, her head smacking against a nearby doorframe, blood dripping down from her temple.

No...

The world is spinning and unsteady as she staggers to her feet, Zhu Xin clutched between her fingers.

She has to...

...The gates.

Hudie's heart clutches with fear as she flees through the palace corridors, shoes smacking against marble floors.

She sent her boy to the palace gates.

If she can just get there fast enough, they can go. They can start over. They can find Bolin, and then they—

The moment she bursts through the palace doors, she calls for him. “SAN LANG!”

The Queen of Wuyong whips her head around, screaming.

“SAN LANG!”

“Mom!” She whips around, head pounding with pure terror, and—

She lifts her head towards the sky, Zhu Xin trembling in her hand.

The bridge.

A shining bridge, made from golden spiritual power, carrying the people of Wuyong straight up into the sky.

And as she peers through the crowds of people walking through it—she sees San Lang.

Her San Lang, waving to her excitedly.

“HE DID IT!” The prince cries. “HE REALLY DID IT!”

And even as the volcano explodes in the background, turning the sky and fields around them into a sea of flames, Hudie feels a lurch of hope—and shame.

For not believing in her husband. For not having faith in her god. She takes one trembling step forward.

Ready to follow her son to the heavens, if that’s what she has to do. As long as they’re together, none of the rest of it matters.

As long as Hudie has her son, she can endure anything. So long as she — There are some things in the world that a mother should never have to see.

Hudie sees it, when the golden light forming the bridge begins to flicker. Sees it, when it’s foundations begin to crack.

Even sees the look in her son’s eyes, when he first realizes what’s about to happen. Then, there’s screaming—as everyone begins to fall. Horrible screaming.

The kind that comes from a place so deep inside, you can't find a way to stop it. Screaming that strikes the Queen to her core, makes her wish it would just end, but—

Oh.

That's just her.

She's screaming.

"...SAN LANG!" She shrieks, throwing the sword under her feet.

It surges into the air, carrying the queen with it as she tries, with every bit of strength she has, to be quick enough. Not to be too late, to get to him in time. That's all that matters. If she can just get to him, nothing else—

But she has to watch. And so does Hua Cheng.

Watch, as her son reaches back for her, crying out, in his final moments, for his mother.

And Hua Cheng can see it in the young man's eyes—

He didn't think he was going to die. Not for a moment. He truly believed that Hudie was going to catch him. The way she always had before.

Hudie has to watch, as San Lang slips past her outstretched fingers, unable to reach him by only a few meters. Has to watch, as he plunges past her, through the smoke, into...

Darkness.

Nothing but endless black, raging darkness.

"...NO!"

Her howling out screams the volcano.

"ZHU XIN!" She flails, hair falling from it's fine combs and elegant styles, falling around her, "ZHU XIN, SAVE HIM! LEAVE ME, SAVE HIM!"

But the blade will not leave it's master. Will not destroy itself by plunging into the smoke below.

Where only inferno and death awaits.

Slowly, then rather quickly—the blade begins to retreat. Even when she tries to leap from it, to plunge herself into the flames down below, following her son—her feet are locked against the pommel.

It won't let her go.

"SAN LANG!" She screams, fingers trembling, reaching.

But they find nothing. Nothing but smoke and ash—so scorching, it burns her fingertips down to the bone.

Zhu Xin pulls her from the inferno, spirits it's master away, all the way to the border of Wuyong, depositing her onto the grass as she watches the lava flows in the distance

Hudie doesn't know how long she screams. Long enough, that she feels parts of her throat break and tear. So long, that she begins spitting up blood.

It's all gone.

Her home. Her kingdom. Every single member of her family. Probably Mei Nianqing, too.

All of it—just gone.

The former Queen of Wuyong listens, as the world begins to curse her husband. Watches, as they tear down his temples. As they begin to pray to other gods in his stead.

She has no time for that. No energy or heart left for hating the man.

There's only one thing left, now.

It's a long way to the central plains, and Tonglu Hudie makes every step of it on foot. Until her shoes split, and the soles of her feet begin to bleed. Her legs threaten to give out so many times, but...

Eventually, she finds herself standing in a small city. The newly founded city, ruled by the clan of Xie. The city of Xianle.

People mistake her for a beggar. Shove her to the ground and ignore her when she tries to ask, her voice rasping and difficult to understand, where the young lord might be.

Hudie begs, and no one listens.

People recognize a refugee from the kingdom of Wuyong when they see one. Cursed, bringing bad luck and disaster wherever they go—just like the god they once worshipped.

But eventually, after a week of begging in the streets—she sees him. The first prince of Xianle, Xie Bolin.

A young man now, recently come of age. Tall, strong—with long dark hair, and piercing blue eyes, a blade at his side.

Hudie watches the way the people of the city adore him, obeying his every word. Sees how thoughtful and fair he is—how decent and caring.

Just like his father.

He was the one who found her, in the end. Offering her a drink of water, some bread. “Are you alright, miss?” The young man murmurs, not unkindly, helping Hudie drink from his flask. “What brings you here?” Then, he notices the sword strapped to her back. “...Are you a Taoist?”

“...I’m looking for my son,” Hudie admits, her voice roughened and hoarse, face nearly permanently stained with soot and ash, along with the occasional burn scar. “I lost him—a very long time ago.”

Bolin frowns, helping her drink. “...Perhaps I can help? I know everyone here.” Life offers Hudie one last kindness—but it’s one that she cannot accept.

She already sees the way that the people on the street watch the prince. With admiration and respect, yes, but...

They seem frustrated by the fact that he’s even speaking to someone from Wuyong.

The only thing Hudie could do, by telling him now—would be to cause Bolin pain and suffering.

“...No,” she whispers, offering the prince a shaky smile, taking one last drink of water. “You’re kind, but he...isn’t here.”

Seeing him, her only child that grew into a man, is enough.

Knowing that he is safe, that he is loved, and he is happy...that is enough.

It has to be.

If Hudie stayed with him, now—it might bring her brief happiness, she knows it would. But it would only bring tragedy to Bolin.

And she loves her son so much more than she loves herself.

She leaves Xianle the very same day, Zhu Xin strapped to her back. And she goes to the only place that she can. The only place in the world that is left for her.

Slowly, Tonglu Hudie returns to the smoldering remains of Wuyong. Only ash now, far as the eye can see.

All she wanted, when she returned, was to find her son's bone ashes. But now, in this environment—that seems nearly impossible.

Hua Cheng watches the fallen queen search the ruins of her kingdom—constantly fighting hordes of demons, goblins, and the like.

She's relentless.

Hua Cheng cannot count how many demons are felled by the blade Zhu Xin. How many days she spends wandering the barren landscape, surviving only on roots and berries. Watches as she kneels in the remains of her garden, finding the only living thing that remains.

A lily seed.

Slowly, she tucks it back into the earth, burying it beneath the ashes—giving the plant a small drink of her water to help it establish. Using the last of what she has left to help it grow.

And then, ironically enough, a student fulfills her teacher's expectations.

BOOM!

When she opens her eyes again, it's before a shower of golden light and applause.

Kneeling in the middle of the heavens, watching as people cheer and clap for her.

Her, Tonglu Hudie, the fallen Queen of Wuyong, now ascended as a goddess.

The first and only Martial Goddess.

But when she looks around, taking in the sights around her—she knows.

Any one of these people could have saved her son. Could have protected her boy.

They simply chose not to.

Hua Cheng realizes, watching the scene—

This isn’t the same heavenly capital that he saw before.

Tonglu Hudie doesn’t take exactly the same path as her future student. She doesn’t take one look at the heavenly capital, then cast herself back down, no.

Before the blessing of Immortality can take hold of her, she unsheathes Zhu Xin.

The Queen of Wuyong doesn’t slit her own throat, or shatter her own sword with grief, no.

She plunges the blade into her own heart, with all of the heavens watching.

Tonglu Hudie always practiced as a cultivator—but she never wanted to be a goddess. Never desired to ascend.

All she wanted, in the end, was a peaceful, human life. One spent in the company of those that she loved.

When she wakes again, Zhu Xin is laying on the ground by her side, resting in the ashes. And it takes a moment for Tonglu to realize that she did not survive after all.

Her body is no more—but her soul has returned, taking the form of a savage ghost.

“…” Hudie looks up into the ash-covered sky, tears slipping down her cheeks.

Let me die.

Let me see my sons, let me die.

It's only then, that she realizes that someone is holding her.

The fallen Crown Prince of Wuyong. The prince born under a cursed star. Her husband, the exiled god, Jun Wu.

And before she can even recoil from him, he holds her tighter, whispering— "I found him."

Hudie freezes, eyes welling up with tears.

"I found San Lang, my love."

The ghost stumbles through the ashes, all while her husband—who, clearly, from Hua Cheng's vantage point, is deep in mourning for her —leads the way.

It wasn't until now, that the crimson ghost saw how deep and genuine the Crown Prince's love for his wife was. And now...

Watching Tonglu Hudie become this broken, shadow of a thing—watching her haunt the earth, unable to find peace—for the first time, Hua Cheng sees something else in Bai Wuxiang's eyes.

The occasional flash of madness. Of anger, hatred, and cruelty. "Here," the god whispers.

Hudie sinks to her knees, shoulders slumping as she stares at the object before her, gleaming as it pokes through the asses.

A small, silver hair pin.

'Everything dies, my love.'

She reaches with trembling fingers, pulling it out of the ashes.

Shaped like—like—

'Then I'll just become a butterfly!'

Her fingertips trace over the delicately shaped wings, tears pouring down her cheeks.

'They always come back.'

This world is cruel. It's hungry and stupid, and it takes without reason.

'And I'll always come back, too!'

Her eyes close.

This world is cruel, and it's hungry and it's stupid. It takes without reason. Devours beautiful, innocent things—simply because it can. Because it's too oblivious to know better.

It's a world of men. Selfish, stupid men.

This grief is different, almost frantic.

Help me.

Hudie doesn't feel like a mourning mother. She knows that pain well. it's all consuming, never ending weight. This—this feels different.

This feels like being haunted. Like being tortured. Like she's a small creature, being toyed with by a monstrous beast that won't let go.

She doesn't know who she's screaming to—what she's begging for. Maybe her son's return. Maybe to Rest In Peace, or just—oblivion.

Help me.

Help me, help me, help me.

Help me, help me, help, help, help, help, help, help, help, help, help, help, help, help, help, help me!!!!

She tears at her hair, screams and wails at the sky, and her pain reduces her into this inhuman thing. This unthinking, unspeaking mass of screams and tears, pounding her fists into the ground, desperate for it to end, for it to stop.

It's so much, she can't—she can't— It hurts

It hurts, it hurts, it hurts, it hurts, it hurts, it hurts...it hurts, it hurts, it hurts, it hurts, it hurts, it hurts, it hurts, it hurts, it hurts, it hurts, IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS!!!!

Now, it doesn't matter how long she screams, or how much she begs for relief. None will come. She's already dead. Her son is already gone. Everything—

Everything is gone, now. Only ashes remain.

Hua Cheng watches the look in Bai Wuxiang's eyes.

Slowly building hatred.

Watches as he stops viewing his wife, the mother of his children, as a forger of blades, but rather...

Hudie shudders, unable to breathe, unable to think coherently—when Jun Wu's hand lands on her shoulder.

"I know how it happened," the god murmurs— And the ghost freezes.

Slowly, her tears stopped, she turns her head to look up at Jun Wu, eyes wide, almost numb in their need to feel something other than pain. Anything, no matter how monstrous it's replacement might be.

"What?"

"The bridge," Jun Wu explains. "I know how it fell. I know why."

Hua Cheng watches the god tell her, watches as he spins a story of jealous, petty gods. Creatures that wanted more prayers and wealth for themselves.

Tells Hudie how they lied. How they told him they would give their spiritual power to the bridge when the time came.

But they lied, and they never did.

They lied, and Hudie's boy, her joy, the last good thing in this world—

Her San Lang died.

She clutches the butterfly hairpin in her hands, and she curses them. Bitterly, from the very depths of her heart, Hudie curses them.

"...We can make them pay," her husband offers. "For what they've done. But I..."

His hands land on her shoulders, squeezing gently.

"I need your help, my love."

Her body shakes with grief, breaths ragged—but still there's steel in them when she replies—

“Name it.”

Jun Wu no longer sees his wife as one that forges blades—but rather, he begins to see her as a weapon herself.

Tells her that they can bring the heavens itself to it’s knees—but that to do it, he’ll need the proper blades.

One by one, the former Queen of Wuyong forges them.

In the volcano that burned her kingdom to ash, she turns the mantle itself into a kiln, and with every swing of her hammer, she brings new creations to life.

But now, she isn’t only creating blades. Cursed tools and weapons of the like, no. Now, she forges monsters and demons.

Takes the rabid souls from the air around her, beating them down into something new. Something useful.

Bai Wuxiang may have burned the heavenly capital to ash, yes—but Tonglu became known as the executioner of the gods.

Clipping their wings, tearing their golden palaces down.

They whispered in fear of her kiln, the monsters that would burst free from it and tear at the world.

The Kingdom of Wuyong was slowly forgotten—and the only thing that was left behind, in the end, was the volcano that laid waste to it.

The Kiln of Monsters. Mount Tonglu.

The Queen of Wuyong died in the streets of the heavenly city, many years ago. She watched, later, when her husband abandoned her body at the foot of the kiln—

Mei Nianqing came for her.

She watched from the shadows as her lover mourned. Not like Bai Wuxiang had, before.

Mei Nianqing cradled her in his arms as he wept—but he made no promises of revenge. Made no efforts to explain how Hudie’s children had been taken, or why.

He only created a grave for her, keeping a portion of her ashes—burying the rest. And he made a promise.

That he would protect their son, Bolin. Even if the boy could never know the truth. Hudie stood in the shadows, and she ached to go to him, to thank him.

Oh, in that moment—she could have rested in peace.

But Bai Wuxiang's words were already so deeply ingrained in her heart.

That the heavens were liars, thieves, and monsters. That their jealousy and hatred of her husband's success had led them to tear him down.

And with them, her boy.

Her beautiful, perfect boy.

Her San Lang.

Mei Nianqing called her name, and she could not answer.

Tonglu Hudie was dead. She died in the fields of Wuyong. Burned with her son, even if the streets of heaven would be stained by her blood a year later.

Now, all that remained was the savage ghost, the armorer of hell, Goddess of Mount Tonglu—

Zhao Beitong.

Named for the heavenly dynasty she toppled. For the city streets she stained red with her own blood, then the blood of the gods themselves.

She took her revenge, and used that anger. Tried to cram it into the aching gap that was left inside of her.

The part of her that was still a mother, desperately mourning her children. But nothing could ever seem to fill it.

There were moments of kindness that were offered to her, over and over again. Moments that Hua Cheng knows, watching the story unfold, would have saved Xie Lian.

He followed such a similar path, for a time—as a tool for the same demon. But all he needed was one person to show kindness. One person to prove that the world was capable of goodness.

But there was not enough kindness in the world to save Zhao Beitong.

And then, she learned the truth.

In the final days of the heavens, from the mouth of the final heavenly official.

Zhu Xin drags across the ground from one of her hands—and her hammer from the other. Eyes glowing red in the dark, nails like talons.

The former wind master cries.

“I-I’m sorry!” He weeps, scrambling backwards on the ground, his face streaked with blood. “We—We tried to brig you into the ranks, why are you—?!”

He howls with pain when her hammer slams into his torso, crushing several of his ribs, her face streaked with his blood.

“You think that makes a difference to me?” She questions, her voice cold—nearly unrecognizable from the way it was before “My children were already dead.” She raises the hammer again, “WHAT GOOD DOES YOUR ACCEPTANCE DO ME NOW?!”

“We—we should have helped! I-I know that now!”

The Wind Master sobs.

Maybe she’ll turn him into twin blades, the spinning sort. Or a fan, even. She might like that.

As she brings down the hammer again, he screams—

“WE SHOULD HAVE AGREED TO HELP, I’M SORRY!”

The rest of his ribs collapse with a sick crunch—but she stops.

“...You did agree,” she corrects him flatly. “You all agreed, and then you turned your backs on us.”

The Wind Master shakes his head vehemently, blood streaming down his chin. “No!” He croaks, his breaths coming in shattering wheezes, bloody foam spewing from his lips.

“H-How could we have answered so many prayers, if we were all helping him?! We— Wuyong was just one kingdom in the world, how could we abandon the rest of it to save them? We—we told him no!”

He coughs raggedly, broken bones grating together. “But—But we were WRONG, please—I—!”

Zhao Beitong’s fingers tremble as she stares down at him, trying to—Trying to understand.

She knows, logically, that the Wind Master cannot recover from his injuries. That a dying man has no reason to lie.

She remembers how insistent she was, when he asked about the bridge. That he could not do such a thing alone. That even to try was madness.

She remembers the doubt she felt, when he secluded himself. The same doubt that made her try to flee that day, with San Lang in tow.

And Zhao Beitong knows something else. Something in her soul.

San Lang would not have disobeyed her, in a moment like that. He would have waited for her at the gate, just as his mother asked. Not because he didn’t want to help—but because he wouldn’t risk being separated from her.

Now, she thinks back on that moment. That last day.

Seeing him on the bridge, with a palace guard holding his arm. Likely leading him over. She gave no such orders for anyone to take her son to the bridge—and there would be only one other being with the power to give such a command.

And oh, she can imagine what he was thinking.

That people would trust the bridge, if they saw the prince crossing it. Wouldn’t doubt it, if Jun Wu was willing to risk his own son.

Because what kind of father would risk his child’s life on ego alone? What kind of man would allow his own arrogance to blind him to the risk?

He probably did blame the heavenly officials. Probably meant every word, when he told his wife that it was their fault. That they did this.

But Jun Wu was the one who lied. He was the one who put their son on the bridge that day.

Her hammer falls to the ground with a clatter.

She sits, watching as the Wind Master takes his last breaths. The last heavenly official. The last creature that remains of this place—and she waits.

Waits, until he comes, surveying the destruction that they have wrought with—

With satisfaction.

“San Lang would have been—”

He falls silent, looking down at the blade sprouting from his chest. Shining black steel. Forged to avenge his own child.

The blade Zhu Xin.

When he looks up at his wife, his expression is one of utter shock. “You...You—!” The blade is yanked from his chest without mercy.

Only to be returned once again, with an even more vicious blow.

“You don’t get to say his name.” She whispers, hacking her head, pulling the blade from his chest again, watching as Bai Wuxiang drops to his knees, gasping from the pain. “Not to me. Not ever again.”

Her husband—her first student, the sweet, cocky young man she fell in love with, all those years ago, stares up at her, his lips parted with shock. “You...” he whispers, eyes narrowing. “Even you?”

Zhu Xin trembles in her hold, but Zhao Beitong doesn’t falter. “Even me.”

“Even when everyone else burned my temples, and prayed to others, you...” Bai Wuxiang parries her third attack, but is too wounded to deflect her fourth.

She knows every gap in his armor, after all. She was the one who forged it. “...You never turned against me. And now—!”

“It wasn’t that I prayed to someone else, Jun Wu.” His wife whispers, yanking the blade out for the third time, his blood spattering across the ground. “I stopped praying to anyone, long ago.”

She stopped praying when she realized no one would answer. That no one could.

“And now, there’s only one god left that’s responsible for the death of my son,” She continues, hitting him again, and again, and again. “You’ll be patient with me, won’t you? You said I could avenge him, didn’t you?!”

She pierces him over and over again.

Once for every layer of hatred that she forged into the blade.

Once, twice, three times. A dozen times.

A hundred times.

Zhao Beitong forged countless blades and spiritual devices over the course of her existence. So many demons, she eventually lost count.

Bai Wuxiang, the White Clothed Calamity, was the first monster that she ever created without purpose. Without intending to.

When she’s finished, she stops, breathing hard—her cheeks streaked with blood and smoke as she stares down at the man beneath her.

The prince who offered her the entire world. And in many ways—he gave it to her.

And now, he’s just a mass of blood on the ground, bleeding and broken—just like anything else.

Zhao Beitong kneels before him, whispering by his ear—

“You aren’t better than anyone.”

Even through the pain, his eyes widen slightly.

“I want you to know that.” Zhao Beitong continues, her eyes narrowed. “You are selfish, and arrogant, and greedy. And now—look at you.”

Look at his broken, trembling body.

“You are just as broken, and frightened as anyone else.”

Slowly, she rises to her feet—hair swaying in the breeze, wearing silk, bloodstained robes. “Everyone has left you, and you blame the world.

Scream and cry about how unfair it is.”

She leaves the sword Zhu Xin buried in his chest, stabbing deep into the earth beneath him.

“They left you because you weren’t worth following any longer.” She turns her back on him. “Everything you have done—you did it to yourself.”

And the same could be said for her—but she’s already living her own punishment. Desperate for it to end.

That’s where she leaves him.

Bleeding to death in the streets of the former heavenly capital as it burns. The last god, bleeding and burning with the heavens he was so desperate to reach.

She returns to the ashes of the home she once knew—and when she arrives, Zhao Beitong sees—

The lily seed…

The one she planted just before she ascended… It’s bloomed into a small field of white flowers.

She kneels among them, holding the pin in her hair. Mourning her old life. Her children. The man she loved.

And eventually, she finds herself surrounded by a pale, ethereal glow. Butterflies.

Not the same species as the sort that once bred in these lands, no. Those are long dead.

These butterflies flutter around her—landing on her head, her shoulders, her hands.

Made from pure spiritual power itself.

There are many different ways to forge a weapon.

Through blood, sacrifice, and death. Acts of great selflessness—or powerful, ancient curses.

How do you forge wraith butterflies?

How, you ask?

To manipulate pure spiritual power—you must understand it for what it is.

Cultivators don't. Gods never did, and nor do ghosts.

Spiritual Power isn't any different from any other form of energy that passes through the natural cycles of life and death.

Heat forms in the hearts of stars like their sun, shining down upon them—feeding the plants, which pass onto animals, then to humans—who all, in turn, decay and rot into plants once again.

Spiritual power is forged in the golden core of one's soul, cultivator or not.

It can be passed on through prayers or cultivation—or even resentment. Building up in the world around them. It sends gods to the heavens above, who take that energy and shine it back down with blessings and miracles for those who pray to them.

It can be carried in resentment when those humans become ghosts, still pouring that energy back into the cycle through curses and destruction.

Good or bad, it's all the same cycle. Different streams, all flowing in the same circular current.

And, eventually, those souls pass.

They enter the cycle once more—exploding across the universe in countless little supernovas, reincarnating into new stars. New golden cores, creating spiritual energy once more.

It took her a long time to understand that. Such a long time, to understand that dead isn't gone.

That somewhere out there, in the depths of the universe, is still her San Lang. Just a different star, now. She doesn't know where, or when—wouldn't now his face or voice, if she ever saw him again.

But somewhere, in this great, unforgiving void—he's there. You want know how to forge wraith butterflies?

You learn that ghosts are just spirit fires given shape. That the flames one bursts into upon death are simply the exposed edges of a soul.

And once you understand the shape of your soul, you can mold it. Forge it into new forms.

But to her, a soul is a wish. A hope. A constantly changing, living thing—being reshaped over and over again, in a never ending cycle of change.

A soul is a butterfly.

She sits among those butterflies now, the ever growing number, more and more forming as her core burns on.

Hua Cheng watches her, the Queen of the Ashes, her kiln slowly cooling and going dark, waiting for her soul to spark out. To explode into supernova, to reform.

Watches as Zhao Beitong desperately prays to Rest In Peace. But she goes on, and on, and on.

Across the world, an ill experienced smith tries to reforge himself. To break himself apart, and become something new.

But all he can do is split himself in two.

Hua Cheng watches, his eyes widening, as a bleeding, abandoned god takes on two forms.

A crying, white clothed heavenly calamity. Wearing his white robes, donning a new mask—the white, twisted visage that has long haunted Hua Cheng's nightmares.

And a smiling, handsome young prince.

Hua Cheng watches, and he understands. Watches the ascension of a new emperor.

The strongest martial god of their time, Jun Wu.

Unable to resign himself to the hideous, broken layers of himself that his wife peeled back with her final words to him. When he couldn't resolve the two, he simply...shed that half of himself. Denied it. Refused to look at it.

And then, people were worshipping him again. Praising him again. Once again, the world was exactly as it was supposed to be.

Except this time, the Heavenly Emperor was not a young prince with nothing to hide, nothing to fear.

Now, he had secrets.

Secrets to hide and keep.

And there’s a price, of course, when you split your soul in two.

Rising tension. Pressure that needs to be released, over and over again. If he was simply going to outpour that resentment onto the world, well. He’d be found out.

Instead, he makes good use of it.

Of all of the things Jun Wu took credit for over the years—all of her accomplishments, there is one that he lays at her feet, allows his wife to take all of the rewards for.

Zhao Beitong is blamed for the downfall of the last heavenly dynasty. A new generation of gods hunt her.

Curse her.

Call her the world’s first calamity.

Jun Wu takes the countless tools she forged for him through the years. His wars. His ascension. His downfall. His revenge.

And he uses them to arm his new soldiers, turning them against her. But none of them can kill her.

Zhao Beitong already killed her mortal body with a blade of her own creation. Her own weapons can’t hurt her now. Not anymore.

No matter how badly she wants them to. No matter how desperate she is for her suffering to end—it never does.

Her soul, for some reason, won’t let go.

She sits in the memory, on the edge of the kiln, watching the approaching army of heaven from the distance, and she whispers something—to herself, but Hua Cheng hears it anyway.

“I was also born under the star of solitude, you know.” Her luck could have been good, or bad.

Heavily sensitive to different sources of influence, varying between extremes. But in the end, it was always down to her own choices.

When Tonglu Hudie was a young girl, and the world was so wide, so open—two very different paths opened before her.

Each offered by two very different young men.

One built her a garden of butterflies. A place where they could bring their children.

God, in every day that has passed since then, Zhao Beitong has ached with regret. Wished she could have chosen that life. To go back.

No paths are set in stone in this life. Not when you're young. But as you grow older, you bind yourself to the choices you make. You are forced to live with your own mistakes.

Now, Zhao Beitong has become a butterfly, pinned inside a glass box. Watching, as Jun Wu seals her in.

She isn't the warrior she once was. Isn't the savage ghost that tore the heavens to pieces out of revenge.

It's been centuries—and she's old. She's tired. She wants to go. Wants —

She wants to Rest In Peace.

When her husband comes for her, she hopes he means to give her that.

Instead, with a smiling voice that tells her this is mercy, he's giving her new life, new purpose—

The man she gave her life to curses her.

Her, the Guoshi who taught him how to fight.

Her, the smith that forged the blades he used to ascend. Her, the wife who led his country.

Her, the mother of his children.

Her, the weapon used to enact his revenge.

He curses her. Binds her to the fields and hills of the mountain that she once called home. Strips her of the name she was born with, rather than the titles that he gave her.

When they were young, she often felt as though she couldn't speak against him. There were these invisible rules of society. Things that you could and could not do, and all of them bound her to silence.

Now, the curse forbids her from revealing to the world what he truly is.

In the same way that women like her are always punished for the secrets of the men that pin them down. Always forced to keep them.

She watches the the world, from the small bounds of her cage. She rages. She aches. She births many half formed monsters, sending them out.

Hoping that they'll tell the world the truth. That at the very least, if no one will bring Jun Wu down—someone will come to free her, to slay her. But...

They leave, and any memories of her husband blur. The truth always disappears. One, however, shines above the rest.

Not a mindless beast, no. A beautiful young ghost, with eyes like fire and hair like snow.

A calamity. One that could grow into a being just as powerful as her, one day. One that could set her free. One that could destroy the man that trapped her here.

But she knows...

When he leaves, he'll forget. He'll unleash himself upon the world, just like every other creation she's made for that man before now. He'll level cities. Murder children. Bring so much suffering.

And Zhao Beitong—she won't. She refuses.

She names him Zhang Wei.

After her first born.

He was the bastard son of a king who became a tyrant, executed to spare his family from the wrath of the people once their dynasty was toppled.

Now, she cradles him in her arms, like the mother he can no longer remember. Sings him stolen lullabies.

His eyes are dazed by the beauty of the wraith butterflies surrounding him, and he is at peace.

He is safe. He is loved.

That's when she clips the newborn dragon's wings, and swallows him whole.

She weeps after. Mourns him all over again. Until the valleys flood with her tears

Three centuries later, it happens again.

Another perfectly formed spirit—this one with eyes like the leaves on the trees at the very end of spring, and hair that curls and tangles in every direction.

Another calamity, capable of saving the world—or bringing it to ruin.

He was born in the kingdoms of the north to a quiet, loving home. Then, when the young boy showed potential as a cultivator, he was stolen away. Placed in chains, forced to fight in a far of kingdom, for people he did not know—until eventually, the young man died.

Cast aside and left to rot, like a hound that could no longer hunt. She names him Bolin, after her second born.

Watches him run and laugh, relishing in his newborn freedom—and she promises him, he will never have to fight someone else's wars again.

Zhao Beitong sees to that.

Time passes. It fades and wanes. Eventually, she begins to wonder if the age of calamities has passed. If now, her soul will slowly begin to fade away—and finally, she can re-enter that cycle once more.

But the gates of Tonglu rattle open once more, stronger than ever before.

And when she sees a young, crimson ghost—falling back down from heaven like a cursed falling star, she knows.

That the cycle she is trapped in is not one that can be broken. It will repeat—over and over again.

She knows, the moment Hua Cheng stands before her, how it will end.

When she opens her eyes, now at the end of her chain of memories, she expects to find herself standing in the center of the kiln—and for a new ghost king to stand before her, ready for the slaughter.

But she isn't.

Zhao Beitong slowly turns her head, glancing around.

She isn't trapped in, surrounded by walls of white marble.

There's no surrounding, all encompassing heat.

No, there's just...

Her heart beats unsteadily in her chest for the first time in a thousand years. A garden.

With flowers of every color—but so many blues and purples.

What...?

Slowly, she kneels down, reaching out with trembling fingers, taking in the sight of the blooms beneath her fingers. How soft and warm the petals feel beneath her fingertips.

Not a dream. Not a memory. This is something different, it's...

There were so many things she forgot over the years. So gradually, she never even realized it.

Hudie couldn't remember the way the wind felt on her cheeks anymore. How the air tasted, immediately after the rain.

Forgot the fresh smells of the forest. Slightly wild—but clean.

Hudie forgot how moonlight is something you can feel against your skin, shining down on you through the night.

She tilts her head back with a smile, her face young—unlined by years of torment and grief.

And above—she realizes—

Hudie forgot what real butterflies looked like.

How many different colors they could be. Some with broken, fractured wings—and yet, every single one of them is perfect.

It’s…this is…

She breathes in the air, feels the wind on her face, heart pounding, trying so very hard to remember more, to feel more—

“Mama!”

Her entire body freezes, eyes widening—and for the first time in so, so long, she feels —feels—

At first, she chokes the name out under her breath, but when she tries again, it’s clear —desperation in every syllable.

“S-San Lang?!”

She whips her head around, and— There he is.

Small and gangly, a braid of messy dark hair tucked over his shoulder in a loose braid. Amber eyes sparkling up at her with mischief, a slightly sharpened canine poking through the right corner of his mouth.

He takes a step forward, arms clasped behind him, shoulders thrown back

Even now, playfully mimicking his mother’s posture, but—when he smiles, it aches with affection.

Love—and so much sadness.

“I came home,” he murmurs, staring up at her. “Like I said I would.”

After so long of feeling nothing but pain and rage—

Hudie’s eyes flood with tears.

“S-San Lang—” She sobs, stumbling forward, sweeping the little boy up into her arms, shoulders shaking as she clutches him to her, kissing his head, his hair, his nose, every part of him that she can reach. “Oh, San Lang, I—I love you, I’m—I’m so sorry, I —!”

The little boy wraps his arms around her neck in return, hugging her tight. “I love you too,” he whispers as his mother weeps against his hair. His voice is soft—lacking the exuberance she remembers. The mischievous playfulness. And, after a moment—

“…I’m sorry.”

Hudie shakes her head, arms trembling as she holds him close, hands rubbing his back, pressing her cheek against his hair. “N-No, what should you—what should you ever be sorry for, my love?”

“...I wasn’t a good son,” he whispers, his tone unreadable. “I always made trouble.”

His mother lets out a choked laugh, shaking her head. “Y-you were perfect,” she reassures him, cradling the boy close in her arms. “It—It was the best trouble of my life, I promise.”

He doesn’t speak again, pressing his cheek against her chest—and she holds him tighter, weeping.

Around her, the clearing is full. Mei Nianqing stands behind her, helping little Bolin stretch up on his toes, trying his very hardest to catch butterflies.

There’s a young man with dark hair, leaning against a tree, playing a small hand flute, watching his family happily.

Hudie doesn’t know how, but she knows—it’s the youth Zhang Wei would have grown into, had his soul not been stolen away.

Her family is here.

She closes her eyes, letting out shaky breaths, clutching San Lang against her.

Her family is here.

Her children—they’re here.

“I’m sorry,” San Lang repeats again, hugging her tighter, his eyes squeezing shut— and again, Hudie reassures him that there’s nothing to forgive.

“I’m sorry,” he won’t stop saying it, trembling in her arms, tears pouring down his cheeks.

“Mom—I’m sorry!”

Her mind is clouded.

Confused.

Because why? What on earth should he ever be sorry for?

Just as she's about to pull back and ask him, reassure him, tell him that everything's alright, that she's hear now, and there's no need between them to ever say sorry—

There's pain. Stabbing, sharp pain.

In the side of her neck, like she's being ripped apart, blood gushing down over her shoulder, down the side of her robes.

Around her, her family doesn't react. There's still happy giggling—the gentle notes of a flute, playing the sweetest song she's ever heard.

And more pain.

When Hudie looks down, her chest heaving with sharp, agonized gasps—

San Lang stares up at her, blood dripping from his jaws, eyes burning like twin cursed stars.

And he whispers again, "I'm sorry." Oh.

Hudie clutches the side of her neck. "I'm sorry, Mom, I-I'm sorry."

Somewhere, beyond the walls of this illusion, she can hear the sounds of something ripping apart. A small creature, slowly being devoured by the jaws of a newly formed beast.

Isn't someone going to stop it? She— Oh.

Hudie's eyes go half-lidded.

That's her.

"I'm sorry."

She's being devoured.

"..." Her fingers tighten around the side of her neck, looking around the clearing at the soft, domestic scene before her.

It's peaceful here. It doesn't hurt.

"...Can I stay here?" She whispers.

The little boy stares up at her, expression unreadable.

"Yes," he replies, with lips stained by the blood of his own mother. "I'll keep you here, until the end."

The illusion flickers, for just a moment.

"Until I can set you free."

She's laying on the floor of her kiln, staring at the endless cavern overhead. Watching.

Hoards of silver wraith butterflies, flighting another ethereal beast—also formed out of spiritual power.

This time, a dragon—spewing flames of pure energy itself. It's...

There's a faint smile on her face, as her third son, her favorite child, cradles her in his arms.

"You learned how to do it," she whispers, lips trembling as her form starts to fade, bit by bit. Too weak, now, to keep its shape—too much of her spiritual power has been devoured.

It's beautiful.

And Zhao Beitong is so, so proud.

Birth is always a terrifying process.

The action of a host being ripped apart in order to bring in new life. An inherently violent cycle—but you never fear the creature that will spring forth.

Because it is yours, and it is part of you.

A new ghost king stares down at her, a single tear dripping down his cheek.

The blood of the mother who forged him staining his lips.

"I'm sorry," he breathes, watching her slowly fade away. "I'm so sorry."

Zhao Beitong closes her eyes with a tired smile, shaking her head.

"You aren't...supposed to apologize when you win, boy."

But this doesn't feel like winning. This feels like losing something that he never truly had.

“Don’t…” Her eyes blink once, before slipping shut one final time. “Don’t disappoint me, San Lang.”

Hudie has never been afraid of dying, or moving on.

There is no such thing as true destruction. Only changing into something new. When she fades away, there’s a smile on her face.

A soul is a wish. Something that drives you. That makes you hold on, often against all reason.

Souls can grow, they can break—and they can change.

“I won’t,” Hua Cheng whispers, a solemn oath, his head bowed.

If you asked Hudie—a soul is a butterfly.

His arms are empty—and when the Goddess of the Kiln opens her eyes again, she sees the sky.

Hears laughing, and the notes of a flute. Holds her youngest child close.

“San Lang,” she whispers, a true smile on her face, and finally, for the first time in so long—

Nothing hurts.

There’s no pain.

No loss, no fear, no wars.

Just her family.

And Tonglu Hudie never has to leave again.

Hua Cheng stands in the Kiln—alone.

Holding a butterfly.

It stands between his fingertips delicately—the last of the horde wielded but the Goddess of the Kiln.

Wings gently flapping, staring up at him, as if waiting.

For the first time in his life—Hua Cheng has something to mourn other than himself. And no one mourns like a ghost.

Hua Cheng bows his head—and it flies away.

He watches as it drifts across the cavern, towards the slowly opening doors of the kiln.

It drifts through the gates, just as the sun begins to rise over the horizon of the Kingdom of Wuyong for the first time in years.

The Dragon he crafted slowly sinks back down, disappearing back into his form. And with it, comes power.

So much power, that the newly formed ghost king is startled by it—thrumming in every inch of his body. Power, resentment, and...

Warmth.

Hua Cheng has only ever knelt before one man. Prayed to one god. There is only one that he would ever allow to chain him down—for the very reason that he never would.

But now, he bows—his hands clasped before him in a gesture of deep respect.

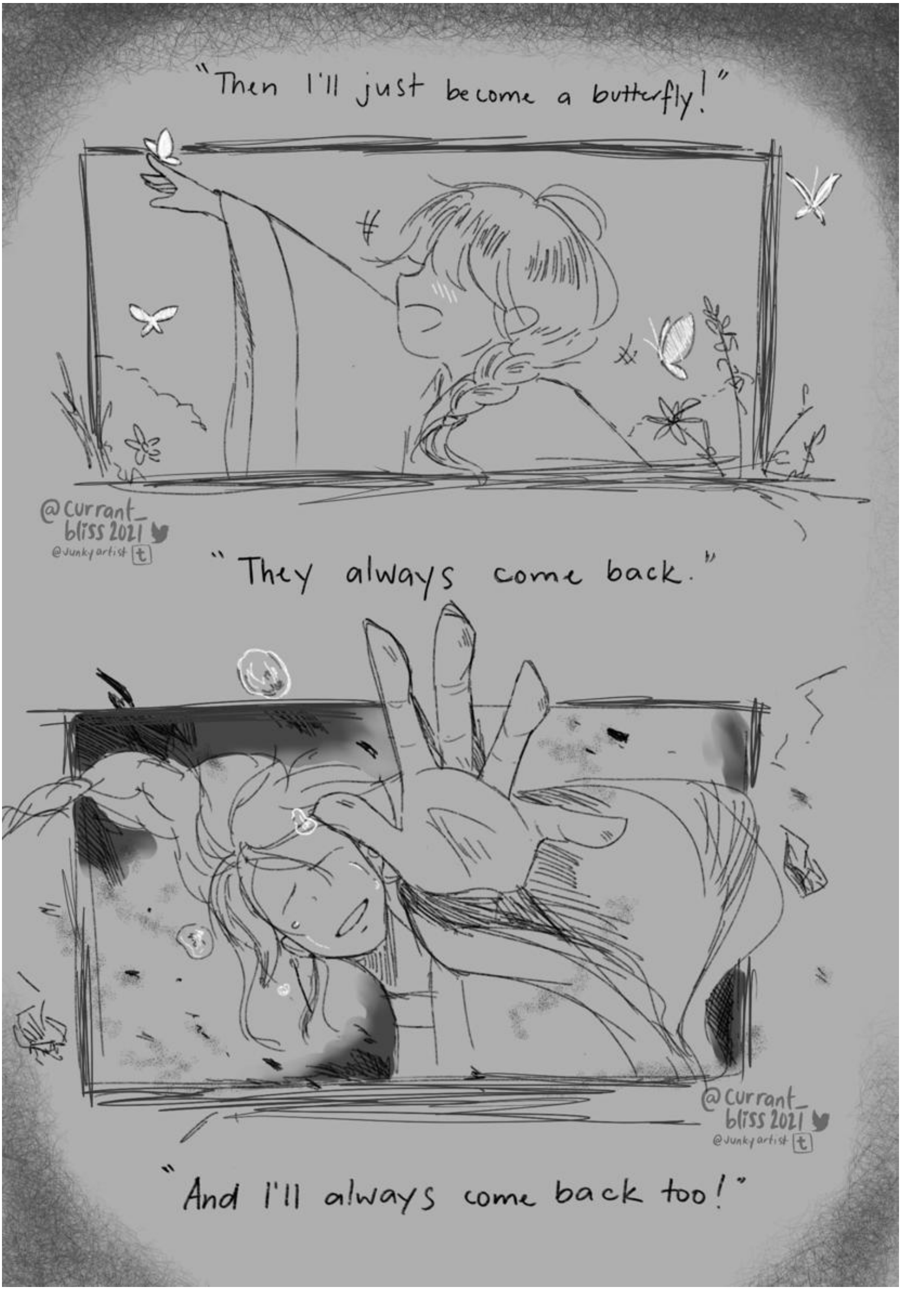
“...Thank you, Guoshi Tonglu.”

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY:

[image]

(Zhao Beitong and San Lang)

CREDIT: LACE, support the artwork HERE



"Then I'll just become a butterfly!"
@currant_bliss 2021
@junkyartist
"They always come back."
@currant_bliss 2021
@junkyartist
"And I'll always come back too!"

(The Death of San Lang)

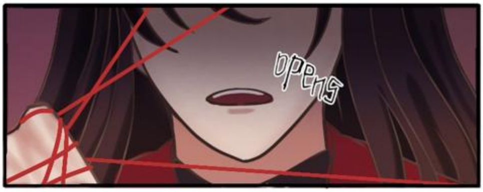
CREDIT: KAT, support the artwork HERE

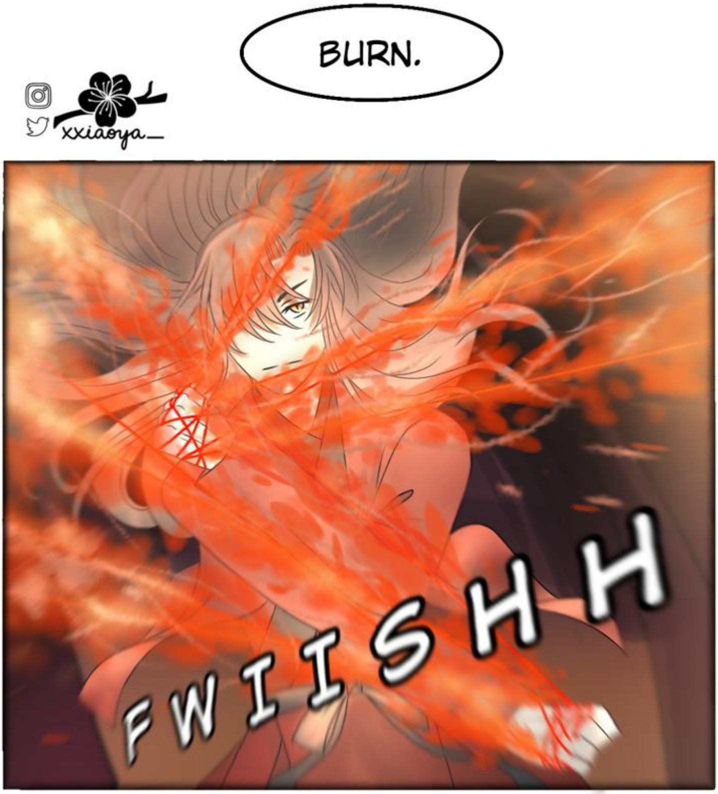
[image]

CREDIT: MYSTERYSEONG, support the artwork HERE

[image]

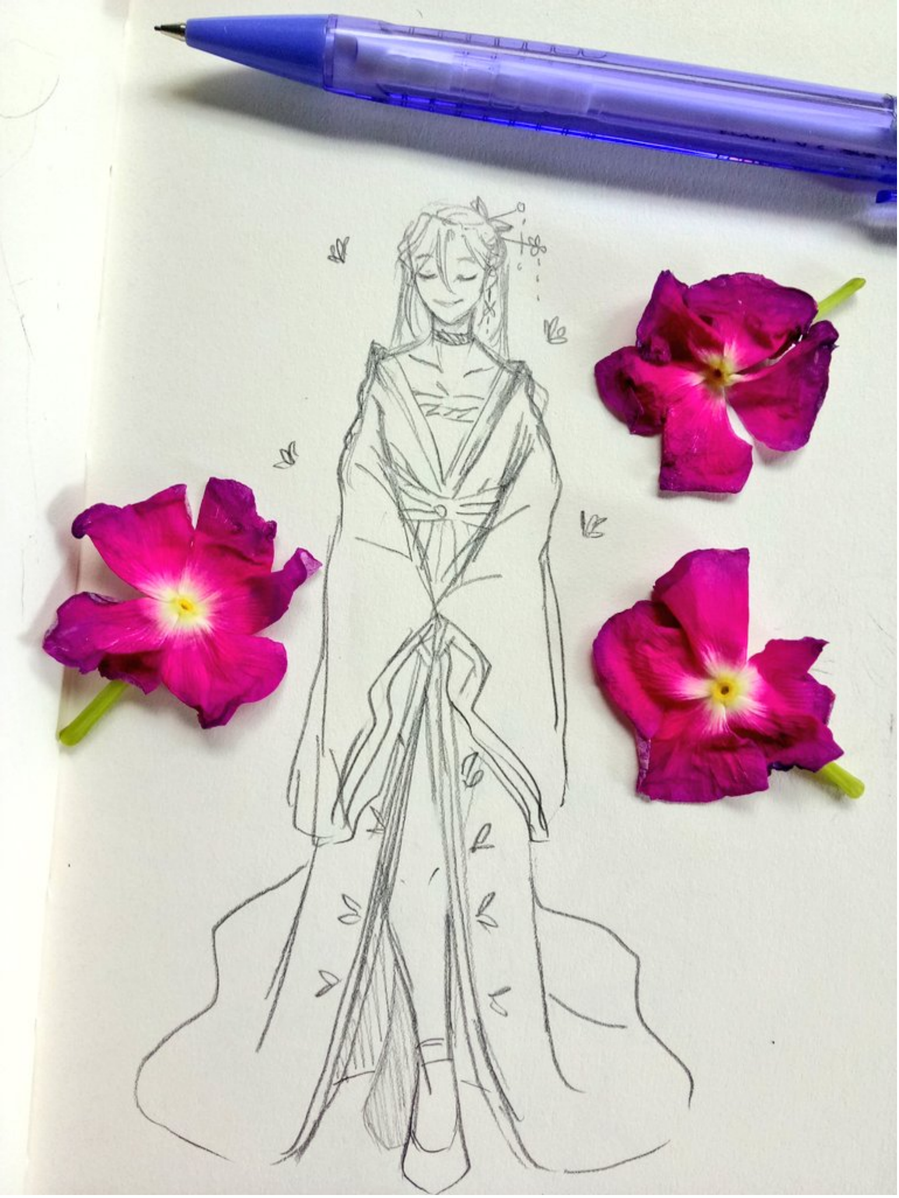
CREDIT: Envy, support the artwork HERE





BURN.
xxiaoya_
FWIISHH

CREDIT: Pri, support the artwork HERE



CREDIT: Pri, support the artwork HERE

Chapter End Notes

Thank you so much to Pri, Kat, Lace, Seong and Envy for allowing me to share their beautiful work, and for creating it to begin with! I'm so, so grateful!

xoxo, Evie!

Metamorphosis

Chapter Summary

When he leaves his place, he'll forget.

He'll keep his memories of Hudie—but he'll forget the man who cursed her.

He'll forget the mirror image of Bai Wuxiang, the author of this horrible, sick variation of a fairytale—

The Heavenly Emperor Jun Wu.

Chapter Notes

You can find me on twitter and keep up with current updates of the story HERE

This story also has some spotify playlists for those who want some fun listening while reading!

No Paths Are Bound: The Playlist
Zhao Beitong's Playlist
The Wu Ming Playlist

See the end of the chapter for more notes

When he lifts his head, he turns away from the door—not exiting the Kiln immediately, no.

Before he does, there is one lesson he wants to make sure he doesn't forget—curse or not.

Deep in the depths of the caverns beneath the mountain, the Ghost King finds something.

Long since abandoned and forgotten.

A hammer, stained with blood and soot, reeking with resentment and power.

Hua Cheng lifts the spiritual tool between his fingers, glancing down at the scimitar, hanging by his waist—

When he smiles, E-Ming trembles with nervous energy.

He returns to the main chamber of the kiln, the blade E-Ming in one hand, the hammer of Guoshi Tonglu in the other. He lifts his scimitar in the air, willing it to hover in front of him at waist height, gripping the hammer with both hands.

When he leaves his place, he'll forget.

He'll keep his memories of Hudie—but he'll forget the man who cursed her.

He'll forget the mirror image of Bai Wuxiang, the author of this horrible, sick variation of a fairytale—

The Heavenly Emperor Jun Wu.

He looks up at the walls of the kiln, drumming his fingers against the handle of the hammer, his eyes flashing red, like the flames of damnation itself, whispering—

"Burn."

Upon his command, like a bloodstained inheritance, the fires of Mount Tonglu spark to life.

CLANG!

With each swing of the hammer, he embeds another layer of the Kiln's spiritual power into E-Ming, making the blade another measure stronger than it was before.

CLANG!

The newly formed muscles in his arms tends with the effort, straining against his sleeves, the heat scorching

CLANG!

With each new layer, he adds memory, violence, and power. Once, twice, three times. A dozen times.

A hundred times over.

CLANG!

When Hua Cheng leaves this place, he will forget, yes. But E-Ming won't.

And spiritual tools, as Hua Cheng's Guoshi taught him...

...They're what you make of them.

By the time he's finished, the spiritual weapon that sits in his hand is a far cry from it's former self.

Longer—wickedly sharp, with a reformed hilt. Absolutely radiating bloodthirst and menace.

And, etched into it's blade...

Are butterflies.

After two years, the kiln of Mount Tonglu reopens.

A small group of survivors sit in the shadow of the mountain, having developed awareness of their situation, but unsure of where to go.

So, they waited.

For two years, they waited.

When the doors screech open, they jump.

"...Bao?" Shuo mumbles, holding the little toddler in his arms closer, watching the mountain gates with wariness. "...What's that?"

The eldest ghost frowns—barely more than a small child himself, but always trying to be brave. "I don't know, but everyone watch out—"

Clink!

They all stop, staring with wonder at the sound of what sounds like a small bell, tinkling softly in the night.

Yanlin clutches her stuffed rabbit, whipping her head all around, mumbling prayers under her breath. To the only god that's ever answered her, to—

There's light.

Soft, ethereal light, floating in front of her face—even as the sun, the first sunrise they've had in years, is slowly setting back over the horizon.

A butterfly, drifting through the twilight.

The little ghost watches with wonder, trying to reach out and catch it, but…

It slips away.

All of the children turn back towards the mountain then, just in time to see a figure slowly descending the slope.

Dressed in crimson robes, with black trousers and fine, leather boots—silver chains and bells attached to them, tinkling softly with each step.

Impossibly tall and broad, with silver vambraces over his forearms, and matching finery around his neck—all etched with the same silver butterflies as the one the little girl saw, just now.

A black patch covering one eye, and a scimitar at his waist—curved, and wickedly sharp.

It's a sight that will strike terror into the hearts of men for centuries to come. But in this moment, it makes the little ghost smile, throwing her hands up with excitement.

"HUA CHENGZHU!" She cries, jumping. "It's Hua Chengzhu!"

"Gege!" Shuo gasps, leaping to his feet.

The children rush to the new Ghost King's side when he reaches the foot of the mountain, jumping with excitement around him, asking a thousand questions,

"Where did you go for so long?!"

"We tried to leave, but we don't know the way!"

"What are you gonna—?"

Shuo falls silent when a hand lands on top of his head, gently ruffling his hair—and that voice is there again, the same one as he remembers, but…

Deeper than before. Ringing with an authority that the young man has never heard before.

"Don't be afraid."

He looks at the group of children around him, a soft smile on his face. A newfound appreciation, now, for how precious little ones can be.

"I know the way."

Yanlin watches, her head tilting to the side with curiosity as the Ghost King reaches behind his back, offering…

A lantern. A small, red lantern, glowing softly against the night.

She takes it between her hands, looking up at Hua Cheng with wide, curious eyes. "… Okay," she whispers, falling into step behind him.

They all do, a line of red lanterns, slowly drifting through the night.

CLACK!

"…Oh for the love of the gods, I'm not letting you roll again." There's a groan, and the sound of pleading—

"C'mon! I'm just having a bad go of it today, let me give 'em an extra shake, it won't be so bad!"

"How many extra shakes have I given you at this point?!"

Fai frowns, puffing his cheeks out. "I would do it if it was you, Xiang! Cut me a break!"

His friend throws his hands up, nearly tipping backwards from his seat at the bench. "You think I haven't?! Have you LOOKED AROUND BUDDY?" He waves his arms at the chamber around them.

"I have given you so many breaks, that the ghost fire population has taken a SIGNIFICANT HIT around here! You know what happens if we run out?!"

They both gulp.

"…We could always try doing what the kid did," Fai mumbles, scratching his chin.

"Betting our entire souls? HA!"

Xiang shakes his head, the loose vertebrae in his neck rattling as he does so. "You first!"

"…" Fai looks down at the dice, taking a deep breath, "Here goes—!"

He gets tackled to the ground before he can actually throw, his friend snatching the dice from him.

“What are YOU THINKING, YOU MORON?!” Xiang wails, practically throttling him. “YOU HAVE HORRIBLE LUCK!”

Fai nods miserably, even as his head is flailing around under Xiang’s attack.

“YOU’RE JUST GONNA LEAVE ME HERE ALONE!? YOU KNOW I CAN’T STAND BEING LEFT WITH MY THOUGHTS!” Xiang cries.

“You’ve always been a sensitive soul, I know—”

“I’m not SENSITIVE!” Xiang sobs, sitting back and wiping his nose, dust falling from his eyes and nose instead of tears and snot. “I-I’m just a social guy, that’s all!”

“I know, Xiang!”

“A talker! Life of the party!”

“I know—!”

SCREEEECH!

They both stop, Fai patting Xiang’s arms in apology, Xiang strangling him, when they hear the sound of a door.

The same sound they heard a little over ten years ago, on the dot.

“...Is fighting not allowed?” Fai whispers nervously.

“They never said anything about that. Are we gonna get in trouble?!”

It’s not like there’s a rule book to eternal purgatory. That wouldn’t be fair!

After a pause, Xiang lets him go, leaping back with his hands thrown up. “He STARTED IT!”

“XIANG?!”

“I’m sorry, but YOU DID!”

They’re both scrambling and kowtowing, ready to apologize to the higher powers that be, to beg for their immortal souls, all of that—but then, the figure that steps through the door is…

A little girl, her hair pulled up into buns on either side of her head.

A stuffed rabbit in one hand, and a small red lantern in the other.

Yanlin tilts her head to the side, slowly examining the two men. "…I thought dumb people didn't go to heaven," she mutters, sniffing with distaste.

Xiang GAWKS, scrambling to his feet, "WHO ARE YOU CALLIN—?!"

He's in the middle of shaking his fist when he sees more red lanterns filtering in through the doorway, his eyes widening with shock.

Almost seventy children, each holding their own piece of light. And now, bringing up the career, is a familiar face.

"…Hua Cheng?!"

Xiang stops, his jaw dropping. "What are you doing back here?!"

"What happened to your eye?!" Fai questions, his own widening with concern. "Did you—?" He stops, eyeing the small toddler that the ghost is carrying on his hip. "… Make poor life choices?"

Shuo blinks, confused.

"…Hua Chengzhu, what's he talking about?"

The young man pinches the bridge of his nose with a sigh. "Don't ask." He mutters, walking past both of them—straight towards the red door.

"But really, why did you come back?" Xiang questions, following after him "Did you die again?!"

"He didn't die," Yanlin glares, crossing her arm, "He's a Ghost King now!"

Xiang glares right back at her. He doesn't like that one, he—

Suddenly, he and Fai both look at each other, their eyes bulging out of their heads. "…A GHOST KING?!" They shriek in unison.

"If that's the case—what the hell are you heading for that door for?!" Xiang mutters, following after him, "Why would you want to reincarnate now?!”

“Not me,” Hua Cheng answers coldly. “Now stop howling, before I decide to rip out your tongue.”

Xiang snaps his jaw shut quickly.

Hua Cheng kneels before the door to the other side, setting the little boy in his arms down at his feet. Those eyes look up at the Ghost King, silently trusting, no longer in pain—after suffering for so, so long.

“...I’m sorry,” the youth mutters. “That I couldn’t help your mom.”

The child doesn’t seem to blame him for that. If anything, it smiles up at him gratefully, patting Hua Cheng’s cheek softly with his palm.

“...” The ghost king leans into it for just a moment, before taking the little boy’s hand, lifting it with his own—and guiding it to knock.

Slowly, the crimson doors leading into the next life lead open—revealing nothing beyond but immense golden light, pouring over them.

Lang Ying’s son hesitates for a moment, cooing uncertainly, but Hua Cheng gives him a gentle push in the small of his back.

“Don’t be afraid.”

Finally, the boy steps forward—disappearing into the light. A few of the other children squirm behind him, staring at the gateway to the beyond with the same uncertainty.

“Is it...really safe?”

“It is,” Hua Cheng reassures them softly.

“And we get to start over again?”

“Yes.”

Most of them go—however slowly, many of them needing several reassurances, or for the Ghost King to hold their hand for a moment before they step through.

But in the end, nearly all of them pass through, moving on to the other side, disappearing in showers of golden sparks.

Hua Cheng watches, his face illuminated with a soft golden glow, the sort that almost makes his skin look alive again, and...

He can't help but smile. Because even if he doesn't know where his beloved is, even if Xie Lian doesn't know that he still exists—if he knew...

If Hua Cheng's god knew what he had done here today, he thinks that Xie Lian would be proud of him.

And that thought—it's enough to carry him through however long it takes to find him.

Finally—he sees that there are three children remaining.

Two brothers,and a girl with a stuffed rabbit in her hands.

"...What's the hold up?" He questions, raising an eyebrow.

"...Thank you for everything you've done," Bao mutters, bowing his head. "But I...if we go..."

He takes a deep breath. "I won't be Shuo's big brother anymore." He squeezes the younger boy's hand. "I don't want that."

Shuo beams up at Hua Cheng, showing that he's missing one of his front teeth. "You helped me find my big brother again! I'm not gonna let him go now."

When he looks at Yanlin, she just shrugs, holding her rabbit a little tighter. "I'm not ready to go yet. I don't have a special reason." She mumbles, pressing her face against its head. "But...if I'm ever ready..." She glances up at Hua Cheng, "Can you bring me back here again?"

Slowly...the ghost king smiles, "I can."

She takes his hand, walking by his side as the small group of ghosts walk back towards the door. "...Hua Chengzhu?"

He looks down at her, raising an eyebrow. "Hmm?"

"Why haven't you gone through that door yet?"

His gaze softens.

His eye seems to see everything, and at the same time—it's always so far away. Thinking about someone that it cannot see.

“Because I still have someone precious in this world,” he murmurs.

Yanlin smiles, holding his hand tighter, skipping.

“That’s a pretty good reason!”

The door swings open again—and this time, Hua Cheng glances back over his shoulder—his eye slightly annoyed, but more patient than it used to be.

“Are you two coming?”

The two gamblers stop and look at one another, for once—completely unable to believe their good fortune.

“…Yes!” Xiang snatches Fai up, scrambling after their former gambling partner, bones rattling as they run. “How…are you able to get that door open whenever you want?” The ghost frowns, following the ghost king through it. “Your luck must be off the charts…”

Hua Cheng smiles.

“…Luck is a choice, sometimes.”

Maybe not for everyone—but it is for him.

The small group of ghosts takes the stairway back up from the realm of the dead, the way lit by red lanterns, each step marked with the soft tinkling of silver bells.

A new Ghost King rises—and the world awaits, opening its doors for him once more.

Hua Cheng stares up at the clear blue sky, the first time he’s seen it in over ten years, his hand reaching for the small coral pearl, braided into his hair—twisting it, remembering a promise.

Not spoken out loud, but echoing in his every thought, word, and action. Wait for me.

Slowly, he raises the bead to his lips, walking down a new path, a small group of followers in tow.

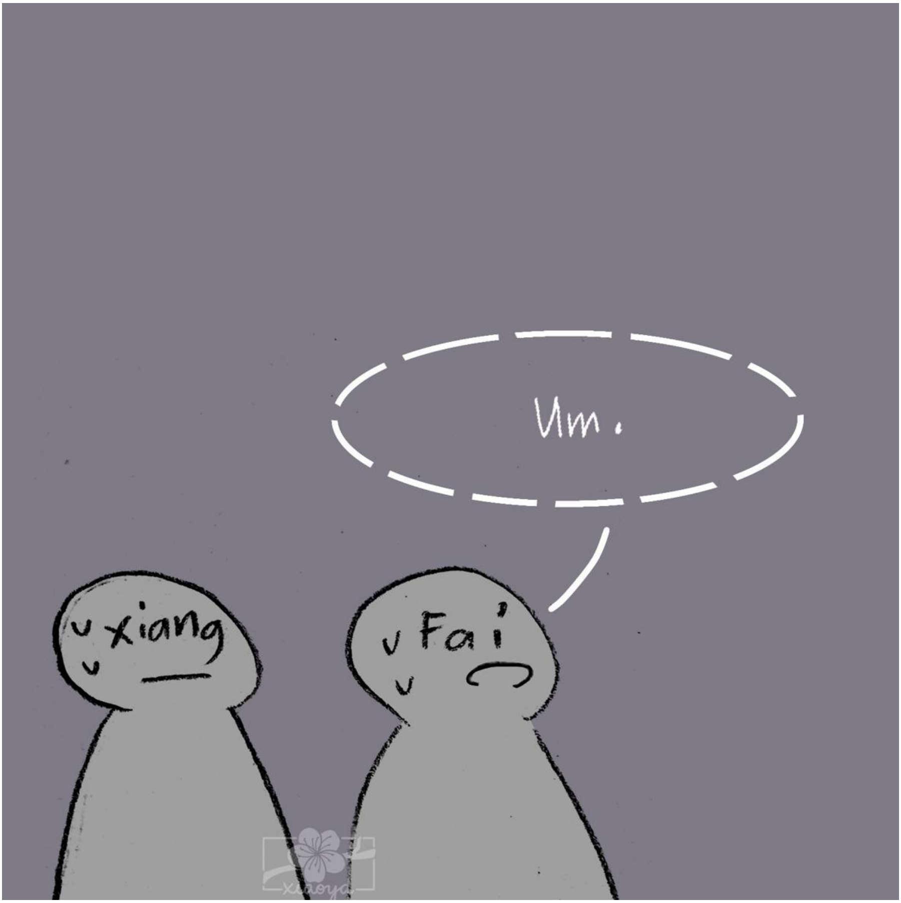
I’m coming—just wait for me.

Now, a new era begins—

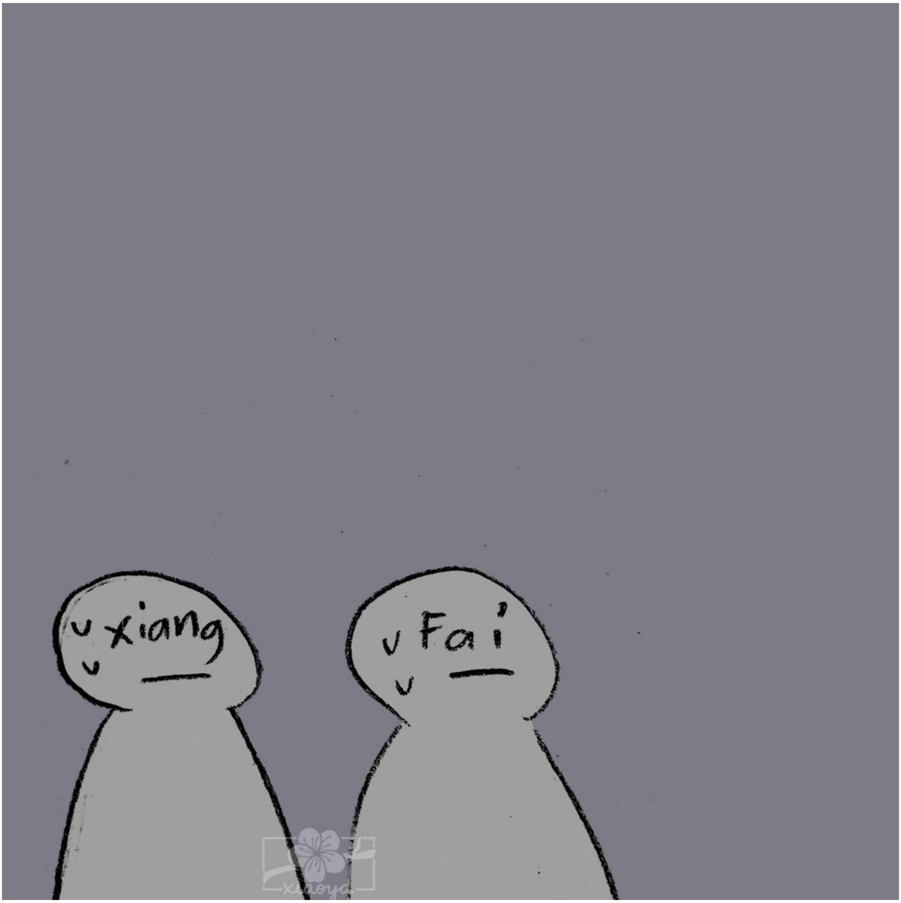
That of Crimson Rain Sought Flower.

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

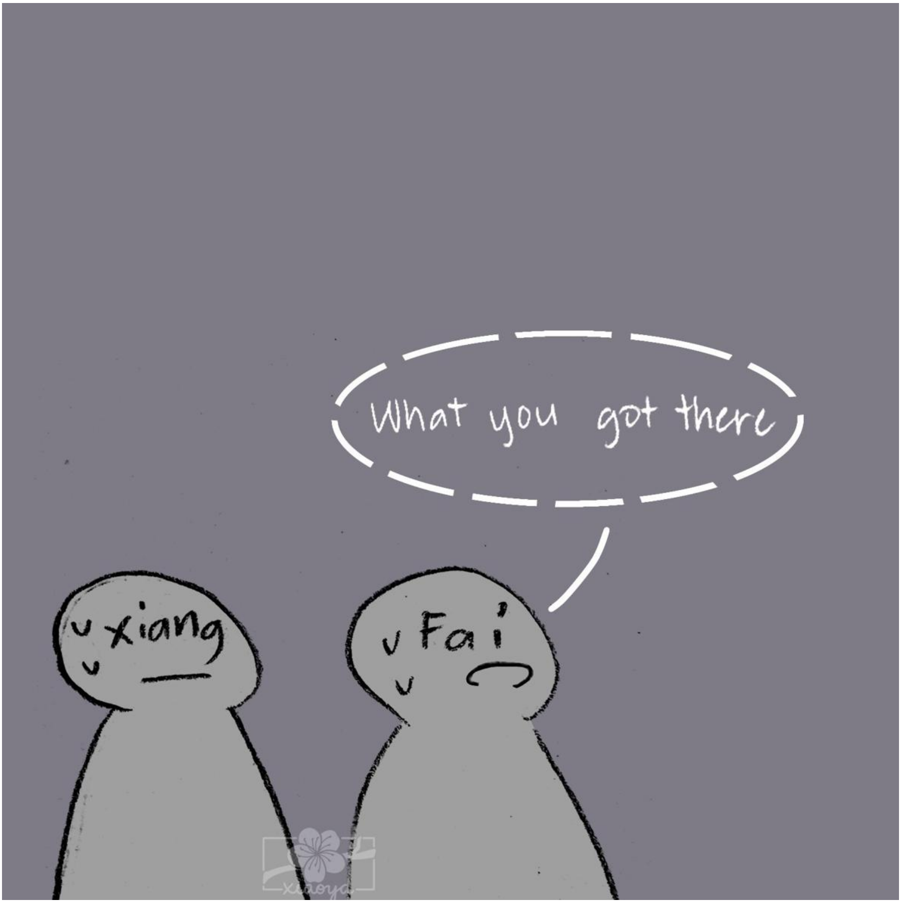
INCLUDED WITH PERMISSION FROM ARTIST, DO NOT REPRODUCE OR USE.



Um.
xiang
Fai
xiaoya



xiang
Fai



What you got there
xiang
Fai
xiaoya

None of your business
xiaoya

CREDIT: Pri, support the artwork HERE

THIS MARKS THE END OF THE MOUNT TONGLU ARC, MOVING INTO THE ARC OF "CRIMSON RAIN SOUGHT FLOWER / THE BURNING OF 33 HEAVENLY OFFICIALS."

IF YOU WOULD LIKE TO CONTINUE READING FROM TIHS POINT ON VIA TWITTER, START HERE

Chapter End Notes

Thank you so much to Pri for your beautiful artwork, and allowing me to share it! I'm so grateful!

xoxo, Evie

A Prayer to a Ghost

Chapter Summary

“Are you gonna buy something or not?” A nearby voice interrupts rudely.

A little boy sits on top of a crate, staring at the young girl with an imperious glare, and she blanches slightly, fumbling in her purse for a few coins.

“And don’t short change him either! He’ll know.”

The village girl huffs, crossing her arms. “I wouldn’t ever cheat a blind person!” She says this, but she’s piling a few extra coins into her hand anyway. “How would you know, anyway?!”

The young man flushes with embarrassment. “Because I tried once, alright?!”

And it was embarrassing. Not just a little awkward, mind you—and honestly, it would have been easier if the weaver had just beaten him up for something—but no. No, instead, he cheerfully accompanied the boy home, then, in front of his parents, corrected the mistake.

The worst part was that he was so pleasant about it, explaining “he had a difficult time counting coins when he was young, too” and it was an “easy mistake to make.”

But the boy’s father knew that it wasn’t, and as punishment, he has to help with the stall for an entire month.

And let him tell you—It’s not actually as boring as he thought it was gonna be.

Chapter Notes

You can find me on twitter and keep up with current updates of the story HERE

⌛ YEAR THIRTEEN ⌛

“This work is absolutely exquisite…” The young woman muses, dragging her fingertips over the shawl in front of her. The materials are simple—but the flower pattern is quite intricate. “How did you manage to—?”

She stops awkwardly, realizing her rudeness.

The man sitting behind the stall smiles, the white bandage around his eyes gleaming gently in the sun, “It’s okay—I’m not sensitive about it. I wasn’t born this way—I didn’t lose my sight until recently.”

Well, not exactly recently, but you know.

“…O-Oh,” she laughs stiffly.

“So you can still remember things, and what it was like to…you know…” She clears her throat awkwardly.

“See?” Xie Lian questions, a pleasant smile still in place. He sounds amused, even as the young lady continues to poke around the stall. “Yes, I remember it pretty well.”

“Are you gonna buy something or not?” A nearby voice interrupts rudely.

A little boy sits on top of a crate, staring at the young girl with an imperious glare, and she blanches slightly, fumbling in her purse for a few coins.

“And don’t short change him either! He’ll know.”

The village girl huffs, crossing her arms. “I wouldn’t ever cheat a blind person!” She says this, but she’s piling a few extra coins into her hand anyway. “How would you know, anyway?!”

The young man flushes with embarrassment. “Because I tried once, alright?!”

And it was embarrassing . Not just a little awkward, mind you—and honestly, it would have been easier if the weaver had just beaten him up for something—but no.

No, instead, he cheerfully accompanied the boy home, then, in front of his parents, corrected the mistake.

The worst part was that he was so pleasant about it, explaining “he had a difficult time counting coins when he was young, too” and it was an “easy mistake to make.”

But the boy’s father knew that it wasn’t, and as punishment, he has to help with the stall for an entire month .

And let him tell you—

It’s not actually as boring as he thought it was gonna be.

“And just trust me—it ain’t worth it,” he mumbles, his ears still stinging from the cuffing his parents gave him.

“How does he know, anyway?!”

“How should I know?! He’s magic!”

This prompts a string of nervous laughter from the young cultivator, waving that statement off, “Hahahaha, Heng, why are you being so silly? I’m just a simple Taoist, the martial arts training helps, that’s all.”

The girl crosses her arms. “What’s that got to do with coins?”

Heng throws his hands up, like she might as well be preaching to the choir. “And if he’s been blind for such a short time, now does he know how to do all this stuff? You’re telling me. The guy’s weird! And… kinda scary.”

Xie Lian’s eyebrow twitches as Heng leans over to her.

“I’ve seen his bandage move on it’s own, sometimes…”

“He doesn’t think I’m scary,” Xie Lian cuts the boy off with a smile. “If he did, he wouldn’t be so comfortable with getting on my nerves, would he?”

The girl thinks that over with a nod, handing over the coins.

(Heng, however, looks slightly nervous.)

“Thanks, mister!” She hums, throwing the shawl around her shoulders. “I’ll tell everyone back home about your shop!”

With that, she prances off—all while Xie Lian slips the coins into the pouch at his waist, reaching for his basket.

Heng leans forward eagerly, but the prince turns away, hugging the basket to his chest.

“Mr. Hua!” The boy whines, “I’m hungry!”

Xie Lian sniffs, pulling out a meat bun for himself, “Go get lunch from someone who isn’t weird and terrifying.”

Heng gawks at him, his jaw slack.

“I didn’t mean it! And I thought Taoists were supposed to be generous and forgiving!”

Well, sure. And usually, Xie Lian is—but he’s gotten rather used to being alone in the last ten years, and the forced, constant contact with Heng has gotten…

Grating.

There are moments when he actually enjoys the kid’s company—it reminds him of Hong-er, sometimes.

…But Hong-er’s occasionally difficult attitude was always cute, because it was never pointed in Xie Lian’s direction.

“Yeah, well—” he nibbles at his bun, “I got kicked out.”

Heng frowns, “Kicked out of what?!”

Xie Lian swallows, “Taoist school.”

The boy’s eyes widen, “There’s a school?!”

The nice thing about the bandages? No one can see when Xie Lian is rolling his eyes. “Yes. Very exclusive.”

“Why’d you get kicked out?”

“…” He huffs out a sigh

“I had a bit of a rough decade,” Xie Lian mutters, and his companion stares.

“…You say the weirdest stuff sometimes,” the kid grumbles, crossing his arms. “…I’m sorry, though, I shouldn’t have called you scary.”

He doesn’t take back the part about Xie Lian being weird, though

"…And I think it's cool that your bandage movies!" Heng adds, noticing the way one end of the wide silk band gives a little wiggle in excitement. "I won't tell anyone else about it again, promise!"

Mr. Hua is a really weird person, Heng has always thought that—but he's nice.

He showed up in the village four years ago, when Heng was still a little kid—and people around have gotten used to him for the most part.

That being said…he's odd. He knows everything, can do stuff that most blind people can't—

And he's completely alone, all the time.

Heng asked his mom about it once—and she got this sad sort of look on her face, explaining that sometimes, it can be pretty tiring, looking after someone who needs extra help. People leave.

Which Heng doesn't understand, because Mr. Hua really doesn't need a lot of "extra help."

Heng has a running theory that he was probably rich before. That would explain why he knows so many things and…

He might be older than Heng, pretty much a grown up, but he's kind of bratty and fussy sometimes.

But now, without looking back—

He offers the boy a meat bun.

"…" Heng grins, reaching out to snatch it up, "Thank you, Mr. Hua!"

All you have to do is be SORT OF nice to Mr. Hua, not even that nice —and he'll always be decent to you. He's a good, trustworthy person.

"You know…I heard something kinda cool today,"

The boy brings up conversationally, chewing.

"Oh?" Xie Lian sighs, picking at the edges of his bun, slowly taking another bite. "What's that?"

"Thaaat there's a new ghost king!" The boy sits forward, grinning.

Xie Lian lifts his chin, tilting his head, "…A ghost king?"

"Yeah! Like, y'know, a calamity?"

The Taoist pales, nearly crushing his meat bun under his fingers as he looks at him more directly, "…Like the white no-face?!"

"…" The kid leans away from him, his eyes a little wide. "No? This is a different one!"

Xie Lian sags.

He clutches his chest with relief for a moment, letting out a shaky breath.

He's gone.

Jun Wu killed him.

His fingers stroke over Hong-er, slowly.

He can't hurt you or anyone else anymore.

"…Okay, there's a new one," Xie Lian mutters. "What's he like?"

"Weird, apparently,"

Heng takes another bite, "Sort of like you!"

Xie Lian tries to give him a look, but, well—it's hard, when you can't actually glare at someone properly. "What's his name?"

"Dunno," the kid shrugs, "but…" he looks over at the Taoist with a grin, "he's gonna be here tonight!"

Xie Lian raises an eyebrow. It's not exactly a…bustling metropolis, this town. It's a decent enough place, near the city—but not exactly somewhere for any major spirits to come to haunt. "Here?"

"Yeah!" Peng's smile widens. "Cause my friend is gonna summon him!"

The ghost king in question, at that moment, isn't haunting anyone.

Technically, he's not even doing his day job.

"Mark it," he growls, not lifting his face from the silk pillow on his chaise lounge.

“…Okay, okay big fella,” Fai sighs, stretching up on his stool.

With a piece of chalk, he adds another tally mark to the wall—which is already covered in them.

Give it up for day four thousand, seven hundred and ninety: with no dianxia. Not even a rumor or a whisper of anyone remotely like him.

Hua Cheng slams his face into the pillow again

How. How is one, very, very beautiful, extremely blind man who dresses very distinctively so difficult to find?!

The door swings open, and before Xiang can say a word, Fai waves his hands in warning. “I wouldn’t say anything,” the ghost mumbles. “He’s in a mood.”

“Isn’t he always in a mood?”

“Well,” Fai pauses, because that—that is also true. “He’s in the same mood as yesterday I guess, but it’s not a good mood.”

“And I’m not the one who had something to tell Hua Chengzhu,” Xiang shrugs, crossing his arms. “It was this one.”

‘This one,’ meaning Yanlin, who is standing between Shuo and Bao, shifting her weight from foot to foot, somewhat awkwardly.

“…Hi,” she mumbles, holding her elbow sheepishly.

Hua Cheng lifts his head with a grunt, “That tone does not excite me.”

“It shouldn’t,” Bao grumbles.

“What’s she done now?”

“Nothing bad!” Yanlin mumbles, crossing her arms and looking away. “I was just trying to make friends!”

Which doesn’t sound so bad, until Bao points out—

“ Human friends.”

Hua Cheng lets out a heavy sigh. “What did you do?”

“…Told some stories…”

Yanlin mumbles, rubbing the side of her head—and when Bao glares are her, she adds, “…About you…”

The ghost king whips his head around to look at her, and she holds her hands up. “Not BAD stories, they’re great! They make you sound really cool!”

“…In what way?” He questions slowly.

The little girl shifts around, twiddling her thumbs awkwardly, mumbling, “…Have you been getting any…prayers, lately?”

“…Yanlin,” he groans, pressing his hands against his temples. “I’m going to disperse you.”

“I was trying to help!”

“Tell him what you said!” Bao grumbles, irritated with her stalling, and Yanlin huffs.

“Just the truth! That he saved us, and led us home with the lanterns.” She mumbles. “But I wanted the humans to like me, so…I embellished…”

“Embellished.” Hua Cheng repeats flatly.

“I kinda…made it sound like…if they were in trouble, or lost…they could light a lantern and pray to you, and…”

Hua Cheng sinks back down against his chaise lounge. “How many times,” Yanlin shrinks, “How many times do I have to tell you, I am NOT a god?!”

“He rejected the job offer and everything,” Shuo agrees, “It was like, BOOM!” He pantomimes crashing back down to earth by jumping in the air, then rolling on the floor, “Then swoooosh!” He jumps back, up, pretending to swing and an imaginary scimitar, “and ahhhh!”

He’s tired.

Hua Cheng is grateful that fate made him fall in love with a man at a very young age. And that even if he hadn’t, death came for him before he was stupid enough to have children of his own.

They are exhausting, they don’t listen—and they cause more trouble than they're worth.

"Okay, but he did ascend, he can answer prayers if he wants to, he's immortal, he has magic powers—" Yanlin lifts up a finger as she lists each piece of evidence to her point "I don't get what difference there is between him and a god!"

"Several practical differences, actually,"

Fai pipes up helpfully. "I'm sure you've noticed young lady—but you haven't stopped aging since your death, have you?"

Yanlin crosses her arms, thinking it over. "I did lose a tooth last month," she comments, wiggling her tongue in the new hole in her overbite. "It was weird."

The older ghost nods, "Just like our bodies decay after death, our spirits age as well. Much more slowly than humans—and more powerful Ghosts like Hua Chengzhu can slow or stop their aging if they choose to do so—but a god's spirit will never age, no matter how long they exist."

Hua Cheng drops his head back into the pillow, making low, irritated noises.

"But…what if I ascended?" Yanlin questions, eyes wide.

Like that's somehow a real possibility for someone who still hasn't learned how, at the literal age of twenty one (and the spiritual age of seven), to lace her own boots. Bao does it for her every morning.

"Would I stay little forever?"

"Children don't ever ascend," Fai waves that off. "But when teenagers do, their spirits will shift to the age of their peak physical form, if they had reached a human life. Hua Chengzhu's body did that when he ascended, isn't that right?"

"I suppose." Hua Cheng grumbles, not interested in the little lesson that's unfolding.

It was more obvious for Xie Lian, who ascended at around the same age Hua Cheng was, when he died—Hua Cheng (who, while the prince didn't know it at the time, was still watching him from afar) watched how the god's body went from that of a teenager, to a man in his early twenties

By contrast, there was a gap of several years between Hua Cheng's death and his ascension—and in that time, his spirit changed forms twice, changing his true form from what it would have been naturally —and then, he ascended into…

A form he hasn't worn again outside of the Kiln.

He shifts his shape somewhat frequently these days—in large part because, like the best predators, he learns from other hunters.

No matter how hard the Ghost King tries, he can't remember Bai Wuxiang's true face. He knows he saw it, in Zhao Beitong's memories —but he can't…

When he does know, however—was that part of the power the ghost possessed stemmed from the fact that no one ever knew what he truly looked like.

Anonymity can, in many ways, be a dangerous weapon.

Aside from that—it's been years since anyone commented negatively on Hua Cheng's appearance. Because he controls what faces they see, how, and when.

After a lifetime of being called hideous, you would become fond of masks too, wouldn't you?

"But…" Yanlin frowns. "If Hua Chengzhu can age, how is he immortal?"

"Because I can use spiritual power to stop aging," Hua Cheng mutters. "If I choose to do so."

Which he has, for the most part. He doesn't want to be too much older than his beloved when he finds him again, after all, but…

When he remembers how his god always used to fawn over him, treating him like a child—particularly how he used to laugh over how cute it was when Hong-er's voice was changing…

Hua Cheng let's his body get a little older. Just to…impress the point that he IS a grown man, now.

Physically speaking, he's several years older than Xie Lian by now—

(Not that it matters, a voice in the back of his head grumbles, he won't know I'm Hong-er, anyway.)

—and when he does find him, if he witnesses Hua Cheng's true form, it won't be one he views as…childish.

"…Okay, but if he can stop aging, he's basically still a god!" Yanlin shrugs. "So, I wasn't wrong, and I didn't—!"

"No, There are other key differences." Fai holds up a finger. "For example, goddesses can still conceive children—female ghosts cannot."

If they could, it would be far more convenient—they'd have less demented little fetus spirits running around, particularly in the wake of the war, that…

Hua Cheng's eyebrows knit together, forcing himself not to contemplate that gruesome matter.

"Can gods have children too?"

"Yes, but it hasn't happened in quite some time—it normally never ends well." Fai explains.

Bao frowns, scratching his head. "Wait, does that mean male ghosts can't have kids either?"

"No, they can," Hua Cheng speaks up this time. "But any human woman who carries a ghost's child will die in childbirth. It's a relatively common curse."

Yanlin doesn't seem so happy or curious about the subject of ghost biology anymore, though Hua Cheng really can't understand why, she was the one who brought it up—

"Why would a lady ever let a ghost put a baby inside her if she knew it was gonna kill her?" Shuo frowns. "That's just dumb!"

Xiang sits up eagerly, rubbing his hands together, "Oh, I know the answer to THAT one—!"

"No, you don't." Hua Cheng cuts him off, his tone threatening.

"…" Xian deflates slightly, crossing his arms and looking away. "Yeah, I guess I don't."

Yanlin lifts her chin, finally speaking up again, "Mr. Fai, how do you know so much stuff?"

“Well, I was a teacher when I was alive,” the slightly rotund ghost answers cheerfully.

A teacher with a fatal gambling problem, but yes. A teacher. A private tutor, more specifically—for the same family that owned the gambling den that would lead to his eventual demise.

“Hua Chengzhu has been generous enough to allow this humble ghost to continue his education!”

It’s mutually beneficial, after all—Hua Cheng could only read one language to speak of, upon leaving Mount Tonglu, and it was a dead one.

Fai has poor skills when it comes to risk assessment and common sense—but he’s a good teacher, and he hasn’t said a word about their lessons.

Hua Cheng finds himself slowly learning more about the world, as time goes on. Searching for his god still consumes his time in many ways—but it’s no longer the only noteworthy thing about his existence, and…the ghost king has learned certain things about himself.

He knows now that he likes liquor, but not wine. Enjoys spicy foods, but not particularly sweet things. Hong-er never had the money to develop a ‘palette’ in his human life, and when he was a ghost, following his god…he never had the chance to find out.

And it’s more than that.

He learned as much in the Kiln—but he enjoys creating things, particularly beautiful things, but not always. He enjoys fighting and hunting—he’s terrible with music, as much as he enjoys it, and—

Hua Cheng discovered through Fai, oddly enough, a genuine passion for learning.

About anything. About everything. Sometimes, because it makes him feel as though he could be more useful to his god, when he finds him, or…

Sometimes, there’s a hunger inside of him. A need to devour every text he can get his hands on, to fulfill a burning natural curiosity.

The world was so small, when he was human. So limited, ugly, cruel, and boring.

But when Xie Lian told him stories in the shrine they used to live in—Hua Cheng is fairly certain the god must have thought Hong-er was just being polite, but—he was rapt with interest.

That was Hua Cheng's first hint of interest in the idea of learning more about the world—that it could be more than just this unpleasant, uninteresting thing.

Then, in the Kiln…he learned what it was like to view the world through the eyes of a scholar.

And his curiosity grew.

It makes him happy, sometimes—because he remembers how Xie Lian was the same. How happy he seemed, when he remembered his time studying under the Guoshi, and…

At the time, Hong-er had always assumed himself incapable of following a similar path. Too stupid, imperfect, and human

But now, he's had the chance to discover the fact that he's a fast learner—a hungry learner. And that, one day…

He could catch up.

But none of that has anything to do with the subject at hand.

"The point is," Hua Cheng speaks up, interrupting the debate, "I'm not a god."

Yanlin opens her mouth to argue, and the Ghost King speaks over her, "And now, I have countless children praying to me for…what, exactly?"

"Help," the little girl replies.

"As in—?"

"If they're lost, or if someone's hurting them," she shrugs. "That's all I said."

And from her point of view—saving children from that is exactly what the Ghost King does.

"…" Hua Cheng lets out a heavy sigh, dropping back Down onto his couch. “Stop telling them that, Yanlin.”

“But—!”

He points to the wall of tally marks irritably. “That’s my priority.”

“…” She kicks at some imaginary dirt on the floor with her shoe. “Whatever,” the little girl mumbles, turning on her heel and running out of the room. “Who CARES!”

Shuo watches her go, tilting his head curiously before looking up at Bao. “It sounds like she cares.”

Bao shrugs.

“Girls are crazy, she—” Both boys pause, noticing that Fai’s initial statement…wasn’t incorrect.

Hua Chengzhu is in a mood .

Slowly—respectfully—they give him space, and Hua Cheng rolls onto his back, glaring at the ceiling.

Thirteen years.

He’s been out of the Kiln for longer than he was in it—and he still hasn’t gotten any closer to finding his god than he was before. There’s that constant reassurance that he’s alright, that he must be—because Hong-er’s ashes have been undisturbed, but…

Hua Cheng throws an arm over his face with an irritated grumble.

What’s the point of power, if you can’t use it for the things that matter? He—

It’s now, in the quiet, left with his own thoughts, that the Ghost King hears them.

Prayers.

Dozens of quiet pleas—all from children

The stories they tell aren’t pleasant to hear—but nearly all of them, the ghost king is familiar with.

Parents who beat them. Fathers who drink. Constantly being hungry, or forced to do things against their will.

It's horrible, but normal.

But…a few prayers stick out.

All the same. All frightened, terrified voices, whispering—

'Don't let it come for me.'

Hua Cheng's brow furrows, his eyes closed.

'Please—Hua Chengzhu, I'll light as many lanterns as you want—keep me and my baby sister safe? I don't want it to get me—'

'Hua Chengzhu,' a little voice cries out miserably, 'it found me.'

All of the voices are coming from the same region—and all of them are praying for salvation from one thing. Something hunting them.

And everyone calls it by the same name.

'The Night Touring Green Lantern.'

Xie Lian's presence has become somewhat of a cause for debate.

"Did you have to bring a grown up?" One of the other kids grumbles, crossing her arms. "The Ghost King doesn't help adults, he might not even come now."

Heng rolls his eyes, "Mr. Hua barely counts as a grown up!"

He pulls Xie Lian along by the sleeve—not particularly helpful, he almost makes the god trip over his own feet several times, but the intention to be of assistance is there. "He's scared of spiders and eats food off the floor, just like us!"

"Well—" Xie Lian tries to interrupt,

"I don't think that's completely true—!"

"Yeah it is!" Heng huffs, tugging him along faster, now. "I see you drop your food and pick it up and eat it all the time!"

In his defense, when you can't see things, you drop them a lot—and he can't afford to buy a new meal every time.

He's instituted a five second rule, and he always blows the dust off and rubs it with his sleeve first. That's fine, right?

“He didn’t say he wasn’t scared of spiders, though.” One of the other children mumbles to her friend, speaking behind her hand, and Xie Lian turns his head

“Do YOU like spiders?”

The little girl falls silent, clearly embarrassed—thinking that whispering made it so the Taoist wouldn’t hear her, but clearly that wasn’t the case.

“It’s worse when you can’t see them,” Xie Lian huffs, allowing Heng to pull him along.

He’s never liked bugs, actually—ever since he was a little boy. The exceptions of course being fireflies, ladybugs, and butterflies. Those were pretty, and they didn’t sting, bite, or do anything else horrifying.

Spiders, however? Ugh.

His friends actually found it quite funny.

The famous crown prince of Xianle, a famous, imposing warrior—could often be sent running by the sight of a tiny little arachnid, clinging to Mu Qing’s shirt, dragging him over to smash it with a broom.

‘You’ll hunt demons for sport, but you’re scared of THAT?’

‘Don’t laugh!’

Xie Lian would whine, ‘I’m pretty sure this is the kind that ju—OH, MU QING, IT’S JUMPING—!’

If it was Feng Xin, he’d just drop all decorum and leap onto his guard’s back, arms wrapped around the guard’s head at one point when they were traveling and came across a tarantula.

Of course, his friend had made some terribly reasonable point about not being able to kill any bugs with Xie Lian’s arms wrapped around his eyes—to which the prince adjusted his grip, but refused to come down until the little creature was slain.

He almost smiles now, remembering

“…” His steps slow slightly, lips abandoning any attempt at happiness, turning back down into a frown, heart aching.

He misses them.

Not every day. It’s not as bad as missing Hong-er, or his parents—because he knows Mu Qing and Feng Xin are alive and well.

They’re happy.

They’re gods now in their own right—even Mu Qing, who hadn’t ascended as an official the last time they fought…

Xie Lian bites his lip, taking a steadying breath. He doesn’t cry as easily as he used to—but his chest often seizes up with the weight of it all, and he feels so…

But it’s okay. It—

It’s okay.

He reminds himself of that, every time. And if it gets too worrisome… he’ll go to one of their temples. Light some incense, leave a bowl of rice. Xie Lian never prays, doesn’t want to trouble them like that—

He doesn’t want their pity, anyway.

“Are you sure this is the spot?” One of the children whines. “I don’t see anything!”

“That’s because I haven’t lit the lantern yet, obviously!” Another voice replies—somewhat snidely now, catching Xie Lian’s attention. “Would you stop rushing me? It’s a delicate operation!”

“Lit the lantern?” He questions softly, dropping to his knees in order to kneel down next to the boy on the grass. “Why do you need to light a lantern?”

The young man sets the red paper lantern down on the ground in front of him, pulling out a set of matches.

“Because that’s how you call him,” the boy grumbles, glancing back at Heng with annoyance. “Did you explain ANYTHING before you brought him?!”

Heng crosses his arms, rubbing his nose with a sniff, “I told him we were summoning a ghost king! What else did I need to say?!”

“He’s probably not gonna be able to do it anyway,” One of the village girls giggles, shaking her head. “I bet he’s just lying again!”

From what Xie Lian can understand—there are about five children in the group, excluding him—and the boy actually performing the summoning…

He doesn't seem particularly popular among them. Xie Lian doubts they're even friends—and the other children are most likely only here to stop and watch the show as it unfolds.

Depressing—but normal, for kids that age.

"SHUT UP!" The boy snaps, fumbling with his matches.

"He'll definitely come, alright?! That's the whole point," he mutters, holding a lit match inside the lantern, slowly sparking the small candle inside to life.

"You're not lost, though," Heng comments.

"…The Ghost King helps lost children?" Xie Lian raises an eyebrow.

"That's…very kind of him."

"And if you tell him that someone is mistreating you," the boy with the lantern stands up, holding it out into the dark. "He'll show up and beat them to death for you!"

The prince's smile fades slightly.

That's…less kind of him, to put it lightly.

But compared to the last ghost king…Xie Lian can't say that it isn't an improvement. Besides—nobody's perfect, right?

"…He feels very strongly about child welfare, then?"

The village girl speaks up again, leaning against a nearby tree. It's gotten dark now—fog creeping in.

"I heard it was cause he was some kid that got tortured to death!" She explains, clearly wanting to take advantage of the slightly chilling atmosphere.

(To Xie Lian, it's all pretty much the same.)

"No…" Heng frowns.

"I heard it was cause he girl he fell in love with got tortured." The boy explains. “The village exiled her, and by the time he found her—she’d already been eaten by wolves.”

Well, somehow that’s even more gruesome—and he has the other children’s attention.

Xie Lian grimaces.

“If that’s true, how did he die?!”

“Well,” Heng sits forward, grinning. “He went mad with grief, and clawed out his own eye!” He receives several horrified gasps in response. “He bled to death. And now, his eye looks down on everyone, and that’s how he sees the lanterns!”

“…I don’t actually think a man can bleed to death from losing an eye,” Xie Lian comments lightly. “And most wouldn’t have the…grit, to do something like that.”

After all—he’s a bit of an expert on pain. He can barely feel it even more—and even he would hesitate to do that.

“Well, that’s what I heard!” Heng shrugs. “Maybe he killed himself after, who knows.”

“Most suicide victims don’t linger as ghosts,” Xie Lian shakes his head again. “They don’t have the will to linger on.”

Unless it was a bitter suicide—and he supposes that situation counts.

Heng crosses his arms, clearly annoyed that the weaver has contradicted him in front of his friends twice, now. “Did they teach you all of this in Taoist school?” He questions dryly.

“…” Xie Lian laughs awkwardly, rubbing the back of his head. “Haha, they sure did!”

“The same one they kicked you out of?”

“Haha—!” Xie Lian stops laughing suddenly, and now they two are glaring at one another. Well—Heng is glaring at him, Xie Lian is just scowling underneath Ruoye in his general direction.

“…Yan, I don’t think he’s coming.” The girl groans.

“Shut up!” The boy snaps again, holding his lantern a little higher. “He’ll definitely come! It’s only been a couple of minutes.”

Xie Lian can’t see the boy—Yan’s—expression, but he sounds…tense, almost nervous.

Heng, seeming to want to kill time, sits down beside the prince.

“Aren’t Taoist’s supposed to be able to do magic tricks?” The boy grumbles, bumping his shoulder against Xie Lian. “Like…breaking swords in half, reading palms, making stuff disappear?”

“Sure,” Xie Lian replies dryly. “We know a thing or two.”

Heng leans forward eagerly.

“Like what—? Ow!” He helps, suddenly going sprawling on his back. The other children don’t actually see what happened, but…

A certain bandage flicked the boy in the forehead. Hard.

“What was that?!”

Xie Lian picks at his nails, “A magic trick.”

“What kind of magic is that?!”

The Taoist glances over, practically sticking his tongue out at the little boy, “Making someone’s dignity disappear.”

Heng gawks, clutching his forehead, and the village girl giggles behind her hand. “I see what you meant about him not being a real grown up now!”

Xie Lian opens his mouth to protest when Heng speaks up again, smug now, “I didn’t even have to tell him about the spider on his leg to prove it to you.”

The god rolls his eyes. “Oh, right, because there’s conveniently a spider on my leg the MOMENT you want to prove a—”

Of course, there’s one thing Xie Lian isn’t used yet:

His newfound, extremely rotten luck.

Which is impressed upon him the moment he feels something jump up from his knee, scuttling across his hand.

“…”

The children watch the blood rapidly drain from the Taoist's cheeks.

It's not like he presented this rough around the edges, hyper masculine persona to begin with—but watching him flail his wrist, shrieking like a little girl, they—

"EEEEEEEAK!"

His fist slams into the trunk of a nearby tree—

…Snapping it in half.

The kids stand around in a shocked semi circle, watching as the blind man slams his fist into the trunk two more times to ensure that the spider (which is surely obliterated by now) is gone, reducing it to little more than a pile of splinters.

"…Hah," Xie Lian lets out a shaky sigh, clutching his hand to his chest, trembling slightly. It must seem so silly to some, after everything he's been through, but—

There's so little left that scares him now, when he encounters fear—even over the silliest things, he…struggles.

It takes him a moment to sense the staring, and…

"…Hahaha!" He laughs again, but slightly more nervous and strained than awkward, this time— "And that's…another Taoist magic trick!"

"…" Yan leans over, mumbling to Heng, "…Is Mr. Hua crazy?"

"…Kinda," the boy admits.

"But he's nice, so…"

Slowly, the girl standing behind them shakes herself out of it. "Yan, I really don't think he's coming—me and Jun are going home." She mutters, grabbing her little brother's hand, both of them starting to walk back.

"I told you to wait a minute!"

The boy cries, throwing his hands up as he watches the other boy that came from their village leave too, trailing behind his friends. "…Who needs you anyways! He probably didn't show up because he doesn't like LOSERS!" The kid shouts, turning around with a huff.

"…" Heng grimaces, muttering 'yikes' under his breath, leaning close to whisper in Xie Lian's ear, "That's why no one likes him, he's always yelling at everyone."

The prince frowns, but with sympathy.

"Well," Heng makes a big show of yawning, stretching his arms over his head. "I'm pretty tired, y'know—helping in the shop all day is pretty tough, so—!"

"Just go, Heng!" Yan snaps. "I'll wait by myself! I don't care!"

He holds the red lantern to his chest stubbornly, and Heng makes a face, rising to his face. "Yeah, yeah, just chase everyone off…That's what you always do." He grumbles, walking away.

"…" Yan sniffs, kneeling back down to the ground, his arms wrapped around his lantern, holding it against his chest. "You think I care? It's fine."

Oh.

Xie Lian's chest begins to ache.

"I'm better off on my own, anyway."

Heng glances back over his shoulder, slightly annoyed. "Hey, Taoist—you coming?"

Yan turns his head, just to see Xie Lian still sitting behind him, shaking out his wrist a little awkwardly.

"…No," the cultivator shakes his head. "You go on home, I'll see you in the morning."

"You sure?"

"Mhm," Xie Lian hums—and all of the irritation before, that short tempered attitude…it's replaced with this calm, patient air that Yan..doesn't know what to do with, watching him awkwardly.

The Taoist smiles, and…his expression is so…

Gentle.

"I want to meet this Ghost King, anyway." Xie Lian hums, crossing his legs underneath him. "I don't mind waiting a little longer."

"…You don't have to stay because you feel sorry for me," Yan grumbles, hugging his lantern tighter. "I don't want that."

"…" The prince snorts.

"I wouldn't worry about that."

"I don't want anyone looking down on me!"

"I don't think I can look down on anyone," Xie Lian points out dryly, making the boy flush with sheepishness.

"…Whatever," he mutters, holding his lantern tighter.

They sit, and they wait—for hours.

Until it must be after midnight—and Xie Lian knows the boy is tired. He can sense it from the way he sways in place, clutching his lantern tight.

The god isn't surprised—while he thought the story of a benevolent ghost king seemed very interesting, he didn't actually believe it.

But…that wasn't why he stayed behind.

"…Yan," He starts. "You—"

"He'll come," the boy shakes his head, his voice exhausted and…thick with anxiety. Desperation, even. "Everyone said he would come!"

Xie Lian falls silent for a moment, listening to the child's heart pound.

"Yan," he finally speaks again, his voice gentler this time. "When you said that he shows up to help mistreated children…was that true?"

The boy nods, hugging himself a little tighter—and after a moment, Xie Lian presses the matter.

"…Is someone mistreating you, Yan?"

Crimson Rain Sought Flower

Chapter Summary

> "I am the Ghost King!" He balls his hands into fists, sitting up on his throne of thorns, "Can't you tell, you ignorant little whelp?! I am the ghost king, Qi Rong! Fresh from the bowels of hell!"
>
> But instead of looking terrified, as he should be—
>
> The little boy looks absolutely delighted.
>
> "A ghost king?" His grin is lopsided, one sharpened canine sticking out. "You?"

Chapter Notes

> You can find me on twitter and keep up with current updates of the story HERE

Answering prayers is a much more complicated affair than one might expect.

For gods, humans do half of the work for them. They explain the problem, leave an offering—and the god knows exactly which temple in their region to respond to.

Obviously, Hua Cheng doesn't have temples.

And, unlike martial gods and the like—his influence doesn't rise and fall depending on location. As the only ghost king, technically speaking—he has jurisdiction over all ghosts, everywhere.

But he isn't looking for ghosts, now—he's looking for children. Human children.

The lanterns provide a small spiritual connection—not enough for him to be able to instantly appear at one's location, but enough for him to follow…somewhat of a trail.

And the further he walks…the more he begins to hear.

Mostly from locals—all charmed by the youthful, handsome face he's been wearing as of late. His body doesn't need rest, food, or drink—but he'll stop in taverns. Drink liquor, while listening to the farmers as they tell their stories.

Stories of children going missing at night.

Mothers waking up to empty beds, running through the house, screaming—but nothing is ever found of them, and they don't return.

Most blame some sort of animal—after all, the search parties that have gone into the forest do find scraps of closing, puddles of blood, but…

If that were the case, how could a beast pluck them straight out of their beds? And do so silently?

No. It was something luring them away. The men in the first tavern Hua Cheng tries suspect a local pervert, known for leering a little closer to the farmers' sons than he should.

Hua Cheng looks into that—on the off chance that it's true, but when he finds the man…

He's disgusting, yes. Pathetic. The Ghost King goes through the effort of rendering him incapable of looking at any children at all—but he's also cowardly, and unlikely to do more than leer.

Still, to be sure—after he takes the man's eyes, he returns the next day —only to find another child missing. This time, a little girl.

And unlike the adults, who look to one another with suspicion…the children tell a very different story.

Of a green light, lurking in the night

Twinkling in the distance—a beautiful, tempting sight. One that entrances any child that looks upon it, drawing them further, further, further—until they can't turn back.

And that, Hua Cheng knows—is no man. No—it's something that falls directly within his purview.

A ghost.

He stays in a local tavern once again, watching the sun slowly begin to set through one of the windows, sipping at his drink. A few of the waitresses have taken an interest—but he never spares more than a passing look when he orders another drink, or settles his tab.

The only thing that /does/ catch his eye over the course of the evening is a young man, wearing a finely made outer robe of blue and silver. Beautifully intricate for something to be worn by a blacksmith's apprentice—and when his companions inquire, the youth brags—

"It's the local weaver back in my village!" He grins, jabbing his thumb against his chest. "The guy doesn't have a family to support or anything, so he sells things like this way under value!"

"Should you really brag about that?" His friend grumbles, shaking his head.

"Have you at least been tipping the man?"

"I mean, sure, I'm not an ass—pah, you think so little of me!"

The mention of the weaver draws a small smile to Hua Cheng's face, fiddling with the red thread tied around his finger.

It...brings back memories. Just then—fate strikes.

Hua Cheng's eyes slip back towards the window—just in time to see the sun slip beneath the horizon entirely.

It's time.

He tilts his head back, Adam's apple bobbing as he swallows the rest of his drink, slamming the empty cup back down as he tosses a few coins to the waitress.

He's out the door before he can hear what the young man has to say next.

"Why would I short change a BLIND man? And a Taoist no less! I'm not that sort of man!

(A fit of bad luck, unfortunately—though not his own.) It's a simple matter, finding a place to lie in wait.

There are six houses on the edge of the village—three of them with children. All Hua Cheng has to do is perch in a nearby tree, waiting in a low crouch.

The ghost isn't particularly clever, haunting the same villagers so frequently—and just like he suspects—

It appears.

Hovering in the dark, bouncing slightly in the air, burning green and bright against the edges of the trees.

Hua Cheng recognizes it, of course—

A ghost fire.

But there's something different about this little spirit. Something…not right. It's been bewitched by something.

He remains in his hiding spot, watching the spiritual power drifting from the little creature in showers of sparks, gently enticing anything that looks upon it. Not more powerful, dangerous beings—Hua Cheng isn't affected in the slightest, but…

The door of a nearby house opens.

Stumbling through the dark comes a little girl, bare foot, hair loose, wearing pink night clothes that must be cold now, out in the wind and the dark—but she doesn't seem to notice.

Hua Cheng follows now, silently dropping onto the ground behind her, slowly following her path.

It winds through the forest, ambling at times, but steadily heading deeper and deeper inside. Away from any help or escape. Like a small insect, slowly being drawn deeper into a spider's web—not realizing that it's already far too late.

The air smells like death and rot.

From…

Hua Cheng glances up, staring at the tree tops, and…he stops.

That's enough.

The little girl stops walking when a set of fingertips press against the back of her head, her eyes coming back into focus.

"I…" She glances around, whimpering with fear. "Where…is—?"

A voice hushes her, and she falls silent.

“Don’t be afraid.”

There’s no green light in front of her anymore—and when she glances around—

There’s no one there at all, so who’s…?

“…Hua Chengzhu?” She whispers.

That was who she had been praying to, after all.

When her feet kept moving, even when she tried to stop them. When she couldn’t scream, no matter how hard she tried, but…she knew she wasn’t dreaming.

“…I’m sorry I didn’t light a lantern,” she whispers, “I—”

“Forget about the lanterns,” a voice replies—a little annoyed.

She pauses, clearly a little confused by how…irritated the voice sounds. Did he like the—?

“But…?”

Before she can question more, though—something catches her eye. Soft, silvery light, flitting past her face—and when she turns around…

There’s a butterfly lighting the path.

The voice doesn’t speak again—but she knows.

If she follows the light—it’ll take her home.

“…Thank you, Hua Chengzhu,” she murmurs, stumbling after it.

Once she leaves the clearing, Hua Cheng reappears, holding the little green ghost fire in his hand, examining it.

“What happened to you?” He murmurs, tilting his head to the side. It’s almost hard to believe now that his spirit was ever this small and fragile. He’s holding an entire soul in his hand—and yet, it feels like little more than a fly.

It would take a savage ghost to do this.

Something powerful, yes, but…clearly not comfortable enough in it’s own ability to hunt to show it’s face directly, or to hunt larger prey.

No, this is a creature that lurks in the dark and preys upon children. His skills in magic and illusion are impressive enough, but…

Hua Cheng suspects, after seeing this ghost's handiwork, that it's combat skills must be subpar at best. And if that's the case—it will run away before the ghost king has the chance to approach it properly.

To make a proper greeting, if you will.

So, Hua Cheng decides to play.

The ghost fire isn't quite so addled now, when he lets it go—bouncing in front of him, waiting for orders—and when Hua Cheng speaks again, his voice is far different from how it was before.

"Take me where you were taking her," He commands. Quickly, the spirit complies.

They go deeper into the woods—and the longer it takes—the more the ghost king starts to notice the smell.

Death and rot. Blood—some of it old, some of it new.

This is practically a slaughterhouse, rather than a savage ghost's lair.

And for what purpose?

It's almost amusing, the way the creature doesn't seem to even be trying to properly hide it's identity, after all…

When Hua Cheng sees a pair of boots tangling through the treetops—he bows who it is.

He's disappointed to find that the creature is still alive—but not surprised

In the center of the forest, there's a place where the roots and branches meet, tangling into a small, tangled little nest. It's hosted many different species of rodent over the years. But never something quite this foul.

A robed figure sits upon a throne of brambles.

Several ghost fires hover around him, highlighting the acidic green hue of his eyes, dark hair falling around his face in a tangled mess as he snatches another spirit between his fingers, examining it.

"...Two silver pieces," he mumbles, discarding it. "How cheap."

He repeats the process over and over, snatching little ghosts between his fingers, estimating just how much they would sell for at the market, fingers trembling and squeezing them with annoyance.

Qi Rong was sold for eight silver pieces, once. What are they worth, in comparison?

Nothing. Nothing. Stupid, worthless souls, barely enough to sell for something interesting, even grouped together like this...

Then, he hears the sound of footsteps—and he sneers, not even bothering to look up. "It took you long enough," Qi Rong hisses. "This better be good."

And, trailing behind the ghost fire is...

A little boy.

Small, probably little more than seven or eight years old—with wild hair, tied into a loose braid over his shoulder.

And big, amber eyes—burning in the darkness.

A fine catch—this child looks like he has a strong soul!

A slow, sadistic grin spreads across Qi Rong's face, full of sharp teeth. Who knew this worthless little place was hiding an expensive creature like this?

"Hello, little one." He hisses, watching the little boy with hungry eyes. "What's your name?"

The child tips his head.

Instead of answering Qi Rong's question, he just takes another step forward, and while he has the voice of a child—he doesn't speak like one.

"Who are you, and what is this place?"

Brave.

A brave little fool.

Qi Rong's smile twists into a sneer.

"I am the Ghost King!" He balls his hands into fists, sitting up on his throne of thorns, "Can't you tell, you ignorant little whelp?! I am the ghost king, Qi Rong! Fresh from the bowels of hell!"

But instead of looking terrified, as he should be—

The little boy looks absolutely delighted.

"A ghost king?" His grin is lopsided, one sharpened canine sticking out. "You?"

The creature practically bears his teeth in response.

"Yes!"

"I thought Qi Rong was cousin to the Crown Prince of Xianle."

The green ghost pauses in the middle of lunging to throttle the child.

"...You know that?" He breathes, eyes widening. Drawn in by the promise of being recognized for what he used to be—

Wealthy. Royalty.

But then he remembers.

How it all came crashing down.

"...He's got nothing to do with me!" Qi Rong snarls. "I ditched that loser ages ago!"

The boy's eyes flash for a moment—but he doesn't waver.

"That's not what I heard."

The green ghost starts to snarl, and the little boy doesn't flinch.

"I heard the crown prince banished you."

Qi Rong pales.

"I heard he was so disgusted, he stripped you of your titles."

Qi Rong stumbles backwards, like he's been slapped. "...Who—who told you that?! It's a LIE! Who told you?! WHO TOLD YOU?!"

The boy doesn't flinch, just smiles even wider.

"Everyone knows that."

Part of Hua Cheng wonders if the green ghost will put the pieces together, but...

His expectations for the green ghost's intelligence were never that high, so he isn't particularly offended when Qi Rong continues to rage—

"IT'S NOT TRUE! IT'S NOT! I left him behind, he was just angry because I didn't wanna worship him anymore, HE'S the disgrace, not ME!"

Of course—that's exactly when he notices it. The rocks on the ground around them— they aren't stones, native to this forest.

They're fragments of marble. Rubble, left behind from...

Divine statues.

There's a face on the ground near his foot—all too familiar.

Suddenly, the air around the clearing is...different, from before. Slightly more menacing.

Qi Rong frowns, glancing around, sniffing—and he catches a whiff of something— something strong.

Spiritual power. More...more than the ghost is used to. But where...is it coming from?

Now, the kid speaks again, his voice cold. "I thought the Ghost King was a red spirit. Not green."

After all, those were the rumors.

Conveniently, Qi Rong seems to ignore the boy's red tunic. "That's just a rumor—it wasn't true! He's definitely green, alright?!"

"...And I thought Ghost Kings were supposed to be tall," the boy drawls, distinctly unimpressed.

A vein bulges in Qi Rong's forehead.

He, of course, doesn't even break 160 centimeters.

"I WAS tall! I don't know why my spirit formed like this, I—!" He grabs the boy by the neck.

In all honesty—Hua Cheng can't remember Qi Rong being taller than Xie Lian, even when he was alive. He was maybe half a head below than the prince—and in this form, he's shrunk even shorter than that.

A small piece of karma, he supposes.

"But can't Ghost Kings change the way they look?" The boy questions.

He doesn't sound like he's being throttled, even with the way he's dangling by Qi Rong's grip on his neck.

His eyes burn in the dark—and his gaze is imperious.

Slowly, the green ghost starts to pause.

"I..." He frowns, his brow pinched. How would a child know that?

"Couldn't you just make yourself taller?" The boy repeats—this time, his voice much lower.

Suddenly, he isn't dangling anymore—and Qi Rong has to reach far over his head to grip the man's neck.

"Like this?"

Suddenly, the clearing goes quiet—dead quiet. No little creatures scurrying in the night. Not even the sound of ghost fires flickering in the wind.

There's nothing, just—

Silence.

His eyes look down on him, burning sharply. Qi Rong's fingers begin to tremble. "...H...Hua Cheng?"

Of course, he knows him by that name. The entire ghost realm does—it was spread to every region of the land of the undead by those who turned back before becoming sealed into the gates of Mount Tonglu.

A beautiful name. A poetic name.

A killer's name.

His smile is just as much of a sneer as Qi Rong's was, sharp, framed with fangs and a cockiness that seems to permeate the air. “I was not aware that there were any other Ghost Kings.” He murmurs—and the moment Qi Rong lets him go, the green ghost is the one left dangling.

He struggles, feet kicking in the air, choking out apologies. “I-I meant no disrespect, young master, I—I—this ancestor didn’t know!”

“You think that makes a difference to me?” He muses, tightening his fingers, watching the ghost’s eyes bulge out of his head.

There was a time when this man towered over Hong-er.

It’s something he’ll forget in time—he always does.

Most people have two different responses to fear: fight, or flight.

Everyone who has ever known the ghost king would say the answer in Hua Cheng’s case was obvious.

Fight.

That wasn’t always true.

There was a different time. One where he was small. Scared. Struggling—but frightened. Because the man forcing him into a sack, dragging him towards that carriage—

His face was so similar to the one Hong-er saw that day.

‘DIANXA! DIANXIA! DIANXIA!’

The screams of the crowd echoed so clearly in his mind back then. The entrancing beauty of that face, the eyes looking down on him, squeezing Hong-er close, as he whispered the words—

‘Don’t be afraid.’

And so, he wasn’t.

But on that day, so many years ago…Hong-er was afraid.

Not of the pain. Even as a child that small—he was used to pain.

Not of dying. Hong-er had barely even lived at all by then—but he was so very ready to die.

He was afraid, when the man with a face so similar to that of his savior threw him into that sack, saying he was Xie Lian's cousin…

Hong-er was afraid that, somehow, the prince knew what was happening. That he knew this man was hurting him, and that he didn't care.

That was frightening. Truly, horrifically frightening.

Not Qi Rong, never Qi Rong—but the thought that the Crown Prince might be someone like him. That the one point of goodness in Hong-er's young life was that of fool's gold.

'My handsome, brave Hong-er.'

That was what his love used to call him—but it isn't very hard to be brave, when you've seen the worst of what the world can do. And there are still things that frighten Hua Cheng. The same things that frightened him when he had a different name. A different face.

But in the end, there was nothing to be afraid of after all.

Because the carriage was stopped—and even though all of the pain, the agony that Hong-er had never been afraid of, not truly—

There was the Crown Prince's face. Xie Lian's horrified, frightened face.

Hua Cheng hasn't felt real fear since that day. Not for himself. He's been afraid on Xie Lian's behalf many, many times, but…

He looks over the trembling, pitiful figure in his grip now.

Hua Cheng has never been frightened by Qi Rong, as a ghost or a human.

Not even when Qi Rong was torturing him. Murdering him.

Hong-er didn't feel fear when the former noble would plunge Fang Xin into his non- fatal point, twisting and sneering, trying to antagonize the teenager into screaming.

That was just pain. It wasn't frightening.

So many people hurt him in his human life—Qi Rong isn't even special in that regard, and as such, the Ghost King wouldn't have held a grudge for his own death normally. Not even for the torture, or the abuse he faced before that—no.

It was for what Qi Rong did after.

Being forced to watch as his god stumbled through the forest, calling out his name. Walking underneath Hong-er's lifeless body, over and over again, fearing—fearing the worst. Desperate to find him.

When Hong-er could only worry about how often Xie Lian was falling.

Scraping his hands, twisting his ankle. Hong-er never would have let him fall before— but now, he's legs wouldn't move. Never would have allowed his prince to continue on in such pain and discomfort before. Xie Lian wasn't so used to pain back then—but he pushed through it.

All to find him. When Hong-er already knew that it was too late. That the worst possible thing had already happened.

He was dead. Hong-er was dead, and all he could do was watch Xie Lian, and worry about it getting cold.

'It's going to snow.'

It was all so unclear back then. He was barely even a ghost fire, struggling to understand why he couldn't answer when Xie Lian called his name.

'It's going to snow soon, gege—you should get back inside.'

His lips wouldn't move, and they felt stiff—cold.

'You hate the cold.'

Hua Cheng has learned so much in the last twenty five years. More than any one human could in a lifetime. But among all of those things, he's learned a very rare secret:

Ghost Fires can weep.

Humans don't think of it that way, when they see sparks drifting from the small flame spirits forms, no. But that's what they are.

They poured from Hong-er's form when he tried to press close to Xie Lian's body in the snow—to keep him warm the way he once did during the nights.

'You have to stop mourning the life you could have had.'

That was what Zhao Beitong said—one of the most important lessons his Guoshi ever taught him. And yet, she was wrong about one thing:

Hong-er didn't mourn the loss of his own future.

At first, he wasn't particularly distressed about his own death at all. It was an afterthought, a frustrating barrier to protecting his god, but...

It was when he realized that he couldn't keep Xie Lian warm anymore —not ever again —that Hong-er truly began to mourn.

He's still mourning that—even now. And nobody mourns like a ghost.

"I...!" Qi Rong's feet are still flailing, his fingers clawing uselessly at Hua Cheng's wrist. "I said I was sorry, there's really no...no need for violence!"

Drawn from his thoughts, the ghost king's lips twist into a sardonic smile. "Was it necessary for you to slaughter so many human children? What was the purpose of that, exactly?"

"It..." Qi Rong's feet jerk slightly when Hua Cheng's thumb crushes into his trachea. "It was...a...Fundraising...effort!" He wheezes, not understanding why the ghost king cares. "What—what difference does it make to you?!"

After all—benevolent ghosts don't make it very far, in the afterlife. To be a ghost king, you have to be dripping with resentment and rage.

What are the lives of a few mortal children, in the eyes of a man like that?

Hua Cheng's fingers tighten to the point where the ghost can feel his vertebrae crush and snap. An all too familiar feeling by now, unfortunately—

"You took my name in order to do so." He muses.

As anyone might imagine by now—Hua Cheng has become somewhat protective over his name. He doesn't particularly enjoy seeing it misused.

"R-Really just your title—!" The ghost tries to argue, but when there's more crushing of his spine, he weeps. "Alright, alright, I'm sorry!"

His voice wails out into the night, echoing through the trees—like that of an animal caught in a trap, struggling for life. "You can't possibly mean to d-disperse me, can you?! It—it wasn't so great an offense—!"

It takes so much wealth and privilege, Hua Cheng thinks—for human suffering to be seen through such a warped lens. Bai Wuxiang wasn't wrong, when he said that to Xie Lian before.

Qi Rong only sees his actions through the scale of the severity of the consequences he faces after.

Even that day, when Xie Lian saved Hong-er from being dragged behind his carriage —Qi Rong measured the severity of the action through the consequences he faced from the king and queen. And to some extent, Feng Xin.

He didn't care that a child almost died—no. Not for a second.

He cared that his arm was broken. He cared that his carriage was taken.

And now, Hua Cheng knows—Qi Rong doesn't think Hua Cheng cares about the lives taken. And it certainly won't stop him from doing this again in the future.

For a moment, he considers destroying him.

It wouldn't be particularly difficult, and—he can see, from the way Qi Rong struggles, that the green ghost anticipates that outcome.

There's only one thing that stays his hand, in the end:

The memory of Xie Lian standing in the middle of a feasting hall, holding a flame.

White mourning robes, covered in blood—the curse pattern of his shackles gleaming in his eyes. His skin tinted with a hellish green glow as he held Qi Rong's form close, whispering to him viciously.

Hua Cheng doubts it's a memory the god looks back on fondly now, but…

Just thinking back on it makes the ghost king's heart ache with longing.

"P…Please…!"

And it's irritating, to have this sniveling, irrelevant creature's whining intruding upon such a lovely image.

So, Hua Cheng crushes his throat entirely to silence him. "NNNGH!"

He releases his fingers then, leaving the green ghost to collapse on the ground, clutching his neck as he writhes with pain.

It should be a familiar feeling for him, then.

“I won’t disperse you,” Hua Cheng murmurs, slowly tilting his head.

Not out of a lack of desire.

But because that decision has already been made.

Xie Lian could have dispersed Qi Rong in that moment with ease—but he chose to allow the spirit to continue on.

It was his god’s wish—and Hua Cheng won’t violate that now. “Not quite, anyway.” He flexes his fingers.

But he’ll come to the very brink of it. What happens to the spirit from there, in the end—is up to him.

“You called yourself a ghost king,” he murmurs, standing over Qi Rong’s broken form. “Would you like to see what that means?”

After all—most people don’t.

Bai Wuxiang was a calamity to be feared. A bringer of war, destruction, and plague— but rarely did he ever enter the field of combat directly.

Rarely did the world ever see the true scope of a Ghost King’s strength.

Hua Cheng is still exploring the limits of that strength now. But this, well—

Qi Rong watches as small, silvery creatures creep in on the forest floor around him. Rats.

The butterflies, he thinks, wouldn’t do for dealing with a creature such as him.

The green ghost struggles to move, pained sounds coming out of his throat as the little wraith spirits begin gnawing at the edges of his form, quickly draining his spiritual power.

This doesn’t even feel like so much as flexing one’s pinky. Hardly even an effort at all.

Qi Rong can see that, even now, as he's pushed to the brink of utter destruction, flailing uselessly as the silver spirits crawl all over him, knowing at every exposed piece of flesh—

Hua Cheng isn't even watching. He's examining the dirt under his nails. Like he's bored.

"You don't seem particularly bright, so I'll be explicit with you," he sighs, turning on his heel as the rats reduce Qi Rong to exactly where he started, twenty three years before:

Back into a Ghost Fire.

"I'm not a patient man. When someone pisses me off, well..." He smirks. "Do you want to know what pisses me off, Qi Rong?" The Ghost King continues, slowly starting to walk back down the forest path. The butterflies have returned now, slamming into the ghost fire over and over again, strongarming the little thing into following their master.

His boots crunch softly against the leaves, dry and brittle as autumn begins to settle in. Silver bells chime softly in the breeze.

"When people touch what's mine."

When you're born with nothing, you grab onto the things life gives you—and you hang on tightly.

Up until recently—there was very little in Hua Cheng's life he could truly claim as his own.

There were things he desired to claim before, yes—but he had no right to them, and was forced to let such hopes go.

But he was a lonely child. One who grew into a selfish teenager. And now, Hua Cheng is a possessive man.

"Lay a finger on my worshippers, and I will find you," the ghost king muses, glancing up at the sky. "And I will do this to you again."

It isn't so much of a threat as it is a promise—because he knows Qi Rong can't help himself.

His survival instincts might not be bad—but his impulse control is absolutely abysmal.

But that's fear that Qi Rong has to live with, and Hua Cheng, well...

He gets to enjoy it.

The Ghost King has never acknowledged the fact that he actually has worshippers. Not until now.

He still isn't sure if it counts, given the fact that he willingly descended but... They've been praying to him all this time, and now he's answered.

That forms a certain sort of relationship, whether you want it to or not. When they exit the forest, Hua Cheng finally hears it—

Rain.

The soft pattering of drops falling down through the treetops, only hitting the top of the ghost king's head when they make it out into the open—and when he sticks out his palm—

He finds it stained with red.

"...Again?" He muses, rubbing his fingertips together.

The last time this happened was on Mount Tonglu, back when he first forged E-Ming. At the time, he thought of it more as a...freak incident, more than anything else.

Now, as the blood begins to pour—he feels a rush of power that comes with it, crackling through his veins.

And now, he realizes—he was that one that caused it before. That is causing it now.

That Hua Cheng's rage could be something so profound, that after releasing it upon a creature like Qi Rong—even in what felt like a pitifully small dose—

He could make the sky weep bloody tears.

Something about that satisfies him. Bringing some small measure of peace to the torn, bloody ache in his heart that has haunted him all these years.

The ghost fire trembles behind him, sizzling each time a drop of blood lands on it's form—and Hua Cheng pulls out...

An umbrella.

It unfolds with ease as he lifts it over his head, watching the bloody downpour around him.

Not the first time he's used to the spiritual device—nor the last. And he doubts, in the end, that his god ever knew that he kept it. But...

'If you can't find a meaning in life...'

His fingers tighten around the handle of the umbrella, remembering.

'Allow me to be that meaning.'

Words that were given in kindness—even if Xie Lian likely put very little thought into them at the time. Such a small, forgettable moment to a god.

But those small moments...

He glances down, catching sight of a small white flower on the ground, it's petals slowly becoming stained by the rain

Those moments, so small in the gaze of a god, can mean everything in the life of a child.

He doesn't think much of it then, tipping the umbrella forward to shield the little thing from the downpour.

His mind is already so far away, haunted by memories of how many flowers, just like this, he used to find for his god each day.

Hua Cheng remembers the flower he placed in Xie Lian's hair, the last day he saw him. How wilted and tired it looked beneath the rain.

He tried so hard to protect him as Wu Ming. Knowing that it was often in vain— because Xie Lian had no desire to be saved.

Still, he tried.

Knowing that no pain lasts forever. That eventually, his god would return to himself again—

And how horrified Xie Lian would be, when he saw the things that grief and resentment could lead him to do.

Humans might worship gods on pedestals—but only because those gods placed themselves on those pedestals to begin with.

No one falls further than a god—and no one mourns them quite like a Ghost.

Maybe as Hong-er, he could have said something. Done something to help him more.

Hong-er was someone the prince knew. Someone he trusted. But—

But who was Wu Ming? No one. Nothing. A creature that didn't even have a name.

And it was not his place to interfere in Xie Lian's decisions—not even his own self destruction.

He could only follow—and watch.

Watch as that flower wilted in the rain.

Alone. So, horribly alone.

Until it came under the shelter of a worn out, slightly bent bamboo hat.

Hua Cheng thinks about that, now—watching a slightly bloody flower take shelter from the rain.

He remembers, and it aches.

He doesn't know that a young girl is watching him from her bedroom window, her eyes wide as she peers through the night.

The sight should be frightening, and yet…

She knows, watching the shape of that umbrella tip forward, that the young man holding it is the one who saved her

The Ghost King, the crimson ghost, Hua Chengzhu— No.

More than just a crimson ghost, she thinks—watching the way the bloody rain drops fall all around him.

What she's watching—it doesn't feel like something as simple as a ghost haunting the night, no.

It's more significant.

This feels like something out of a story—no, a fairytale.

And such tales have names that carry the beauty they hold within.

Of all of the times that Hua Cheng would make the sky rain with blood—he found this incident to be among the least significant.

Pest removal, if anything

And yet—it’s the night that earned him his proper title. One verse in a song of four—

‘Crimson Rain Sought Flower.’

At first, he found it a bit off base, but...then again, what else is he doing, if not walking through the bloody rain, constantly seeking the flower?

Xie Lian told himself, when he began his second banishment, that he was going to start over. That this was a new leaf, and he wouldn’t turn to the methods he had once before, when he was foolish and young, determined to unleash his grief on the world.

And he meant it.

In the years since, he hasn’t brought any harm to humans. He hasn’t cheated or stolen from anyone. In general, he’s lived his life by respectable means.

Just a simple Taoist.

But Xie Lian never expected to find himself placed in this sort of situation.

One where he’s expected to stand aside, and allow something horrible to continue— simply because heaven mandates that it isn’t his ‘place’ to interfere.

But Xie Lian isn’t a god. Not right now, anyway, and...He’s regretted his failures to help mortals—but never the act of trying.

Knock knock!

The boy stumbles toward the front door, rubbing his eyes irritably as he opens it, only to find...

A blind Taoist in white cultivation robes, flanked by a thin, angry looking child, half hiding behind his side.

“...Mr. Hua?!”

“Heng,” Xie Lian smiles in return.

“What are you doing here?” He mumbles with a frown. “It’s not even sunrise. I don’t have to work for another four hours! I get to sleep a little more! I—”

“It’s not about that,” Xie Lian shakes his head, pulling Yan out from behind him. “I need you to keep him here with you tonight.”

Heng stumbles back inside the doorway, looking at Yan like he’s a cockroach that the taller boy would rather smash before he makes his way inside.

Yan doesn’t look particularly pleased about the situation either, but...

Xie Lian smiles sweetly, gripping both children by the shoulders as he steers them inside.

“It’s important to make friends at a young age,” he explains calmly. “Otherwise you’ll end up all alone like me, understand?”

“...That’s depressing,” Yan mumbles, hanging his chin.

“At least I won’t end up blind like you!” Heng grumbles, tugging at Xie Lian’s grip on his arm. “And Yan’s already all alone, that’s not my —!”

He stops when the Taoist leans in front of him, still smiling—but there’s a sharpness to it now.

“Do you know how I lost my sight, Heng?”

Slowly, the boy shakes his head—and Xie Lian’s smile widens. “Someone asked me to do a good deed, and I said no.”

Not exactly the truth, but from the way he can hear Heng’s heart throb with terror in response, it’s an effective lie.

The two boys are left behind in the doorway, Yan holding himself tightly while Heng glares, eventually forcing himself to turn back. “If you want to sleep, there’s an extra blanket. But if you try to get in my bed—I’ll kill you.”

The smaller boy is quiet for a moment, then—

"...Okay," he mumbles, stumbling after him.

Xie Lian had Yan carefully describe the path to his father's house to him before—and now, it's a fairly easy path to walk. He stumbles once or twice, occasionally catching himself with his hand against the trunk of a nearby tree.

The bark is wet now—but he can't remember it raining before. There's also a faint smell of iron, like blood...but he can't seem to place it.

Either way, there isn't much time to contemplate it. He has something a little more pressing on his mind, now.

It's a small walk up the hill, to make it to the cottage that Yan described—and the entire way there, Xie Lian is contemplating.

This isn't exactly a situation that can be worked out with words. Maybe Xie Lian would have thought that in his youth, but now...

He isn't so naive.

It's something he's silently wrestling with, walking to the doorstep of the house, rapping on the door with three sharp knocks.

Can he settle this situation without harming the human? Does he—?

"I swear to the GODS if you're not dead, I'll KILL YOU MYSELF!"

...Does he want to?

He feels the door swing open aggressively as Yan's father stumbles outside, liquor coming off of him like a stale stench—hears the rush of air as he swings his head around, trying to catch sight of the child—before his gaze finally settles on Xie Lian.

"...Who are you?!"

"..." The god smiles, clasping his hands in front of him in a friendly gesture. "Good evening—you have a son named Yan, is that correct?"

"...Yes," the farmer grouses, wiping at his nose. "What's it to you?"

"Well, I came across the child with some other kids from town," Xie Lian explains calmly, "and they were trying to summon a Ghost King."

“I…” The man’s eyebrows knit together. “What?! What sort of nonsense is that?! Where’s the little brat now? When I get my hands on him—!”

“I left him with Heng’s family for the evening,” Xie Lian continues, a forced smile in place. “But I hope you aren’t trying to imply you’d resort to violence.”

“…” The farmer stops, breathing heavily, looking the Taoist over. He recognizes him from town, he thinks.

“…Mr. Hua, isn’t it?”

Xie Lian bobs his head politely. “Yes. The children—they seemed to think the Ghost King could help them, if they were being mistreated.”

The farmer stiffens, his shoulders rising defensively. “Would your son have a reason to summon him, you think?”

“…The boy’s been disturbed since his mother died,” the older man mutters, hands balled into fists by his sides. “He’s prone to telling tales to get attention. Nothing to worry yourself over.”

The lines are practiced. He’s said them many times. Xie Lian can tell.

“…I see,” he murmurs. “Well, I thought I should check, nonetheless. Thank you for setting my mind at ease.”

It’s not as though he can use physical violence to threaten the man, can he? “It’s alright, little priest—safe journey home, now.”

Xie Lian turns around with a frown.

It’s been a long time since he was so frustrated with his limitations as a god. And—he knows it wouldn’t be hard to eliminate this man. That no one would miss him, and that some might even thank Xie Lian for it.

But didn’t he swear that he wouldn’t resort to such things again?

He—

“I swear, that boy wants to see ghosts everywhere he looks,” the man mutters when he thinks Xie Lian is out of earshot. “If that’s what he wants, he can go join his dead whore for a mother for all I care.”

The prince pauses in mid step. Ah. There it is.

He reaches into his robes for a moment, slowly working through a newly formed idea in his mind—lifting out a small silver ring, pressing his lips against it.

“I’m sorry, Hong-er.” He murmurs under his breath. “I promised I wouldn’t do this sort of thing anymore, but...”

But this is important.

Finally, Xie Lian turns around, settling his gaze—unseeing, but still unnerving, on the farmer.

(He doesn’t know that, only a few kilometers away, a ghost king rubs the back of his neck with a shiver.)

“Sir?”

The farmer pauses, glancing up.

“...What is it?”

Xie Lian smiles, slowly tipping his head to the side, his voice perfectly pleasant— friendly, even, as he speaks again—

“Yan told me everything.”

The older man goes stock still, eyes bulging out of his head. “He—?!”

“He showed me the scars.” Xie Lian explains.

Of course—Xie Lian had to touch them to know that they were there, but once he did, the prince knew exactly what made them.

A whip.

“And that made me believe he was telling the truth about the rest of it, as well.”

He listens, as Yan’s father’s pulse begins to race.

There were other things the child told Xie Lian. Things that wouldn’t leave scars, but cut all the deeper.

“I’m going to tell,” Xie Lian concludes, turning back around. “That’s why I left Yan somewhere else, tonight. I thought it was only decent to tell you first.”

If this were any other situation—if Xie Lian were any other person, it would be an incredibly foolish thing to do. A naive thing to do.

But now, he simply starts making his way back down the path towards the village— and when he hears quiet footsteps following, he smiles.

Humans can surprise you, in Xie Lian's experience. Many of them have a goodness in them that can come out when you least expect it.

But there are just as many who are never surprising. Who will always disappoint. This man is one of the latter—which works to Xie Lian's advantage

Even if he pretends not to notice, he's expecting it when the farmer creeps up on him from behind.

And this method—it works perfectly for his needs.

When a set of hands wrap around his throat behind, the cultivator makes a big show of gasping, letting out a strangled whimper.

Objectively, he's aware of just how violently the man is squeezing his throat. Can feel his windpipe being crushed as those fingers squeeze tighter with each passing moment.

But it doesn't hurt, not really.

Even when he's lifted from the ground, feet flailing with feigned weakness. His hands tremble as he 'tries' to pull the farmer's fingers off of his throat.

Fingers that Xie Lian could crush with a flick of his wrist, if he desired—but now, he does no such thing.

Then, when he finally goes limp—those hands let him go, and his body goes crumpling down against the dirt.

He lays there for a moment, hair covering his face—utterly still. Not breathing.

The farmer stares down at him, hands trembling, his own breaths becoming ragged.

Xie Lian remains limp, when he feels fingers wrap around his ankles—slowly dragging him into the underbrush.

It's kind of nice, he thinks. Almost like being carried. He can't remember the last time someone ever carried him. The occasional rock bumps his head—but it's not too bad

Eventually, he's left behind a bush—the brilliant plan of a mean spirited drunk to get rid of a body. Very impressive—Xie Lian is trembling with awe of his ingenious little scheme.

He stumbles back towards his house, and Xie Lian feels Ruoye tremble against his throat woefully.

Poor thing, probably feels horrible that the god wouldn't allow it to help. But that wasn't the point.

Xie Lian lies against the forest floor, stroking his fingers over the ring thoughtfully.

'I'm sorry, Hong-er,' he thinks to himself, staring into the dark void of his shackles

'I know I said I wouldn't do this anymore.'

He promised to take better care of himself, in his second banishment. And Xie Lian does try, but...he isn't very good at it, honestly.

'But there was a child in danger this time. You would understand, if you were here—I promise.'

Once his throat finishes the process of reconstructing itself—it takes a little over an hour—he rises to his feet.

He clutches Hong-er between his fingers again—but Xie Lian doesn't bother with apologizing this time. It would seem sincere, given what he's about to do.

In the cottage at the seat of the hill—there's sharp rapping at the door.

Knock, knock, knock!

"..." The farmer rubs his temple, rising to his feet, staggering through the kitchen once more. "Have you finally dragged your miserable ass home, you little—?!"

The door swings open, and he freezes up with terror.

Standing in the doorway—his throat clearly bruised, but otherwise unharmed—is a Taoist.

A blind Taoist, wearing cultivator's robes.

"Hello," Xie Lian smiles kindly. "Are you Yan's father?"

"..." The farmer trembles. "I...I'm..." he takes a step back, his throat dry. Had he...had he not finished the job somehow? "I-I am..."

The Taoist's smile widens, making the older man's heart drop into the pit of his stomach.

"He told me everything," Xie Lian explains, turning around. "I'm going to tell."

He begins his slow walk down the mountain path once more, and once again, he's all too aware of the sound of the farmer stumbling after him.

It almost hurts, the second time—but only because he uses a knife. The feeling of a blade against the god's skin brings back bad memories

He lets out a pained cry when the knife plunges into his back, over and over again, even makes a scene by rolling over onto his back, throwing his arms up to shield his face—before going limp once more, his blood pooling beneath him on the ground.

There's a bit more effort, now.

This time, when he drags Xie Lian into the forest—there's an attempt to bury him. Not fantastic, really—it's barely more than a foot deep, and his boots are sticking out. But he can't say that there's not a very, very shallow learning curve when it comes to Yan's father.

Xie Lian lays there again, wiggling his toes. The farmer didn't seem particularly concerned with mopping up the blood spatter—but then again, there was all of that blood around before—maybe Xie Lian's blends in.

How did that happen, anyway? He... Ruoye is writhing in protest now

The spiritual tool is attached to him—more so than most devices of such nature. It's primary purpose is protection, after all—not combat.

Being forced to watch this happen to the prince over and over again...leaves the poor thing distressed.

"I'm sorry," Xie Lian murmurs. "But this is the best way."

After all—Xie Lian can sit up now. He can brush the dirt from his robes, and make his way back up the hill.

Yan wouldn't be able to do that, if his father harmed him. He knocks on the door once more.

It's not the most graceful method, he'll admit.

"He told me everything."

But each time he says those words, the man's eyes widen just a little more with fright. "I'm going to tell."

In the hours before sunrise, Xie Lian is strangled. Stabbed. Drowned in the river at the foot of the hill. And each time, he makes his way back

He never lays a finger on the farmer—not once.

But in the hours after sunrise, there's a light set of knocks on a different door.

The Broken Trio

Chapter Summary

> “I’m back!”
>
> A voice crows, and in the doorway stands a tall, lean young man with long, jet black hair—dressed in dark lavender robes. And in each hand, he holds a rabbit. “Ma, I thought you might want something nice for tonight’s dinner to welcome me back!” He exclaims, dropping them down.
>
> “Where’s my little brother? I thought he’d be waiting at the door to greet—”
>
> He stops, however, when he sees a dark haired beauty dressed at their table, dressed in red silk, and his eyes go wide.

Chapter Notes

> You can find me on twitter and keep up with current updates of the story HERE
>
> CONTENT WARNING: MENTIONED SUICIDE

The tradesman yawns, scratching the back of his head as he walks past his wife, in the middle of starting breakfast. “Did you order something?”`

She glances back over her shoulder, shaking her head, “Between waking up and cooking your breakfast, did I have time to order something from the market? No.” She grouses, wiping her hands off on a cloth.

Her husband sighs, rubbing his neck. “No need for the attitude, my love…”

When he opens the door—there’s a figure standing there, and for a moment, he almost doesn’t recognize him.

“…Mr. Hua?!” He finally gasps, looking him over.

After all, his hair is loose now—and he isn’t wearing his typical white robes.

Actually, with the cut, and the red and gold color of the cloth...

He almost mistook the young cultivator for a bride. If not for the bandage around his face, he wouldn't have recognized him at all.

Xie Lian smiles awkwardly, "I know, I must look strange..."

It's not as though he could walk around in dirty, bloodstained robes after all. And he does normally keep an extra set of his white robes at all times, but...

He still hasn't replaced the set he lost in a house fire two months before, so it couldn't be helped.

"My robes kept on getting dirty. I don't know if you've had the chance to notice, but... there's a lot of blood on the road, for some reason."

"I did notice that," the huntsman's wife frowns, turning around. "What on earth do you think could have happened?"

"I don't know,"

Xie Lian shakes his head, letting out a sigh. "But I'm afraid I have some very unfortunate news."

"Oh?" The wife sets down the cloth she was using to wipe off her hands, her expression stern. "Was it something Heng did? I swear, Mr. Hua, if he's given you any trouble—!"

"No!"

The young man is quick to correct her, shaking his head. "He was actually quite a help to me last night! I think...he had some sense that one of the local children was in trouble. Yan? I brought him here last night."

"...Yes," the huntsman agrees, rubbing his chin. "We saw."

"He told me some...concerning things about his situation," Xie Lian explains, his eyebrows knitting as he frowns deeply. "And he showed me...proof, left behind on his body."

The parents look at each other, silently horrified.

Of course—everyone knew that Yan's father had a tendency towards alcohol and violence. Particularly after the...questionable circumstances of his wife's passing. He was vile, and everyone knew it. But…

Yan wasn’t exactly a reliable narrator either, so no one ever listened.

But they’re deeply religious folk—and their trust in the young Taoist is absolute. Now, they have to believe the veracity of the tales.

“Oh, that poor child…” The wife whispers, covering her mouth. “I…I’m so sorry that we didn’t…”

“It’s taken care of now,” Xie Lian sighs. “But now the situation has gotten a little bit messy.”

The parents stare at him, waiting—and now…the Taoist enters questionable territory.

Lying—but for a good reason.

“Well, after leaving Yan here, I went to tell his father what the child had told me…” The Taoist frowns.

“And that I would be reporting it to the authorities. It only seemed like the right thing to do. I even came back at sunrise, to see if he wanted to come and turn himself in before I had to, but…” He hangs his head. “I suppose my warning pushed him to…”

“Oh!” The wife gasps. “That’s…that’s just horrible, I…”

Xie Lian nods, his lower lip wobbling slightly. “I can’t help but wonder if things would have been different, if I had waited until morning…”

“Don’t blame yourself, young man,” the huntsman shakes his head, patting Xie Lian’s arm. “You did the right thing.”

“Yes…” Xie Lian sighs, turning his head in the direction of Heng’s room, “but that poor boy, I can’t imagine what will become of him now…”

The parents look at one another—not unaware of the underlying question in the cultivator’s words.

“…I suppose I could use the extra hand around here…” The huntsman mutters, scratching his head. “It would do Heng good, to have a child his age around.”

Xie Lian thinks Heng might prefer drowning himself in the river, but he smiles pleasantly. “I was thinking the same thing!”

“...If we do this,” the wife speaks up, “Could we ask just a small favor in return? It shouldn’t trouble you too much, hopefully.”

Xie Lian considers the matter, tapping his chin. “What is it?”

“It’s our eldest son, Kuo,” she explains, reaching over to pour the tea.

“He’s been a ranger for a little while now, working for the local magistrates, but...” She sighs, looking to her husband, who shakes his head with exasperation. “He’s restless.”

“Thinks he’s too good for this place, is what it is.” The huntsman huffs, crossing his arms.

“I’ve tried to knock some sense into him, it’s no good.”

Xie Lian tilts his head, arching an eyebrow. “I’m not sure how I could help with restlessness—”

“He wants to study cultivation,” The Huntsman’s wife explains. “We sent him to study under a master in the city, but...”

Her husband glares at the wall stormily. “He’s never exactly been good with following strict rules.”

Well, that explains why Heng kept bringing up the fact that Xie Lian got kicked out over and over again. Initially, the god assumed the child was just being difficult, but...

The child was clearly anxious for his older brother. Actually, it explains a lot of the behavioral issues, he...

“...I’m hardly worthy of being anyone’s teacher,” Xie Lian mutters, shaking his head, prepared to explain (vaguely) his own failings, but...

Before he can, the huntsman’s wife reaches for his hand, squeezing gently. “You have much to offer the world, young man.” She reassures him. “A person is so much more than just their eyes.”

Xie Lian pauses—because that’s not what he meant, but... He finds himself genuinely moved “...I’ll be traveling soon,” Xie Lian explains. “South. It’s not good for my cultivation method if I stay in one place for too long, but...”

(Really, it’s got nothing to do with that—but Xie Lian’s bad luck tends to drag others down if he lingers for too long.)

"He could travel with me, if he would like." The god murmurs, bowing his head in assent. "Though not for too long—I'm sure he'll want to return to his family quickly."

The huntsman seems doubtful of that—and in that moment, the front door slams open.

"I'm back!"

A voice crows, and in the doorway stands a tall, lean young man with long, jet black hair—dressed in dark lavender robes. And in each hand, he holds a rabbit. "Ma, I thought you might want something nice for tonight's dinner to welcome me back!" He exclaims, dropping them down.

"Where's my little brother? I thought he'd be waiting at the door to greet—"

He stops, however, when he sees a dark haired beauty dressed at their table, dressed in red silk, and his eyes go wide.

"You didn't..." He starts, pointing a trembling finger in the stranger's direction "I'm not ready to get married!" He cries, slightly terrified—but when the stranger turns their head, his expression changes slightly upon seeing an...admittedly lovely face.

"..." Xie Lian isn't sure how to react when he hears the sound of someone scrambling to kneel before him.

He feels a hand grasping his own firmly, giving it a gentle squeeze—and then the young man (Kuo) speaks again, this time clearly trying to lower his voice in order to sound a little manlier, "...I will dedicate my entire life to you, my precious flower!"

Xie Lian doesn't react immediately, his face frozen with shock—and across the table, the huntsman drops his head into his hands with an irritated groan.

"You are making a fool out of yourself, boy!"

"Love at first sight can make a man a fool!" Kuo exclaims with no hint of shame.

"I don't know," Xie Lian replies dryly, allowing the young man to kiss the back of his hand—it feels oddly reminiscent of his younger days. Men and women alike would travel for thousands of miles to present themselves before the Crown Prince of Xianle…

…Only to experience sharp disappointment when they learned the conditions of his cultivation method. "It sounded like you were afraid of commitment, before."

Kuo starts, a little surprised by how deep his bride's voice is—but not deterred in the least! "I've changed!"

"In the last thirty seconds," his mother replies, her tone just as dry as Xie Lian's.

"Yes!" Kuo nods emphatically, clutching Xie Lian's hand against his cheek. "Thank you mother, you couldn't have picked a better match—!"

"If we picked a match for you, it wouldn't be Hua—!"

His father snarls, his face slowly starting to turn purple, and Kuo squeezes Xie Lian's hand, looking terribly offended on his behalf.

"You think I care that she's blind?! I don't! I can see plenty for both of us!"

'Oh,' Xie Lian thinks offhandedly, allowing his hand to be tugged to and fro in Kuo's grip, 'that's actually rather sweet.'

An idiotic young man, but clearly a decent one.

"He's NOT A WOMAN!" The huntsman stands up, his chair screeching. "That is a MAN!"

There's a pause.

Xie Lian smiles awkwardly, waiting for the young man to cringe away or howl with disgust about being tricked, but—

Kuo doesn't let go of his hand, if anything—just holds on tighter. "And I'm OPEN MINDED!"

His mother lets out an irritated cry, "STOP EMBARRASSING US!"

The huntsman is on the brink of ripping his hair out at this rate. "We go through ALL of the trouble of finding you a cultivation master that ISN'T obligated to kick you out after three weeks of your behavior, and you ruin it in FIVE SECONDS—!"

“He’s a CULTIVATION MASTER?!” Kuo cries, “My wife is a—?!”

Xie Lian is whipping his head around, trying to keep up with the shouting voices, when he hears the sound of Kuo getting slapped upside the head by his father—hard.

“HE. IS. NOT. YOUR. WIFE!” The older man howls, “Would you GET IT TOGETHER?!”

“...I’m not offended,” Xie Lian finally speaks up, managing to get the group to fall into stormy silence. Well—Kuo’s parents are scowling, the young man is still holding Xie Lian’s hand, looking up at him with big, starstruck eyes. “But...”

He scrambles for some explanation that will satisfy the parents,while also letting the boy down easy, so...

Carefully, the cultivator pulls at the silver chain around his neck, lifting out a finely crafted ring—a ruby set in its face.

“I’m already married,” he explains gently.

Another lie, one of many that he’s told this morning—but the first he almost wishes was the truth.

“Is that so?” The huntsman speaks up, eyes wide. “You never mentioned a wife before, Mr. Hua.”

“...They’re no longer with us,” Xie Lian explains with a tight smile in place.

“Oh,” Kuo’s mother frowns, leaning over to squeeze Xie Lian’s shoulder, “I’m so sorry to hear that, dear...”

The rest of the arrangements are quick enough to work out—to the couple’s shock, the Taoist isn’t so disgusted by their son’s overtures that he would go back on their deal

By the time the sun has fully risen, Xie Lian has changed into a slightly less ostentatious set of blue robes (he’ll have to make another white set the next time they stop), and kneels between Yan and Heng very seriously, holding both of their hands in his firmly.

“...You two need to look after one another now, understand?” He murmurs, his tone stern.

“...” Heng looks away with a huff, glaring with annoyance. “I already have a shitty big brother that leaves all the time, I don't need an even shittier little brother!"

"Who said I wanted a big brother like YOU, anyway?! Besides, I'm barely younger than you, piss off!" Yan cries with a glare—but he holds onto Xie Lian's hand tightly.

"...Because it's just the two of you now," the cultivator explains, his gaze clearly strained beneath Ruoye.

Both boys stop, looking down at him. "I won't be around to make you stop fighting anymore," Xie Lian explains, his voice slightly unsteady, like...

Like he's thinking about something else.

"So, you have to try and get along, okay?" He squeezes their hands even tighter.

No one can see it—but beneath Ruoye, his eyes are hot and swimming with tears. 'Because you're going the rest of the way without me.'

'And I am so, so glad that you are.'

"...Mr. Hua? Are you...?"

He can't see them, but even if he could—he would see something else.

Xie Lian would see a gangly palace guard, crossing his arms and scowling in the opposite direction—and a young servant, clutching a broom between fingers that tremble with anger.

'I just wish we could have done it together, that's all.'

"...I'm alright," he reassures them both.

Then, Xie Lian smiles—a shaky one, the sort that hurts—

But it's a good hurt. The kind that feels like letting out a deep sigh after a good cry. It's just...growing.

And that hurts, sometimes.

"Let me tell you a secret," He murmurs—and both boys lean closer, listening closely.

Xie Lian's smile brightens—then it softens.

Heng has complained every single moment that he's spent with the Taoist. They haven't gotten along—and that's mostly his fault—but now, he realizes...

He's going to miss Xie Lian, when he goes. Yan clings to his hand even tighter.

"...The most important people in your life," the cultivator explains gently, looking back and forth between the two of them, "are the ones who grow up with you."

You never realize it when it's happening—because life is always so fast and out of focus when you're young.

Xie Lian always kept his eyes pointed forward—and he never stopped to look at the people around him. He thought he did. Thought he was a good friend, a good ruler, a good son, but...

When he finally stopped to look at the people that once stood beside him...there was no one left.

All he could do was sit by the sea, taking in the sunset one last time—and realize that there was no one to blame but him.

Not his parents, not his friends—not even Bai Wuxiang—

And never Hong-er. Never, in any world, would he ever blame Hong-er.

The only one to blame was him.

He pushed them away, or didn't fight hard enough to keep them safe, or—

Or he just didn't listen.

The boys glance at one another again, this time with slightly less distaste, and—to Xie Lian's surprise, it's Heng who speaks up first.

"...Yeah, fine." He mumbles, looking away. "I won't beat him up, or whatever."

It's not exactly a glowing promise to live together in peace and harmony, but...That wasn't what Xie Lian was asking for, anyway.

It's been several years since he came to this village, and the region surrounding. Long enough to get used to it.

Now, it almost feels like starting a new path all over again. Like...this is one juncture, where his life could have gone in two very different directions. It's hard to know if he chose the right one—Xie Lian never does, until it's very far behind him.

"You said you wanted to go south?" Kuo muses from his side, holding a truly massive crate of Xie Lian's weaving supplies in his arms, along with his own belongings on his back.

(Xie Lian can lift the crate with one finger, but the young man insisted.)

"I know a great spot!"

He explains. "There's a TON of natural hot springs and rivers. Bet you feel nervous about using public baths, right? Worried someone might take advantage? Well," the youth beams, "now you've got me!"

Xie Lian smiles, half amused, half sardonic. "Oh, thank goodness." He replies.

"And the food—you'll love it! You like spicy food, right? Ah, well, if you don't, you just gotta try the right kind—" He stops, noticing the way that Xie Lian has come to a halt in the street beside him. "...You alright, Mr. Hua?"

"...Is that a temple?" Xie Lian murmurs.

"It is," Kuo agrees, tilting his head to the side. "You wanna get some prayers done before we hit the road? I don't usually go to that one, but—"

"Which god is it for?"

(Come to think of it, Kuo doesn't know how his teacher knew it was a temple, but he lets it go.)

A few minutes later, Xie Lian finds himself kneeling on a small pillow left out for worshippers, hands clasped in his lap, struggling to think of what to say. If—If he should even say anything at all, an incense stick burning before him.

Around him, other visitors whisper.

"His divine statue is lovely, don't you think? The general must be so handsome!"

"Oh," a woman laughs softly behind her hand. "I heard that if any of his divine statues aren't to his liking, he'll destroy them and send a deputy to sculpt another."

"Hah?! Really?!"

"So vain!"

Xie Lian bites back laughter, shaking his head fondly. That sounds like him.

'I spent so long being angry with you…' He thinks to himself, fiddling with a thin piece of thread between his fingers. 'But I never stopped to think about why…about what was going on in your life.'

It's hard, growing up with the expectation that you'll always be the center of your own story. Everyone else in your life becomes a member of the supporting cast, and in a way…

It stops you from thinking of them as their own people. With their own lives, and their own…

Xie Lian tilts his chin up, staring blankly at the divine statue before him, wondering if it's a close likeness at all, or the face of an insecure boy, trying to place expensive masks over his expression.

Like that could make him feel as though he belongs.

'…That boy reminded me so much of you,' he thinks.

Difficult to deal with. Always lashing out and making the other children run away, complaining about his bad personality.

And when he tried to tell the other villagers that he was in pain, no one listened to his story.

They just complained about his 'bad' personality, brushing the rest off.

Had Xie Lian allowed others to do that around him, before? Not that his friend ever tried to say anything of the sort, but…

Had the prince ever really given him a chance?

'Was someone hurting you, too?' Xie Lian's fingers tremble in his lap. 'If you had told me, would I have listened?'

He spent so long just assuming a friendship was there—only because

Xie Lian wanted it to be. Because having a normal person in his life was refreshing.

But did he ever pay attention, really?

If he's taking a brutal moral inventory of his actions—Xie Lian doesn't think he did. There were moments when it was obvious that his friend was in a difficult situation.

Even that one time, when he stopped the guards from scolding him for taking fruit from the orchard home to his family…Xie Lian never asked the boy why he needed to take them. Just told his friend that he could take as much fruit as he wanted, whenever he wanted.

That was all Xie Lian ever did. In his mind, the only real problem in his friend's life came from poverty. So, if Xie Lian just gave him things—food, money, opportunities —then he just magically wouldn't have problems anymore.

Because Mu Qing was two dimensional to him, then.

Xie Lian never considered his situation that deeply. Just offered him everything he could, over and over again—and felt irritation when Mu Qing viewed his generosity with suspicion.

'I'm not doing it so you'll thank me, or so you'll owe me,' Xie Lian used to think to himself.

'I'm doing it because we're friends.'

But what was Xie Lian thinking, when Mu Qing didn't help him that day, on the mountain? What was he thinking when Mu Qing said those words in anger in front of Feng Xin?

'How could you?'

That's what he had thought.

'How could you?!'

After everything Xie Lian had done for him, how could he?

And that—that doesn't sound like friendly generosity, or kindness for the sake of it that…

Sounds like an attempt at buying friendship from someone that was far too proud to ever accept the premise of such a thing.

When, all of that time—if Xie Lian really wanted them to be friends, he could have asked Mu Qing what he was really thinking. Away from Feng Xin, and all the others. Because when it was just the two of them, they never fought.

If he had just asked—

'Is someone hurting you?'

"Mu Qing, I..."

The prince freezes, only realizing in that moment that he had accidentally opened his mouth in prayer—and underneath Ruoye, his eyes widen, because...

...on the off chance that he was listening, would Xie Lian know what to say? Would it help? Or would it just...

Xie Lian's lips tremble as he rises to his feet, shaking his head.

He isn't ready for this.

Not yet. He's still got his own hurt and anger, weighing heavy, and—

Mu Qing is the last person that would ever want to hear from him, anyway. He shouldn't have come here.

The prince turns on his heel, walking out of the temple without another word, the doors slamming shut behind him.

His heart is still pounding when he descends the temple steps, quick to get away as quickly as possible—and he isn't even annoyed by Kuo's boisterous voice.

"Ready to go?" He calls out, falling into step beside the cultivator.

There's one thing that Xie Lian came to notice about his student very early on—is that, unless you tell him that you want to talk, he doesn't ask what's bothering you.

Xie Lian appreciates that—especially now

"...Yes," he agrees, arms tightening around himself slightly.

The young man leads the way eagerly, broad shoulders and arms clearing a path for Xie Lian to walk through the crowd without ever bumping into anyone.

“You know, now that we’re going on an adventure…” Kuo muses, rubbing his chin, “I should probably start going by my courtesy name. Put on a more serious front, you know?”

Xie Lian almost smiles. “It’s hardly an adventure. What’s your courtesy name, then?”

“Chi,” he replies. “You can still call me Kuo, though. Besides, isn’t first love always an adventure?” He waggles his eyebrows, bumping Xie Lian gently with his shoulder.

The cultivator has been faintly amused—though not encouraging—by his flirting all morning. But now…he doesn’t smile at all.

“…” The youth glances away, sniffing awkwardly—but he’s never been one to give up so easily. “Your husband,” he starts, glancing at Xie Lian through the corner of his eye, “…you still miss him?”

Xie Lian’s fingers reach for the chain around his neck without thinking.

Xie Lian finds it interesting that Kuo presumes his partner was male. He never said anything to indicate his preference one way or the other, but…he doesn’t correct it.

“…I’ll always miss him,” he answers softly.

You stop missing people when you forget them, after all.

And that isn’t possible for Xie Lian. Even if they were never married. And their relationship, it never truly reached that point, but…

Kuo considers that for a moment, squaring his shoulders. “Well, I’m not giving up, alright? I’ll make you get over him—for sure!”

“…” for the first time in ages, Xie Lian actually laughs. Throws his head back and laughs hard, straight from his gut.

“Hey! It’s not funny! I’m gonna work really hard!” Kuo whines, not seeming that upset—and it only makes his teacher laugh even harder, shaking his head.

“A flower can only be plucked by the stem once,” Xie Lian wipes at the corners of his eyes underneath Ruoye, smiling. “After that, it won't bloom again.”

And someone has already picked the crown prince, in the end. “What kind of saying is that?! It’s so DEPRESSING!” Kuo cries.

Xie Lian has already bloomed in someone else’s eyes—and has no desire to do so again.

What he didn’t know then, was just how desperately someone was still seeking the flower.

And, that in the heavenly capital above, someone had stopped in mid step, eyes wide. “...General?”

One of his deputies stumbles to a halt beside him, nearly dropping the basket of items he had been carrying back to his superior’s palace. “General Xuan Zhen?”

The young god doesn’t answer immediately, his expression unreadable, then—

“Go on without me.”

“But—!”

“Now.”

The deputy gives him an odd look before nodding, continuing on down the street, and...

He squeezes his eyes shut, remembering the way those words sounded in his head.

‘Mu Qing, I...’

It—It was...

It was him, wasn’t it?

And Xie Lian would never know, out of all of his prayers, this was the first time someone tried to answer.

‘Your highness?’ Mu Qing mutters, pressing his fingers to his temple. But...there’s no reply.

‘Why would he call me?’

Out of all of everyone on earth, god and mortal...

…Mu Qing knows that he's the last person Xie Lian would try to talk to.

And Xie Lian never knew, in the centuries that followed, that the great General Xuan Zhan took the time to descend to his temple immediately after, searching the crowds.

'Your highness?'

'Are you—?'

But no matter where he looked—there was no sign of him. Even when he changed into a mortal form, asking one of the worshippers in the temple…

They explained a blind Taoist had indeed been there, leaving his offering—and then left.

And why…

Why would he do that?

Mu Qing stands over an incense stick, long since burnt out—his eyes filled with far too many emotions to untangle fully, thinking—

'Why did you do that?'

Part of him wants to discard it as an oddity.

A moment of the crown prince faking kindness, just to show everyone how forgiving he is. How decency comes so easily to him, when all Mu Qing knows how to do is fake…

His hands ball into fists at his sides, trembling.

…But what if it wasn't that? What else could it be?

Mu Qing has always been a worrier. Even Xie Lian knew that, but…

The crown prince never knew just how much his friend worried about him. And he wouldn't—not for a very long time.

Worried enough to go to the one person that Mu Qing would have always preferred to avoid.

Feng Xin doesn't even look up from where he sits by the fire in his palace, sharpening one of his blades to a fine point, his posture tense.

"Get out."

Mu Qing rolls his eyes, crossing his arms as he leans against the doorframe. "You think I'd be here if I had a choice?"

"...Then what could be so important?" His f—e—

Mu Qing's former co-worker, turned enemy, now co-worker once again replies icily.

"..." The martial god looks down at the floor, slowly fiddling with a longer piece of his hair, twirling it around his finger. "I heard something."

Feng Xin never so much as looks up at him, working on his sword slightly more aggressively. "You hear a lot of things, Mu Qing. I've never cared to hear about them before."

"..." And since he doesn't look up, he never sees how complicated the look in the god's eye actually is.

Feng Xin never really looks at Mu Qing to begin with. Only ever reacts to the sharpness of his tone when he speaks.

"Xie Lian."

The larger man stiffens, his knuckles suddenly white where they grip the handle of his sword. "Excuse me?"

"I heard Xie Lian," Mu Qing replies.

"He prayed to me this afternoon."

Well. He doesn't know if it actually counted. After all—the crown prince barely said more than his name before disappearing again, but...

Mu Qing knows that Feng Xin has been looking for Xie Lian too, all this time—even if it's never been said.

"Did he say anything to you?"

Naturally, if it was what Mu Qing suspects it was—a cry for help—the prince would have called out to Feng Xin first, but...

Feng Xin sets the sword down against his legs, and he sounds so tired . "I don't have time for whatever this is, Mu Qing."

The god freezes as Feng Xin runs his fingers through his hair, sagging forward with a mixture between exhaustion and resentment. “If you want to fight, come back and start lying to get my attention tomorrow—I don’t have the energy today.”

“I…” Mu Qing sputters, eyes narrowed.

“I’m not lying!”

“Sure you’re not,” Feng Xin rolls his eyes, finally looking up to meet Mu Qing’s gaze. “He didn’t pray to me,” he replies, clearly indulging what he thinks is an antagonistic question. “And in what universe would he EVER want to pray to someone like you?”

Someone like him.

“…” Mu Qing hangs his head for a moment, his hair obscuring his face.

It’s funny, sometimes—how saying the right thing can completely changing the trajectory of a man’s life…

And so can saying the wrong thing.

“…you are SUCH a self righteous bastard.”

Mu Qing mutters. “At least I can say I left. He didn’t send me away because I wasn’t any good to him anymo—”

THUD!

The slam is so violent, several scrolls topple down from a nearby shelf. Feng Xin doesn’t care, just glares down at Mu Qing hatefully.

Mu Qing never flinches.

Not even now, with Feng Xin’s fingers easily encircling his entire throat. He just smirks up at the general, smug with the knowledge that he clearly struck a nerve. “You wanna know why he’ll never pray to you, Feng Xin?”

The god squeezes tighter, and Mu Qing grins fiercely.

“Because you set these high expectations for everyone else…and when people don’t know how to meet them…you end up alone,” Mu Qing explains, fingers delicately grasping Feng Xin’s wrist. Not trying to push him away, no—

He's trying to hurt him.

The same way Mu Qing hurts.

Because the way Mu Qing's thumb brushes over the inside of Feng Xin's wrist is reminiscent of an intimate caress.

A reminder of the fact that, of the two people that the martial god has desired in his life—both left him for that exact reason.

They won't ever touch him that way—and now, the only person who will is the likes of Mu Qing, in a situation like this—taunting him.

And Feng Xin has never desired Mu Qing.

Mu Qing is more painfully aware of that fact than anyone else.

"...I never expect anything but the worst from you," Feng Xin mutters, eyes acidic with anger. This is a side of him that Xie Lian never knew. A side of the god that almost no one ever knows. "And somehow, I still end up disappointed."

Feng Xin's passing moments of cruelty will always belong to Mu Qing.

Mu Qing tips his head slightly, his cheek bumping against Feng Xin's fingers, eyes slightly narrowed as he murmurs, "But I'm the only one that's left, aren't I?"

Briefly, there's a spark in Feng Xin's gaze.

A self loathing sort of heat, one that he can't help—and just the sight of it makes Mu Qing's stomach lurch, but—

The hand gripping his throat lets him go, and Feng Xin turns his back on him.

"You left a long time ago Mu Qing. It doesn't matter that we're on the same side now."

After all—Xie Lian wasn't actually there when Mu Qing left. He was off god knows where, doing god knows what, it—

Feng Xin was the one that Mu Qing left behind that day. And neither of them has ever forgotten it.

"Get out."

This time—Mu Qing listens.

They’ve had countless fights over the years—but this is the first time that both come to regret an argument in the aftermath. Each too proud to go to the other and investigate the truth behind what happened, and…

The crown prince does not pray to Mu Qing again.

We Always Come Back Here

Chapter Summary

> The scroll is snatched from her fingers after a moment, held in front of a tall, rather imposing figure, his armor gleaming in the light of the martial hall.
>
> “...This is so specific,” Pei Ming lets out a slightly amused chuckle, “I wonder what you all have done to offend him.”
>
> One of the martial gods listed glares, crossing his arms. “I’m glad you find this amusing, Ming Guang.”
>
> “Well, of course I do!” The general smirks, barking out a laugh. “I thought I was a polarizing figure—but somehow the lot of you have managed to offend a newborn devastation!” He shakes his head. “Enough so for him to bet his own soul on losing—I don’t ever think I’ve seen stakes that high.”

Chapter Notes

> You can find me on twitter and keep up with current updates of the story HERE
>
> tw// this chapter once again displays negative attitudes towards sex work

See the end of the chapter for more notes

YEAR THIRTY TWO

“Sir?” The waitress smiles, bowing her head politely. “Do you mind if I ask your name?”

It only seems polite at this point—she’s been constantly refilling the young man’s glass with liquor all night.

Hua Cheng smiles, reclining in his seat. “Zhang Wei.”

He’s been using that alias with this face for a few years now—always prepared to cycle through others if necessary.

“Are you traveling alone?” She muses, filling his cup once more. “We don't often get outsiders coming this far south."

"I can imagine," he murmurs.

"I am—but I'm looking for someone."

The young woman raises an eyebrow, leaning a little closer out of curiosity—and maybe also because this Zhang Wei is rather handsome...in a wicked sort of way. "Is that so? Someone around here? Maybe I could help."

"I imagine you can," Hua Cheng never stops smiling at her, his tone positively charming. "As I understand it, he owns this establishment."

Along with several other properties in this small fishing settlement, built on the banks of several river deltas.

It's new, barely twenty years old—but lively.

The people moving here are young families—fishermen and cultivators alike, looking to start anew. And Hua Cheng can imagine that it must be a beautiful place for children to grow up—from the mountains on the horizon, to the lotus blossoms floating in the rivers and streams.

When the waitress realizes what he means—her eyes widen slightly with surprise. "...You're looking for Jiang Chi?" She muses, looking the traveler over. "I didn't take you for a cultivator."

Hua Cheng smiles, the gesture slightly lopsided—but enticing. "I'm not," he assures her.

"But we have a mutual friend who just so happens to be the person that I'm looking for."

As one of the more successful cultivators in the region—there are rumors about the man. Among them, that his cultivation master was actually a blind Taoist.

Such a rumor couldn't be ignored

"Is that so?" Her eyes light up with interest. "You know Mr. Hua?"

That gives the young man pause, his eyebrows raising slightly.

Is that what he's going by, these days?

"Do you?"

"When I was a little girl," she laughs softly. "I'll let Mr. Jiang know that you're here."

Hua Cheng never had any concerns about whether or not the cultivator would be willing to meet with him—he has a way of getting what he wants in that sense.

What he did not expect, however, was the ease and swiftness with which he was able to secure an audience.

"Mr. Zhang!" A voice booms upon entering the sitting room. "Welcome to Lotus Cove!"

Despite the fact that the red clad youth is clearly in his twenties, and Jiang Chi is now a man on the cusp of middle age—he raises an eyebrow, sizing him up with the eye of an elder.

"Lotus Cove?"

The cultivator frowns, scratching his ear. "You don't like it? I've been trying to think of an official name for this place. Something with a little more...flair, you know?"

That, Hua Cheng can understand. "Names are important," he agrees.

"Better to not make them boring."

And it's fitting, anyway—given just how many blossoms he saw on his way here.

Jiang Chi grins, gesturing for the youth to follow him. "A man after my own heart, come in, come in! Any friend of Hua Laoshi is a friend of mine! Sit, sit!"

He complies, watching as several servants scurry around, bringing more and more trays of food—enough to feed an army, it would seem, when it's clearly just the two of them.

"...I've never seen a cultivator with such...secular tastes," Hua Cheng comments, raising an eyebrow.

"Eh? You think so?" Jiang Chi smiles, lifting a bite of meat to his lips. "Hua Laoshi used to say the same thing, but he also said that it was no good to get so focused on your cultivation that you lose track of the world around you."

Hearing that makes Hua Cheng smile.

“So, I try to enjoy things,” The cultivation master shrugs. “Li Qiao told me that you were looking for Hua Laoshi. When was the last time you saw him?”

“…” Hua Cheng fiddles with his chopsticks, toying with his food rather than consuming it. “It’s been a few years.”

Jiang Chi stares down at his own cup of liquor with a sigh. “…Then I doubt it’s been sooner than when I saw him last.”

A woman in lavender silk finery walks in, bending over to whisper in Jiang Chi’s ear for a moment, and from the intimacy between the two—she must be his wife.

And Hua Cheng can’t help but notice…

Just how strikingly similar she looks to the crown prince. Not enough so to imply any relation, but…the shade and shape of her eyes, the way she wears her hair…the way she carries herself…

Even the Ghost King finds himself drawn in.

Madam Jiang glances in his direction, offering him a kind smile before bowing her head politely. “Welcome to our home, young master Zhang Wei. Is the food to your liking? Have enough to drink?”

“…Yes,” Hua Cheng agrees, glancing away sharply, his cheeks slightly warm. “Thank you.”

Madam Jiang seems to find it terribly amusing that such a handsome, imposing young man could be left flustered by a smile from a woman of her age—but her eyes are gentle, and she doesn’t tease him. “I’m glad to hear it.”

She presses a kiss against her husband’s cheek. “I hope you two will forgive me for not joining you—our youngest is still recovering from a fever…”

“It’s no trouble,” Hua Cheng agrees quickly, sipping from his glass, staring at a painting on the wall until she’s left the room.

Once they’re alone, Jiang Chi turns his face back to the young man, his expression suddenly serious. “So,” he muses, reaching for a silver bell sitting on top of the table, bound in purple thread. He rolls it softly under his fingertip, the metal clinking gently. “What are you?”

Hua Cheng doesn’t respond immediately, but from the look in the mortal’s eye—it’s clear that he knows something is amiss.

“What do you mean?”

“Hua Laoshi left 15 years ago,” he explains calmly. “For you to look the age you do, and be retracing his steps all the way back here…”

The ghost’s eyes widen slightly.

Ah, so the man isn’t as stupid as he seems. Or maybe—he uses his jovial nature to allow people to underestimate his intelligence. Either way—it’s clear that he’s more clever than Hua Cheng’s initial estimate.

“What do you think I am?”

“Either you’re another heavenly official—in which case, I would be surprised,” Jiang Chi muses, the bell still ringing under his finger, “Or, you’re a ghost. Which is equally confusing—but I’m less hostile towards that possibility.”

Hua Cheng tilts his head out of curiosity.

“You knew his true identity?”

“…Powerful creatures such as yourselves don’t work particularly hard to hide,” Jiang Chi admits with a small smile. “You assume most people don’t pay attention—which is true. But to the ones who do, it can become quite obvious.”

After all—he spent five years studying under the god. Much longer than what they initially agreed. Long enough to notice the fact that his skin, while fair and delicate, never scarred permanently. Or that, even in that span of time—Xie Lian didn’t age at all. Not the tiniest bit.

An entire human lifetime hadn’t passed since the fall of Xianle—so there were still quite a few portraits laying around with a somewhat accurate likeness that hadn’t yet been burned, and from that—Kuo put the pieces together.

“You’re an odd man,” Hua Cheng muses.

“I don’t think I’ve ever met a cultivator who openly expressed distaste for the rest of the heavenly court."

"I cultivate under General Ming Guang," Jiang Chi explains with a shrug. "I would have done so under Taizi Dianxia, but..." He trails off with a sigh. "I was forbidden."

Hua Cheng's eyes narrow. "...Forbidden?"

"By Hua Laoshi himself," the cultivator assures him, waving a hand before the ghost king can become too riled up. "He was convinced it would bring bad luck, and said I had better not. And..."

Across the table, Hua Cheng stares. "And?:

"...I don't think I'll be answering any more of your questions until you answer mine," Jiang Chi counters, his tone firm. After a moment of silence—instead of rolling the bell under his fingertip—he gives it a sharp flick.

Ding!

Hua Cheng's flinch is very subtle, but present.

The cultivation master smirks, pressing his fingertip down onto the bell to make it stop. "A ghost, then."

"..." Hua Cheng's gaze settles on the spiritual device, slightly irritated. "That's an interesting tool you have there."

"Thank you," Jiang Chi smiles, drawing it back. "You must be a strong ghost, at that—any low level specter would have taken damage."

"You could say that," Hua Cheng agrees.

"As a matter of fact, given how perfect that mask of yours is..." The cultivator raises an eyebrow. "There's a short list of ghosts that could do that."

They stare at one another, the tension somewhat thick in the air—and eventually, Kuo smiles, throwing his hands up in a shrug. "Such things don't bother me—after all, you're the one who has pointed out twice now that I'm not a conventional cultivator."

Indeed, he has...

"But I would prefer it if I could speak to you without a disguise," Jiang Chi points out. "It would seem more respectful, that way."

Hua Cheng raises an eyebrow. No one has seen his true form—and he has no intention of breaking that pattern now.

But he can indulge the human.

In human years—he'd be older than Jiang Chi by now, and though his true form sits somewhere in it's mid twenties...

This time, he chooses a mask that's slightly more reflective of their positions, shifting his face to something in it's mid forties. Still handsome, yes—but mature.

There are slight creases at the corners of his eyes and mouth, a hint of gray at his right temple. He almost looks like a respectable man that might have a wife and family of his own, somewhere—if not for the slight glint of mischief in his eye.

"Better?" He sighs.

"Much."

"Back to my questions." Hua Cheng smiles thinly—tolerating the human's impertinence, but only because dianxia clearly favored him in the past.

"You said that he left thirteen years ago, and that you followed him for five years before that?"

"That sounds about correct."

Jiang Chi sighs, leaning his chin on his hand. "I tried to explain that I would follow him for a lifetime—but I had made a name for myself here, and a girl was sweet on me...Hua Laoshi always spoiled me as a student, but he made it clear he had no intention of marrying me—"

He stops when he sees the glass in Hua Cheng's hand has cracked in three places, his eyebrows raising. "...You alright there, my friend?"

"You two were intimate?" His voice is soft—but his tone is as cold as a winter wind.

Seemingly oblivious to the fact that his life is in mortal danger—Jiang Chi snorts. "Intimate?! No, no way—not because I didn't make it clear that I was open to it—"

Another crack appears in the side of the cup, liquor dripping between the ghost king's knuckles. "...You what?"

“Hey, relax, would you?” The cultivator waves his hand, looking at the glass morosely. “His cultivation method didn’t allow for that sort of thing anyway. The closest I ever got to ‘intimacy’ was going into the public baths with him, and…”

Jiang Chi pouts, downing his own glass.

“He made me wear Ruoye over my eyes after he caught me trying to sneak a look, so I never even saw much of his body.”

Now, the glass outright shatters—no, it collapses into a pile of dust underneath Hua Cheng’s hand, and Jiang Chi watches, his eyes slightly wide.

“…It’s like that between you two?!” He gasps, covering his mouth with one hand, but then it occurs to him—

And in a twist of fate, his next words inadvertently save his own life. “You aren’t the husband, are you?”

Hua Cheng chokes on whatever liquor remains in his throat.

He’s trapped between two instincts—to ask Jiang Chi what the hell he’s talking about, and to…

“What did Xie Lian tell you about that?” He questions flatly. Rarely ever has he called the prince by his given name (it gives him a quiet thrill, even now.)

“Just that he was married, the guy was dead, and that he was never ever getting over him,” Jiang Chi grumbles with a sigh. “Ever.”

It sounds like a polite way that Xie Lian would opt to let someone down easily. Hua Cheng knows him well enough to understand that, but…

Could it be true? It—

Dianxia never seemed interested in romance, when Hong-er was with him, but…

When Hua Cheng remembers the longing sadness in the prince’s expression when he asked Wu Ming to kiss him…

Maybe he did want that level of intimacy with another person.

Between Hua Cheng’s time in the kiln, and the unaccounted for time before Jiang Chi started traveling with the god…

That's over twenty years. Plenty of time to…form a meaningful…

His chest stabs with an agonized form of jealousy. And…

Hua Cheng knows he doesn't have a right to feel that way. That just because he thinks everyone else is unworthy—that doesn't mean that he deserves Xie Lian's love either. He knows that, but—

"So, are you?"

The Ghost King lifts his chin, his expression unreadable. "I am."

He tells himself it's perfectly reasonable to lie about dianxia in this situation—but only because, as his husband, Hua Cheng would be more entitled to information about his whereabouts.

"…Well, I certainly meant no offense," Jiang Chi smiles awkwardly, scratching his head.

"Oh—" Now, his eyes widen, and he gets a little pale. "Oh—you're—" He points at the ghost king with a slightly shaky finger, realizing exactly who he's speaking to—

"You're Hua Cheng!"

It takes a moment the older man to understand how he put that together, then—

Oh.

Xie Lian took that surname as an alias, so, to Jiang Chi, it must seem like…

The thought of that warms his chest slightly, in spite of everything. It's just a lucky coincidence really, but…

"…Did you keep it a secret or something?" Jiang Chi questions.

Or, well—maybe he wouldn't have to. After all, it's not as though anyone knows that his human identity and ghost identities were one in the same. But—

"I can't imagine the Heavenly Court ever knew that the Crown Prince was married, given how they speak about him."

“...Speak about him?” Hua Cheng questions flatly. “What do they say?”

“I mean...” Jiang Chi shrugs. “Everything you would expect.”

Cultivators often share an open line of communication with the gods they serve, many of them rising and falling as deputy gods.

As such—rumors about the inner workings of the heavens are often flying around.

“But...there’s a thread of it that...would certainly imply that he wasn’t married,” Jiang Chi frowns, his expression suddenly stormy with defensive anger on his Laoshi’s behalf. “It’s truly classless.”

After all—Jiang Chi didn’t need to ask Xie Lian a word about it to know that none of it was true. Not a single word. They were together every day for years—and he never saw the god engage in more intimacy than holding someone’s hand. And even that was rare.

The rumors of his promiscuity, as a result...just seemed petty and mean spirited. Like kicking a man that was already down.

“That’s why I ended up cultivating under General Ming Guang,” Jiang Chi explains, pouring himself another glass.

“What does he have to do with it?”

“He was one of the only gods that tried to speak against those rumors,” The cultivator scowls, remembering the way the discussions flew around between different sects of cultivation. “Even Xuan Zhen and Nan Yang didn’t say a word. They used to be his friends, right?”

“...They did,” Hua Cheng agrees stiffly, and Jiang Chi clicks his tongue with distaste.

“Well, Ming Guang dismissed a pretty prominent deputy of his for spreading such rumors without evidence—so, I decided I would commit my merits and cultivation to him.” He explains with a shrug “As far as I’m concerned—the rest aren’t worth bothering with.”

It’s thanks to that statement, and that statement alone, that Hua Cheng and Jiang Chi part on relatively good terms.

There are many small interactions in a man’s life that can change his fate in the blink of an eye.

For Jiang Chi, it was the mere mention of a husband that ended up saving his life. And, the life of the son he would sire later that year.

A young man that would take his father's unorthodox ideologies, as his first and only disciple—and pass them on to others.

From then on—the cultivators who trained in the settlement of Lotus Pier would be known as members of the Jiang Sect.

And from them, much more was to come.

Such a small action changed the direction of the mortal realm.

It's not such an uncommon thing to happen.

After all—it was an equally innocuous comment made by a relatively irrelevant ghost, that would forever change the shape of the Heavenly Court itself.

"...Hua Chengzhu," Fai bows his head, carefully serving tea. "I thought your journey was relatively fruitful. Don't you?"

He's been trying to ease the youth's mood for the past three days—but there's been no helping it.

After all—he is a ghost king to the outside world. And to many of the ghost children that have grown to the point of a small settlement around his lair, he's practically a god, but—

In many more ways than that, the great and terrible Crimson Rain Sought Flower is almost like a teenager, unable to let things go. Sulking for weeks on end when he doesn't get his way.

"...He was headed west fifteen years ago," Hua Cheng glares at the ceiling. "Very fruitful."

"..." The ghost stands there awkwardly, holding the teapot between his hands—and honestly, the innocence of his intentions almost makes the consequences of his actions comical. "You know, Hua Chengzhu, I'm pretty good at finding things— because I have a trick!" He offers kindly.

The ghost king turns his gaze to him, clearly listening—and the former school master explains;

"Whenever I've been working at a problem for too long with no solution, or searching for a lost item with no success—I take a break in order to reorient myself."

Hua Cheng frowns.

"...Are you suggesting I take a vacation while he's out there suffering?" The ghost king questions flatly.

"No, not at all," Fai shakes his head vehemently. "I just mean that approaching a problem from a new angle increases your likelihood of success! And..." he lets out a sigh. "For someone as sly as you, I'm honestly surprised you never learned the phrase, 'Work smarter, not harder.' "

Hua Cheng sits up with a frown, raising an eyebrow. "What do you mean?"

"Surely you've realized by now—being a devastation level ghost isn't just about raw strength."

Now, Hua Cheng actually seems to stop and listen. "...I know," he agrees.

Bai Wuxiang didn't exactly leave behind a model for how ghost kings were supposed to behave—other than destroying an entire nation in the span of a year.

When Hua Cheng rose, people expected the same.

It's not as though the Ghost King is not capable of doing such a thing—he certainly is, no one has disputed that—but he's also had no inclination to do so.

As a result, humans and gods alike view him with some form of curiosity—and some have taken his silence as weakness.

Fai continues to point out—

"You have countless spirits at your disposal. Is it really efficient for you to spend all of your time searching when you could delegate such matters?"

Doing so feels almost disrespectful—given that it's his most important task. But... He has a point

"Aren't there other things you want to see taken care of by the time you reunite with your god?" Fai offers helpfully. "Surely, you must have other matters to resolve."

He says this, thinking of possibly building a new home. Or maybe working on some self improvement.

Meditation. Balancing one's mind and body. That sort of thing.

But after a moment of contemplation—he sees a slow, hungry grin spread across the ghost king's face.

"...You know what, Fai—I think you're correct."

The short, slightly rotund ghost blinks owlishly. "...I am?"

One month later, there's a stir in the streets of the heavenly capital.

'Did you hear?'

'I—yes, but he can't possibly be serious, can he?'

'I think it might be some sort of prank...'

'No, no—I can feel the demonic energy on the scroll—it's from him!'

And all of that—it's SUPREMELY irritating to Feng Xin, who is dealing with a much more serious issue right now.

Glaring down at the dark haired man before him, his hands braced against the marble walls that make up the side of Xuan Zhen's palace, caging the martial god in.

"Who did it?" He questions, his voice low, trembling with anger.

Mu Qing arches an eyebrow. The two of them are equally skilled by means of combat —if he wanted to shove Feng Xin off, it would be a fair fight.

But instead, he cleans back against the wall, crossing his arms.

He tilts his head to the side, and he smirks, and Feng Xin hates it.

Hates it because it makes him look so cocky and arrogant, when he really doesn't know shit about the situation half of the time. Hates it because Mu Qing's hair is so much longer now than it used to be, and...

And he's started wearing this black choker around his neck—and it's highlighted when he tilts his head to the side like that, and he—

Feng Xin squeezes his eyes shut, punching the wall next to Mu Qing's head until it fractures in several places.

"Who DID IT?!"

"Oh, my..."

Mu Qing sighs, turning his head to look at the damage. "That'll probably cost you... what? A hundred thousand merits? My building materials aren't cheap, you know."

"I don't have time to run around with you all day," Feng Xin grouses, his scowl darkening.

"But I'm not leaving until you tell me."

A soft laugh slips from Mu Qing as he leans his head back against the wall, raising an eyebrow. "That makes it sound like you do have time, Feng Xin."

"Shut up!" He snaps. "Stop stalling!"

"It wasn't me," Mu Qing laughs even more now.

"I don't know how the typo happened, but I had nothing to do with it."

That's the truth, but he highly doubts Feng Xin is going to believe him. He's never believed Mu Qing before.

"Sometimes these things really do just happen," Mu Qing continues, still giggling as he remembers the look on Feng Xin's face when he saw how red he got. "You just get..." He covers his mouth in an almost coy fashion—and in spite of it all, Feng Xin's stomach lurches. "Unlucky!"

Feng Xin hangs his head for a moment, his cheeks burning slightly with the reminder, but he spits out between clenched teeth—

"I'm not TALKING about the dick thing, asshole!"

Just phrasing it like that makes Mu Qing laugh even harder, clutching his stomach. "Now you are!"

But that laughter comes to an immediate halt when fingers grip his chin firmly, forcing Mu Qing to look up, his eyes suddenly wide as Feng Xin glares down at him, his expression conflicted.

“...What the fuck are you doing?” The martial god questions flatly. (His heart pounds.)

Feng Xin’s fingertip taps a small welt on My Qing's cheek—just beneath his orbital bone.

If there’s one thing that the man has always been vain about—it’s his face. He was a beauty from a young age—only surpassed by the crown prince.

“Who did it?”

Mu Qing stares, slack jawed.

“...Why? You wanna send them a thank you note?” He hisses, trying to yank his chin out of Feng Xin’s grip—but the other god holds firm, his gaze sharpening.

“Just answer the damn question, Mu Qing.” He growls. “I don’t have to explain myself.”

“Then neither do I!”

Mu Qing is as indignant as ever, his eyes burning with irritation of his own now. “Why the fuck do you CARE?”

“I don’t!” Feng Xin starts, then stops, opening his mouth and snapping it shut, before finally getting exasperated. “Heavenly officials shouldn’t be brawling, so just—!”

“Who said it was a heavenly official?” Mu Qing sneers. “What? You think people are still giving me a hard time because I was someone’s servant? Or because I left my post?”

It’s clear from Feng Xin’s expression—he thinks it’s both. “Well, you did the SAME thing!”

Mu Qing hisses. “So before you go and start feeling sorry for me, think about whether or not any officials have been giving YOU a hard time, huh?!”

Feng Xin’s hands ball into fists next to Mu Qing’s head. “Why are you ALWAYS like this when ANYONE tries to be nice to you?!”

“You aren’t being NICE to me!” The dark haired man snaps. “You’re being PATRONIZING to make yourself FEEL BETTER, because you were an ASS the last time we talked. And your version of being ‘nice?’

It just makes you look like an invasive JACKASS!"

"How am /I/ the jackass here?!"

Feng Xin snarls. "I'm just trying to get you to tell me so I can—!"

"So you can WHAT?" Mu Qing shakes his head. "Hold it over my head?! I don't fucking think so—!"

"God, you make it SO hard not to hate you—" "Oh, shut up, you ALREADY hate me!" He glares.

"If you want to help someone that'll just fawn over you, say thank you, suck your dick, all of that—go annoy someone else!"

Feng Xin lets go of Mu Qing's chin, only to wipe his hand down his own face with irritation. "You know, for someone who can't have sex, you talk about it a lot."

It's the things he says offhandedly, these casual observations, that end up making Mu Qing choke, his face turning red. "It's a figure of speech, you MORON!"

"I mean, sure," Feng Xin nods. "But you brought up the typo thing."

Mu Qing sputters. "I only brought that up because I thought it was why you were INTERROGATING me, I—!"

"And you mention something about me wanting someone to suck my dick pretty much every time we argue," Feng Xin mutters, his eyebrows knitting together as he contemplates.

He's not a particularly observant person, and he's even worse when it comes to subjective matters like feelings—and now, watching him edge in around the WORST possible topic, Mu Qing is starting to panic.

"Like I said, it's a FIGURE OF SPEECH!" "It makes you sound jealous."

Before the martial god can completely collapse into a puddle of distress, Feng Xin adds, "Of my cultivation method."

Of—

Of his cultivation method.

Mu Qing takes a shaky breath, his face hot, heart pounding—

And he sneers.

“I don’t think I’m missing out on much, thanks.”

He lifts his nails in front of his face, examining his cuticles. “Besides, it’s not exactly like you get around without the limitation, so you really aren’t one to talk.”

Then, Feng Xin unintentionally goes and ruins his life.

“...Who says I don’t get around?” He questions.

Mu Qing stares.

The worst part is—Feng Xin doesn’t say it defensively. No, it’s just an honest question, asked with a confused glance and a furrowed brow.

Meaning—that he—

“Y—you mean...” The raven haired man struggles to put the facts together. He can, he just doesn’t want to.

Feng Xin shakes his head, and it’s a bit of an awkward conversation to have, but—

Enemies or not, hate each other or not, Mu Qing is the only person in the Heavenly Capital who knows Feng Xin with any level of intimacy. Who else would he tell?

“I’m not a virgin, Mu Qing.”

“I knew that!” The former servant blurts out, normally fair skin now blotchy and red. “I just figured it was the one...the one time—”

“What one time?” Feng Xin frowns, getting ready to press the matter, but— But then two hands are shoving his chest—hard.

“Who the FUCK are you—” Mu Qing starts, then shoves him again, “You—!”

“What?!”

“Who are you FUCKING around HERE?!”

Feng Xin stumbles back, shocked, then—

“...are you MAD? And—I never said it was a heavenly official! NOW who's being invasive?!"

"You fucking HYPOCRITE!"

Mu Qing snarls, and sure, he's a trained martial artist, specializing in blades—he can fight with the best of them. But right now? Right now he's just blindly pounding his fists against Feng Xin's chest. "Always poking around in MY business, JUDGING me, when you—!"

"Would you CALM DOWN?!" Feng Xin snaps, eventually losing his patience with it— and while Mu Qing is quicker and much more agile than him, the former guard has always been stronger, so he's able to catch at least one of My Qing's wrists, pinning him back against the wall with ease

And when the dark haired man thrashes, Feng Xin catches his other wrist, pinning both above Mu Qing's head. "Who do you think you're calling a hypocrite?! I know you've done things before—!"

He pauses, cheeks heating up from the memory—and Mu Qing's glare is absolutely venomous.

"General Nan Yang? General Xuan Zhen? Are you two fighting again?"

The two pause—with Mu Qing glaring in the opposite direction, and Feng Xin dropping his wrists, obviously sheepish.

"...We're busy," Mu Qing hisses. "Go away." The junior official pauses. "But..."

He glances back and forth between the two men, clearly confused about whatever is supposed to be going on. "There...something's happening—?"

"Did you hear what he just said?!" Feng Xin—normally the polite one of the two— snaps. "We're busy—now get lost!"

"But—!"

"NOW."

The official scrambles off, and Feng Xin lets out a heavy sigh, turning back around to face Mu Qing—and probably apologize, because...

Feng Xin knows he shouldn't have brought up what happened that day. But then—

"You weren't my first kiss, you know."

...Mu Qing gets spiteful.

Feng Xin's expression is frozen, and the dark haired man smiles slyly, leaning back against the wall. "You really thought you were, right? Felt bad about it this whole time? Because of what you said?"

The other martial god blanches, and Mu Qing lets out a vindictive little laugh

"No. It wasn't my first, and it wasn't my last, and it definitely didn't make me question my decision to remain celibate," Mu Qing shrugs. "So no, I'm not jealous of your cultivation method. I just feel sorry for whatever poor woman has to deal with you now—"

"Who."

Mu Qing pauses in the middle of his snide little speech. "...What?"

"Who was it with, then?" Feng Xin questions sharply. Because they were together almost every day as teenagers, and there was no other real possibility—

"...Sorry, but I don't kiss and tell," Mu Qing shrugs.

In all honesty—if Mu Qing did tell him the circumstances of his first kiss, it wouldn't aid his goal in hurting Feng Xin. If anything—it might just make the other man worry. Or worse, pity him.

"Just know that you're terrible at it, and I honestly wish I could repress the—hey—!"

And then—

'Oh.'

Mu Qing's shout of protest cuts out when his mouth is otherwise occupied, and he's pinned against the wall of his own palace once more.

'We're back here, again.'

And he wishes he could tell himself that he's above it, but— His lips part with a sharp gasp.

There's something they never really explain, but—

Smell is one of the senses most directly connected to memory. The one most likely to trigger an immediate emotional response.

Feng Xin has always smelled like leather and wood fire smoke. Ever since they were kids.

Mu Qing used to snort and complain that he smelled like a military camp every time they were forced to be in close proximity, but…

Now, he breathes it in deeply, a deep shiver running through his body when he feels a tongue moving against his own.

Oh.

And then, there's teeth.

Scraping against his lower lip, and all Mu Qing can manage to do is let out a soft, reluctant sound of want—but his hands aren't nearly so hesitant, wrenching free of Feng Xin's grip, scraping against the nape of his neck as he pulls the general in closer.

Mu Qing has this way of sinking into kisses—hunching his shoulders in until he feels smaller than he actually is in Feng Xin's arms, like the man who hisses whenever his underbelly is exposed might actually enjoy being vulnerable.

And kissing him—it never makes things better. In all honesty—it feels bad.

It's good, physically. It's everything Mu Qing has ever wanted any touch to be, and he hates it. Hates that his skin only ever seems to sing under Feng Xin's lips.

But mentally—

Every kiss Mu Qing has ever had has made him really fucking sad.

Because he's never what the person against him wants. Just a stand in, a generic version of a person he could never actually be.

That hurts even more than being alone. Worse than never being touched at all. But oh god, he wants Feng Xin to touch him more. To kiss him more.

And he wants to rip him to shreds. To scream and cry out into the universe, only to watch it inevitably fall back on him as resentment from the people around him.

That’s how it always goes.

Mu Qing wants to pick him to shreds, until he doesn’t come back.

And then, Mu Qing wants to cry himself to sleep and feel sorry for himself over the fact that Feng Xin left.

Because that’s what he always does. Breaks things, just to hear the sound of them shattering. And he can’t explain why he did it, when people ask, so he just—

Sneers.

And in all of that time, no one has ever asked him the simplest question in the world:

‘Was someone hurting you?’

Feng Xin pulls back, his breaths ragged—and there’s this raw edge to his voice, the kind he only gets when he’s slightly undone.

“The worst you’ve ever had, huh?”

Mu Qing’s lips tremble as he pulls him back in, fingers knotted in Feng Xin’s hair.

“Shut the fuck up,” he whispers sharply, arms wrapped around Feng Xin’s shoulders, arching slightly when strong arms wrap around his waist.

‘Why do I always end up back here?’

Feng Xin wasn’t Mu Qing’s first kiss. But he was the second, third, fourth—so many after. Back then, it was like every argument they ever had ended that way.

Never going too far, and Mu Qing would always smirk when he saw the self loathing in Feng Xin’s eyes when he pulled away.

It made him want to die.

Reminded him of how damaged, discarded, and worthless he felt.

And he told himself that couldn’t be true, because they didn’t stop. That, to be a placeholder for a prince—he must have some level of appeal to him, right?

There must have been something there that was worth wanting, right?

They barely break for air, with Mu Qing cursing and muttering insults each time, but then Feng Xin's fingers are threading through his hair, cradling the back of his head as he mutters against Mu Qing's lips—

"…You taste the same," he mutters, his brow furrowed.

It's been over thirty years—how could it be exactly like it was back then?

He barely notices the way Mu Qing's lips tremble before they're crushing against his all over again.

"I fucking hate you," he whispers.

Mu Qing doesn't think he's ever tried so hard to mean something in his life.

He lies a lot. More than most people, but mostly to himself.

That lie is the one he's told more than any other—to the point where he's forgotten that it wasn't true. Not in the beginning.

The hand on the back of his head makes him tilt back, guiding him into deepening the kiss, every breath coming out hitched and fragile, and he thinks—

His teeth sink into Feng Xin's lip, sucking sharply, fingers tugging at his hair, and the martial god moans, low and rumbling.

He doesn't moan Mu Qing's name. He never has, but—

'At least he isn't saying someone else's name,' Mu Qing thinks to himself, goosebumps racing down his arms when Feng Xin's knee slides between his thighs.

'Even if he won't say mine—'

They press closer, each of them gasping.

'At least he isn't saying his, either.'

Every kiss Mu Qing has ever had has made him really fucking sad. But none of them hurt as badly as the day he left.

And when he thought he heard it, that day—

'Mu Qing, I…'

There was only one thing he wanted to say, back then.

'I wasn't trying to hurt you.'

That was all he wanted to explain. The only thing he wanted to say every single day after Xie Lian chased him out of that house.

'I just wanted him to know what it felt like. I was trying to hurt him, not—not you.'

But that's the problem.

Mu Qing has always been good at sharpening his knives, making them get to the point where they can cut as deep as anything.

But his aim—sometimes that's off. And he ends up hurting someone he never intended to. Because he just—

He just wanted Feng Xin to know what it was like.

To love someone—to want them so badly, and to know that they wanted someone else.

That it fucking sucks, and there's nothing you can do about it but try to get over it. Which might not be possible—in Mu Qing's experience at least, because, well—

He always ends up back here.

And Mu Qing knows why he always comes back to this. Understands the twisted, slightly warped part of him that needs the validation of the fact that Feng Xin wants him physically, but—

But now he knows that Feng Xin has other options, options that he's actively pursuing.

And now, Mu Qing can't make himself understand—

Why does Feng Xin keep coming back? After all this time, when they clearly loathe one another? Why would he do that? He—

That thigh rubs a little closer between his knees, and the moan Mu Qing lets out is nothing less than needy.

That's when an answer comes to him. The most cynical, hateful thing that Mu Qing can think of.

So, naturally, he thinks it’s true.

Feng Xin is so lost in it, he’s too disoriented to do anything about it when Mu Qing shoves him again, this time so hard, he’s sent stumbling.

“What…” He wipes his mouth with the back of his hand, shaking his head irritably. “What the FUCK is your problem?!”

“You think I’m STUPID?!” Mu Qing snarls—and leaning back against the wall is the only thing that stops his knees from buckling.

“I—what the fuck?!”

“I know how much you hate the fact that I’M here, but he’s not,” the dark haired man hisses, adjusting the front of his robes. “You’re just trying to ruin my cultivation method!”

“I—are you—are you INSANE?!”

“You can’t fucking STAND me!” Mu Qing cries, hands balled into fists. “Why else would you be doing this if you’re such a lady killer, huh?! Why would you bother?!”

Feng Xin stops, his mouth hanging open, his face slightly pale, and—

In Mu Qing’s mind, it confirms everything he was thinking, because Feng Xin clearly doesn’t have an answer.

“…I didn’t think so,” he mutters, shaking his head.

Mu Qing worked his ass off to be here—and he isn’t falling because of Feng Xin. No. Not again.

“Stay the fuck away from me, understand?” He hisses in the martial god’s direction— turning on his heel and stomping off.

It’s not a moment that either of the men will look back on with any fondness in the centuries that follow, but, ironically enough…

It saved their lives.

In the Great Martial Hall, there’s quite a bit of a store as the gods gather, staring at the list of names.

“...He can’t be serious, can he?” One civil god mutters, handing the list over to Ling Wen—the up and coming deputy of the chief civil god, who looks the scroll over with a serious eye.

“It all seems very in order to me. I doubt it’s a joke.” She murmurs after an examination.

The scroll is snatched from her fingers after a moment, held in front of a tall, rather imposing figure, his armor gleaming in the light of the martial hall.

“...This is so specific,” Pei Ming lets out a slightly amused chuckle, “I wonder what you all have done to offend him.”

One of the martial gods listed glares, crossing his arms. “I’m glad you find this amusing, Ming Guang.”

“Well, of course I do!” The general smirks, barking out a laugh. “I thought I was a polarizing figure—but somehow the lot of you have managed to offend a newborn devastation!” He shakes his head. “Enough so for him to bet his own soul on losing—I don’t ever think I’ve seen stakes that high.”

“...Can he even do that?” One of the civil gods grumbles, glancing over Pei Ming’s shoulder to read over the terms again. “Why not just offer his ashes?”

“You say that like offering one’s ashes is a small thing,” Ling Wen mutters dryly—only for her co-worker to flash the young upstart an annoyed glance.

“But isn’t offering his soul just as serious? What would that even mean, anyway?!” “He’s offering to permanently remove himself from the reincarnation cycle.”

They all pause in the middle of their bickering at the sound of the heavenly emperor speaking.

“Essentially binding himself to purgatory for all eternity,” Jun Wu sighs, reclining in his throne.

“And if he isn’t offering up his ashes—that’s likely because he doesn’t have them.”

“...What kind of ghost doesn’t have their own ashes?!” A martial god cries out, and for once, Ming Guang is rather helpful.

“Ghosts often give them to their lovers as a sign of devotion,”

He would know. It’s not uncommon for female ghosts to offer him their ashes, after all.

“Soul or ashes—the result is relatively the same,” Jun Wu shrugs.

All of the gods present look at one another considering...after all, with all of them together...They could kill a Ghost King!

“Are you sure you want to do this?” Pei muses, examining some of the names on the list. “After all—it took Jun Wu himself to handle the last calamity.”

“Yes, but there will be thirty five of us,” one of the gods replies dryly. “Forgive me for feeling confident.”

“Thirty three,” Ling Wen corrects him calmly, stepping closer to Pei so she can examine the scroll in more detail. “It doesn’t seem as though Nan Yang or Xuan Zhen are coming. That’s significant.”

It’s a polite way of saying that they were among the most powerful martial gods invited.

“Not to mention that eleven of you are civil gods,” Pei points out.

“I didn’t realize being a ghost king required much of a formal education,” one of said civil gods replies snippily, crossing her arms. “I’d be surprised if the beast could read at all, much less debate.”

“I didn’t realize you were an expert on calamities,” Ling Wen murmurs, taking the scroll when Pei Ming offers it to her, carefully rolling it up before placing it under her sleeve. “That must explain how you managed to offend one so easily.”

She turns on her heel, leaving them.

Her heels click against marble floors, echoing throughout the martial hall as the other gods look at one another, grumbling.

“Jing Wen had better get a good grip on her, she’s so big headed!”

“And what should you expect, from a common shoe maker?” A fellow civil god sneers.

"I'd think more carefully about who you call common," Pei Ming muses, covering his mouth with a yawn. "Compared to some of those that you insult, the lot of you would be lucky to consider yourself shoemakers. Or the subjects of the very rumors you spread."

He begins to descend the steps of the martial hall, following after the junior civil god, and there's an indignant cry from behind him—

"Do you mean to compare us to concubines , Ming Guang?!"

"...No," The general turns his head, fixing the younger god with a steely glare.

"It takes a backbone to do such work. I see no comparison."

The one who called after him—a young martial god by the name of Gao He—glares, whipping his head around in the direction of Jun Wu. "Is he truly allowed to speak in such a way without reprimand?!"

The Heavenly Emperor surveys the scene without much of a reaction, holding one fingertip against his temple—and he seems relatively unbothered by the conflict. "It's for you to settle among yourselves."

"But—!"

A hand lands heavily on his shoulder, and Gao He freezes.

"I'm terribly sorry that no one here has given you the memo," Pei Ming's voice comes from directly beside his ear, and the younger god's heart skips a beat.

He hadn't even heard the general move.

"But I can say whatever I like to you," the elder god explains, oh so patiently. "Because I'm better than you."

Gao He's jaw locks, muscles working tightly, remembering another god who spoke to him in such a way—even when he had fallen to practically nothing.

"No matter how hard you work," the general smiles, "I will always be better than you."

It's rare to see the great martial god Ming Guang truly angry. Even now, he levels every insult with an easy going smile, but...

Many forget—there is only one other martial god that has ever stood in the same class as that of Ming Guang and Jun Wu.

Only one, among all of them, that he ever would have considered a peer. None of the warriors who stand before him will ever come close to that.

“It’s easy to say that now, general,” Gao He sneers, fists clenched, knuckles white. “But that arrogance could be the end of you.”

Pei Ming’s hand tightens on his shoulder—not visibly to anyone observing, but enough so that it makes the younger martial god wince.

“Maybe so,” he agrees. “But I don’t have to demean others to make myself bigger. I stood tall to begin with.”

With that, he lets Gao He go.

He turns once more to leave, and Gao He clenches his teeth. “You think I’ll take such insults from you?”

A slow smile spreads across Pei Ming’s face. “Oh, you wanna fight then?” He only meets silence in return.

“Which would you rather have a go at first—me, or the calamity?”

After another long span of silence, the general smirks. He didn’t think so. “I suppose you prefer a battle when you have more than twenty friends to help, don’t you?” He shrugs, lifting his hand from his sword. “Just remember—”

He exits the Grand Martial Hall, kicking the doors. “When the lot of you come crying to me,” Because they will come, Pei Ming is all too aware. “I will not help you.”

The doors slam shut, leaving thirty three officials behind, glancing at one another. “...He’s always been rather dramatic,” one of the civil gods offers.

The others nod quickly, trying to soothe themselves.

“It did say he would fight us all at once, didn’t it?”

“One of you marked the date and time?”

Among the fighting, one of the civil gods—the one who questioned Hua Cheng’s ability to read—stops, surveying the group.

"..." She tilts her head to the side, considering. Of course—it's very possible that they all could have individually done something to offend the calamity, but unlikely. After all, how could he have had so many interactions with heavenly officials without anyone knowing?

What seems far more probable is that they, as a group, offended the calamity on a single occasion—so viscerally, that it turned to this.

But wouldn't she remember such a thing? And this group—most of them haven't worked together since they were junior officials.

Decades ago.

What did this calamity use to connect them all together? And whatever it is...how could it be so serious?

Outside the grand martial hall, Pei Ming has to put his naturally long legs to their full use in order to catch up to the brisk stride of Ling Wen.

"I hope you didn't hear..."

"About them calling me a shoemaker?" She questions calmly, not looking up—and Pei Ming winces. "It was only slightly inaccurate. I sold shoes. I didn't make them."

"...Right," Pei Ming sighs, scratching the side of his head. "Look...they're trash." He assures her. "Most of them were appointed by family connections and bribery before they were able to properly ascend—seeing someone rise on their own merits makes them feel threatened. It's not a reflection on you."

Ling Wen doesn't look at him, her pace remaining brisk.

"I know that," she replies evenly. "But it is considerate of you to say so."

Pei Ming shrugs, smiling pleasantly—and with that, he's prepared to take his leave of the conversation, when the deputy god makes a comment of her own:

"I hope you aren't comforting me with any ulterior motive," now, she does send him a side glance—her gaze sharp.

"Oh, no—nothing like that," Pei Ming shakes his head—not offended. After all, he very much earned his reputation.

"I see." Ling Wen replies flatly.

The general watches her keenly, raising an eyebrow, "Why does that irritate you? You just said—"

"You just scolded others for looking down on me for my status in my mortal life," Ling Wen's eyes return to gazing firmly ahead. "But a shoe seller is the only goddess in the heavens that you have never expressed any interest toward. Including those who are married."

Pei Ming smiles awkwardly, and Ling Wen doesn't spare him a glance.

"I find that makes your previous sentiments seem disingenuous."

She really is the sort who can phrase criticism in such a matter of fact way, it's almost difficult to find it rude.

"That sort of thing really doesn't matter to me," Pei Ming assures her with ease. "I love all women—from all walks of life. And I find you quite beautiful." Ling Wen seems utterly unmoved by the compliment, and he continues, "In my experience, taking a lover with too serious of a personality tends to overcomplicate things—because they'll over think. Even so, I would have expressed interest in you, if..."

He watches her closely.

"...I thought you had such interests in men."

Ling Wen stops walking.

Her expression doesn't change—but her shoulders are suddenly rather stiff. Pei Ming doesn't press her—just watches, his hands clasped behind his back.

When she does reply, her tone is far more stiff than it was before.

"If you had such suspicions, why would you not have reported them to the appropriate authorities?" She mutters, fingers gripping the scrolls under her arm just a little bit more tightly. "And why bother to defend me from criticism?"

When the general answers—his tone is uncharacteristically soft, sensitive, even, to the goddess's underlying distress.

"Because it isn't my business or anyone else's. And they were wrong to speak ill of you."

Her fingers tremble.

It’s not something that she could be cast out for. Not openly. But as a junior official— she could be removed from her role for any number of reasons, real or manufactured. And...

While many in the heavens are kind and open minded to others, there are just as many who are not.

And if Jing Wen knew, he would...

“...You know,” Pei Ming muses, watching the vexed look in her eye, “I’ve never found it entertaining, but there are many officials in the higher court who will change their forms when going about their business.”

Ling Wen stops in mid thought, sending him a baffled glance. “...What does that have to do with this?”

The general shrugs. “There are things you might be able to enjoy on occasion in a male form, for example, without judgement from others.”

It’s not an ideal solution—but he can tell from the way that Ling Wen’s eyes widen slightly in response that it had genuinely never occurred to the goddess until this very moment.

“...You say this with the presumption that I’ll ascend at some point,” the civil goddess mutters.

At this rate, she highly doubts her superior would ever allow it. He’s gotten a little too accustomed to having someone wait on him hand and foot, doing nearly all of his work for him.

“Because I’ve always had pretty good instincts,” Pei shrugs, “and they tell me that you will.”

“Right.” Ling Wen repeats flatly, shaking her head—and when she does, Pei Ming’s quiet, gentle tone disappears. Suddenly, he’s his jovial self again—slinging an arm around the goddess’s shoulders.

“And when you do,” he exclaims with a smirk, “I’ll teach you how to get women!”

“No, thank you.” She replies, and Pei crows with offense,

“Ling Wen! Don’t be cold to me when I’m in the middle of being generous! Women don't like that—!" He pauses. "Well, some of them do, actually—but still—!"

Over the course of the afternoon, a fledgling friendship is born—with the junior official tolerating General Pei following her about her daily duties—and at the end of the day, over dinner, the general remarks on the original matter at hand—

"Do you know why he sent it?"

"The invitation?" Ling Wen questions, sipping from her cup of tea. "No idea. If I had to guess, some drive to satisfy his own ego. Or a woman."

Pei leans back in his chair, raising an eyebrow. "Why would you guess that?"

She shrugs. "Why else do men challenge each other?"

"It could also be some violated sense of honor," he points out, rubbing his chin thoughtfully—and his companion raises an eyebrow.

"Do Ghost Kings care about honor?"

That makes the general pause, his eyebrows knitting together. "...You know, I have absolutely no idea."

Then—

"A few of them are planning on broadcasting the confrontation to their followers in their dreams, you know."

Ling Wen tips her face forward, pinching the bridge of her nose. "...They really are hopelessly vain, aren't they?"

"And shortsighted," Pei Ming agrees.

"But who knows? Some of the martial gods among them aren't exactly weak, and with the number challenged..." He shrugs. "The odds are in their favor."

Ling Wen doesn't reply, sipping her tea.

Betting one's soul isn't something a man does when he thinks there's a chance of losing.

Either he's just that arrogant about his own skills—or, he's far more powerful than anyone’s estimation.

In truth, however—the answer was both.

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

All Art Shown is included with permission from the artist, do NOT reproduce or use without permission.

JIANG CHI (KUO)

[image]

CREDIT: LACE, support the artwork HERE

...Wait for me.
DO NOT REPOST
@RoseNightshade

CREDIT: Dru, support the artwork (it's a really cool gif!! look at it!!) HERE

Chapter End Notes

> Thank you so much to Lace and Dru for your artwork, and allowing me to share it! It means so much!!
>
> xoxo, Evie

Thirty Three Heavenly Officials

Chapter Summary

> "SHOW YOURSELF, HUA CHENG!"
>
> In the shadows, there's a lopsided smile. Not anxious in the least—but the expression of a man who has always loved a good fight.
>
> "As you wish."

Chapter Notes

> You can find me on twitter and keep up with current updates of the story HERE

Three days later, a group of thirty three officials stand in an open field—waiting for one more to arrive:

The Ghost King, Hua Cheng.

"...How do you think he chose this place?" One of them questions, squinting as they look around. The mortal realm makes sense, after all—but he can't think of anything special about this particular region.

Gao He shrugs, stretching his arms over his head, watching the horizon. "Most of the spiritual power in this land has already been used," he muses, nodding towards the mountain in the foreground. "Maybe he doesn't want us to be able to cultivate more energy mid-battle?"

One of the civil gods, a scowling woman by the name of Yao Meifen, crosses her arm. "As ascended officials we can draw on merits from our worshippers at any time. Does he not know that?"

"Who knows," Gao He rolls his eyes. "Let's just hope we can get this over with quickly."

After all—it's a relatively simple task, taking one enemy in such a large group. But the glory in killing a ghost king? A task only achieved by the likes of Jun Wu?

That prospect leaves them all hungry for the fame and respect it would bring with it. But the afternoon draws on...

And there's no sign of any ghost king, leading to stirrings of impatience among the group.

"...You don't think this was some sort of prank, do you?"

"If it was, then we certainly must look like fools to him."

"Hardly, he looks like a coward!"

"Is he a coward if his only intention was to make us look like idiots?" One of them grumbles—and Gao He cuts all of them off.

"If you're so offended, why don't you go ahead and get lost?"

One of them tries to do just that, but...when they reach the edge of the field, they stop.

"Changed your mind?" One of the martial gods jeers, but she whips her head around with a glare.

"No, I can't get through! There's some sort of barrier!"

"...What?!"

Yao Meifen draws over to her side, touching the barrier with a frown. "It's an array." She murmurs. "Powerful."

"Is this some sort of trap?! He just lured us in so he could trap us here?!"

"What reason would he have for that?!"

"A ghost king doesn't need a reason—!"

"Oh, calm down." A voice drawls—low, but carrying through the group with ease. Every single Heavenly Official goes still.

"It's to ensure that none of you will leave before we conclude our duel,"

They all whip back and forth, looking among themselves to see where the voice is coming from—but they see nothing.

"Once we have finished, you will be free to leave."

Gao He's lips twist into a sneer.

"Oh, how GENEROUS of you!" He calls out, hands balled into fists. "SHOW YOURSELF, HUA CHENG!"

In the shadows, there's a lopsided smile. Not anxious in the least—but the expression of a man who has always loved a good fight.

"As you wish."

Suddenly, standing in the middle of the group is a tall, slender young man. Long, raven hair tied above his head in a neat ponytail, wearing deep crimson robes, with black breeches and leather boots underneath.

Slowly, he turns to face them.

What the officials see now isn't the twisted, mangled face of a monster —no.

He's a handsome young man, likely somewhere in his early twenties—his left eye dark and calm, his right covered by an eyepatch.

His hands are clasped behind him, shoulders thrown back. He...

Gao He looks him over, his expression twisted with hostility.

'I don't need to demean others to make myself seem bigger.'

The youth steps forward, lifting his chin—and he looks down on every single one of them imperiously.

'I already stood tall.'

"Shall we?"

There's a slight flash in his eye when he speaks—in a voice that sounds far older, far more self assured, than the face that he wears.

Several of the martial gods present stiffen, their hands going to their weapons and spiritual tools.

Hua Cheng doesn't reach for anything.

He maintains that calm, elegant posture, watching the others with a gleam in his eye, waiting for someone to make the first move.

Few do, watching the ghost king with slightly unsure expressions, before Gao He, exasperated, shouts, "WHAT ARE YOU WAITING FOR?

MOVE!”

The minute they obey him, launching into action—he sees the corner of Hua Cheng’s mouth tip up slightly, into a calm, knowing smirk.

Then, there’s a flash of silvery light—and then, the clash of steel on steel. The Ghost King hasn’t lifted a single finger, and yet...

There’s quite the fray unfolding around them, a spiritual weapon moving so quickly between the combatants—it’s more of a flash than a solid object.

“THAT’S—!” One of the civil gods, who works in compiling research on the ghost realm, “THAT’S HIS SCIMITAR, E-MING!”

“What do you know about the thing?!”

“Not much!” The civil god cries, “Just that it was forged in Mount Tonglu!”

Gao He makes a face, clicking his tongue with annoyance. Their weapons have been forged by their own hands, or were gifted from the Heavenly Emperor’s collection.

Surely, any weapon of demonic origin couldn’t hope to compare—?

CLANG!

It’s solely on his instincts and reflexes that he’s able to block the blow before it hits his cheek, his sword coming up to parry the scimitar—only for him to stagger back from the force of it, gasping.

How...on earth—?

“FOCUS ON HIS RIGHT!” One of the martial gods cries in the communication array, his eyes focusing in on the ghost king’s eye patch, leading several to do so immediately.

Surely, Hua Cheng couldn’t have heard—but Gao He sees his smirk deepen. “WAIT—!”

Before anyone can react, several of the officials are blown back by near invisible strikes from E-Ming—but one remains, hands trembling where they grip his sword, and—

Hua Cheng holds it by the blade—with only his fingertips, completely unscathed, examining it.

'This was one of hers.'

Twenty seven layers of steel, balanced on the center—oiled leather on the grip.

And it's weak point—

Hua Cheng's fingers slide three quarters up the length of the blade, and with a flick of his wrist, it shatters into a dozen separate pieces.

"You think you can cut me with a toy like that?" He muses, glancing back over his shoulder with a sanguine, lopsided smile. "How disappointing."

Another official tries to take advantage of him being distracted, attacking from behind—only to be caught by a hand around his throat.

"...None of you have changed, I see." He sighs, squeezing until the heavenly official shrieks, eyes bulging out of his head, then using a simple flick of his fingers to throw him like a rag doll.

So violently, he slams into three other martial gods before hitting the barrier.

"What is that supposed to mean?!" Gao He mutters under his breath, lifting his sword again before finally throwing himself into the battle.

And it's—

No matter how hard the martial god strikes, no matter how quickly he moves, that scimitar is always there before he can close in

"How do you know ANY OF US?!" He shouts, infuriated, sweat dripping from his brow as he watches the Ghost King send another martial god flying with a flick against his forehead.

Still, he hasn't taken a single step from his original stance. "We've met before," Hua Cheng replies

"Have you forgotten so easily?"

A few of the martial gods look to one another, unsure—and many seem to conclude that it's a trick, some attempt to make them stop and wonder what he means, all while the Ghost King is preparing to finish them off.

But it's more than clear by now that the ghost king doesn't need to distract anyone— that this fight is more like...

Like he's toying with them.

"It's a shame Nan Yang and Xuan Zhen couldn't be bothered to reply," Hua Cheng sighs, catching another blade between his fingers.

"Then this might have been closer to a challenge."

Again, the blade shatters—though this time, it blows into so many pieces, it practically turns into dust before crumbling to the ground.

"It's been so long since I fought someone worth my time."

Not since his days in the kiln.

None of them present much of a challenge—only when they attack in large numbers. And even then, they're uncoordinated, making the group attacks less difficult to deal with.

His muscles feel underworked—thrumming with energy, but nothing to direct it towards.

But there are other forms of satisfaction to be derived from moments like this—Hua Cheng has learned that much, by now.

"Tell me something," he sighs, catching E-Ming between his fingertips now, twirling the scimitar with such speed, it almost looks like a disk in his grip.

"You all clearly didn't do any research before coming down here to face me," he surveys the bloody and beaten martial gods before him, and this time, he lashes out, slashing E-Ming manually—and just the impact is enough to shatter a broadsword with one blow.

"Did you know anything about me at all?"

"..." A silver haired martial blood spits out blood, knees shaking as he rises back to his feet. "Just that your name is Crimson Rain Sought Flower—and that children often pray to you for vengeance."

A bizarre, macabre form of worship.

One of the others wipes at the sweat from his brow, glaring, "And that you gouged out your own eye."

Hua Cheng smiles, letting E-Ming go, attacking autonomously once again—just to clap his hands in slow, sarcastic applause.

“Both are correct. And let me guess...” He glances around the group with a sly, sarcastic smile, “Absolutely none of you have any idea why you’re here?” The ghost king receives blank, frustrated stares in return—and his amusement doesn’t fade.

“Because you wanted to show the world that you’ve got guts?!” Gao He snaps. Hua Cheng snorts.

He doesn’t need to prove that. His very existence is evidence. One doesn’t walk into the kiln and walk out alive without a will of steel—and a heart like stone.

His still aches, from the things he had to do. “Let me explain it like this,” he takes a step.

“I’m sure you all heard the rumors of a new heavenly official ascending, oh...” His eyes flash. “Thirty two years ago?”

The group falls silent, looking at one another—because they all know what he means. There was only one new ascension that year—and no one met the man.

He cast himself down immediately after speaking to the heavenly emperor and Lord Jing Wen. But...he...

“...You?!” Gao He sneers. “You expect us to believe that was YOU?” The Ghost King doesn’t seem offended by his incredulity.

He’s never needed recognition for his ascension before—and Gao He’s desire to deny it doesn’t offend him now.

“You’ve never wondered why a ghost king was willing to accept worshippers?” He muses, fiddling with something braided into his hair—but no one can see exactly what.

“...To expand your own powers?” Gao He sneers, noticing the other martial gods beginning to falter, but refusing to back down,“To pretend to be one of us?!”

“I haven’t used any spiritual power thus far,” Hua Cheng’s voice is soft—and it startles the other martial gods present.

...Because he hasn’t . E-Ming is directly connected to the ghost’s soul, clearly— merely operating the tool doesn't require spiritual powers, and...

The rest, the Ghost King has done with his bare hands. One hand, really.

"...Fine," One of the civil goddesses, speaks up, a literary goddess by the name of Mo Kang. "If that's the case, why cast yourself back down?"

Hua Cheng's smile widens, "I'm so glad you asked," he murmurs, E-Ming snapping the bow out of a martial god's hand before he can fire.

"You see," He clasps his hands behind his back again, taking smooth, confident strides as he walks among the martial gods, "Many years ago, when I was a far lesser being—I sat there, on that mountain," he murmurs, "and I saw something rather strange."

The group stops, looking at one another, whispering among themselves. ...So, there was a particular reason for choosing this place?

"I watched a group of junior officials come here to cultivate," several of them stiffen, eyes widening with recognition.

"And when they came across a fallen heavenly official—I found the way they treated him rather..." Hua Cheng's head tilts to the side, and his smile sharpens with anger,

"Hypocritical."

"...You're referring to the crown prince of Xianle?" Gao He sputters, his jaw hanging open.

"You're doing this for HIM?"

Hua Cheng watches him coldly, not responding one way or the other —giving the Heavenly Official the chance to barrel forward into what may as well be a verbal death trap.

"If you—if you were there that day, you know WHY we looked down on him!"

"Because he was less fortunate than you?" The Ghost King questions, one eye slightly narrowed—but still, he allows Gao He to continue to speak.

“Because no matter HOW unfortunate any of us were, we would NEVER resort to the things that he did! He deserved what he got!”

Gao He snarls. “Whores play stupid games, and they win stupid prizes!” That’s an interesting phrase. Hua Cheng likes it, despite the circumstances.

The martial god crosses his arms, waiting for the Ghost King to respond—almost like he expects Hua Cheng to change his mind.

Instead, the Crimson Rain’s gaze remains ice cold.

If he was still the impulsive young man that he was, he would fly into an immediate rage, screaming in his god’s defense. The way he did as a teenager, trying to stop mobs from burning down dianxia’s temples.

But he isn’t.

Hua Cheng is a man now—one who has seen far too much of the world. And he knows —if he vigorously defends Xie Lian on his devotion for him alone...

The Ghost King will never be ashamed of his devotion—but he knows that, as a former heavenly official, being associated with Hua Cheng would complicate things for Xie Lian.

When he replies, his voice is soft—deathly so. “What was that you called him, just now?”

Gao He can sense something amiss, but he doesn’t retreat. “A whore. You think it’s just a rumor?! I saw him with a customer once myself—it’s a fact, and after resorting to such things, he—

“My mother was a whore.”

Gao He falls silent, choking on his words.

“...What?”

Hua Cheng turns from the others, walking towards him. The ground rumbles subtly under his feet when he does, like small earthquakes triggered by each passing step.

“My mother,” he explains calmly. “By your standards, she would have been called a ‘whore.’”

It’s not something most men—practically any man, really—would say openly. Even if it was true—they would lie, or desperately fight to hide it.

Crimson Rain doesn't seem interested in burying that truth. If anything, he's perfectly willing to lay it out in the open.

"You said before—no matter how low any of you feel, you would never stoop to that," Hua Cheng stops directly in front of Gao He—a tall man, by most standards, but the Ghost King makes him look small.

One eye, black as pitch, looks down on him.

"If you believe that," he tilts his head down, making the martial god feel absolutely dwarfed by his physical presence, heart squeezing with terror, "then you've never truly been hungry."

Gao He takes a stumbling step backwards, hands trembling, and the Ghost King follows.

"You've never been forced to watch your child starve," Hua Cheng murmurs, "Knowing that your choices would be to give him away, or sell whatever you had left to offer."

And who could his mother have given him to, with that eye of his? There was no choice. There never was.

"...There's always..." Gao He starts, swallowing dryly. "Another...he...his situation wasn't..."

"How would you know?" The Ghost King stares him down. He remembers him. Remembers all of their faces—

Hua Cheng took the time to memorize every single one. He remembers Gao He well.

"Because he was a prince! A god higher than any of us—as he seemed so EAGER to remind everyone! It was his OWN choices that put him in that situation! He had all of the opportunities, and he WASTED them—!"

CRACK!

Gao He's head whips to the side from the force of the slap.

"I haven't finished talking," The Ghost King replies coldly.

The martial god spits up blood—and when he does, two teeth land in the grass.

Hua Cheng turns to face the others, continuing his slow, ambling pace —like a lecturer before a group of students.

“I watched,” he explains, “as these junior officials eagerly leapt upon someone less fortunate. Taking advantage of their status and their numbers—as I’m sure many of you thought you would against me, today.”

At least two of the officials have the sense to look sheepish.

“And I found it strange,” the ghost king shakes his head, “it was baffling to me, watching their ascensions. After all—the best show of a man’s character is how he treats those who are less powerful. But it wasn’t only the cowardly opportunism shown by the lot of you, no.”

He doesn’t pause in his speech as another official charges him—allowing E-Ming to strike him so viciously, he’s sent flying backwards until he slams against the barrier of the magical array with a crunch.

“What I found strange was that a group of individuals who could not even meet their own standards managed to ascend at all.”

There’s a stir as a few of them begin to quietly protest, but Hua Cheng’s eye snaps back to their ringleader.

“What was that you said before?” He calls.

“That whores play stupid games, and they win stupid prizes?” He repeats the phrase carefully, his eye narrowed.

“What about the men who buy them, Gao He?”

The martial god pales, his mouth gaping like something akin to a fish. “I-I...I don’t know what you’re trying to...”

“Do you see why I thought it strange, now?” Hua Cheng questions. “That a man who spent his mortal life frequenting brothels—and continues to do so as a Heavenly Official—would look down on anyone for providing a service he so frequently indulges in?”

Gao He flounders, his heart pounding, face splotchy and pale as he glances around the group of officials, watching them gasp and whisper among themselves—watching him with judging eyes.
“You...they...I...I’m not...” He rasps, voice trembling.

Hua Cheng steps in close once more.

“Ashamed that your little secret is out?” His eye is wide now, feral as it bears down on him, and his smile turns absolutely vicious. When he speaks again, his tone is almost sneering, “Don’t worry, Gao He.”

He leans in, baring his fangs.

“They won’t tell anyone, will they?”

Hua Cheng remembers every face from that day.

He didn’t forget a single one.

He remembers how vulnerable and heartbroken his god seemed, looking in Gao He’s direction when he heard the man speak, crying out—

‘You promised you wouldn’t tell anyone!’

Let’s see, Hua Cheng thinks. Let’s see how quiet they’ll keep for you. How bitter that shame feels.

Then, the Ghost King turns to the silver haired official who spoke out before, his tone remaining as cold as ever, “Why are you smirking?”

The Martial God’s expression falters.

“At least Gao He obtained lovers through transactional means,” Hua Cheng stares at him coldly. “You forced yourself upon each of yours.”

One can’t even hear a pin drop, now.

Hua Cheng doesn’t lift his head when he hears an attack coming from behind—simply reaches back.

He catches Gao He’s blade against the palm of his hand—and it doesn’t even break his skin before he manages to twist his fingers through the metal, snapping it in two.

Another one of hers—a later model, finer make—more difficult to shatter, but still, he breaks it.

One by one, he meets each martial god—shattering their weapons, and calling each of them what they truly are.

Gamblers. Thieves. Embezzlers. Wife beaters. War Criminals. Each one with their own unique atrocities.

They each lay on the ground when he's done with them, limp.

The few who have strength left to move are pinned to the dirt by hordes of wraith butterflies, silvery little creatures feasting upon their spiritual power as Hua Cheng walks among the bodies.

"You said before that claimed to have ascended because I wanted to be one of you," the Ghost King laughs softly, shaking his head. "I watched all of this, and when I did have the chance to ascend—I left."

He surveys the group of defeated warriors with an icy gaze.

"Because I didn't want the misfortune of ever having to call any of you my peers." He stops before Gao He, one black boot coming to rest on top of his head, stomping his face down into the dirt, letting him taste how low he's fallen.

His eye burns crimson. "Worthless trash."

When he lifts his foot—Gao He doesn't even have the strength to lift himself from the small crater that Hua Cheng formed in the earth beneath his head, just lays there, bloody and beaten.

"In spite of all of that," Hua Cheng shrugs with a sigh, "I'm still a religious man."

He throws his hands up. "When I see so many mortals deceived into worshipping false idols under the premise of their 'goodness,' well..."

His gaze sweeps over the crowd of bleeding, broken men before him. "I decided something had to be done about it."

"And that," he spreads his hands, gesturing to everyone around him, "is why you all are here today."

Finally, the Ghost king turns to the civil gods—eleven of them, huddled against the edge of the magical barrier, wide eyed.

He smiles, his eye glinting viciously. "Shall we?"

Many of the other civil gods shrink back, but Yao Meifen—the one who called him illiterate, before, steps forward, her head held high.

"Very well."

Many hear the term ‘civil god’ and undervalue what it actually means.

It’s the broadest term within the heavenly court.

Martial Gods fall within a specific, self-explanatory category: warriors. Most of them former generals, royalty, etcetera.

Then there are the elemental masters—of which many roles now sit vacant. The rest, however, are called ‘civil gods.’

Their domain is as wide as academia itself—and due to it’s less flashy nature, it is often viewed as the ‘easier’ form of ascension.

(After all, there are those like the Goddess Ling Wen, who can write one average essay, catch the interest of a senior god, and rise as a deputy.)

However, this is a misconception—as is proven by Yao Meifen’s skilled eloquence in debate. She proves herself knowledgeable in ancient histories, literature, and ethics— Known as a foremost expert on each, and yet—

A Ghost King—a son of a whore, by his own telling—one who likely received little to no formal education—is able to meet her in an argument with ease, never faltering before giving his response. Each point is measured and clear.

One of the other Civil Goddesses, Mo Kang, had tried to point out to her that Hua Cheng was speaking eloquently during his battle with the martial gods, but...

Yao Meifen had scoffed.

And now, as they slowly circle one another, she finds herself... Struggling.

Debating with a King of Hell, about...The Moral High Ground.

“The Heavenly Court defines the moral structure of the mortal realm,” Her nails dig into her palms, but she fights to remain calm—poised. “The mere fact of their ascension makes Heavenly Officials beyond reproach.”

“The Moral Structure of the Mortal realm,” Hua Cheng muses, hands clasped behind his back—one sharpened canine peeking through the corner of his mouth as he speaks, “And what of the Mandate of Heaven?”

Yao Meifen pauses, startled that Crimson Rain has studied things such as… Political Philosophy, of all things.

“If a mortal ruler is overthrown—it is because he has lost his heavenly mandate due to being unjust.” Hua Cheng glances around at the fallen martial gods around them. “Is heaven not subject to its own mandate?”

The Civil Goddess glares.

“That would be akin to a snake eating its own tail, don’t you think?”

“Every god is born as a human being,” Hua Cheng reasons as they continue their slow circle around one another, like two lions on the hunt. “They are subject to mortal laws before their ascension.”

“Laws,” Yao Meifen points out with a smug, victorious smile, “by the will of heaven.”

“How does the heavenly realm feel about rape, then?” Hua Cheng arches an eyebrow —and the goddess pales. “You heard what I said about your comrade, before. What he’s done to women.”

The martial god writhes against the ground, humiliated, struggling to voice his protests—saying that those ‘rats’ were lying, that they were angry that he refused to marry them, nothing more.

But they are not the cries of an innocent man. Hua Cheng levels his gaze upon her.

“Does the ‘mere fact of his ascension’ leave him beyond reproach?”

Yao Meifen grits her teeth, unable to answer for that, but—

“If ascension itself is this declaration of moral infallibility, then how do gods fall?” Her face darkens, and Hua Cheng smirks, shaking his head.

“Gods ascend for the same reasons as any leader, mortal or otherwise.” The Ghost king argues. “Because they have a societal advantage—or because other humans believe in them enough to follow them. And when humans stop believing—those gods fade.”

Her throat aches from how hard she’s fighting back emotion, biting her own tongue until she spits blood, but Yao Meifen still doesn’t relent.

“Gods fall because they fail to meet an ethical code—but that code is STILL dictated by the will of heaven—!”

“What is heaven, then?” Hua Cheng counters, never missing a single beat or taking a pause, as though he’s already considered her argument to its conclusion before she speaks. “Is there some permanent figure among you who writes out this moral code from on high? Is it a democracy? No—” He laughs.

“You all kiss the boots of your heavenly emperor. But he wasn’t the first, was he? And why should he be the last?”

The suggestion of that makes several of the Heavenly Officials balk, turning pale.

“If Heaven was all knowing, dictating morals to mortals from on high…”

He steps closer, watching as Yao Meifen shrinks, her eyes suddenly unsure— Questioning herself.

“Why do laws change?” He questions. “You’re older than me, aren’t you? In your lifetime, how much have the morals of humans changed around you? What did that have to do with Heaven?”

“Of course…” She starts, then stops, her eyebrows knitting together, “They—They have to change. The world is never stagnant. People evolve—”

“But if Heaven was all knowing and infallible, it would already have a perfect set of morals for them, wouldn’t it?”

She falters.

“If that was true, why would the heavens need to evolve?” He questions again.

“…Maybe…alright, maybe Heaven isn’t infallible,” Yao Meifen concedes, “But it still acts as a moral leader—”

“Without infallibility, what right do the heavens have to dictate morality to anyone?”

Hua Cheng muses, deftly backing her argument deeper into a corner, “If immortality doesn’t grant one infallibility—if rapists, philanderers, and gamblers can ascend through heaven's doors, their mandate is no different from that of any mortal ruler."

"That's—!"

"And if the heavens are found to be unjust—people stop worshipping them, or they are cast out by other officials." They stand face to face now, with her leaning back, one hand clutching against her chest with frustration. "It's just another political power structure."

Yao Meifen flushes. "I thought you said that you were a religious man! If all of that was true—then what point would there be in ascension at all?! Why do gods even exist? To serve as an example—!"

"To serve mortals." Hua Cheng cuts her off flatly.

"I—what?"

"Cultivators are expected to protect the weak and serve their communities before they ascend," he never takes his eyes from her. "They serve their communities—in turn, people believe in them, and they ascend, gaining immense power."

"That has NEVER been the way of heaven, we—!"

"Don't interfere with mortal affairs," Hua Cheng agrees, and just when Yao Meifen thinks the argument has returned in her favor—

The Ghost King smirks.

"Your way is to spout morals and do nothing to enforce them. Only interfering when Ghosts threaten your own power structures."

Finally, the civil goddess falls backwards, spitting up more blood, until it trails down her chin—and she—

The Ghost King leans over her, tilting his head.

"I am a religious man," he repeats, "but worship is something that much be earned, and—"

Hua Cheng looks her over.

"I don't believe in you."

...She's been beaten.

One by one, Hua Cheng debates each of them. On everything from the accessibility of ascension—

Pointing out that, while there is a civil exams system that allows commoners to rise, it does nothing for those who live in poverty.

That while an orphan born with nothing might be able to ascend through great sacrifice or physical might—it is nearly impossible for them to gain the education required to ascend as a civil god.

And to achieve such great physical might—that often requires being taught as well.

Even sacrificial, selfless acts—often viewed as the great equalizer among ascensions— are usually only capable of being performed by those born with strong fates, or the luck to be noticed by the heavens.

Meaning, the system is inherently unequal.

Hua Cheng argues that point doggedly and tirelessly.

That they are flawed—and heaven is flawed. That they are corrupt, and that heaven is corrupted.

The only way to save a dying tree is to peel away the diseased bark and start anew, is it not?

One by one, they fall.

Receiving the same treatment as their martial counterparts before them. Their own secrets and personal shames being revealed.

A plagiarized paper here, an accepted bribe there. Some even having gone as far as to forge the answers on their civil exams.

Each and every one of them is a liar in some way. A cheat. A thief. Living off of the fruits of their indiscretions.

And when the last civil god collapses, clutching his hands over his mouth as he coughs up blood, Hua Cheng stares over the group.

All thirty three of them.

“I’m sure you remember my conditions,” he murmurs, and with a flick of his wrist, E- Ming returns to his hip, sliding into it’s sheathe. “You have until the full moon to fulfill your end of the deal.”

Just as he promised—now that the fight is over, the magical barrier drops away.

And just like that, silver bells tinkling with each step he takes, Crimson Rain Sought Flower leaves the battle field, and thirty three gods, bleeding in the dirt.

Humiliated, beaten, and broken.

And he smiles, pleased with his work—knowing that it has been done well.

When the sun rises on another day—the world is not immediately upended, but subtle changes quickly begin to be seen.

A king awakens—telling his advisors to cease construction on a new temple for General Gao He. Upon being asked why—he simply blames it on a change of heart.

There are fewer worshippers in the temples of Yao Meifen and Mo Kang—among many others.

And even within the heavenly realm—there are whispers.

It begins as a self serving act of paranoia, among the thirty three.

'Don't believe him, when he calls me a thief—he's a whoremonger!'

'Who called me that?! Well—she's a cheat, she forged half of her civil exams!'

'As if I'll take this gossip from a man who preys upon women!'

"Don't worry, they won't tell anyone."

Those were the words the Ghost King used to taunt them.

But oh, how they tell.

Far and wide these birds fly, singing their traitorous little songs before they crawl back to their nests, nursing their wounds. Reeking of indignation and self pity.

They do as much damage to their reputations as the Ghost King himself—not even realizing what they're doing.

And one by one, they each make one final mistake:

They presume that it never occurred to the ghost king that they might not honor their word. Fail to consider why he let them go, rather than slaying each and every one of them upon their loss.

And oh, what a fatal error it was.

Hua Cheng let them go, because that's how you deal with an infestation of rats. Rather than killing them immediately, you lace one with poison—allowing it to flee back to the nest, killing the problem at it's source.

And, because the Ghost King does this in his god's name—and dianxia was always known for showing mercy, when it was appropriate.

Out of respect for that—he gives each and every of them the chance to descend on their own. Allowing them the chance to survive and cultivate anew.

None of them take it. Not a single one.

They tell themselves snide little justifications. That it's only reasonable—after all, who could expect them to honor a deal with a ghost king?

That if they stay in seclusion and lick their wounds—people will forget. They always do.

But not a ghost.

Ghosts, in the end, rarely forget. Their memories are long, bitter, and vicious.

Crimson Rain Sought Flower is no exception.

He sits upon the steps of a manor in the middle of construction, red columns sprouting up around him—watching the full moon rising.

Several children play in the street below, chasing silver butterflies, giggling among themselves. Yanlin is among them, occasionally stopping to glance back at Hua Cheng, but—

She leaves him be, seeing the look in his eye.

Fai stands beside him, somewhat awkward. "Well..."

The older man clears his throat, trying to think of a way to soothe the young Ghost King, "I suppose the lesson to be learned here is that heavenly officials aren't particularly...trust worthy. But you still did what you set out to do, yes? It was quite impressive—"

"Not quite."

Hua Cheng watches as the moon rises high into the sky, and he rises with it, stretching out his legs as Fai watches him, his expression somewhat anxious.

"What...do you mean by that, Hua Chengzhu?"

The youth shrugs, long tresses of dark hair swinging gently behind his back.

Bells chime softly in the night, and with each step he takes, the moon seems to shine brighter, taking on an almost amber glow.

"I allowed them to fail," he murmurs, staring ahead, watching silver wraith butterflies fly from his vambraces, disappearing into the night.

"And now, I am going to help them fulfill their responsibilities."
"You..." Fai starts, swallowing dryly, "You should really—!"

But before he can finish speaking, there's the soft rattle of dice—and the Ghost King disappears into the night, just as the butterflies before him.

Within the realm of the dead, there are many different forms of creature—goblins, demons, spirits of every shape and size—but, most common among them all, is the ghost.

A ghost can remain on earth after death for many reasons.

Malicious or benevolent, it doesn't matter—they need only the will to remain. But it is the malicious ones who thrive, rising in power.

And among these ghosts, are four ranks:

A malice, only strong enough to focus on single targets.

A menace, able to wipe out an entire clan.

A savage, possessing the strength to wipe out a city on it's own.

Malices and Menaces make up the majority of ghosts—with only a few powerful, savage ghosts rising to the top of the pile.

And even fewer among them, are those who are born from the Kiln of Mount Tonglu.

Supremes. Devastations. Calamities.

To most, simply called Ghost Kings. Capable of bringing down a nation in a single night—and unleashing chaos upon the world.

For all of written memory, there was only one: The White Clothed Calamity. Bai Wuxiang.

The Destroyer of Xianle.

Bringer of Plague, Death, and Suffering.

So frightening, his devastation so all encompassing, that many feared to even speak his name. So powerful, it took the Heavenly Emperor himself to bring the creature down.

And with him, people believed the age of The Ghost King had ended

That there would not be another. And with that, the heavens breathed a sigh of relief. Became comfortable, in the knowledge that there were none left who could threaten their power.

They built their golden palaces, indulged, became lazy and corrupt. And slowly, they forgot.

Forgot the days of war and plague. Of the damage that could be done, by a single ghost.

They forgot that it meant to be vulnerable.

Forgot that to be targeted by a ghost king is to be marked for death.

But after tonight, they will not forget again.

That won't be possible.

Across the continent, far and wide, silver butterflies drift through the night—moving closer to their targets with dainty flaps of their wings.

Hua Cheng stands beneath the full moon, spreading his palms out on either side of him, breathing in the night air. Crisp—freeing.

The last time he was in a fight—a real fight—it was against a being so powerful, he felt like a paper boat being tossed about in a flood. Surviving on luck and wits alone.

And his opponent—while worthy—was not one that Hua Cheng took any pleasure in defeating.

Ever since, every fight has felt like a shadow in comparison. Irritating—but only in the sense that they never provide a challenge.

This, however, feels like stretching his legs for the first time in decades. Finally flexing muscles that have been dying to be used properly.

The Ghost King takes deep breaths, long and slow, allowing the spiritual power to build up in his chest until his hands are sparking with it—reaching out with his mind, until he can feel tens of thousands of wraith butterflies, scattered from one end of the horizon to the other.

It's far more than anything he's ever attempted before—and yet, before he even says the words—Hua Cheng can feel it there, in his gut: that all of the destructive power in the world lays within his hands.

A Ghost King can bring chaos to the mortal realm—this is well known. On this night, the world learns something new.

When Hua Cheng opens his eye once more—it scorches under the moon with the light of a cursed star.

"Burn," he growls.

On this night, the world learns that a Ghost King can also bring Heaven itself to it's knees.

In an instant, the same, singular blink of an eye—the wraith butterflies burst into small infernos, setting flame to everything around them.

In an instant, thousands—no, tens of thousands—of temples are suddenly pyres, flames roaring up into the sky.

The fires rage until nothing but ash remains—with so much smoke rising into the sky from all around, the moonlight itself begins to dim, slowly changing colors with the ash and fog.

And in the heavens, thirty three gods are forced to watch as all of their temples burn.

Not just a few, or even most—but all. They're forced to watch as the merits stop coming. As the money dries up, and the prayers fade.

As their worshippers—those which many of these officials had begun to take for granted—leave, and they don't return.

And when the officials try to rectify the situation by building more?

Hua Cheng burns those, as well—until no respectable human would dare waste their money in building temples for gods that bring such rotten luck. And who could blame them?

As the desperation builds—they go to the one place they can think of for help. Not Jun Wu, who would certainly judge them for breaking their word, but...

They reach out to the only god they can think of outside of Ju Wu that might be capable of dealing with the calamity:

Just as General Ming Guang predicted, each and every one of them comes crawling to him, pleading for help. And each time, he reminds them of what he said in the very beginning:

That, when the situation turned against them, he would not help them. Pei Ming keeps his promise.

He sits back—and with a keen eye, he watches them burn. Some brightly, with the heat of an inferno—and others slowly, gradually fading into obscurity, becoming forgotten.

The last to disappear is General Gao He—and as his life finally sparks out, he remembers his own words.

'Whores play stupid games, and they win stupid prizes.'

What did he play, but the stupidest game of all? Gambling with a Ghost King.

To think, there was ever a time in his life when he thought he could slay such a creature.

His prize?

Disgrace—and eventually, oblivion.

In the next meeting within the Grand Martial Hall, Crimson Rain Sought Flower, the Ghost King Hua Cheng, is bestowed with a new title:

The Scourge of the Heavens. A title not even the White Clothed Calamity ever dared to achieve.

Jun Wu's gaze is cold, surveying the damage.

Many press him about what shall be done about Hua Cheng—but his response is always the same:

That the Heavenly Officials agreed to the fight and it's terms, only to refuse to fulfill them once the battle was lost.

Hua Cheng was within his rights, holding them to their word.

Eventually, he turns his attention to the only two survivors from the entire ordeal:

General Nan Yang, and General Xuan Zhen.

"It was quite astute of the two of you to ignore his invitation," the heavenly emperor murmurs, looking them over. "But I do wonder why you did so."

Neither of the men responds immediately. Nan Yang stares off into the middle distance, his jaw locked as he struggles for words.

Xuan Zhen is the one who speaks—calm and collected, arms crossed, "Nan Yang blamed me for a clerical error with a few of his temples."

There's no need for an explanation for anyone to know what clerical error he means, and Feng Xin's face flushes indignantly—but still, he doesn't say a word.

He hasn't responded to Mu Qing's antagonizing behavior in months.

"We were arguing about it, and by the time we finished..."

Mu Qing shrugs, flicking his hair back over his shoulder, "The matter was already settled.

No one even questions it—because it sounds exactly like them.

And it's close to the truth—though not quite honest.

When the meeting disperses, Feng Xin looks to him.

Hidden by the crowd of gods moving around them to exit the martial hall—he reaches for Mu Qing, but...

The martial god has already turned on his heel, making his exit.

Feng Xin's fingertips brush against his hair as he disappears into the crowd—but nothing more.

Time passes, and the actions of Crimson Rain Sought Flower, the Ghost King Hua Cheng, are passed along. Painful reminders, to heavenly officials—but to humans, they become a thing of folklore.

Those who once worshipped in the halls of Gao He, Yao Meifen, and Mo Kang now light incense and leave offerings in his name.

His wraith butterflies become a sign of comfort and safety to orphans —and terror, among the gods.

The Scimitar E-Ming becomes the subject of nightmares.

And when people see blood begin to fall from the sky like rain—they know to flee, because calamity is not far behind.

The people forgot, once, what it was like to have a Ghost King.

Then, Hua Cheng brought half of the upper court down, and set the sky aflame in a single night.

And even as the Ghost King's power grows—he never ceases in his task. Searching far and wide, scouring the realms for his love. Each time coming up with nothing but rumors and smoke.

It's been long—so long. Far too long. But still, Hua Cheng never stops.

Even when the task seems utterly fruitless. Even when fate itself seems to have turned against his success—he doesn't give up.

But with each passing year, his heartache and impatience grow.

And as the time slips by, Hua Cheng always finds himself reaching for the coral pearl braided into his hair, twisting it thoughtfully.

There was a time in his life when he didn't pray for anything—or, when he did, Hong- er never expected any sort of answer.

Now, the Ghost King only prays for one thing: over and over again, almost like a mantra;

'Wait for me.'

No matter how long it takes.

'I'm coming for you—just wait for me.'

And every now and then—he feels that distinctive shiver down his neck, and he knows:

Somewhere, wherever he is, dianxia is touching his ashes. That he still has them, carrying them with him wherever he goes.

It's the safest place in the world for them to be—and Hua Cheng would give anything in the world to be able to join them.

That, however, is a matter of time.

And time, in Hua Cheng's experience—is a cruel master.

There's too little of it when you're happy—and far too much of it when you're alone. And all things, gods, ghosts, or mortals, are subject to it's clutches in the end.

Money Over Life and Gains Over Shame

Chapter Summary

Between the realms of ghosts and mortals, there is something that is neither or. To some, an abomination—to others, a haven.

What began as Crimson Rain's lair and a small settlement of orphans is now...more like a city.

A City of Ghosts.

Chapter Notes

You can find me on twitter and keep up with current updates of the story HERE

Content Warning: for existential dread and death (not main character death)

YEAR THREE HUNDRED AND THIRTEEN

Between the realms of ghosts and mortals, there is something that is neither or. To some, an abomination—to others, a haven.

What began as Crimson Rain's lair and a small settlement of orphans is now...more like a city.

A City of Ghosts.

In the center of that city, one will find the red pillars and spires of a grand estate, lanterns gleaming all throughout the night.

It is where the Lord of Ghost City resides, within the walls of Paradise Manner.

Among one of the most opulent residences in the three realms, many wonder why the Ghost King went to such great expense. Many speculate that it was to lure in a potential bride—and others believe Crimson Rain to be a widower, paying respects to a long dead wife.

Either way, whether the rumors are true or not—Paradise Manor is not a home, but simply a place of residence; with one inhabitant.

And tonight, the Lord of Ghost City is not there.

There are many smaller dwellings where Ghost children are known to play—giggling mischievously.

They play pranks on passing mortals, or chase wraith butterflies through the night. Often looked after by the spirits of mothers who have lost their children—they are rarely alone.

There's even a small schoolhouse in the city's outer rings—where a short, elderly ghost teaches.

But the fields around ghost city are silent, on this night. The children do not play, and school desks stand empty.

Only a few city blocks from Paradise Manor stands a large, imposing structure— painted crimson.

A Gambler's Den.

A place where one might lose life and limb if they don't play their cards right—but the odds are always even, and the bets are always fair.

Two ghosts are often seen at the table toward the front, laughing as they toss a set of dice back and forth, crowing to the Ghost King.

Taunting him to join in—or scolding him for being such a grouch. When horrified visitors inquire—one of the children will explain that the men are practically Hua Chengzhu's uncles—

And that, when it comes to gambling, they taught the Ghost King everything he knows.

A lie, of course—the two have never been anything but trouble with a set of cards— but Crimson Rain Sought Flower is generous, and he allows the misconception to continue.

But today, the gambler's den sits empty and silent, no dice rolling around with a—

CLACK, CLACK, CLACK!

On this night, the streets of Ghost City remain vacant. The lanterns go dark. Not a single butterfly lights the path through the night. No children laughing, merchants shouting, or dice rolling.

For the human travelers passing through, it's a bizarre—almost haunting sight. Where on earth would so many ghosts disappear to?

What is happening on that evening is not quite so unusual. It's normal, when it's time comes, for a ghost to be accompanied by companions on the journey in order to receive a proper send off.

Usually only their loved ones, to hold their hand—and the great Hua Chengzhu, of course, to lead their way through the night.

The only thing that marks this occasion as different from the others is just how beloved and well known the ghosts in question have become.

They are older than the city walls—and nearly every man, woman, and child in Ghost City—mortal and undead alike, has grown up in their presence.

Now, the city residents gather in a grand hall, holding a sea of red lanterns, moving in a slow, solemn procession.

In the front—two frail, withered ghosts stand before a black door. Impossibly broad and vast, surrounded by the flames of green ghost fires.

By their side, a young woman weeps. In the throws of her teenage years, hair braided into neat buns on either side of her head.

"It's not fair!" Yanlin sobs, clinging to the front of Xiang's shirt, trembling with anger, fear, and...

Endless sadness.

"Hua Chengzhu, you—you can't let this happen, it—!"

The Ghost King stands back, expression unreadable.

"It's SO unfair!"

Worn, gnarled fingers stroke through Yanlin's hair. And when Xiang speaks—his voice is rough and brittle with age.

"Don't you blame the brat, Yanlin," he mutters gruffly, giving the girl a one armed hug. "He's done everything that he can."

"More than most would have done." Fai offers quietly, rubbing a hand over Yanlin's back.

"...It's not right," From Hua Cheng's side, Bao's hands clench into fists, trembling as he hangs his head—angry and helpless. Of age, now—a man in his own right.

"They don't deserve it."

After all—they've lived fairly decent lives. Made mistakes, yes—but in their time with the residents of ghost city, each ghost has done far more good than harm.

"...It's not about what we deserve, lad," Xiang sighs. "It just is what it is."

They were never meant to come back, after all—Ghosts don't do that, after losing their ashes.

What Hua Cheng did was unprecedented—but it was also never something that could last.

"I could still give you more time," The Ghost King offers, his tone... Quiet. Difficult to read.

"...No," Fai smiles, shaking his head. "You've expended an enormous amount of spiritual power on us over the last century, Hua Chengzhu. It—it was very kind," his voice trembles—but he forces himself to remain calm.

To put on a brave face.

"But there's nothing more to be done."

Their ages have progressed to the point of near inhumanity—and with it, the toll that time takes on a man's mind.

They have clearer days, and bad ones. When Hua Cheng is there, constantly providing them a flow of power—they are themselves.

Laughing, playful—and harmless.

But when Hua Cheng isn't there—attending to other business, or continuing his search—

They deteriorate rapidly.

Skin wasting away, their minds fading until only wrathful, violent spirits remain. And then, they become dangerous. Not only to humans—but other ghosts, as well.

That's why they're here, today.

Because on Hua Cheng's last trip away from the City—Fai's mind faded again, and when it did...he...

The spirit of a young boy, one of his students, ended up being dispersed. Fai knew then that it was time.

And Xiang would never let him go alone.

Normally—these ceremonies are never sad.

It's a time of ache, yes—because the ghosts who are left behind will mourn their companions. But also one of happiness—because the spirit that is moving on is rejoining the living. Being reborn anew.

But that isn't what this is.

The door they stand before isn't red—symbolizing new life, rejoining a never ending cycle.

Those lives, those futures—they were stolen from Fai and Xiang long ago. Now, they stand before a black door.

Evil lays behind—and untold suffering.

Bao wasn't wrong before.

They don't belong there.

Neither of them have done anything to deserve eternal damnation and punishment. And the pain such a loss causes—it doesn't only harm them, but...

An entire city of ghosts, who have come to love the two like their own family.

Yanlin wasn't wrong either.

It isn't fair.

It's horribly, wretchedly unjust. So much so, that even the most cynical and bitter of the ghosts in the crowd are left with a sour taste.

This is what it is, to scatter a ghost's ashes.

This is what it is, to steal a soul's future.

Hua Cheng closes his eyes.

This ache in his chest isn’t entirely unfamiliar, but he won’t think on it now.

When he opens them, Xiang and Fai have turned to face the residents of Ghost City, looking upon them one last time.

Xiang, who has never been one for kind words or sentimental gestures—smiles wide.

“I never did much good in my human life,” he mutters, shaking his head, “but...it was an honor, to be your neighbor.”

Fai nods, echoing the sentiment, smiling upon his students, who cling to their caretakers and weep.

“Among the greatest honors of my life,” the ghost agrees.

They bow—and slowly, in unison, the whole of ghost city bows to them in return, thousands of red lanterns glimmering as they move in unison.

It would be a beautiful sight, were it not paired with the taste of heartbreak. “Thank you, wise masters,” the citizens speak as one.

Slowly, they make their way back towards the gates.

There wasn’t always a third door in this hall—gleaming and white. But after so many trips back and forth, it has remained permanently present for the ghost king, and those he ferries through.

Hua Cheng rolls the dice against his palm—

CLACK!

CLACK!

And with that, the doors swing open—and the ghostly funeral procession makes its way through, singing soft hymns of loss and longing, drifting through the night.

Now, only six figures remain.

Two elderly ghosts, not long for the mortal realm. Three teenagers, standing before them in disarray—and one Ghost King, standing towards the back, his arms crossed.

Since the first brick was laid in the streets of Ghost City—it has always been the six of them.

Back then, Bao, Shuo, and Yanlin were children of only ten, eight, and six.

Now, Bao is a young man approaching nineteen in physical years. Shuo, somewhere around seventeen—and Yanlin, all of fifteen.

And while they have been under Hua Cheng's protection for centuries...

On the day to day, it was Fai and Xiang who looked after them. Who, in many ways, raised them more than their human parents ever had the chance to.

"...I'm sorry," Bao spits out between clenched teeth. "That we couldn't help you two." Always the big brother, that one.

Trying to protect everyone. To take responsibility for things that were never his fault —but still, he tries.

Fai smiles, reaching over to squeeze his arm. "You helped more than you could know."

Yanlin wipes at her eyes—desperately trying to calm down, but the tears won't stop.

"Ah, get back here little one," Xiang sighs, pulling her into another tight hug. "What are you cryin' so much for? You ain't the one that's leaving."

Yanlin sniffles, hugging him tightly. "Because I—I—I don't want you to go!" She sobs, pressed against his chest. I'm not ready!"

"That ain't how life works," Xiang sighs, rubbing her back. "Now, you look after those two knuckleheads for me, alright? Someone's gotta keep a good head on their shoulders around here."

She nods, muffling a sob against his shirt—and the ghost whispers, just between them:

"And look after the boss too, understand?" He whispers. After all—if she doesn't, who else will?

The young ghost sniffles and nods, her shoulders trembling. When she lets go, she can only turn and fling herself into Bao's arms, trying not to weep too loudly.

He holds her tight, rubbing the back of her head, letting her weep into his shoulder— and when he makes eye contact over her hair, he and Xiang share a quiet nod of understanding.

They've said goodbye often over the course of the day—neither of them can bear to say anymore.

Finally, they begin to make their way towards the doors—where the rest of the citizens of ghost city just took their leave.

Shuo remains, his head slightly bowed, lips pressed so tightly together, they've lost any remaining color.

"...There really isn't another way?" He mumbles.

Fai reaches out—much shorter than the young man now, who now stands a few inches below Hua Cheng's height—patting the top of his head.

"I'm afraid not, lad." The teacher sighs, shaking his head. "But you work hard, alright?" Shuo nods, lips trembling "Don't lose that potential."

He glances over Shuo's shoulder, looking Hua Cheng in the eye, "You have to nurture that."

Of the three, the middle child has always shown the greatest promise. Yanlin has remained a malice—but both Shuo and his brother have become Menace ghosts.

They'll be powerful, in time.

And Shuo has the potential to rise even higher. He'll likely become a savage ghost, by the time he's a grown man—of comparable strength to what Hua Cheng possessed as Wu Ming.

The Ghost King's gaze does not waver. "I will," he agrees softly.

Even if he isn't much of a teacher.

Eventually, Shuo knows that he has to go. He takes one shaky step back, green eyes flickering down to the red string tied around Hua Cheng's finger, hopeful, just as he was as a child, but—

"I'm sorry,"

The Ghost King seldom says such words. “But it wont’ work this time.”

“...” Shuo nods, fighting to hide a bitter vein of disappointment—but Hua Cheng does allow the boy to take one end of the string, carrying it with him towards the door back to the mortal realm.

A small act of reassurance—reminding Kuo that one of the three left behind will return

Then, he disappears through the doorway as well—and when Hua Cheng turns around, it’s just as it was before.

Him, and two ghosts—standing on the edge of human existence. In a space between hell and the next life.

Back then, he was a spirit without strength. Hope. Even a name.

“I haven’t seen you wear that face in a long time,” Xiang comments, his hands shoved into his pockets, rocking back on his heels.

He’s never been particularly good with goodbyes.

“It’s the face you were wearing when we met,” Fai comments with a soft smile, appreciative.

“...It’s the face I was born with,” Hua Cheng admits. His scars and his nose healed when his spirit reformed, and he’s simulating having two eyes—but it’s the closest he’s been to himself in centuries.

And that seems to please both ghosts. After all—it’s a show of great trust.

“Well,” Xiang smiles, crossing his arms as he tilts his head to the side, bones in his spine creaking as he looks him over, “who would’ve known that you were a good lookin’ fella all this time?”

“We always knew that,” Fai cuts in, trying to soften it—

But Hua Cheng laughs.

“Compared to you?” He smirks, looking the old ghost over, “Anyone’s a prince.”

Fai gawks, looking back and forth between the two, slightly stressed—but then Xiang throws his head back and cackles, dust puffing out between his teeth, his jaw rattling.

"You little BASTARD!"

"I'm…" He wipes at his eyes, shaking his head. "I'm not gonna miss you at all!"

Both of their smiles fade—and Hua Cheng takes a deep breath.

"…I thought I could work it out," he mutters, "I didn't realize…"

He thought they would have more time.

"Listen, kid…" Xiang sighs.

You'd think, now that he's three and a half centuries old, people would stop calling him that, but…well…

Not these two.

"…We made our own choices," he gestures between himself and Fai. "And yeah, we got a ROTTEN deal, I won't lie—but it's noting to do with you."

"I know."

Hua Cheng agrees.

But when he was fighting in the fields of Mount Tonglu—that was always with the intention of getting strong enough to protect his god. That's still his motive behind everything he does, but—

Even now, after how much strength he's gained…

He can't save them.

From what he knows to be an objectively horrible fate.

Rapists, wife beaters, and thieves are allowed to ascend to the highest ranks of the heavens, but…

A loaded set of dice can land two men here.

And even the most powerful ghost in all three realms cannot stop it.

In a moment like this—Hua Cheng almost understands the desire to rule the world from the high seats of heaven. To enforce laws and justice on mortal men—

So they won't end up here, taking a punishment that far outweighs any crime.

But the heavens couldn't have stopped this.

Watching the morose look on Hua Cheng's face, Xiang shakes his head, "Look at me."

The younger man complies, eyes snapping up, and Xiang jabs one skeletal thumb against his chest, then points at Hua Cheng with his index finger, his gaze determined.

Unafraid.

"Kids like you and me—who weren't born with anything—we gotta take risks." He explains. "And every time we do—we know we might lose it all, but—"

Xiang grins, his eyes far away—like he's reliving a happier memory. "That moment—just before the dice land—it's like nothin' else."

He breathes, bubbling with an excitement that he hasn't held since his youth—the kind that he only ever seems to have when he's putting his luck on the line. "Because in that moment—you could be seconds away from being rich. Being somebody." He lets out a shaky breath.

"For most people—that moment is as close as we ever get. And we chase it, over and over, knowing that it's no good for us—knowing that we'll strike out, again and again...but damn," he laughs, exhilarated, "it's so much fun, getting that close."

"You were someone."

Xiang sniffs, "...Nah," he shakes his head. " You made me someone. Made us both somebodies," he nods towards Fai. "But I was a screw up before that. Still am—but you know what?" He slaps Fai's arm with a wide grin "That's fine—because I had a DAMN good time playing with you two!"

He trembles a little with fear each time he looks back towards that door—but the bravado never leaves his voice. "So, don't you DARE tell me sorry, or pity me— understand?"

"...Yeah," The Ghost King agrees, dipping his head. "I do."

"..." Xiang lets out a shaky breath, nodding. "Good, now—" He extends his hand, “What do we always say?”

Hua Cheng stares down at the ghost’s outstretched palm for a moment — remembering a time when he looked down on the man. Thought of him as little more than a foolish, shortsighted little gambler.

One unworthy of respect.

He didn’t know then, what a loyal friend Xiang was. Trustworthy— and brave, in spite of holding so much fear.

Slowly, the ghost king reaches out to take his hand, shaking it firmly. “...Gains over shame,” he repeats, unable to hold back a small smile.

Xiang beams back at him, squeezing his hand tightly, “And money over life!” The irony of the statement makes him cackle, his teeth rattling together from the sound—

“HAHAHA!”

He drops Hua Cheng’s hand, turning around to face the door before him, rolling his shoulders.

“...Hey,” he calls back, “if someone ever kicks the doors to hell open— I’m gonna find you, and we’re gonna play another round, alright?”

Something about that makes Hua Cheng’s mouth quirk at the corners. “...Just listen for the flute,” he mutters, half under his breath.

“Huh?” Xiang croaks, confused—and the ghost king shakes his head, clearing his throat.

“I’ll play a round with you any time, my friend.” He calls out. “There’s always a seat for you.”

Hua Cheng can’t see the way Xiang’s lips wobble. He’s never called Xiang a friend before.

He gives a shallow nod—turning to Fai, “...I know you hate going first,” Xiang mutters, glancing back towards the door “I’ll go on ahead, alright?”

The shorter man frowns, his eyes filled with emotion, “Xiang—”

“I’ll see you on the other side, alright? It ain’t such a big deal,”

Xiang takes a shaky breath, facing the door one final time. “It’s just...”

he reaches forward, grasping the handle, huffing out his last breaths—

“Just a new game, that’s all!”

The door to hell wrenches open—and when it does, dark, cloud-like hands reach out, gasping him.

“XIANG!” Fai cries out, eyes wide and frightened, but before he can rush forward— Xiang holds up one hand in a shaky thumbs up, offering a fierce grin as he gets dragged in.

“It ain’t so bad, I’ll...see you...in the shithole, got it?! Don’t—be such a wuss!”

BAM!

The door slams shut—and Fai is left there, pale and frightened, but...when he looks back to Hua Cheng, he tries not to be.

“...That didn’t look so bad,” he starts, forcing a cheerful tone— “Don’t lie.”

“It looked absolutely horrific, and I’d rather die again,” Fai mutters.

He bites his lip, staring at that door, his eyes strained.

“...He’s always done that,” the ghost admits after a moment. “Charged ahead of me.”

“He’s a show off,” Hua Cheng drawls, trying to set him at ease, but... Fai’s smile is bittersweet, eyes slightly wet.

“He does it because he knows I won’t be as scared if I know he’s waiting for me,” he explains, wiping at his nose. “He’s been jumping in headfirst since we were boys, and...that’s probably part of why...”

Why they ended up here.

It was Fai’s gambling debts, after all.

“...He never blamed you for that,” Hua Cheng reminds him quietly, and Fai nods, his mouth tightening at the corners.

“I know,” the ghost agrees, “he wouldn’t. I just...” Slowly, he turns to face Hua Cheng.

“I wanted to wait, to tell you...I...”

He bows low, hands clasped.

“Thank you, Hua Chengzhu.” Fai mutters fervently, and Hua Cheng—the sight of it—

Something about it sets him on edge, and he shakes his head, his voice low with shame.

“Don’t thank me.”

‘I couldn’t do anything but delay this, in the end.’

“...It’s important for me to say this,” the elder presses on, not lifting out of his bow. “I died...in disgrace,” he admits, his voice shaking. “My family was so ashamed—they couldn’t even tell the truth of what happened. Simply said it was an accident. I was...I was nothing.”

Just the memories seem to be enough to swallow him whole—still, he doesn’t stop.

“...But then you came along,” Fai smiles, lifting his head, “and in these last centuries, I’ve had purpose again. I’ve—I’ve been a teacher again.”

Tears slip down his cheeks—not happy or sad.

They exist somewhere in between.

“So, thank you, Hua Chengzhu.” Fai mutters, casting his eyes to the side.

He’s always thought of himself as a small, insignificant creature. Not as loud or action driven as Xiang. Certainly nobody worth remembering, but...

He’s been lucky to spend his life following so many memorable people. He doesn’t regret a single moment of that—only his own mistakes.

“...” The ghost smiles, beaming with encouragement—just as he did when he was teaching Hua Cheng his first characters and numbers.

“And your god—whenever you find him—”

The words he speaks next make Hua Cheng’s eyes widen sharply, and...

“—he will be lucky to have you.”

They're among the kindest words anyone has ever said to the Ghost King. Enough so to leave his throat thick with emotion.

"So, please." Fai repeats, bowing his head once more. "If you could do one last kindness for me—accept my humble, deepest gratitude."

There's a pause, his head hanging low with respect, before he hears the Ghost King reply—

"Only if you accept mine."

Fai pauses, surprised.

"Your—?"

When he looks up, his breath catches with shock.

Before him, Crimson Rain Sought Flower, lord of Ghost City, the calamity Hua Cheng —

He's bowing to Fai.

A murdered gambler, who came from nothing—and died with nothing. A failure, forgotten by most who knew him.

And the leader of the ghost realm is bowing to him. Hands clasped before him in respect.

"Thank you for your lessons, Fai Laoshi," Hua Cheng murmurs. "I will not forget them."

The number of people—dead or alive—that the Ghost King would bow before is incredibly small.

First, and always—to his god. Second, to his Guoshi. And now, to his teacher.

"..." Fai's lips tremble, and then he smiles. So wide, his crumbling jaw cracks from the strain—and tears pour down his cheeks.

Tears of happiness, from a man about to face hell itself.

"...Hua Chengzhu," he whispers, feeling the need to try and remind the Ghost King of how ludicrous this is, "I have made so many mistakes—"

"I'm not interested in being taught by someone who has not made mistakes," Hua Cheng corrects him—his voice uncharacteristically gentle. "I'd rather study under someone who has learned from them."

The tears pour even faster now, and the gift Hua Cheng has brought Fai, in this moment—is absolutely immeasurable.

A wound, a sense of inadequacy that has long festered in Fai's heart—is now closed.

Peace.

In this final moment, Hua Cheng brought Fai's soul peace.

He mirrors Hua Cheng's posture, like that of a teacher bowing to their own student upon graduation.

It's a different sort of goodbye—and far more bittersweet. But no one is ever really gone.

"The greatest honor I could ever have," Fai murmurs, his hands trembling, "was having you as my student."

Both men straighten, and finally, Fai turns to face the door.

A great, black maw—ready to open its jaws and swallow him whole.

"Do you need—?"

"It's alright."

Fai glances over his shoulder, offering Hua Cheng one last smile.

"Xiang is waiting for me."

That sentence alone is enough to make Hua Cheng stop, fingers outstretched—his throat suddenly thick.

His fingers wrap around the handle, and finally, in one last act of courage...

Fai throws the door to hell wide open, watching as clouds of dark smoke stretch out towards him, wrapping around his old, withering form.

And he smiles.

Because sometimes, in the face of such horror—

Smiling is the bravest thing a person can do.

BAM!

The door slams shut.

Hua Cheng stands alone, in a field of ghost fires, staring down that empty, black door. Knowing what lays behind it. And—

And that it's all so unfair.

'Not everyone is meant to live forever.'

That was something Fai used to say, when Yanlin asked why he and Xiang aged so much faster than the other ghosts in the city.

Of course—almost no one does live forever. Not really.

Mortals inevitably perish. Even if they linger as ghosts—almost all of them will eventually fade.

The Gods themselves aren't eternal. There was a Heavenly Dynasty before that of Jun Wu. Most gods will fade to obscurity after a few centuries.

(And, as Hua Cheng has shown, one can speed up the process.)

And among the tens of millions of ghosts across the realms...

Hua Cheng is the only one among them that is capable of sustaining himself for eternity.

A feat he achieved in the pursuit of his god. A desire to be stronger. To be useful to him, for as long as Xie Lian walked the earth.

Hua Cheng never thought of it as pursuing immortality.

He was chasing power. Usefulness. But he was also ready to die at a moment's notice, if that was what his god needed of him.

And now that he's achieved it, however unintentionally, Hua Cheng is forced to reconcile himself to what immortality truly means.

Saying goodbye.

The moment he meets a person, Hua Cheng is already thinking of the ways that he'll say goodbye to them, in the end. Because outliving them has become a simple reality.

Even if some wouldn't call this living—it's more like haunting. But all immortals are like ghosts, really.

They live off of memories alone, watching the world pass them by, unable to live among it was they once did—always mourning something that is already long gone.

And of course—no one mourns like a ghost.

It's a price Hua Cheng accepts, in his pursuit of his beloved.

But oh, what a heavy price it is to pay.

He turns his back on the door, making his way towards his own exit, following the small trail of red thread, marking the way home.

Each step feels heavy—and it aches with a pain that Hua Cheng knows he will not soon forget.

He bears it.

Makes his way up each and every step, as he has a million times before—reminding himself of a difficult truth.

Hua Cheng can destroy nations. He can topple gods. He can make the sky rain blood.

But he cannot save everyone.

There was a time where he never desired to.

A time where only one person in his life mattered—and aside from him, Hua Cheng didn't care if the world itself burned to the ground.

And his god—he still sits high above the rest in Hua Cheng's affections. He's still his drive. His focus, his—

His meaning.

But in these last three centuries—Hua Cheng has learned that he isn't incapable of forming other attachments. Even if they're dwarfed by his devotion to Xie Lian—he's still able to feel friendship. Connections.

He can't help but wonder if it's worth the pain of losing them. "Are they gone?"

He doesn't realize he's finished the journey back to the surface until he hears Shuo's voice.

The boy is sitting back against a boulder on the outskirts of ghost city, his knees pulled up against his chest.

"...Yes," The Ghost King admits. "They are." "Is there...a way for them to ever come back?"

Hua Cheng thinks on it for a moment, but—tired, he shakes his head with a heavy sigh. "I don't know."

He takes the other end of the string back when Shuo offers it, prepared to return to Paradise Manor for the night, when—

"Hua Chengzhu?"

The ghost glances back over his shoulder—and Shuo hasn't moved from his spot. Still holding his knees close against his chest, lips trembling as he stares straight ahead.

"...Yes?"

"Are your ashes somewhere safe?" Shuo bites his lip. "Like— really safe?"

Oh.

He—

He's worried.

Hua Cheng's gaze softens slightly—and he nods.

"They're in the safest place they could be," he assures him—and Shuo hugs himself a little tighter, unsure.

"How do you know that?"

"Because..." The dark haired man turns his gaze up to the stars, growing quiet. "...if the place where they're kept no longer existed," Hua Cheng explains slowly, "I would have no reason to exist either."

Shuo's eyebrows knit together—and he's clearly startled by the concept, "...It's that important?"

"Nothing could ever be more important," he replies.

He makes to turn back now—knowing that tomorrow will not be any easier. Nor the day after that.

But over the centuries Hua Cheng has learned that, with enough determination, it is possible to drink himself into a stupor, and he plans to do just that.

Shuo still has questions.

“...What kind of person scatters someone’s ashes?” He whispers, glaring into the dark, struggling to understand.

Hua Cheng can’t imagine the feeling. The cruelty that humans are capable of has never confused him. It simply is.

“Was it someone who hated them?”

Shuo mutters, trying so hard to make sense of it. To find a reason. “What could they have done that was so awful?”

In truth—scattering ashes is only justified when a ghost is so powerful, so dangerously malicious, that them returning to the mortal realm is too great a risk.

There are very few ghosts who rise to such a level of danger.

As for mortals...Murder. Rape. Crimes such as those are often viewed as a worthy excuse.

Hua Cheng has scattered a man’s ashes before.

Several, actually.

In a bloodstained temple, many years ago.

Hua Cheng doesn’t feel any remorse over that. Not after what they did. Not after that they /tried/ to do.

And if he came across his beloved and found that someone had tried to harm him again—the ghost king would repeat the sin without pause.

But Fai and Xiang did no such thing.

And there’s no logical answer that Hua Cheng can give.

“...I don’t think that they did,” he admits. “I think there was a desire to make an example out of them, and…"

"And?"

"Sometimes, men do things because they can."

Shuo seems to understand that much, eyes narrowing.

"…Rich men do that," he mutters, fingernails digging into his trousers where they grip his knees. "It was a rich family, right?"

When Hua Cheng thinks back on it—

"Yeah."

Merchants. From the kingdom of Xuli.

"I hate rich people," Shuo whispers, eyes burning with resentment.

It seems to run deeper for him than just this one instance—that much is obvious. But he doesn't seem inclined to share, and…

Hua Cheng is tired, so he doesn't ask.

When he's back in paradise manor that evening, he takes reports from his wraith butterflies, watching images from thousands of locations form across the continent, but…

Just like every other night, his god isn't there.

Hua Cheng doesn't reach for the bottle of liquor on his desk, the way he had planned to.

He doesn't have an actual need to sleep, no reason to own a bed even, but…

Centuries of wishful thinking have left the ghost king with a fondness for dreaming.

He only has one, after all.

When it comes, he opens both eyes, just to find a warm, ethereal gaze staring back up at him.

His fingers drift out, tangling with smaller, softer hands—so warm against his palms.

And he always knows that it's a dream—

But it's his own, and dianxia's smile feels real.

"Hong-er," he murmurs, raising their joined fingers up, pressing them against his cheek, "you're tired."

That's how he can always recognize the dreams for what they are.

Because when Xie Lian says his name, Hua Cheng can answer.

"I know," he whispers. "I'm sorry."

Xie Lian turns his cheek into Hua Cheng's palm, pressing a soft kiss there.

The ghost shivers, the way he always does—but that's another way to know that it is a dream.

His god would never touch him in such a way. Not if he knew who Hua Cheng truly was.

"...And sad."

The god frowns more now, his eyes scanning over Hua Cheng's face. "What happened?"

It's probably a coping mechanism of some sort, if he's being honest with himself—his emotions trying to find a slightly less bothersome way to process things.

But Hua Cheng chooses to pretend.

One of his arms slides around the crown prince's waist, pulling him in—and once he's close enough, Hua Cheng's face presses against his hair, letting out a shuddering sigh.

"I miss you," he admits.

It's the answer he always gives.

Arms wrap around his back, hugging him closer.

Even if it's more intimate than what the reality would be, it's far closer than the dreams Zhao Beitong tried to show him in the kiln.

Close enough, that there are moments when he forgets that he's dreaming. “I know,” his god whispers. “But there’s more, isn’t there?”

Hua Cheng is quiet, fingers stroking through his hair. He could choose to just be rude, to cling to him and remain sullenly quiet like the brat that he once was, but—

Dream or not, he can’t bring himself to do that.

“...I lost something today,” he admits. “It...was painful.”

The god doesn’t question, doesn’t press—his fingers just draw invisible patterns against the ghost king’s back through his tunic, and eventually, he continues—

“They were...my friends,” saying it feels so strange to him, so alien. “And I couldn’t save them.”

“...Oh, Hong-er,” Xie Lian sighs, arms tightening around Hua Cheng’s back, “I’m so sorry.”

He leans his cheek against the Ghost King’s head, the weight of it comforting. “But you can’t save everyone.”

“...I know,” Hua Cheng whispers.

“Just like I couldn’t save you,” The god mutters, his tone suddenly self-deprecating. Hua Cheng’s arms tighten, holding him so close, he half expects the dream to shatter.

“You did.” The ghost mutters, shaking his head. “So many times.” Xie Lian never believes it, but he smiles

It’s a dream, yes—not particularly close to reality.

But Hua Cheng doesn’t need it to be.

And when he wakes in the morning—it always aches just a little bit less than the night before.

He calls that better than nothing, and...

Hua Cheng is curious now, remembering Shuo’s words

‘They were rich, right?’

A wealthy family, in the Kingdom of Xuli. Among the most powerful merchants in the land.

Once, Xiang asked Hua Cheng to find them and enact revenge—telling them that Xiang had sent him from hell.

And now, it feels like…

A visit might be in Order.

IF YOU WOULD LIKE TO CONTINUE READING THIS STORY ON TWITTER, YOU CAN CONTINUE FROM HERE .

The Way of Elder Brothers

Chapter Summary

> "I know where the Shi family lives!"
>
> Hua Cheng turns around, glancing around the crowd at first before looking down—
>
> To find a little girl beaming up at him.

Chapter Notes

> You can find me on twitter and keep up with current updates of the story HERE
>
> tw// there is a moment in this chapter that could be perceived as transphobic to some audiences, but does not rise to being explicit transphobia (as the character in question does not identify as transgender when the statement is directed at them)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

There's a port city, in the Kingdom of Xuli. A glittering jewel in the middle of the coast, filled with ships from every corner of the earth, of every shape and color.

Merchants toss catches of fish between the aisles of their stalls—and the scent of spices lingers on the wind.

Hua Cheng spent his younger years in a country torn by war—and in the years since, he was so consumed by his search that he never stopped to look, but...

He stops, lifting his chin, finding the faintly familiar shape of a pagoda rising in the distance.

It's covered in paints—greens, reds, and golds. Likely kept up through the centuries, one of the oldest temples for the martial god of the region.

Hua Cheng often forgets after all this time that he was born in the kingdom of Xuli. His memories are faint at best, but...

He remembers that temple.

His mother prayed there, before they left on their journey to Xianle. Hua Cheng can still remember the way she looked, knelt before the divine statue, offering a small bowl of rice, her brow furrowed with concentration.

She would always try to get him to pray, before—at any of the other temples they frequented. She did that often, hoping to scrounge enough coins through begging that she wouldn't have to go out in the night, but...

She didn't try to convince her son to pray that day.

No—she rose to her feet with a determined expression, spinning on her heel and walking out without a word, grabbing Hong-er's hand tightly as she hurried down the street, not looking back once.

He couldn't tell you if this was the city where he was born—or just where they lived last, before Xianle.

It doesn't feel much like coming home. And yet—he does like this place.

There's laughter and talk no matter where you look, children rushing forward to watch the ships.

Musicians play in the street, rattling bells and tambourines, flute notes drifting through the voices in the crowd.

Hua Cheng wears the face of a wealthy, well to do young man—clad in crimson silk robes and fur lined boots.

The sort of person you listen to, when they speak.

He turns his gaze to a nearby merchant, lining up rows of finely made tapestries. The side of them makes him smile faintly, remembering.

"Did you make those yourself?"

"With these hands?" The merchant snorts, holding up worn, thick fingers. "Hardly—I source them from out west."

"Where out west?" The stall owner shrugs, crossing his arms, leveling a stern look in his direction.

"You expect me to give out trade secrets just like that? Pah!" He shakes his head. "You want something, I'll get it for you—but I won't give up my sources."

“That so?” Hua Cheng muses, crossing his arms. “There’s something else I’m looking for. Maybe you could help me.”

The merchant rubs his shin, thinking. He’s a serious looking fellow—with a square jaw, and a scar through the right corner of his mouth. “I reckon I could. What is it?”

“The Shi family,” the teenager sighs, stretching his arms over his head. “I heard they were merchants in the area. Or have they moved on?”

“Moved on?” The stall owner sputters. “They own half of the city, so I very much doubt that.”

“Can you point me in their direction?”

“Even if I could...” He sighs, “Honestly, if you’re not royalty or something, they aren’t gonna bother with you. Is it really that important?”

“Oh, I’m certain,” Hua Cheng smiles faintly, his eyes unreadable. “Just tell me where their manor is, I’ll handle the rest.”

The stall owner seems a little unsure of his intentions now, frowning—and that’s when another voice pipes up eagerly.

“I know where the Shi family lives!”

Hua Cheng turns around, glancing around the crowd at first before looking down—

To find a little girl beaming up at him.

She’s small—barely tall enough for the top of her head to reach Hua Cheng’s ribs, but he suspects she might be a bit older than she looks, and...she’s a striking child.

Delicate chestnut waves frame her face, pouring down her back—and emerald eyes shine up at him brightly.

The stall owner looks even more wary now, opening his mouth to speak—but Hua Cheng beats him to it, kneeling down before the child with a smile. “Is that so?”

She bobs her head, rocking on the balls of her feet. Her dress is finely made—leaves embroidered into her sleeves.

“I can take you there, if...” She clasps her hands behind her back, her eyes twinkling with an almost infectious level of excitement, “You get me some candies?”

“...” The ghost king tilts his head, watching her for a moment—his smile remaining. “What kind would you like?”

“Mmm...” She thinks it over, pointing towards a nearby stall, selling spun sugar pulled into different shapes. “That one!”

“Alright,” he agrees, standing back up.

In a matter of moments, she’s skipping down the street with a rabbit shaped snack, Hua Cheng walking by her side.

“So, whatcha looking for the Shi family for?” She hums, taking a big bite—a little messy. Hua Cheng doesn’t see well-to-do girls eat that way often, but he doesn’t comment.

“I’m investigating a matter that might relate to them,” he shrugs. “What’s your name?”

She opens her mouth immediately, “Sh—!”

Then, she stops.

“Sshhhhheeesh, this is good!” She hums, quickly stuffing her mouth full with spun sugar, her tongue sticking to the roof of her palette S she chews.

“It’s—um—mmmphrepmh!”

“I didn’t catch that,” Hua Cheng replies dryly.

She swallows thickly, coughing a little, “It’s...Mingxia,” she rasps. “What’s yours?”

Hua Cheng can guess her family name by now, so he doesn’t press for it. “Bolin.” He replies calmly. “Are we close?”

“...Yes,” the young girl nods. “Just a little further!”

Now—Hua Cheng has gained many skills over the years, one of them slightly more refined than the others.

He follows her lead, bells chiming at his waist with each step. Eventually, he speaks up.

"Mingxia?"

She glances back up at him with a friendly smile, "Yeah, Mr. Bolin?"

He leans down, arms clasped behind his back, watching her closely—"Were you telling me the truth before, about your name?"

"…" Her smile fades, eyes suddenly unsure.

Hua Cheng can see a liar a mile away—especially a bad one.

"Um…I wasn't trying to be rude or anything!"

She assures him. "I'm just not allowed to tell anyone! I could get in a LOT of trouble."

That certainly does catch his notice. "Trouble?"

They stop in the street, and she bites her lip, looking down at what remains of her candy. "I…um…"

"Hey!" A voice barks from around the corner, sharp and accusing, "What's going on here?"

Hua Cheng looks away from the little girl, just in time to see a teenage boy making his way toward them, his expression dark, but…

Mingxia's face lights up happily. "Gege! I'm back!"

Her older brother is just as striking as she is—with darker hair, loose down his back, half of it pulled up with an element silver hairpiece, and piercing blue eyes.

Eyes that are fixed on his younger sister with a stormy expression. "What have I told you about wandering off?!"

He snatches the little girl up into his arms, hitching her on his hip as he sends the stranger accompanying her a suspicious glare. "Who is this?"

"…Mr. Bolin!" Mingxia exclaims. "He said he was looking for us!"

Her brother's eyes narrow—and Hua Cheng smiles.

"Ah, so Shi is your family name. I suspected."

The elder glares, annoyed, and Mingxia winces, "I didn't say that we were—!”

“Who are you, and what do you want?”

“Hua Bolin,” the ghost king replies, crossing his arms. “Are you forbidden from giving your real name as well?”

He sends Mingxia a look, and the little girl winces. “I gave him the name, and he didn’t believe me...”

‘The name.’ So, it’s an agreement worked out between the two of them?

The young man heaves out a sigh. “You’re addressing Shi Wudu, eldest son and heir to the Shi family.”

He looks Hua Cheng over once more, his gaze tense with suspicion. “Why were you looking for us?”

The Ghost King glances around the marketplace, reaching up to toy with the pearl braided into his hair. “I’m a cultivator.”

As far from the truth as it gets, but believable.

“I’ve been investigating a possible curse, and it led me to your family tree.” He explains with a shrug. “Do you keep genealogical records?”

At the mention of the word ‘curse ,’ Shi Wudu’s expression instantly changes—moving from suspicious, to shocked, to...

Hopeful.

“...We do,” he agrees, his tone suddenly far more polite than it was before. “How did it lead you to us?”

Hua Cheng glances around the bustling marketplace, “You wouldn’t want me to explain it here.”

He says it with such certainty that...the teenager sighs, turning around.

“Alright, come with me.” He mutters—never setting his younger sibling down. He clutches the child close in his arms, constantly glancing about—and he only seems to relax once they’re inside the gates of the family manor.

Hua Cheng finds it all slightly...strange. It isn’t odd for siblings to be close, but…

He suspects Mingxia must be somewhere close to ten years old, and Shi Wudu is carrying her around like she might as well be a toddler—even when they step inside, he doesn't set her down.

"Young master, you've returned! And who—?"

Shi Wudu is quick to wave the servants off, feet clicking softly against marble floors as he strides down the corridor, a handsome young stranger at his side. "I'll be hosting a guest in the library. I'll send for you if we require anything."

He has a rather…uptight demeanor.

Unusual for a young man of that age—Hua Cheng doubts he could be older than sixteen or seventeen—and the first trait about Shi Wudu that really sticks out to him is…

Pride.

A stiffness that seems to exude from wounded pride, and a need to repair it.

(A fatal flaw.)

When the library doors shut behind them, he finally sets his little sister down, placing her on one of the couches before he goes off to find the genealogy scroll that Hua Cheng requested, and in the meantime…

Hua Cheng kneels in front of the little girl, watching her closely.

"Is it alright if we talk now?" He questions, resting his forearms against his knees.

"…" She squirms, glancing in her brother's direction—clearly wary of disobeying him, though she doesn't seem sure if this counts as disobedience. "I think so…"

"Your name," Hua Cheng's tone is calm, which seems to make her relax just a little bit. "Why would you get in trouble for saying it?"

She glances from Hua Cheng, then to her brother, and back to him again.

"…I'm hiding," she whispers, her eyes wide.

He raises an eyebrow.

She doesn't seem to be hiding at all. She hasn't hidden who her family is—and was playing in plain sight in the market square.

(Even if her elder brother did disapprove.)

"...Hiding from what?" He questions.

"The bad thing."

She doesn't seem to have the words to explain what . Hua Cheng doesn't hold that against her—and, in any case, it seems clear when he considers Shi Wudu's reaction to the word 'curse ,' well...

It's something supernatural.

A scroll lands on the desk behind them with a heavy slam

Hua Cheng rises to his feet, offering Shi Wudu—who is now standing behind them, watching the two with a wary eye, his arms crossed—a thin smile. "How far back does it trace?"

"...Four Centuries," the teenager frowns. "I thought that might be excessive, but—"

"It'll do."

Hua Cheng doesn't say much more as he rolls the scroll out across the desk's surface, tracing the lineage back from one generation to the next, keeping track of the years in his head.

Shi Wudu shifts his stance slightly, so he's standing between the stranger and his sister.

"...I've never seen a cultivator like you before," he comments slowly, looking over 'Mr. Bolin's' form.

He dresses well, in fine clothes—silver jewelry. Not like a man that has dedicated himself to a spiritual path.

"There are unorthodox cultivators around," Hua Cheng murmurs, not looking up from the scroll.

"...Which temple do you cultivate under, anyway?" The teenager presses, eyes slightly narrowed. And now, the Ghost King understands that SHi Wudu's paranoia is not unfounded.

"Ming Guang," the dark haired stranger replies, his gaze intently focused on the scroll, and Shi Wudu snorts with surprise.

"What? I've never seen you around here before."

Hua Cheng might be able to sniff out a bad liar—but telling lies is just as natural to him.

Pei Ming is one of the few gods in the heavenly court that doesn't mandate a certain type of cultivation in order to send merits through his temples—and, as a result, his following is...diverse, with many eclectic figures.

"His territory is broad," Hua Cheng shrugs. "I came from further south."

Finally, he reaches the appropriate year, and...

There it is.

Shi Jinhai. He heard that name enough times over the years—from both Fai and Xiang—to recognize it.

Old Man Shi.

Ten generations back—but still, it's the same bloodline.

"..." Hua Cheng leans back, crossing his arms. "I'm assuming from the odd behavior, something has been targeting your little sister?"

Shi Wudu remains silent, his lips pressed tightly together. Tension and exhaustion radiate from the young man in equal measure.

Hua Cheng's eyes remain heavy on him—and he doesn't drop the subject. "It would have begun in the last nine years or so."

After another moment without an answer, he shrugs—rolling the scroll back up. "I already got what I came here for, it makes no difference to me."

"...Yes."

He's slow to admit it, but he does. "The family has...experienced a decline in the last ten years, but when I became an older brother..."

his eyes slide over to his sibling. “Things became more complicated.”

The younger Shi sibling shrinks slightly—almost like she feels guilty.

Hua Cheng doesn’t press, and still—even though he seems to understand that the newcomer isn’t here to do harm—

Shi Wudu is hesitant.

“This...thing, that’s been hunting her—it’s always lurking nearby,” he explains carefully, his brow pinched.

“We’ve managed to trick it for years, but if I say too much—”

“It’s not here right now,” Hua Cheng assures him—and that almost seems to exasperate the young man, his eyes flashing with annoyance.

“I haven’t even said what it is!” He snaps. “And how would you know if it’s here?”

“There isn’t a malicious presence here.” He sounds utterly assured in that, enough so that the young man is inclined to believe him. “I would sense it if there was.”

Whatever it is—it’s staying away.

Likely...by Hua Cheng’s sheer presence alone, it doesn’t dare come too close.

Shi Wudu frowns deeply, finding that doubtful. “It’s a crafty spirit. That’s part of the problem. It could slip right under your—”

“It isn’t here,” Hua Cheng repeats—his tone ringing once again with certainty, and... Finally, the teenager relents, hanging his head with a sigh.

“...Introduce yourself,” he mutters, wiping a hand down his face. Hua Cheng is almost baffled by that, since he already has, but—

The little girl slips out of her chair eagerly, as though her brother’s permission lifted invisible chains from her feet.

She rushes over, grasping Hua Cheng’s hand, shaking it as she grins up at him cheerfully, dimples in her cheeks.

“Hello, Mr. Bolin!” She tips her head to the side, vibrating with excitement—as though this is something the child rarely ever gets to do:

“My name is Shi Qingxuan!”

And that—

Oh.

Hua Cheng’s eyebrows shoot up as he sends Shi Wudu a curious look. That certainly isn’t a name he would have thought of as a—

“...” The elder sibling takes a deep breath, “When my little brother was born, my parents wanted his fortune told.”

Little...brother.

Hua Cheng glances back at Shi Qingxuan, looking over the dress he’s wearing—the way his hair has been styled. Even his air is distinctively feminine—in a way that most boys that age couldn’t fake so easily.

‘I’m hiding.’

Hiding is one way to phrase it.

“There was an experienced fortune teller staying in a local temple, and he...” Shi Wudu’s eyes linger over his little brother, filled with so much worry, for someone so young. “He warned my parents not to celebrate Shi Qingxuan’s birth. Not to draw any attention to him, but...”

“They didn’t listen?” Hua Cheng guesses, his voice slightly dry.

After all—it would be difficult for a family of wealthy merchants to resist showing off the blessing of a second son, securing the bloodline for a generation.

“...” Shi Wudu shakes his head. “And when they did...” He grimaces, like just recalling that day still haunts him, all these years later. “... There was a voice, promising...that his life would have a horrible beginning, and a...”

His gaze flickers over to the little boy, who is still watching both of the older men intently.

“...” Shi Wudu points toward his head, and Shi Qingxuan huffs—but immediately covers his ears, mumbling something about never being allowed to listen—and when he does, the elder brother turns back to Hua Cheng.

"...A horrible end," he finishes, slightly pale.

"He got so sick after that—none of us actually knew if he was going to make it. My parents returned to the fortune teller—and he told them the only way to protect Shi Qingxuan was to hide him from the creature that had latched onto him. So...he was raised as a daughter, instead."

Shi Wudu crosses his arms, leaning against the desk beside Hua Cheng, watching his little brother—

(Whose hands are still clasped over his ears.)

"...Our parents passed when he was four," he continues. "It's just been the two of us since then."

And a constant battle with their cousins over the family inheritance. Shi Wudu has run their businesses to some amount of success, when you consider his age, but...it's been a constant battle.

Between that, and protecting his brother—the teenager seems almost prematurely aged.

"We've hired countless cultivators to look into the matter over the years, but...they've always told us that this kind of spirit is particularly difficult to deal with," Shi Wudu mutters, his brow furrowed. "That it won't let go, not until he's..."

Dead. It won't stop until then.

"A jinx monster," Hua Cheng sighs, shaking his head. "You're referring to a jinx monster."

Shi Wudu nods—holding his arms around himself so tightly, it makes him hunch over slightly."You think that has something to do with our family tree? What really brought you here, anyway?"

The ghost doesn't immediately answer, glancing over the Shi siblings, his expression unreadable.

Finally, he answers:

"An ancestor of yours committed a heinous act, bringing bad karma to your bloodline. It would seem..." His eyes settle on Shi Qingxuan. "It's landed on him."

Shi Wudu looks to his brother too now, his eyes filled with veiled terror. Hua Cheng almost feels sympathy for the teenager, really.

He knows what it's like, to desperately want to protect someone that the universe seems determined to curse.

"A heinous act?"

It's difficult, speaking about the matter as thought it means nothing to him, but...Hua Cheng shows no sign of strain, his arms still calmly crossed over his chest.

"Shi Jinhai," he nods back in the direction of the scroll, "caught two gamblers using loaded dice in his hall."

Shi Wudu doesn't try to deny that their family used to own such establishments—he knows that they did.

"As their punishment," Hua Cheng continues, his tone slightly tense, eyes never leaving Shi Qingxuan's face, "he had their throats cut, bodies burned, and ashes scattered."

The young merchant pales, reaching down to grip the table in order to steady himself. He doesn't bother pointing out the fact that it was an overreaction—that much was obvious, but—

"...He did something that foolish?!" Shi Wudu hisses, eyes slightly infuriated. "How could he risk bringing that down on his descendants?!"

He doesn't seem to mourn the tragedy of what happened to Xiang and Fai, only it's resulting impact on his brother's fate—which Hua Cheng supposes is fair. It's all somewhat removed from him.

"You'd be surprised," the ghost mutters, his expression briefly turning dark, "the things men will do, when they think wealth and power can protect them from the consequences."

Shi Wudu barely listens—and that is a mistake.

Hua Cheng's words, in his case, will be prophetic.

"...But...Shi Jinhai lived nearly four centuries ago..."

Yes. A blood debt that is older than even Hua Cheng—who can no longer be called young by any standard.

“…Why is it only catching up to our family now?!”

Well.

The dark haired man blows out a heavy breath.

“The men in question—their spirits were rescued from purgatory by the Ghost King, Hua Cheng.” The man himself explains, “Their spirits began to degrade nine years ago—and passed on to hell very recently.”

The blood debt didn’t go into effect until then.

“…So, because of that…” Shi Wudu’s nails dig into the table, his shoulders shaking slightly with emotion, “Now, my little brother has to suffer for something that happened four centuries ago?!”

Far more severe now, then the initial bad karma would have been.

The negative energy had a long time to fester, after all. It’s quite potent, now.

“This is all the Ghost King’s fault, then?!”

“No.”

Most people struggle deeply with feelings of guilt and shame—even over the smallest things. Hua Cheng, however, can usually see things clearly.

“The only one to blame for this is your ancestor.”

After all—Hua Cheng had only shown the two mercy, and would have kept them in the mortal realm indefinitely, if possible. He may have delayed the curse’s effect—but he didn’t cause it.

And yet, he can see how unfair it is.

Particularly when he looks upon the little boy standing before him now. Bright eyed, shining with a kind of warmth that few souls ever truly possess.

Clearly, he isn’t a cruel person. Doesn’t deserve such a vicious fate. And yet, sometimes, life isn’t about what you deserve.

“So…” Shi Wudu swallows dryly, trying to wrap his mind around their situation—and struggling to do so. “What do we do?”

After a moment, Hua Cheng turns his gaze away from the child—focusing on the elder sibling once more. “Better if he doesn’t hear the rest.”

Ears covered or not—risking him overhearing seems unnecessary.

After a moment—Shi Wudu nods, looking towards his little brother. “Go play outside in the courtyard, alright? We’ll be out in a moment.”

The little boy lowers his hands to hear him, then pouts. “But...”

“Now.”

“...” Shi Qingxuan makes a face, his lower lip jutting out with disappointment, but he nods. “Okay...”

It’s fine. He’s used to playing by himself, after all.

He turns to make his way out the door—and he catches the stranger, Mr. Bolin, giving him a small wink just as he does.

He doesn’t know what to make of it at first, but...

When he steps out into the courtyard, he sees a small, silvery butterfly floating ahead of him.

Shi Qingxuan reaches out, curious, but the little light darts out of reach before he can touch it—and he smiles.

“...Pretty!” He whispers, chasing after it, giggling as he runs and jumps around the stone pathway.

For once, in the brief space of that moment, the carefree child that he deserves to be.

Back inside the library, Shi Wudu hears words that make his blood run cold. “Nothing.”

He stares at the cultivator for a moment—taking in Hua Cheng’s cold, matter of fact expression, trying to piece together what he means. “...Excuse me?”

“You asked me what you should do now,” The ghost continues, straightening away from the desk. “And the answer is nothing.”

“That’s impossible,” the merchant mumbles, his heart squeezing with dread. “How could you expect me to let him suffer?”

"The fortune teller your parents spoke to already gave you the best advice there is," Hua Cheng shrugs. "Allow Mingxia to become a permanent identity for him." He glances in the direction of the door towards the courtyard. "He could live a relatively normal life, if he remains hidden."

"As a WOMAN?" Shi Wudu exclaims, shaking his head, "How?! How is that fair to him? He—he could be so much more than that—!"

"...Than a woman?" Hua Cheng arches an eyebrow, and Shi Wudu flushes with annoyance.

"You know damn well what I mean! He doesn't deserve to be forced to spend a lifetime pretending to be someone he isn't!"

"...He didn't exactly seem to mind, other than the name." The ghost king points out.

"But even so—how could we keep it up indefinitely?! It's easy now, he's a child, but who knows how his body will change?!" Shi Wudu groans, rubbing his temples. "What if he grows into someone that we can't pass off as a woman?! What do we do then?!"

It's obviously impossible to predict such things—but Shi Qingxuan is a small, delicately featured child. Hua Cheng finds it hard to believe he would change so drastically moving into adulthood, but he shrugs.

"Allow the jinx monster to think he's a homely woman?"

The merchant stares, his expression infuriated. "...Is this funny to you?!"

"No," Hua Cheng shakes his head. "But you're trying to argue your way into a better solution by saying how unpleasant your current situation is—and there isn't one."

"There has to be!"

"Look," he turns around, struggling to explain it in the way that a normal cultivator would, rather than an omnipotent being—

(He's honestly lucky that Shi Wudu has been too distressed to wonder how 'Mr. Bolin' came to know the story of the two ghosts.)

"Jinx Monsters are difficult for humans to deal with in the first place. The best bet is to trick them, or kill them. This one seems stronger than the others, if it was able to sicken your brother at the outset, which makes killing it as a mortal nearly impossible." Hua Cheng shrugs, "Even if you managed to capture the assistance of a god, or become one yourself—a significant part of your brother's life will have already gone by."

"Couldn't we just..." Shi Wudu starts, the wheels in his mind working frantically.

He's not stupid, Hua Cheng can see that much—and that's precisely part of the problem.

Intelligent people always think, no matter how intractable a problem might be, they can think their way out of it.

Hua Cheng is guilty of doing the same thing at times—he would know.

And if the person being targeted was his god—Hua Cheng can't say that he wouldn't be equally desperate to protect him.

"Couldn't we just make the monster target someone else?" Shi Wudu mutters. "Wouldn't it forget about my brother, after that?"

Hua Cheng stiffens.

"...That would be extremely difficult," he mutters, his eyes slightly narrowed. "And it would only be a short term solution."

"How?! You said that they don't stop until the target is dead—if we make him think he's found my brother, then he won't—!"

"Because this is a curse."

A response to an act of evil. Avoiding it by committing another evil act—it would only cause the resentment to rebound and multiply into something worse.

"You can face it head on, or hide—but you can't pass it on to someone else without consequence."

Hua Cheng glances back out the window, watching Shi Qingxuan playing among the flowers outside, chasing one of his butterflies.

"The best thing you can do for your brother is teach him to be more independent. Jinx Monsters thrive on weakness and fear."

When he glances back at the teenager, Shi Wudu has his arms crossed—and he's shooting Hua Cheng a frustrated glare.

"All you're doing by coddling him is making him better prey."

"I don't coddle him!" The younger man snaps. "You met him—he's silly! An airhead!"

He throws his arms up, "The best I can do is stop him from getting kidnapped, eating something poisonous, or revealing his name to that damn thing!"

"He won't learn until you allow him to."

In spite of everything, Hua Cheng doesn't possess universal contempt for the wealthy. He knows that being born to privilege doesn't make one incapable of learning.

Xie Lian was born among the highest, most blessed of the earth—and still, he was able to show decency and kindness. And through training in cultivation, he became strong, built endurance.

Shi Qingxuan is a sheltered child now, yes—but only because his older brother is keeping him that way. He could learn, if given the chance. Anyone can.

"Those are the only solutions I can offer you," Hua Cheng mutters, shaking his head. "It's up to you, if you decide to listen."

He makes his way to leave, and Shi Wudu stands alone in the center of the library, hanging his head, hands balled into fists.

"Why would you come here asking about the curse, if you weren't going to help us?!" Hua Cheng stops, his hand on the door, and he lifts his chin.

In all honesty—he didn't have much of a reason. He knew that the crime was so far removed from the consequences—it wouldn't make him feel any better to bring vengeance down on Shi's ancestor's four centuries later.

Hua Cheng simply came because he was listless. Lost. And...

His teacher told him once, that when he felt lost—like he couldn't find a solution to a problem, no matter how many different ways he looked at it—the best solution would be to distract himself before reproaching it from a different angle.

Hua Cheng came because he was sad.

Because he missed his friends, and wanted to see what their suffering had come to.

In the end, he doesn't know if this made him feel better—but it did bring some small amount of closure.

"When I heard the story, I became curious," he replies with a shrug. "That's all."

He leaves Shi Wudu there, alone.

And resentment isn't the only thing that's left to fester.

The young man stares down at his palms, fingertips trembling slightly, his heart pounding with the terrifying prospect of not being able to save the only family that remains to him.

Slowly, his hands curl into fists, his spine stiffening with resolve.

He won't.

Shi Wudu won't lose his little brother—no matter what he has to give up in sacrifice. Even—

Even if it means he has to stave off this curse for the rest of his life. He won't lose Shi Qingxuan.

When the little boy looks up, he sees the cultivator leaving, his arms folded behind his back. "...Mr. Bolin!" He calls out, waving. "It was nice meeting you!"

"..." The cultivator stops, turning to look the boy's way, and...

The smile he offers is half-hearted.

"You too."

When Hua Cheng leaves the Shi manor, he thinks a story has ended. That he's closing the door on a painful chapter, and allowing it to pass on.

He's rarely ever been so wrong.

Shi Qingxuan’s brother comes to him that afternoon—and tells him that they’re leaving the city.

That Shi Wudu found a master on a mountain a few towns over—and that he’s going to learn to become a cultivator.

He’ll take care of everything. Get stronger, do whatever it takes to keep his little brother safe—Shi Qingxuan only has one task:

To never reveal his name.

A task that the child would always be doomed to fail.

Hua Cheng leaves this place, and he tells himself that he has washed his hands of the. matter, returning to the streets of Ghost City.

On the other side of the port, the markets still bustle, cries filling the air.

“...” The vendor squirms awkwardly, counting the coins in his hand, before looking down at the rows of tapestry laid out on the ground in front of him. “...You...sure are getting stiff with the prices, huh?”

The weaver tips his head to the side, not turning away from his loom. “Thread has gotten more expensive.” He shrugs. “Is that a problem?” “No, it just—”

“It makes it more difficult to resell them at a profit?”

The vendor jumps, his face flushing—but Xie Lian smiles, shaking his head as he turns back around. “It’s fine—I don’t really mind.”

As long as he has a meal at the end of the day, what more could he ask for? He’s done better than usual this year. No near fatal injuries or accidents—one horrible bout of sickness when a plague came through, but that was all.

Oh—and the incident with the beauty pageant.

Xie Lian doesn’t necessarily know if that counts as good luck, or bad—either way, he doesn’t like to look back on it often.

“Do you still want them?”

“...I suppose, yes.” The merchant mutters, setting down the small stack of coins, lifting the tapestries up into his arms.

“Could you try to make them look a little more exotic next time?”

Xie Lian tilts his head, confused. “...I could. Why?”

The merchant at least has the nerve to look a little sheepish. “...I’m trying to pass them off as being from further out west.”

The weaver snorts. “I see.”

Across the square, a group of children play, kicking a small, grain-filled sack back and forth, racing until one of them can make it to the goal set up on the other end of the alleyway.

“Ha!” One of them crows victoriously, slamming it in. “Another round on us!”

“No fair!” A child on the other team, a boy with short hair, cropped close to his head and ruddy cheeks complains. “We’re one man down!”

“Not my fault!” His opponent grins. “One more point, and we get the front seats during the fire parade tonight!”

That was the bet, you see.

There are a limited number of seats for spectators who can’t afford seats in the stands, or to look down from the high windows of their manors. Those who want to get in close on the street level often compete for it.

“...” The ruddy cheek boy turns around with a glare. “He Xuan!”

From the front of the alleyway, his head bowed low, the other boy doesn’t look up.

“I’m busy.”

“...” His friend glares, stomping over. “Busy doing what?!”

The dark haired boy is hunched over a pile of rope, knotting them together with some odd piece of metal—

It’s weird.

But He Xuan has always been that way. He’s nice enough—but always fidgeting with things that other people don't ever seem to understand.

"Building something. Do you really need me to play your game anyway?" He sighs. "Why don't you ask Xu Fan?"

"Because he SUCKS!"

Another one of their teammates jogs over with a frown. "What's he doing?"

"..." The ruddy-faced boy rolls his eyes, crossing his arms. "He Xuan here thinks he's gonna be a ship builder, one day."

The dark haired boy glances up at him sharply. "That's not what I'm doing."

"No, but you think you're smarter than everyone!" The other child snaps. "You won't even help out—and you're the best player we have!"

After all—the boy has always been good at everything he tries—athletics being among them.

"If I was a ship builder, they wouldn't sink as much." He Xuan mutters, looking back down at his little project. "And I don't wanna play."

The ruddy cheeks boy looks over at their playmate, annoyed. "See what I mean about thinking he's too good for everyone else?"

"..." The other child glares, kicking the piece of metal that He Xuan has been working with out of his hand—making it skitter across the cobblestones of the street with a clatter.

"Hey!" The dark haired boy cries out, leaping to his feet, "What are you doing?!"

"Whatever you're making is stupid!" The neighborhood kid snaps. "Stop being such a jerk and play!"

"...Piss off!" He Xuan glares, turning around—and it's only then that the other two seem to remember just how big he is for his age, even if he is slender—and they cower a little.

But instead of going at them—which honestly, he's been provoked at that point—he just turns around with an angry huff, chasing the metal piece across the city street, ropes still piled in his arms, looking all over for it, slightly frantic, until—

“Is this yours?”

The child stops, turning around to see the metal gear held between a pair of long, slender fingers.

“...” He nods, then, when he notices the bandage over the man’s eyes, he clears his throat. “...Yeah, sorry.”

He reaches out to take it, and Xie Lian smiles. “That’s alright.”

Once it’s back in He Xuan’s hand, the weaver questions— “Did you make that yourself?”

“...No,” the child shakes his head. “I collect scraps from the shipyards sometimes. Make it into other stuff.”

Xie Lian tips his head. “That’s very resourceful. What are you using it for?”

He Xuan shifts his weight back and forth, sizing up the stranger. “...A present. For my little sister,” he admits.

Xie Lian’s smile softens. “Is that so?” The little boy’s ears redden slightly.”Well, she’s very lucky to have such a kind older brother.”

The Taoist can’t see it—but there’s a small smile on the boy’s face now. A slight twitch of his lips—but he seems happy, if not a little embarrassed.

“...Thanks,” he mumbles. His eyes drift to the side, and he comments, “...one of the turnbuckles on your loom is messed up.”

Xie Lian lets out a sigh, looking back at the machine tiredly. “That makes sense, I suppose. It’s pretty old now.”

“...” He Xuan fiddles with the gear in his hands before dropping it into his pocket. “I can fix it,” he offers.

When the Taoist raises an eyebrow, surprised, he explains— “I’m good at fixing stuff, so if you let me try...”

Slowly, Xie Lian smiles. What a sweet little boy.

He moves out of the way, sweeping his hand toward the loom, “By all means, feel free.”

He Xuan steps forward, quickly setting himself to the task—fiddling with different parts here and there, taking two of the turnbuckles down, using a small pair of pliers from his pocket to move them back into the right shape.

And when he's finished—true to his word—the loom moves smoother than it has in years.

Xie Lian glances back at him with a smile, fiddling with the silver chain around his neck. "Thank you—you've been a big help."

He Xuan shrugs, fiddling with his sleeve. "It's no big deal."

Xie Lian glances over the loom, humming for a moment. It might not be a big deal to him—but for the god, it saves him hours of work, and his hands quite a bit of strain.

"Still—I appreciate it. Here." He reaches for one of the coins the vendor just left him with, pressing it into He Xuan's palm. "Take this."

It's just a copper piece—barely enough to buy a meal, but it's more than any money He Xuan has ever had of his own, and his eyes are wide when he looks up at the Taoist.

"...You don't have to," he mumbles, trying to give it back—after all, the man is blind, his robes are well kept, but...he clearly doesn't have a lot of money to spare, but—

Xie Lian shakes his head. "Nope—that's yours now, you keep it, and...this."

He reaches into his bag, pulling out a meat bun for the child. Fresh, he just bought it this morning, meant to be his dinner, but...

Well, he's a growing boy—he probably needs it more anyway.

"You take this, and you finish that gift for your sister, alright?" He hands it over.

He Xuan takes it, turning it over in his hands. He'd try to be polite and give it back, but, well...

He's always had a huge appetite.

His smile isn't small now—it's big, from ear to ear, and he bobs his head. "Okay!"

He crams the meat bun into his mouth in one bite, running off

The path home is familiar, dodging through the same alleyways and paths he always takes—until he slips into the small flat, pressing a kiss to his mother's cheek.

Mrs. He smiles fondly, ruffling his hair. "No trouble today?"

Her son shakes his head innocently. "No, Ma!"

Her eyes sparkle down at him—a deep, almost electric shade of blue, like the sea after lightning strikes.

Just like his.

"Good boy," she murmurs, "your father isn't back yet. Are you and your sister eating before you leave?"

He shakes his head, bouncing with excitement.

"We're gonna go early," he mumbles, fishing for the bronze piece in his pocket, "I got this, so we're gonna eat there."

His mother eyes the coin curiously. "How did you get this?"

"The weaver on Gushan street? I helped him fix his loom," He Xuan explains.

"I told him he didn't have to pay me, but he insisted."

That makes his mother smile softly, watching him with such fondness.

Their family doesn't have much—but her son has always been their greatest blessing. Handsome, kind, so talented in everything he tries.

"That's my clever He Sheng," she murmurs, setting down her book. "How about you sit down for a second? Your hair's a mess."

"It's fine..."

"It's falling all over the place," she snorts, patting the space on the bench beside her. "Come here."

Reluctantly, he complies.

Once he's seated beside her, she undoes the leather cord holding his hair up, combing it for a few minutes, humming while she works, before tying it back up in a high, neat ponytail.

He Sheng leans against her as she does so, eyes half lidded and content. “Isn’t that better?”

The young man looks up at her—and he smiles.

“Yeah,” he agrees, pressing closer against her, “it’s better.”

Mrs. He smiles back at him, giving him a one armed hug, kissing the top of his head. Such a good son.

Finally, there’s the sound of feet coming down the steps.

“Gege?”

A small girl appears in the doorway—with matching dark hair, plaited into two neat braids down her back, and clear gray eyes, shining with excitement. “Can we go now?”

He Sheng looks up at his mother for permission—and she smiles, nodding. “Don’t let her out of your sight!”

“I won’t,” He Sheng agrees, leaping to his feet, hurrying towards the door. “Hold her hand the entire time!”

“I will!” He snatches her smaller fingers up in his own before they’re even out of sight, and her mother watches them go with a smile.

It’s their last fire festival, after all—her husband found work in a smaller village further up the coast. It’ll be less expensive than the city—and their family desperately needs the money.

But both of her children adore the festival—and she wants them to enjoy it one last time

“Gege,” He Zhong chirps, holding his hand tightly as He Sheng leads her through the ground, “What’s the rope for?”

Her brother glances down at her with a smile, pulling her closer whenever the crowds get too thick. “A surprise for you.”

“Really?” Her eyes widen. “What is it?” “I’ll show you when we get there, alright?”

They stop by a food stand on the way, picking out a pouch of snacks to split between the two of them—and there’s enough left over for He Sheng to get her one of the paper butterfly kites all the other children have.

“...What?” He watches the little kite floating over their heads with a smile as they walk towards the city center. “You’re praying to Hua Chengzhu? I thought he only helped out unfortunate kids,” he reaches down, poking her cheek. “And you’re pretty lucky.”

He Zhong sticks her tongue out at him. “I’m gonna ask him to bring us gold, dummy! So you can go to one of those fancy schools!”

Her brother’s smile suddenly becomes a little strained, but he squeezes her hand. “... That’s not Hua Chengzhu’s thing, A-Zhong.”

“Isn’t he rich?”

“Yeah, but he kills the people who are mean to you, he doesn’t bring you money...”

“We’ll see,” He Zhong hums, skipping by his side. “Maybe he’ll try something new!”

He Sheng rolls his eyes, but—they’re in the right spot now.

“Ready for your surprise?”

She practically vibrates with excitement, braids bouncing about her shoulders as He Zhong jumps up and down. “Show me, show me!”

“Alright,” He Sheng un-loops the ropes from around his shoulder. “But you have to be a little brave for me, alright? And do exactly as I tell you.”

His little sister nods eagerly. “I can! I’m super brave, I can do it!”

“...” He Sheng smiles, handing her the bag of snacks. “Alright, give me a second.”

He does the dangerous part by himself—scaling a gutter on the side of the building, attaching one end of his contraption to the ceramic tiles on the rooftop, testing it with his own body weight to make sure it’s secure—then he lowers himself back down as He Zhong watches, curious

“What’s that, gege? What are you doing? It looks kinda dangerous, are you sure it’s —?”

“It’s called a pulley,” He Sheng explains once he’s back on the ground, taking the bag of snacks from her. “That way I can pull you up, but you don’t have to climb.”

“Ooooh…”

He Zhong murmurs, her eyes wide. “That’s why you need me to be brave?”

Her brother nods, showing her how to sit down on a makeshift seat between the ropes—and to hold onto both handles tightly so she won’t fall.

“I definitely won’t drop you,” he assures her, and she grins.

“I know!” She swings her feet lightly as her brother starts to raise her up, a little nervous when the ground shrinks away, but otherwise fine, “I trust you, gege—you’re amazing!”

He Sheng rolls his eyes, and when she reaches the top, he calls up, “Swing your legs over!”

She does, crawling up the rest of the way onto the roof safely—and once he attaches a counterweight, He Sheng is able to raise himself up as well, climbing up to sit beside her.

“How did you learn how to make that?” She breathes, glancing around with wonder.

You can see the entire city from here—and the sea beyond, the sun setting slowly over the horizon, making it look like a pool of liquid gold.

He Xuan shrugs, handing her the bag of snacks once more. “I read about it somewhere.”

The engineering is pretty basic, after all.

The hard part was finding a metal piece that he could work into something like a gear —but once he found it, the rest was simple.

“Oh!” He Zhong gasps, watching as the fires start to light up in the streets below. “Gege! We have the best seats ever!”

He Sheng grins, brighter than he has all day. “Right? You like it?”

From here, they can see the entire parade—and the fireworks as they shoot out across the water. It's...

He Zhong smiles up at him, holding his hand tightly. "I love it! It's the best fire parade EVER!"

"It's just..." Her smile fades slightly. "I wish we didn't have to move," she mumbles, her expression dimming.

"..." He Sheng leans a little closer, bumping their shoulders together. "I know." "I'll miss my friends..."

"Yeah," he agrees—then smiles down at her.

"But I'll be there—and I'm your best friend. Right, A-Zhong?"

"..." The little girl smiles up at him, holding his hand tightly, and in the other, the string to her butterfly kite. "Yeah! And we'll always be together, right?"

He Sheng nods emphatically, ruffling her hair.

"Always."

Across the city—another set of eyes watches the fireworks behind expensive panes of glass.

Shi Qingxuan asked his brother to watch with him, but he's been busy packing all afternoon.

"Do we have to go?" He mumbles, watching the fireworks sadly.

Shi Wudu doesn't look up, cramming most of their belongings into a few different chests. They'll be gone before the night is out—and with that, leaving the only home they've ever known.

"This is the best way for me to keep you safe—and us together."

He turns from his work—not to watch the festival, but to place a hand on Shi Qingxuan's chin, making the boy look at him. "And that's what brothers do. We always stick together, understand?"

Shi Qingxuan stares up at him, his eyes wide. "...I understand," he agrees with a nod.

Family ties are strong—stronger than most things in this world. It brings out the very best in some—and the worst in others.

It can pull you up from the abyss—or, it can become your undoing.

For the elder brothers of the families of Shi and He, it would be the latter.

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

Included with Permission from the Artist, do not repost or use without permission.

Baby Shi Qingxuan (posing as lil Mingxia)!

[image]

CREDIT: Envy, support the artwork HERE

Chapter End Notes

> Thank you so much Envy for your beautiful artwork, and allowing me to include it! I'm so grateful!
>
> xoxo, Evie

Selling Souls and Twisting Fates

Chapter Summary

Each day, he brings more gold, jewels, and grain. And each day, he prays more fervently.

For the power to destroy the jinx monster himself. For an answer. A way to trick the monster again. For meaning, in this suffering that they are enduring. What have they ever done to deserve such misfortune?

Two ghosts, mistreated four centuries ago—why torture them for that?

He would do anything, give anything, sacrifice it all—just to spare his brother from such a fate. That's what he's thinking one evening, his knees aching from how many hours he's been kneeling—

When, for the first time, a voice answers.

"Do you really mean that?"

Chapter Notes

You can find me on twitter and keep up with current updates of the story HERE

Tw// there is a scene in this chapter that is intended to be reminiscent of grooming / an inappropriate power dynamic. This might be triggering to some readers.

He Sheng finds a home in a new town, on the northern edge of the sea shores. Likes the waters less—so dark and cold compared to the emerald shores where he was born.

Craggy cliffs make up the edge of town, and from there—he can watch the sea when the storms roll in.

Flashes of lightning filling up the entire sky, churning black waters tossing ships back and forth as they approach the shore.

It's often cold and bleak during the winters—but summer always comes, bringing with it a warm wind, stirring the leaves in the trees around him.

His father takes work with a local shipbuilder—hard labor, but the pay is enough to keep food on their table each night.

He Sheng takes to tagging along, pulling extra chores, climbing up to help fasten masts or welding anchors—and he spends the money he makes on books.

Books on anything, everything—and he's tucked behind the cover of a history text one summer afternoon, when an apple drops into his lap.

When he looks up—a face is smiling down at him.

Warm, clear brown eyes, a mouth that dimples slightly at the corners—soft dark curls.

The freckles across the bridge of her nose would be called a blemish to some—but to He Sheng, they look like tiny constellations across her skin, marking subtle paths across her expression.

The ship maker's daughter.

She asks him what he's reading about—and he can barely speak.

He Sheng has never been particularly talkative, but he's also never been shy. Speaking to her, however, feels completely daunting.

He's so determined to show her how clever he is without trying too hard. To find ways to make her smile that seem unintentional on his part.

The young man succeeds in making her smile every time—but she never quite seems to believe that it was unintentional.

They were so young then—each of them only eleven years old. Childhood best friends, slowly falling deeper into a story in the process of unfolding.

A story that is told with lingering fondness during a wedding celebration, sheepish smiles exchanged as they recall tender years.

Chasing one another down dirt paths, sneaking out late in the night to whisper ghost stories back and forth by lantern light, A-Zhong trailing behind

As they grow older, the feeling becomes stronger—winding deeper and deeper into his heart, until he can no longer bear it remaining unspoken.

And yet, he's terrified of saying it aloud, only to never hear those words spoken back to him.

Time passes, and his good fortune grows.

He's grown into a handsome young man—strong and capable, with people already whispering that he might be able to take the National exams very soon.

A loving family, the loveliest girl in the village by his side.

Even the local cultivators whisper that he is destined to ascend.

But destiny is a funny thing. Never bound on iron, the way the legends always seem to tell it.

They are fluid creatures. Small threads being pulled by unseen fingers into a greater tapestry.

And you never know, in the end, the intentions behind the pattern being woven.

All it takes is one small decision, one minor deviation from the set path, to change many futures.

In this case, it was a simple mistake.

A young man cultivating on the mountainside—forgetting the time, working far past dinner.

His little brother, worried—going to look for him

And in the process of doing so, he makes a mistake.

After stopping in the woods to relieve himself, he hears a voice call his name.

Not Shi Mingxia, no.

His real name.

And in a moment of petrified terror: the boy answers to it.

Then, he hears the laughter.

Reeking of evil.

Echoing off the trees in the dark, sneering as the boy cringes with terror—it asks him his birthday.

Shi Qingxuan is petrified, and he is alone.

He's never been in a situation like this before—never even wandered out by himself after dark, his brother never allowed it.

Too frightened to think clearly—he answered.

And from then on, there was no escape.

Every moment he found himself starting to fall at ease, that could s was back.

Whispering insults, cursing him, haunting his every step.

And all Shi Wudu could do was watch, desperate.

Watch as Shi Qingxuan—his sweet tempered, kind little brother, began to crumble and fracture under the fear and paranoia.

Waking up screaming in the night. Sitting in one corner of their bedroom day in and day out, hands over his ears, sobbing.

Begging someone to make it stop.

Each night, the Shi brothers would pray.

The younger would sit on the front steps of their home, arms clutching a red lantern to his chest, staring out into the dark, whimpering out pleas for salvation.

'Hua Chengzhu, help me.'

'I'm so tired, please—please, help me!'

That voice would creep in, whispering in the darkness around him.

"He won't come."

Even as terrified tears slip down the boy's cheeks, the voice never stops.

"No one will ever come for you."

Shi Qingxuan trembles, whispering his prayers faster, rocking back and forth.

“Until the end, it will be you and me.”

The elder brother prays in the largest temple in the area, bowed on his hands and knees, forehead pressed to the floor as incense sticks burn.

Each day, he brings more gold, jewels, and grain. And each day, he prays more fervently.

For the power to destroy the jinx monster himself. For an answer. A way to trick the monster again.

For meaning, in this suffering that they are enduring. What have they ever done to deserve such misfortune?

Two ghosts, mistreated four centuries ago—why torture them for that?

He would do anything, give anything, sacrifice it all—just to spare his brother from such a fate.

That’s what he’s thinking one evening, his knees aching from how many hours he’s been kneeling—

When, for the first time, a voice answers.

“Do you really mean that?”

Shi Wudu’s head snaps up, shocked—

And before him stands a figure that gleams in the candlelight, shadows flickering across his face, wearing robes of white and silver.

Handsome—but almost in an aggressive way. The mortal can barely stand to look upon him.

And he trembles.

“Y—you—!” Shi Wudu chokes, barely catching himself on his hands as he scrambles backwards, his heart pounding.

“Don’t be afraid,” the heavenly emperor smiles, stepping forward. “You were the one who called me.”

It’s Jun Wu’s temple, after all.

“I…I…” The mortal stammers.

He’s a man now—of age, but just barely. And in the presence of Jun Wu, he feels more like a frightened child than anything else.

“I’ve been watching you for some time, you know,” the god muses, watching as the young man’s eyes grow impossibly wide.

“Y…you have?”

The heavenly emperor nods, watching him with kind eyes—brimming with sympathy.

“Your cultivation level has been worthy of ascension for some time now, and yet…you have not come to me.”

The way he says it—it makes Shi Wudu feel almost ashamed, hanging his head, swallowing hard.

“I—I meant no disrespect,” the young man replies, lips trembling. “But I—I couldn’t leave. My little brother…”

“…Yes,” Jun Wu murmurs. “I’ve been listening to your prayers about him for many nights. Did you mean what you said before?”

“What…What I said?” Shi Wudu whispers.

“That you would do anything,” Jim Wu repeats, “Did you mean that?”

The young cultivator is frozen for a moment.

It’s hard to quantify, sometimes, just how much pressure it can be—having Jun Wu looking down on you.

The most powerful being in the universe—showing you attention.

“Yes,” Shi Wudu admits, his lips trembling. “Anything. If It meant…”

If it meant that his brother would be safe.

The martial god looks down upon him, his expression unreadable—and eventually, he offers the young cultivator his hand.

For a moment, Shi Wudu stares, trembling.

Wondering why this is happening to him, if he dares to reach out, but —

When a god comes down from the heavens to offer you his hand, who are you, not to take it?

Slowly he reaches back, and the heavenly emperor pulls him to his feet.

“It’s horrible, watching the ones you love suffer,” he murmurs, shaking his head with sympathy. “There is no greater terror in this world.”

Shi Wudu nods, his chin dipping low, shoulders slumped.

He was a beautiful child, one who grew into a handsome young man.

Dressed in blue silks, silver and sapphire jewelry holding up silky dark hair, dangling from his ears.

He’s halfway between delicate and sharp—like a large cat of pray, one that hasn’t yet learned how to use his claws.

But he can be taught. He was so proud, once.

Proud of his wealth. His beauty. His intelligence and his talents. His family name. And oh, how that pride lifted him up—pushed him so high, he found himself standing on top of a towering pedestal, far above everyone else.

But he was also dragging someone else up with him.

Clutching his little brother’s hand as he dragged them both higher and higher—and now, he finds Shi Qingxuan hanging off of the edge of that pedestal, dangling towards the abyss.

Shi Wudu is left with two choices—to hold on, or to let him go.

There was only one path he could ever choose.

“…I don’t know if I actually…belong there,” he mutters, his eyebrows tense.

For the first time in his young life—that pride is wavering.

Jun Wu watches him with a keen eye.

It’s rare that he ever shows great favor to anyone.

The last time he extended his hand in help, it was slapped away so easily. So ungratefully.

Maybe the mistake had been to choose someone with such a strong sense of right and wrong.

Someone who wasn't desperate.

His hand squeezes Shi Wudu's firmly, reaching for the other.

"Your place," he murmurs, his voice low and reassuring, gathering both in the cultivator's hands in his own, holding them until they stop shaking, "is wherever you wish to be."

The eyes staring up at him are wide, vulnerable—

Moldable.

"..But I can't save him."

Shi Wudu whispers the words, like admitting to some sort of shameful frailty.

He isn't a son anymore. His mother and father are dead. Isn't a friend, he's cast all of those aside in his journey to cultivation.

He has no close companions, not even lovers, he—

He's just a big brother.

Being Shi Qingxuan's older brother is all that Shi Wudu is now, and without that, he...

Years ago, a crimson clad cultivator looked him in the eye, and told him that there was nothing he could do to save Shi Qingxuan.

Absolutely nothing.

Now, the leader of heaven himself looks Shi Wudu in the eye, and he says the words he's been praying to hear for so long now—

"There is something."

The young cultivator goes completely still in Jun Wu's grip, his gaze entranced—like someone caught under a spell.

So desperate to be relieved of this constant state of fear that he's been living in—for most of his life, now—that he'll do anything.

Anything. "...What?"

"You've thought of the answer yourself before, haven't you?" Jun Wu smiles, saying the words almost like praise.

In truth, he has.

Tricking the monster again. Setting its sights on someone else.

"...Someone told me..." he starts, then stops, his gaze fretful. "That it would only make things worse..."

"Not if you do it properly," the Heavenly Emperor assures him. "You're more than capable."

Properly. As though there's...a method to it?

Shi Wudu's eyes narrow slightly with confusion, and Jun Wu let's their joined hands drop turning around to face his own divine statue.

"I had a wife once, you know."

The cultivator goes still, watching the back of Jun Wu's head.

He speaks softly as though he's even surprised himself.

"...I've never told anyone from the Heavenly Court that before," the Emperor admits with a soft laugh, and Shi Wudu is left...

With his jaw hanging open, wondering...if he wouldn't even tell a god such things...

Why tell him?

He's a mortal. A talented, wealthy mortal, but still—

Jun Wu glances back at Shi Wudu over his shoulder with a tired smile, shrugging his shoulders. "I suppose...you're the first person I've spoken to in centuries that might understand."

It's a heady, addictive feeling—to have someone so powerful make you feel so important. And Shi Wudu—

His eyes are entranced now, wide—so young, so desperate for the answers that the god is promising, that he listens.

"And sons," Jun Wu adds, his eyes suddenly far away.

“I was a father.” He tilts his chin back, staring his divine statue in the face.

Much more mature looking now, than the youthful structures they used to build for him in Wuyong.

“We lost our first two,” he explains. “Both were stolen from us, and each time—it destroyed her.”

Shi Wudu’s expression shifts into one of sympathy. “...My parents were stolen from me,” he mutters, glaring at the temple floor.

Killed, in a robbery gone awry.

Shi Qingxuan was too young to remember. He thinks it was a sickness that took them to this day, but...

He saw everything.

Curled up, hiding inside a wardrobe, hands covering his mouth, watching through the cracks in the doors as the thieves tore through their home, taking his parents, and—

Shi Wudu was so afraid back then. So infuriated by his own helplessness.

He’s never forgiven himself for it. For not being able to save them—even if he was a child then himself.

“I know,” Jun Wu murmurs, not turning around—and Shi Wudu’s breath catches in his throat.

“...You do?” He whispers.

“You prayed to me, back then.” The Emperor explains.

An interesting twist of events—as most children in danger have taken to praying to someone else. It caught Jun Wu’s attention.

Shi Wudu presses one palm against his forehead, skin still tingling where the heavenly emperor grasped it before, trying to wrap his head around it.

“You...heard me?”

He can’t see Jun Wu’s expression, staring up at the divine statue now.

The way his eyes have narrowed into an expression that's almost hateful—but his voice remans warm and gentle.

“Those men didn't find you, did they?” Shi Wudu leans back against a pillar, his knees suddenly weak. “They didn't hurt your brother.”

The cultivator's face rests in his hands, heart thudding in his chest.

He lost his parents so young. Was responsible for raising Shi Qingxuan when he was still a child himself.

Shi Wudu forgot what it felt like, to feel...protected. Looked after. And on one hand— his skin thrums with this feeling of relief, of comfort, but...

He also isn't accustomed to the feeling of being indebted to someone. “My youngest son,” Jun Wu continues, “I lost him too.”

He lowers his chin, shaking his head. “Tragically. Unnecessarily . He could have been saved—but no one would help me.”

There's such bitterness in his tone when he speaks on the matter, spite biting in every word—

Shi Wudu believes him.

Jun Wu turns back to face him.

“I wouldn't stand by and watch someone else suffer that way,” he murmurs, shaking his head. “Not senselessly. I'll help you.”

The human lets out a choked sound, knees nearly buckling under him, lips quivering, “Thank—” he chokes, tears slipping down his cheeks, “Thank you, I—”

“If,” the heavenly emperor continues, speaking over him as he walks across the temple floor, approaching the human, “you accept my terms.”

“...Terms?” Shi Wudu questions, his eyebrows creasing. “Yes, I'll accept anything, anything you ask, I—”

Fingers grip his chin tightly.

The young man falls silent, heart pounding to the point where it's almost become uncomfortable, staring up into Jun Wu's gaze.

“You will tell no one else,” he murmurs, thumb digging in slightly beneath Shi Wudu’s lower lip, until the cultivator squirms with discomfort.

“The rules of heaven are limiting at times—even for me. Most of the heavenly officials have never experienced suffering. Not in the way that we have. They won’t understand the things we do.”

It isn’t a difficult decision for the human to make.

Even if he told the truth of whatever the matter was—who would believe his word, that of an ordinary human, against that of Jun Wu himself?

Agreeing to silence isn’t a risk on his part.

When he nods, Jun Wu smiles—slow and wide, pleased.

Desperation, it seems, was the key.

He lets go of the human’s face, stepping back—and when he gestures for Shi Wudu to follow, the cultivator falls into step by his side without complaint.

“Tell me,” the heavenly emperor murmurs, his footsteps echoing through the hall, “What you now about switching fates?”

Three months later, the cultivator Shi Wudu faces a heavenly calamity out over the north eastern sea. A twisting maelstrom that threatens to pull several merchant ships into it’s hold, dragging them straight down.

Even among heavenly calamities—it’s particularly challenging.

But this young man fights with a might the world has not seen in years. Decades, even —and when he strikes the heavenly spectacle down, all who watch expect him to ascend in a flash of golden light—

And yet, he does not.

He returns to the shore with the others, helping the injured from their ships, surveying the damage—and it’s then, when fate twists itself into a knot.

An intersection of different threads, one that cannot be undone.

Not until one of them breaks.

"He Xuan!"

Shi Wudu's head sticks up sharply, whipping around to see a dark haired young man trailing behind one of the shipmasters, carrying a bag of tools over his shoulder.

"I've got it—three compartments are flooded, but the bulkheads are salvageable." He mutters, his gaze focused.

Shi Wudu remains silent, watching the young man move from one damaged ship to the other, taking notes for one of the master ship builders. And, despite the fact that he couldn't be more than Shi Qingxuan's age—

It's like watching someone miles ahead in capability.

It's a simple matter, finding an excuse to learn the man's birthday. As a show of thanks, before he parts ways with the locals—he reads palms and tells fortunes.

Not his strongest technique—but that doesn't matter. It wasn't ever the point. And when it's He Xuan's turn...

The birth dates are the same.

"...So?" The teenager raises an eyebrow, tilting his head. "What does it say?" For a moment, there's hesitation.

After all—he knows it isn't right. In the centuries that follow, he'll force himself to forget this moment. To pretend it didn't happen

But he knew, even back then, that it was wrong. Remembering the words of a cultivator, telling him that curses could be faced, or they could be avoided—

And yet, if you push them onto someone else, it will always come back down on your own head, but worse by another measure.

"...It says you'll find luck in love, soon." Shi Wudu mutters, letting the young man's hand go, giving a shallow nod. "Thank you for your assistance."

He leaves without another word, the rest of the shipbuilders not knowing what to make of his odd, rushed exit.

He Sheng, however, is focused on other things—staring down at his palm with thinly veiled excitement, biting the inside of his cheek.

...Luck in love, huh?

When Shi Wudu does ascend—it's with his younger brother watching from the mountainside.

He sits on the ground, hugging his knees, his face pale and drawn.

The voice hasn't come today. Hasn't said a word—but still, the boy waits. And he watches, now, as his brother rises to the world above.

And he tries, so hard, to be happy for him. Even if he's afraid.

Absolutely terrified of the prospect of being alone now, of what it will mean for him, to have a brother as a god, but—

But just as soon as that golden light rose into the sky—it comes crashing back down, landing before him.

Shi Qingxuan jumps at first, scrambling back, then...

"G...Gege?" He whispers.

His brother has always been blessed with good looks—both of them have, but now—

Now, Shi Wudu shines.

Dressed in robes of sapphire silks, dripping in jewels, his hair elaborately styled.

And just as he's always done, he reaches for his little brother.

Lifts him up, pulls him higher—onto the highest pedestal of all, holding Shi Qingxuan close against his chest.

"What did I tell you before, you little fool?" Shi Wudu murmurs against his hair, the wind rushing around them.

Shi Qingxuan's eyes are wide, filled with tears.

Realizing now, after a lifetime of living in fear, always hiding, always wondering when the creature was going to get him—forever hunted by it, unable to escape...

"Brothers always stick together." The elder whispers fiercely, "Always."

...Finally, Shi Qingxuan is free.

But oh, does that freedom come at a cost.

A heavy price—one that the newly appointed water master carries with him when they walk through the streets of the heavenly capital, holding his newly appointed deputy general close against his side.

Guilt, shame—and dread.

Because he knows, in his heart—there's a chance that Jun Wu could have been wrong, and the cultivator who came to him when he was young was telling the truth.

That, in delaying Shi Qingxuan's demise, he could have brought something worse on them both, but...

Now, he has time.

Time to get stronger—to build power and security. And then, if and when whatever the consequences are for them...

Shi Wudu's fingers tighten around Shi Qingxuan's shoulders, his gaze determined.

He'll be ready to face it.

When the sun sets, he's ordained as the new Water Master in the Grand Martial Temple, kneeling before the throne of Jun Wu as a fan—a powerful spiritual tool, is lowered into his hands.

General Ming Guang watches closely—leaning against a pillar on the far side of the hall.

The newly appointed head civil god, Lord Ling Wen, stands by his side—in a far less relaxed posture, his back straight, hands clasped in front of him—holding the scroll containing the details of the new water master's appointment.

Much to Pei Ming's disappointment—his friend doesn't use the male form for romantic purposes. He had hoped they could go out on the town together, and he could show the civil god some of his favorite lines, but, well—

Ling Wen uses this form in ceremonial events, most often.

Even so, stiff posture and lack of a social life and all—the civil god gives Pei Ming a strange look, watching his friend from the corner of his eye.

“What is it?”

“...” The martial god tips his head, watching the way the Heavenly Emperor watches Shi Wudu, handing the fan over.

“Don’t you think there’s something odd between them?”

Ling Wen follows Pei Ming’s gaze, watching the exchange—particularly the way that Jun Wu’s eyes seem to linger. It’s subtle—but present.

“You’re the senior between the two of us,” Ling Wen shrugs, crossing his arms.

“You would remember better than me—but didn’t he show similar favor to the Crown Prince of Xianle?”

“No,” Pei Ming mutters, shaking his head. “It wasn’t like this.”

The Emperor was quite open about his interest in Xie Lian’s future as a god—this feels almost...secretive.

As though there was something about this that they weren’t supposed to notice.

“...” Ling Wen shrugs, “He’s probably the most promising god to ascend since the Crown Prince of Xianle, and before that, you. Not to mention being eye-catching.”

General Pei’s eyebrows shoot up.

“...I don’t think I’ve ever heard you refer to any man as eye catching before,” he comments dryly—but Ling Wen’s reply makes him pause.

“I was referring to you, actually.” The civil god sighs, his eyes returning to the ceremony.

“...What is that supposed to mean?”

Ling Wen shrugs, watching as the newly appointed water god rises to his feet, clapping politely along with the rest of the crowd.

“I don’t think I’ve ever seen you show such an immediate keen interest in something that didn’t have breasts attached.”

"That's not true!"

Pei Ming has the nerve to sound a little bit offended. "I was interested in the Crown Prince of Xianle's ascension before—you just weren't around to see it."

"Ah, now he has two things in common with the crown prince," Ling Wen sighs. "That doesn't bode well."

In that sense, Ming Guang agrees—it doesn't bode well for the young god.

After all—shining so bright so young...catching the attention of so many powerful people...it can all come down on you one day, before you even realize it.

Pei Ming watched it happen—and he remembers.

Which starts out as his justification, for taking an interest in the new Water Mater, the illustrious Shi Wudu.

Quickly gaining attention with the nickname, 'The Water Tyrant.'

To the Gods of the Middle Court, he's an arrogant, demanding official —expecting the highest respect.

To General Ming Guang, who already sits among the highest of the martial gods—the behavior is somewhat amusing.

That of a prematurely confident little brat—but unlike the rest of the Heavenly Court —he doesn't find the behavior unappealing.

What he finds less amusing, however, is the attitude of the new water master's deputy general—his little brother, Shi Qingxuan.

A silly little creature, always clinging onto his elder brother like a child far younger than his actual years—

And, for some reason, he loathes Pei.

He even mentions as much, holding onto his elder brother's sleeve one evening, glaring as he watches the martial god leave their palace.

"...Don't be rude," Shi Wudu scolds him, his voice stern—but he never raises a hand to the deputy god. Not even once. "He's your senior."

Shi Qingxuan shrinks a little under correction—after all, he always listens closely when his brother criticizes him, but…

“I just don’t like him,” the young man mutters, his eyes slightly narrowed. “He seems slimy.”

Shi Wudu snorts, rolling his eyes. “There are worse things.”

After all—of all of the devils he would ever make deals with—Pei Ming would be the least of them.

The Water Master’s career would be among the most illustrious in all the heavens— leaving him beyond reproach.

And yet, even if no one else could see it…

Shi Wudu wore his own cursed shackle. It wrapped around him tightly, weighing him down with every year that passed. Even as he tried to tell himself that he felt no shame. That it was what had to be done—and put it out of his might.

The weight of it remained.

Black Water Sinking Ships

Chapter Summary

> “If you want to help your fiancé, try bribing someone next time.”
>
> Qin Meirong takes a couple of steps after him, her voice desperate. “What about you, then?”
>
> Hua Cheng stops, one foot already on the steps up to his dais. “What about me?”
>
> “Could—could I bribe you?”
>
> Several nearby ghosts cackle and jeer. A mere mortal with only years to spare
>
> What could she offer a ghost king?

Chapter Notes

> You can find me on twitter and keep up with current updates of the story HERE
>
> CONTENT WARNING: violence, minor character death, mentions of suicide, implied sexual violence.

YEAR THREE HUNDRED AND TWENTY FIVE

CLACK!

CLACK!

CLACK!

“HA!”

Three ghouls sit across the table, one of them beaming brighter than the others, pulling a pile of bones towards his side. “That’s two fives for me! Take THAT!”

“Lucky roll!” His companion grouses.

“You won’t get so lucky next round. You’ve used up too much of it!”

“Oi!” HIs friend crows back at him with a glare. “I ain’t doing anything unnatural! I just have a lot of luck! Don’t be jealous!”

“...Could I play?”

The three ghosts fall silent, turning to...

A human.

A girl.

Warm eyes—soft, dark curls, a spray of freckles across her nose. She seems rather well to do—an odd addition to a place like this, but...

The Gambler’s Den in Ghost City is open to anyone, that is the rule. So, the spirits make room for her at their table—and hand her the dice. “What are your terms?”

“Um...” The young woman frowns, staring at the dice in her hand—heavy against her palm, made of black jade, numbers painted in gold. “...I’m looking to win some luck,” she explains. “Is that something you can do, here?”

She heard you could bet on anything, in the Gambler’s Den of Ghost City.

The trio of ghosts look at one another—then nod. “Sure,” one of them agrees. “We bet for luck all the time—but what are you going to put up in exchange?”

“Um...” She thinks about it carefully.

It’s not like she has much in the way of money to offer—not anymore. And not in an amount that she would need, so...

The ghosts fall silent, a little stunned by the offer the young woman makes—

“Two years of my life? How does that sound?”

Time is a dangerous thing to gamble.

Particularly for Humans who never know how much of it they might have left—and betting against ghosts, who have an endless well in comparison.

And yet—the odds are fair. The bets are proportional, and…

In Ghost City, those are the only rules that must be followed.

“Very well,” one of the ghosts agrees, eyes flashing eagerly. “Shall we?”

It’s simple—odds and evens. She takes evens, they take odds, but…

On her first roll, she receives a one and a three.

Odds.

And in that action two years of her natural life—they’re gone in an instant. But…

Her eyes narrow with determination, and she rolls up the sleeves to her dress, looking at the table around her.

“Double or nothing?”

There’s a quiet hush as they glance towards the raised dais in the center of the room.

At the end of the day—there are limits.

Particularly when it comes to humans, and what ghosts are allowed to take from them.

The Lord of Ghost City is a relatively relaxed ruler—he’ll allow humans to bet themselves into the grave, if they’re stupid enough.

But he doesn’t like it when the ghouls get opportunistic.

That being said…

Hua Chengzhu has become distracted, as of late. Hasn’t been monitoring the city as closely as he was before. No one knows what the reason is, behind the Ghost King’s change in demeanor, but…

One of the Ghouls grins, his eyes lighting up eagerly.

“By all means, we can play as many rounds as you like, little lady!”

It manages to draw some attention—the way she seems willing to bet over and over again, to the point of near madness. After all, who could need luck so badly? What could be so important?

It’s only when the stakes have reached ten—ten entire years, that they hear some rustling from above.

The young woman doesn’t look up from her dice, ready to throw again —but those who were once playing against her have fallen completely silent, their own rolls coming to a halt.

It isn’t until she hears the thuds of footsteps that she realizes why everyone is so tense, their eyes on the dais—and when the curtains open, her own heart stammers. Half in fright, but also with...

Wonder.

The man who descends the steps looks younger than her—an impish teenage boy. Dressed in crimson, black boots thudding on each stair—

But the eyes that look down upon her burn a deep shade of gold—and they seem ancient.

“H-Hua Chengzhu,” one of the ghouls stammers. “We...We didn’t mean...”

A hand lands heavily on his shoulder, nails long and black—almost like talons, and when he speaks, it’s in a voice that is far deeper than what the woman was expecting.

“That’s enough,” he hisses, eyes flashing. “Or you’ll be betting against me, next time.”

It’s no small thing, to play with the lord of Ghost City. After all—his luck is beyond all others—and most don’t mind playing with him, even if it’s only to lose.

But when you play a round as a punishment? There’s only one thing being bet as collateral.

Souls.

“But...” The young woman stands when Hua Cheng turns around to leave, her lower lip wobbling. “I knew the stakes, sir! I just—please, let me keep playing?”

The Ghost King stops, one foot on the steps back up to his dais, his eyes focusing on her face when he turns his head.

“...Who are you?” He questions flatly—unfamiliar with her face.

After all—most humans willing to bet on such dangerous things are typically habitual gamblers. And yet, she's certainly not a frequenter.

The human fidgets slightly, but her voice is steady, "Qin Meirong."

A nice name—pretty enough, but certainly not one that the Ghost King has heard before. "...And why have you come here?

She's quiet for a moment—clearly struggling with whether or not answering would do her any good, but...There doesn't seem to be much of a choice, at this point.

"...It's my fiancé," she explains, clasping her hands together tightly, "He's taking his civil exams next week, and I—!"

Hua Cheng rolls his eyes. If he had to count how many young women came into this place, willing to throw their lives away for utterly inadequate partners...

"Don't look at me like that," she frowns, noticing the Ghost King's expression. "He's brilliant, and he deserves to pass! He just..." she trails off, biting her lip, and Hua Cheng watches, mildly impressed.

No mortal has ever dared to scold him—not in this form.

"He just what?"

Qin Meirong is a beautiful woman, with finely shaped features and clear eyes.

But worry and fear have aged her prematurely, creasing around the corners of her gaze.

"...The test examiners—they don't like him. They hide his results. He's just...in an unlucky spell, that's all!"

There's a difference between bad luck and sabotage, but...

There is something odd about this woman. Hua Cheng watches with mild curiosity, one eyebrow raised, because...

The air around her is that of someone with a naturally blessed fate. But it's been tainted with bad luck.

The air of a curse.

Contagious, like a plague that spreads through contact. Something parasitic, and...

Almost familiar.

“...We’ll settle your tab at six years,” the ghost king sighs, turning around. “If you want to help your fiancé, try bribing someone next time.”

Qin Meirong takes a couple of steps after him, her voice desperate. “What about you, then?”

Hua Cheng stops, one foot already on the steps up to his dais. “What about me?”

“Could—could I bribe you?”

Several nearby ghosts cackle and jeer.

A mere mortal with only years to spare.

What could she offer a ghost king?

But, oddly enough—Hua Cheng seems to be listening.

It’s baffling, to anyone watching. The lord of Ghost City is fair, yes—and when it comes to children, he is often generous.

But as for why he would show kindness to this woman... ...that’s anyone’s guess.

Hua Cheng, however, does have one point of softness that the world does not recognize. Could never know about.

All she wants, in the end, is to protect someone precious to her. He can empathize with that feeling rather well.

“In exchange for what?”

“I...” She trails off, thinking—and eventually, knowing that her odds of success are admittedly low, but determined to try—she lifts her chin, eyes determined. “I can cook a meal for you!”

Qin Meirong has always been an excellent cook—He Xuan never leaves a plate empty.

Several of the ghosts around the room look at one another, clearly prepared to laugh at such an offer, but...

Crimson Rain isn't laughing.

The human stares up at him hopefully, her lips trembling—and his mouth quirks up at the corner.

"...I accept."

There's a stir in response.

"...Hua Chengzhu," one of the ghouls comments, his jaw hanging open, teeth rattling as he speaks. "You can't possibly be SERIOUS!"

"Why shouldn't I be?" He murmurs, clasping his hands behind his back as he follows the young woman down the steps. "Who are you to say?"

The ghosts fall silent, watching their king leave the hall of the gambler's den with... A mortal. All on the promise of what could only be a mediocre meal.

Nearly all of them seem baffled by the action—except for one young ghost, watching with vaguely bitter eyes.

Shuo watches Yanlin closely, not speaking at first—but when Hua Cheng disappears out the doors of the gamblers den, he sends his companion a warning look.

"It's better not to lose perspective, Yanlin."

Her mouth tightens at the corners.

No one is close with the Ghost King.

Not really. Not in a way that matters. Fai and Xiang got closer than just about anyone, but...

No one knows him, from before his days on Mount Tonglu. No one knows why he knows the things that he does.

The only thing that Yanlin, Shuo, and Bao have always known, is his priority

He's looking for something. Someone. A blind taoist. None of them know why—but given that the search has been going on for three centuries now, he's clearly some sort of immortal.

Whoever that person is—he belongs to Hua Cheng's past. A part of him they never get to know.

That can be hard to square yourself with, when you've been following someone for centuries. Always at an arm's length. He's never cruel, but...

"My perspective is just fine, thanks." She mutters, turning away.

He's the one who doesn't see things clearly—not her.

The village is quiet--a little dreary, in the rainy season, but never unpleasant.

And while Hua Cheng has often been given much more for doing far less, Qin Meirong cooks a lovely meal.

Nothing overly fancy—but warm, filling, with the taste of something that evokes nostalgia.

Not of something that he's ever actually had, no...

Hua Cheng's mother never had the kind of resources to cook that kind of meal, and the last home he had...

He smiles faintly at the memory, remembering Xie Lian's few, disastrous attempts to cook a proper meal.

It took him ages to realize he wasn't any good—because Hong-er would always smile, and eat more than his share, pretending to be greedy for once, letting the god eat what they already had pre-made instead.

And dianxia was so frustrated, when he actually tasted it for himself.

'Why did you say it was good?!' He would groan, coughing and gagging on the one bite he had managed to swallow, 'You don't need to spare my feelings!'

And Hong-er would just beam, taking another bite from his own plate. Xie Lian could never see his smile—but always heard it.

'Because gege made it for me!'

Hua Cheng stops, chopsticks lingering against his mouth, swallowing one last bite. Technically, he doesn't need to eat. But...

He always takes some small amount of happiness in remembering the meals he used to share.

"Are the rumors true?"

"Rumors?"

She stands at the counter, gathering the leftovers from their meal, using a cloth to wipe off her hands. "Everyone says that you're a widower—and that's why you always dress in red."

Like a bridegroom.

"..." Hua Cheng snorts, shaking his head. "Not exactly."

Few ever have the confidence to ask him such questions directly anymore. Not without feeling a twinge of fear.

"I was younger than him," The ghost explains, not caring very much about sparing the details with one, irrelevant mortal. "I don't think he realized what I wanted."

Qin Meirong takes that in, the cloth going still between her fingers for a moment, and when she speaks again, she doesn't seem perturbed. "Is he gone?"

"...I'll find him, one day."

It's a matter of time, Hua Cheng knows that.

He just never realized how much time it would be.

"..." The young woman smiles, reaching out to take the Ghost King's empty plate. "That's beautiful."

Hua Cheng pauses, a little surprised by that descriptor. The few people who are...aware of his situation—they never call it anything but...

Hopeless. Foolhardy. A waste.

"You think so?"

Qin Meirong nods, setting the cloth down so she can lean against the counter. "I...just before He Xuan and his family came to the village, I lost my sister."

It's been over teen years now, but just remembering it brings heartache to her tone. "We were twins."

There was a horrible sickness that came through the kingdom that year, ripping through the common people like flames. The worst plague since the outbreak of Human Face Disease in Xianle, years ago...

Qin Meirong survived, but her sister... Faded, like smoldering embers.

"...I know," she sighs, shaking her head. "I know that ghosts are real, and the gods, and everything else—if I didn't I wouldn't have come to find you, but I..."

She glances out the window, her eyes filled with an endless ache. Two halves aren't meant to be torn apart.

He Sheng and He Zhong have helped fill some of those gaps in her family, made her feel something close to whole, but...

The void remains.

"I always told myself, if she was still out there—she'd come and find me again," Qin Meirong explains with a soft sigh.

"But time went by, and when she didn't, I thought...she just moved on."

She lifts her chin, her eyes sparkling with an aching kind of happiness. Bitter sweet, living inside of a love that only exists in flashbacks.

Hua Cheng knows the feeling all too well.

"But now, hearing you say that, it's like..." A hand comes up as she wipes the tears gathering at the corners of her eyes. "It makes me think somewhere, she might be looking for me. Watching over me. I think that's what we all want, when we learn that ghosts are real."

Hua Cheng watches her, his expression unreadable as Qin Meirong laughs sheepishly, shaking her head. "I...I'm sorry, for going on like that. I just think—he'd be happy, if he knew what you were doing."

He almost smiles, but...

'If your precious person knew...'

'...If they knew they were the reason that you couldn't move on, it might trouble them.'

The answer for Hua Cheng, has always been simple:

He'll just never let his god know why he hasn't gone. Not because he doesn't want to, but because...

He doesn't have a choice.

His chopsticks land on the table with a soft thud as he pushes his chair back, rising to his feet. "Well, that fulfills your end of the bargain," he murmurs.

He doesn't acknowledge the kindness of her words—or the emotions they bring out in him.

And she doesn't expect him to.

"It's time for me to carry out mine."

She smiles, watching the Ghost King walk out the door. It's a rare thing, to make a deal with the devil—particularly the greatest devil of them all, but...

Sometimes, they aren't so bad. They even make very polite dinner guests.

The next morning, she's right there, leaping into her fiancé's arms before he leaves for the city, off to take yet another score of exams.

"You," she emphasizes, gripping his cheeks with both hands, "are going to make it through just fine this time, I swear."

"..." He Xuan smiles at that, pressing their foreheads together, his arms around her waist. "I'm glad someone thinks so," he murmurs.

It feels almost fruitless now, like he's throwing himself at a brick wall over and over again, only to come back empty handed each time. But...

Qin Meirong never seemed to stop believing it would be different if he just tried again. Even when he thought she would leave, because he couldn't offer her the things she deserved--

Her faith in him remained unchanged.

"You're going to be late if you don't hurry," she smiles.

He Xuan hums, not letting her go—not at first. "...I'll make it all worth it," he mutters. "I promise."

It's almost assumed that men will take what they're given in life, never noticing the sacrifices and efforts of the people around them.

He Xuan has never been like that.

He takes note of every sacrifice. Every moment of support--and expresses his gratitude. There's never a moment taken for granted, never a second when she doesn't know that he cares, and...

Even if he hadn't said so, she would have known.

"I know you will," she whispers back.

In truth, he already has.

These last few years—even if they were marked with just as many disappointments as triumphs, have been among the happiest of her life.

And she knows the man she's going to marry. Knows how kind, honest, and brilliant he is.

It will be worth it.

She rocks up on her toes, pressing a soft kiss against his lips, and when they pull apart, Qin Meirong smiles, fixing his hair as she steps back.

"I'll be waiting for you when you get back."

He Xuan smiles in return, giving her one last look.

"I know."

They part ways—her, going back home.

Him, returning to the city where he was born.

Hua Cheng realizes that, falling into the human's shadows, following him through the tree lined path.

Both of them, born in the same place—three centuries apart.

It’s funny, he thinks, how time and pain can separate so many different paths—but in the end, they always lead you back to the same destination.

The young man—the scholar, He Sheng, also known as He Xuan—he walks with his back straight, and his head held high.

Something stirs.

Deep in the recesses of Hua Cheng's mind, a feeling—almost like a memory of something that he buried deep, but—

Hua Cheng closes his eyes, pushing that down.

She's been more difficult to suppress, as of late—but he's long since become accustomed to keeping her subdued.

The Civil Exams are held in a small, nondescript building in the city center, many studious, stern faced young students gathering together to write their essays in total silence, only the scribbles of pens against scrolls filling the air.

Hua Cheng watches from underneath the shroud of a glamor, leaning back against a pillar, boredom staining his features, a dagger twirling between his fingers.

'You've lost focus,' a voice in his mind whispers—and his eyebrow pinches.

'Push it down,' he thinks to himself.

It's easy when he's focusing on the task at hand, watching as He Xuan hands off the exam scroll to one of the proctors, finishing earlier than any of the others—

And yet, he seems utterly calm about the entire matter, his expression smooth.

Like someone who knows his answers are completely correct—and that it won't matter in the end.

Hua Cheng watches him bow to the instructors before leaving the room, the sun reaching high in the sky—and he sees to his end of things, following the instructors into the back.

He watches as the scroll the young scholar gave them is discarded, switched out with another before being placed into a pile of scrolls to be sent to the board for review, and...

Qin Meirong wasn't wrong, it seems—there was wrong doing going on.

When the proctors leave the room, Hua Cheng is there, the glamor slowly shrinking from his form, lifting the scroll they just placed into the pile, and He Xuan's, which they discarded—comparing the two.

One is well written, clearly a passing result, and the other…

Is Blank.

Hua Cheng doesn't make mistakes often. Isn't prone to such things. He's meticulous, determined, and focused.

Well, he usually is.

So, he's unaccustomed to making careless errors. Missteps that he'll come to regret later.

"…What are you doing here?!"

The voice jars him.

Is a human…here? How did they enter without him noticing? But—

But when Hua Cheng turns his head, one of those proctors is there,standing in the doorway, and…

Hua Cheng isn't wearing the face of a mischievous youth today, no:

His current form is something more sinister.

Far more reflective of his mood.

Tall, broad shouldered, dark eyes, sharp teeth—long nails. A shape he was wearing underneath a glamor, not expecting to be seen by any mortals, but now…

Now, there's a tiny little human, trembling in the doorway, looking at him like… Like he's some sort of monster.

And typically, this is when Hua Cheng would sneer, throw his head back and make some mocking little speech to frighten the human into silence, but…

"Well," he glances down at He Xuan's scroll, annoyed. "…That's a complication."

"GUARDS—!"

Before the proctor can finish crying out, a scroll hits him in the temple with a sharp thunk!

His eyes go wide, and then he crumples to the floor, limp, while Hua Cheng rolls his eyes, spinning He Xuan's scroll in between his fingertips.

Things just became...complicated.

When the guards do enter the room, they find proctor Mao Xue hunched over the exam table, gathering scrolls, his brow furrowed with irritation.

"Sir? You called?"

The young professor straightens, sending them a glare. "No thanks to you incompetent fools!"

The guards pause.

Mao Xue glares, hands resting on his hips as he turns around. He's a short man, forced to crane his neck to level an annoyed stare at the guards, but he endeavors.

"Do you know how long it's been since I called?!"

The guards fall silent, looking at one another.

"...We don't—"

"Forty five seconds!" The professor snaps. "If there was truly an emergency, any ruffian could have had their way with me. And you call yourselves professionals!"

"Apologies, sir, we—!"

"You're damn right you're sorry!" Mao Xue huffs, snatching up the pile of scrolls.

"I was going to ask one of you imbeciles to deliver these scrolls to the board for me— but now it's clear that I'll have to do it myself!"

"Sir—!"

"Out of my way!"

They watch as Mao Xue storms past them, scrolls in hand, properly chagrined. But… He was acting odd, wasn't he?

In the time it takes for Hua Cheng to deliver the scroll to the examination board himself—He Xuan lingers in the marketplace, looking for a small gift for his bride-to- be.

A thank you, for everything she's done in the last few years.

The weaver that once worked on this street has long since moved on—to where, He Xuan could not say, but a younger generation of artisans have taken up several of the patterns he was known for, weaving them into sashes, belts, and robes.

He stops to examine one sash in particular

Black thread, with gold threads making it look like waves cutting through the water. Like the sea at night.

It's not the sort of thing Qin Meirong would ever buy for herself, but…Black has always been He Xuan's color.

Such a small delay, one that barely takes up the afternoon.

But in the space of those few hours, He Xuan's life changed—and he didn't even know it.

On the walk home to his village—he has no idea that today won't be like the others. The wind feels the same—the path is familiar. The taste of salt is ever present in the air.

It felt…normal.

Sometimes, they say that you just know—instantly feel it, when something has been taken from you. When you've lost something precious.

It wasn't like that for him.

He didn't know, not until he was standing on the path leading towards his family's home, and…He saw his mother.

Kneeling in the grass in front of their home, her eyes streaked with tears, hands clutching at the earth in front of her, and…

For the first time, her gaze is just…

Empty.

That was the day when He Xuan's heart died.

A literal, physical feeling.

He felt it wasting away.

It would take longer for his mind to break and bend—that part of him has always been solid, rooted in the iron foundations that make up the core of who he is, but—

But He Xuan's heart—it was gentle, back then. Before it was twisted and mangled into something else.

It cracked, when his mother told him that a group of men had come to their village, and that they had tried to take He Zhong.

That crack deepened, when she explained how Qin Meirong tried to stop them—but—

In the end, they were both taken away.

That crack in his heart, it ached and stung with regret. Wondering why he hadn't been there. Why he had delayed in returning from the city—

Why had he even bothered taking that damn test again to begin with, because why did it matter, now?

But oh, it was easy, when the pain in his heart was only a crack.

It widened into a chasm when he learned who took them. A wealthy family, one that owned nearly half of the village—formerly a side branch of the Shi's, but later expelled for their constant indiscretions.

And what they had wanted A-Zhong, and later Qin Meirong, for? Concubines.

Then, it felt as though his heart was split down the middle, the crack widening until it was nearly severed in two, a cold wind blowing through.

Because he knew—he knew that they would refuse.

Part of He Xuan wished that they wouldn't—knowing that whatever the Sheung's would do, it wouldn't be worth refusal, it—

But when he arrived at the manor, prepared to fight for their freedom, the truth was worse than he could have imagined.

For so long, He Xuan was only a big brother. Only ever thought of ways to find his sister a better spot from which she could watch the parade for the fire festival. How to keep her safe. To always keep an eye, and never let go of her hand.

His heart shattered when he found A-Zhong's body.

Left out in the front courtyard—abandoned and discarded, still limp, not yet stiff.

Meaning that he was close. That if he'd just had more time, he could have stopped it. He could have...

'I promise, I won't drop you.'

'I know you won't!'

Her face was so small then, beaming up at him with such believe—such faith.

'You're amazing, gege!'

Now it's drained of color, stained with blood—eyes staring up at him, cold and unseeing.

'I'm your best friend, right?'

They'll never shine again.

'Always!'

But the moment his heart died, was when he heard broken, fractured gasps—no, that isn't what he would call them.

They were last breaths.

And there, beaten nearly beyond recognition, left alone in the cold, he found Qin Meirong.

Whimpering his name with bruised lips.

"H...He...X...Xuan..."

Reaching for him, even then—her limbs shattered and broken.

Then, He Xuan felt the remains of a heart that still beats—in defiance of all reason— begin to fade into ash.

As he held her in his arms, gently shushing her, trying to soothe her pain, but…

There was nothing left to be done.

The dark curls that once felt so smooth under his fingers were sticky and matted with blood.

The freckles he once compared to constellations now bloodstained. But when those eyes looked up at him one last time—

They were still so warm.

“He X-Xuan,” she repeated his name, blood bubbling past her lips with every word she spoke, but still, when he tried to shush her—she pressed on, “I-It’s alright,” she whispered, her eyes turned over his shoulder, looking past him—at something he couldn’t see.

“S…she found me.” Her lips pulled up into a faint, broken smile, “H-He was right…”

“I don’t…” He Xuan’s voice was nearly incapable of speech, “I don’t understand…”

Her breaths were rattling towards the end, broken ribs protesting each attempt at air —

But she clutched the front of his robes.

“You’re a g…good man,” Qin Meirong’s last words would never leave him, her eyes still so clear, even towards the end, staring up at him with a determined light, “Don’t….don’t let them…make you f-forget that, He Xuan…”

Oh, but he would.

For centuries, he would forget.

“You’re…a good man.”

The light and warmth faded from her eyes, all as he watched. And in that moment, no heart remained within He Xuan’s chest. Something was still there, still beating, but that wasn’t a heart. That was an unfamiliar beast, no longer an accepted part of him.

When Qin Meirong left the world, she took He Xuan's smile with her. Took his joy, his curiosity, and his kindness.

His hope, his faith, and his ambitions.

It would be centuries before he would smile or laugh again, even reluctantly.

Centuries before He Xuan would love again.

And when he did, it would come on the breath of the wind, swirling all around him, trying to stir those parts of him to life.

Oh, how He Xuan would resent that love. Fear and distrust it.

How he would deny it and do everything in his power to break it, to snuff it out.

Oh, the things He Xuan would do, all while telling himself that he no longer had a heart.

And god, the way it would break again, the next time he heard those words, from a very different set of lips—

'You're a good man, Ming...H-He Xuan.'

They would break him all over again.

Hua Cheng watches.

Not because he has no reason to interfere—he does. He had a fondness for that young woman, and was disgusted to learn what became of her, no—

He watches now, out of some morbid sense of fascination. Because He Xuan doesn't snap. Not immediately.

Even as Hua Cheng watches the murderers of his sister and fiancé drag him through the streets, cold and shattered, he just hangs limp in their arms, eyes dark and uncaring.

And at first, the ghost king thought the human had simply given up. But the longer he watches...

The more clear it becomes, that something is forcing the human to linger on.

Even as Hua Cheng can see it now, the heavy dark aura that lingers around the young man—so vile, it permeates the it around him—

It's a curse.

A parasitic curse, latched deeply to the man's soul.

Whispering hateful words to He Xuan, as the youth sits day in and day out, glaring at the blank walls of a dark, empty cell.

Wasting away from starvation, until he looks far closer to death than Hua Cheng ever has, alive or otherwise.

His face nearly skeletal, eyes sunken in.

And that voice whispers to him, all the while, that he will lose everything.

That he will die alone, in the cold. That he might as well die here.

He Xuan doesn't—against all hope or reason, he lingers on, but Hua Cheng—he recognizes this curse for exactly what it is.

A Jinx Monster.

And slowly, as he watches it struggle and fight to feed off of He Xuan, who possesses little to no fear at this point, Hua Cheng realizes the truth behind what has happened. Slowly, then all at once.

After all—he didn't tell Shi Wudu how to switch fates.

But that doesn't mean that Hua Cheng wasn't more than aware of how to do so himself.

The two of them share names, after all. Even the same birthday.

History has an odd way of repeating itself, at times. No matter how hard you try to learn, and teach it's lessons to others.

Because Hua Cheng warned him.

In so many different ways, curses can be faced or they can be hidden from, but they can not be cast aside and forced onto another.

And now, he watches the bloody harvest of the sins that Shi Wudu has sewn.

Watches as He Xuan's captors nearly starve him to death—and still, he does not die.

Watches, as the young man is released from jail—only to learn that his mother passed away from illness during his time in a cell, because no one was well enough to look after her.

And still, the young man doesn't break.

He watches—with great interest—as He Xuan returns to his ailing father, too old and fragile now, to work on the ships he once helped build.

And even now, with his exams passed, when he must want to leave this village behind...

He stays—and he becomes a shipbuilder himself, starting a business. Small, at first, but...more and more successful, as time goes on.

After all—if there's one thing He Xuan's ships are known for...it's that they don't sink. And, however briefly—he manages to thrive.

But it could never last. Not with that creature on his back—and not with the humans that linger in this place. Petty, angry, and jealous.

Hua Cheng watches, as they take everything he has. Over and over and over again. But each time, He Xuan rises back up.

Over and over again.

Like the waves crashing back up after a storm, he surges with every downfall.

Hua Cheng almost pities the Jinx Monster, lingering on his back—desperately trying to feed off of the mortal, but...

He Xuan doesn't face his problems with fear. Doesn't hide from his curses. Any lesser creature would have abandoned the hunt long ago, but...

Hua Cheng knows every creature and creation that has ever emerged from the Kilns of Zhao Beitong—

And he recognizes the Reverend of Empty Words for what it is. Still, this human endures it against all reason.

Until he can't.

Still, on the day that He Xuan snapped, there wasn’t fear.

Hua Cheng saw frustration, when the shipmaster saw that yet another one of his boats had been commandeered by the local clan leader.

Building anger, when the bank refused to extend his loan payments.

The final straw comes in the late afternoon, when he’s returning from work.

Gaunt, thin—a tall man, once a muscular youth—but he never quite recovered from the starvation he endured in prison.

Still alive, but he looks far more like a wraith.

And when he returns to his family home, he finds the last living relative he has—his father—has passed away.

Alone, sitting in a chair by the window, his head turned to look out.

Waiting for him to return home one last time. He Sheng, his pride and joy.

Always such a good son.

Hua Cheng watches the human, as he has for so long now—more attention than he’s paid to any mortal, in his time as a ghost.

He Xuan kneels by his father’s chair, holding one hand between his own. It’s gone stiff and cold by now.

His expression is unreadable—mouth unmoving.

He doesn’t cry. In all of the time since the deaths of He Zhong and Qin Meirong, Hua Cheng hasn’t seen the human shed a single tear.

But the expression on his face—the look in his eye as He Xuan looks upon his father one last time—

It’s one of deep respect and affection.

Hua Cheng can’t understand that feeling.

Doesn’t know the meaning of what it is to honor one’s father.

He never had one. Never had anything that came close.

He's had a mother. In many ways, more than one.

That's the only familial bond he's ever known.

And now, watching this scene—the Ghost King finds himself almost...

Envious, in spite of it's dreariness. The blatant horror of it all.

After some time, He Xuan rises to his feet once more, gently setting his father's hand back down in his lap.

He Xuan's walk back to town is slow, unhurried—and his request is so simple, so small, in the face of it all—

He just asks around in the local tavern, for someone to help him lay his father to rest. There's no other family to assist him—and it's a difficult job for one person.

More than one of the local townspeople are willing to help. He Xuan is liked and respected by many in the village, as was his father before him, but...

The son of the local clan leader sneers, slamming his cup down on the bar counter, his eyes narrowed.

"Why should he need help?" The young man murmurs, arching one eyebrow.

He's stereotypically handsome—but he's also got a unique brand of cruelty in his eyes, the kind that can be recognized with a single glance.

"It should only take one man to bury a dog."

A dog.

This is the heir to the Sheung family.

The same family that took his sister.

The same family that took Qin Meirong.

The same family that threw him in prison, and left him there to rot.

The same family that repeatedly commandeered his ships, leaving He Xuan drowning in debts.

The shipmaster doesn't speak immediately—doesn't react.

But there's a flash in his eyes, and Hua Cheng sees a thread, worn so thin over the last few years, finally begin to snap.

No one will raise a hand to help now, fearing retribution from the young master of the Sheung clan.

That's fine. That's better, actually.

Hua Cheng watches He Xuan make the trek back to his home. Taking the ax that he (and his father before him) once used to build their ships, chopping wood from a nearby forest to make a pyre.

It's careful, methodical—never hurried.

The young man burns his father's body—gathers the ashes, and buries them in the family grave.

He's buried a fiancé, a sister, a mother, and now his father.

He Xuan stands before the tombstone now, staring at his family name, and it occurs to him.

Who is going to bury him?

There's not going to be anyone left, he—

"You're going to die alone," a voice whispers next to his ear, cruel and jeering. "Alone in the cold, with no one left to mourn you."

"..."

Hua Cheng watches with rapt attention as the youth stares down at the family grave, silent.

Finally, a smile spreads across his face.

Slow, lopsided. Not the muted, almost shy smiles that He Xuan showed the world as a child. Nor the quiet, confident grins he used to share with the girl that he loved.

There's no trace of sanity in this smile. "Is that so?" He whispers

Even the Reverend of Empty Words seems to balk at his reaction, falling silent as He Xuan turns away from the grave, ax still in hand.

“...I suppose there isn’t a point, then.” He mutters, dragging it on the ground beside him, the blade slowly cutting through blades of grass.

No one answers, but He Xuan seems to have developed some level of awareness that a creature is stalking him. Listening to his every word.

And he smiles even wider.

“In being someone worth mourning.”

Life is one long cascade of decisions and consequences.

Nearly four centuries ago, a gambler didn’t know when to stop rolling. A friend tried to save him with a set of loaded dice. A merchant reacted out of spite and anger.

Decades later, a young ghost saved the two men on a whim. Kept them from their fate for as long as he could. And when they could no longer be held back, their curse fell on two brothers, one unwilling to let go of the other.

In his refusal to allow him to suffer, he cast that curse upon someone else.

Every single one of those decisions led to He Xuan lifting up his ax that night.

Not a single one of those decisions were his own.

But when he reaches town once more, his third time making the trek in a single day— he sees the lights.

Dozens of torches, flickering in the streets. It’s—

It’s the fire festival, Just like every other year.

Not like the festivals he used to watch with A-Zhong, when he was a boy. He even took Qin Meirong back there one year, using the same trick he had with his little sister when they were children, sneaking them up to the rooftops.

That was the first time He Xuan kissed her.

She looked over at him, admitting that she wouldn’t have cared where they watched— as long as she got to watch them with him.

And in that moment—it seemed too difficult not to kiss her. Like keeping himself away was an act of physical restraint.

His heart pounded, back then. Now, it's nearly silent in his chest.

It doesn't feel an ounce of remorse or anxiety as he walks through the crowds, dragging his ax behind him.

It's almost as though he's been dead for years now, and his body is the only one that hasn't accepted the news, carrying him onward.

Slowly at first, then stumbling towards the front of the crowd, no one ever bothering to look too closely. After all, he's just their neighbor. Their quiet, patient, ever enduring neighbor.

No one sees the look in his eye until the final moment— Especially not his first victim.

The swing lands squarely on the back of the young man's skull, splitting it open like a melon.

The heir to the house of Sheung isn't dead by the time he hits the ground, eyes wide, mouth gaping with shock, pained moans escaping him.

Silenced with the next swing of the axe.

For a moment—no one moves. Everyone around is frozen with shock. The music stops, along with the chanting and singing.

Dozens of torches stand still, flickering in the night.

He Xuan stands over the corpse, his once tan face now pale, sunken in —splattered with blood.

There's no loud declaration of rage, no elaborate, angry speech against those who have wronged him—no.

The shipmaster places his boot against young master Sheung's chin, yanking the axe out of his chest without a word, stalking towards the bank.

No one stops him. Not a soul.

There was no family that suffered under the Sheungs quite like the Hes—but they have lorded over this village for several decades now.

They have been greedy, selfish, and cruel.

The normal townsfolk watch, as the kind, bright eyed boy they once knew slaughters the bankers.

Some even begin to trail behind him, torches in hand, as He Xuan runs from one target to the next. And somehow, no matter how much they try to run away, no matter how desperately they try to defend themselves…

It all comes to nothing.

He Xuan moves like a man possessed.

When the handle on his ax breaks, he takes the splintered handle in his hand, driving it into the men who beat his fiancé to death over and over again—occasionally stopping to laugh, like he's taunting some invisible presence that no one else can see.

Does he seem afraid, hmm?

When there's nothing left of his ax handle, he takes up a knife from a nearby butcher stall, hacking until the tip of the blade breaks off in the heart of one of the men who stole from his father.

The night deepens, thunder rolling in as a storm rages over the sea.

But the storm in the village rages on, voices screaming out in the night as a dark, bloody figure darts through the night, ripping them apart with any weapon he can get his hands on.

Slowly, the other villagers begin to egg him on. Some—some even start to cheer. To thank him.

There's no sorrow, for the loss of a clan that had been tormenting the locals for an entire lifetime. No pity, as the townsfolk watch the Sheung's reap what they have sowed.

Until finally, only the clan leader is left—scrambling backwards on his hands and knees, pleading.

One of his knees has already been smashed by the hammer clutched between the shipmaster's fingers, blood dripping down his chin.

"L-look," Lord Sheung stammers, his voice weak and trembling as he looks around the crowd, desperate for a single soul to help him.

They won't.

"I have money—power, position—anything you desire, I can give it to you, just—!"

"Go back in time, then." He Xuan replies flatly, speaking for the first time since he began his rampage—and his voice—

It's cold, almost rational.

"Give me my family back, and I'll let you go."

"I…" Lord Sheung stares up at him, his lips trembling. "You know I can't, that's not possible—!"

He cuts himself off with a pained shriek when the young man takes his other knee, as well.

"Then it's not possible for me to have mercy on you," He Xuan sneers. "What a shame."

This man cannot bring his family back—and He Xuan cannot find it in him to show him mercy.

There's no room inside of him for kindness, when he smashes the hammer into the man's face, over and over again—until nothing recognizable remains.

Oh, the things He Xuan would do, while telling himself that he didn't have a heart.

It died long ago.

He's just waiting for his body to catch up.

There's no instance to point to, of a human surviving a curse of a jinx monster. He Xuan is no exception.

Yet, it isn't the creature that brings him to an end. Gravity does that.

When He Xuan is panting, soaked from the rain and the blood of his tormentors, a hammer clutched loosely between his fingers.

He takes one staggering step back—not realizing that he was already standing on the ledge.

He Xuan had been standing on that ledge for a long time. Years, now. Never realizing that the cliffs lay behind him.

The villagers who watched the slaughter without a word try to help him now, but… It's too late.

They rush forward—and He Xuan plummets out of sight,

SPLASH!

Cold.

The thunder roars, and He Xuan sinks, his eyes just as dark and deep as the waters that grip him, staring up blankly.

It's cold, and he's alone.

Crushed under the weight of the waves, dragged further and further below—

Only darkness remains as air slips away.

The sea floor hits his back, the immense weight of the water crushing down on him, squeezing out whatever life remains.

For a moment—He Xuan almost prays to the water master for relief—But he has no desire for that. And even if he did—

He Xuan's prayers would go unanswered.

They always do.

And there isn't fear in his last moments. There's no sadness, self pity, or hopelessness.

Only rage remains. Deep and bitter, churning with the same ferocity as the waves overhead as his body dies, and the Reverend of Empty words goes without another meal.

He Xuan's body lays against the seafloor, limp, eyes unseeing—illuminated by a pale, unearthly green light.

That of a ghost fire.

It hovers for a moment, a sole flickering point of color in the endless void of the ocean.

Then, it howls.

Shrieks into the darkness, unheard—sound cannot carry through water, after all.

And yet, the sea rises in response. Churning with violence, crashing into the ships that float near the harbor with renewed menace.

The sea swallows them whole, dragging them down into the abyss.

For years to come, people will remember the storm that swept through the coast that night, and the young man who raged beneath it.

The lives that were lost by land, underneath his blades—and the countless souls who were lost at sea.

Remembered as a night of tragedy. A night of justice. A night of revenge.

But what people remember the most, is the daunting height and size of the waves as they smashed massive cargo ships to bits.

It was a night of blood and death.

A night of black water sinking ships.

Love and Vengeance

Chapter Summary

Zhao Beitong forged three ghost kings.

Lost the first two—though in the end, it was the last one that ended up losing her.

She sees no need to forge another.

And yet.

Chapter Notes

You can find me on twitter and keep up with current updates of the story HERE

A ghost king stands on wet sand, watching the sea roil, arms crossed.

In the end, while his own actions indirectly caused this—there was nothing Hua Cheng could have done to prevent it.

Diverting the curse from He Xuan would have meant casting it back upon Shi Qingxuan.

Interfering with the Reverend of Empty Words without killing it would have simply made the curse worse than it was before. And if Hua Cheng had destroyed the creature...

The debt created by Xiang and Fai's deaths would have remained. He knows all of this, and yet...

When he thinks back on a brave, clear eyed young woman, willing to bet her entire future on the man that she loved, so certain that he would be worth it...

Hua Cheng feels some small measure of remorse.

The storm doesn't end. It only worsens, clouds darkening and swirling.

A typhoon is brewing, one that might sweep broad portions of the coastline away with it. At first, Hua Cheng thinks it's odd—for the death of one spirit to cause such an uproar. But then...

Pain.

Sharp and stabbing, echoing throughout his skull as he sinks to his hands and knees

Like there's a balloon swelling inside his skull—something that has long since been buried fighting to rip it's way out.

The Ghost King's fingers claw into wet sand, gritty texture sliding underneath his nails, biting his lip until it bleeds.

This isn't just one spirit at all.

Somewhere, between the known and unknown, on the very edge of consciousness, lies a garden.

A calm place. A gentle place.

One where a young man sleeps in his father's arms, listening as his mother tells ghost stories.

Where the youngest child stands behind his mother, braiding flowers into her hair, occasionally stopping to chase after butterflies—but always returning to her side.

Always.

This time, he stops in the middle of the clearing—sending her a tense look, one filled with worry.

His mother smiles, reaching for him with open arms, "What's wrong, my love? Come back here."

San Lang stands before her, unmoving, his expression rapt with concentration. "... You're waking up," he mutters, shaking his head. "Or...is it the..."

Oh.

For the first time in centuries, Hudie remembers that this is a dream. A beautiful dream. A merciful dream.

But still, a dream.

She turns her eyes to Zhang Wei, where he leans against a tree, watching his brothers, calmly playing the notes from his flute.

To Mei Nianqing, cradling Bolin in his arms, occasionally looking her way with a gentle smile and a warm gaze.

And finally, back to San Lang—watching her with a look of quiet frustration and sadness.

When she speaks again—it is not with the soft notes of Tonglu Hudie.

It is in the flat, matter of fact tone of Zhao Beitong.

“What was the first lesson you learned in the Kiln, child?”

Hua Cheng opens his mouth to respond—then winces, clutching a hand to his temple. “...Pressure,” he finally mutters, his voice strained.

“What about it?”

“It...” Hua Cheng presses both hands to his temples, his skull pounding—realizing this is what she must have felt, when Mount Tonglu opened before. “It has to be... released...or else....”

A pressure relief valve. That was how she explained the existence of the Kiln to him. Or else the entire system implodes, taking everything else down with it.

Even if Hua Cheng has absorbed Zhao Beitong’s consciousness into his own spirit, even if she can no longer take form on her own—

The Kiln will still open. The fields of Mount Tonglu will still call.

But now, the hammer—the tools to forge a new ghost king, or to bring it to ruin—

They lay within Hua Cheng’s hands.

“You will go,” Zhao Beitong murmurs, tilting her head back, looking up towards the night sky.

So many stars.

“Try and fight it as you might, you will go.”

And oh, how he does.

He returned to the gates of Ghost City. His butterflies continue their search across the continent for his love, finding nothing but dead ends.

The Ghost King watches gamblers from his throne, and he pretends that the world around him remains still.

Even as more and more ghosts flood to the fields of Mount Tonglu. Their screams and the raging battle carrying far and wide, howling towards a final confrontation.

In the years that follow, Hua Cheng hangs back—knowing, if he goes, what he will find waiting for him.

And yet, that pull remains.

'So much waiting has made you tired,' a voice whispers in his mind. 'You're retreating from the world.'

Hua Cheng denies it with scowls and sneers. Spends his days scouring reports, his nights, dreaming of his love in his arms.

He's become far better at dreaming than he used to be.

The Xie Lian straddling his waist now is smiling, hair hanging all around them like a silk canopy as he leans over Hua Cheng, lips pressed against his forehead, his cheeks, before finally bringing their mouths together.

Every kiss Hua Cheng has ever dreamed of sharing with his god is based off of one memory, reframed over and over again, hundreds of times, until now, they feel so heart achingly familiar.

Until eventually—they frown against him. "You're unhappy again," the prince whispers.

Hua Cheng's fingers reach up, toying with the strands of Xie Lian's hair that surround him, letting out a tired sigh.

"...I just miss you," he mutters. It's the same answer that he has always given, without fail.

But this time, his dream offers a slightly different reply.

"It was harder, today." Xie Lian admits, his voice slightly weak. It startles the Ghost King, because that's true, it was harder today, but...

"There were so many things I wanted to talk to you about," the god whispers, his voice unsteady.

Now, even Hua Cheng's dreams sound distressed.

"…" He frowns, arms sliding around Xie Lian's shoulders, pulling the prince down until he lays flat against Hua Cheng's chest, head tucked underneath his chin. "You can always talk to me, dianxia," he murmurs.

Xie Lian shivers.

"…I know," he whispers, pressing his nose against the side of the Ghost King's neck. "But I…"

It feels almost like a reluctant admission, one that stabs straight through Hua Cheng's core.

"I get so lonely , Hong-er," the god clings to him. "I'm trying, but…it's hard."

"I'll come back," Hua Cheng promises, his fingers tucking underneath Xie Lian's chin, tilting his face up, pressing their foreheads together. "I'll definitely come back, your highness."

The god's eyes remain closed, and his lips tremble.

"…Believe me," the ghost pleads softly.

Something about that statement makes Xie Lian stiffen, his lips going still, eyebrows knitting together as he reaches for Hua Cheng's face.

His fingertips stroke over his cheeks, and he whispers.

"Hong-er…are you…?"

Hua Cheng catches him by the wrist, his grip so gentle.

"Am I what?" He murmurs, pressing Xie Lian's palm against his cheek.

It takes the god a moment to answer, his expression wracked with thought, and… A voice echoes through the dream, reverberating in Hua Cheng's head.

"This is the one lesson you never learned."

Hua Cheng's grip on Xie Lian's wrist never tightens, and the kiss he presses against his forehead is featherlight, so tender—

But when he speaks, his tone is dark with anger. "Get out."

It's his dream. And he doesn't want to share it. "This is what you've been mourning.”

This time. Something he has no way of knowing if he ever could have had, and still, he aches for it.

“You turn your back on the world,” she murmurs, “and you say that it’s all for him.” Hua Cheng’s arms tighten around Xie Lian, who frowns with confusion.

He just wants to dream

Just a little longer.

He can still remember his god saying that, the way his arms felt around Wu Ming’s neck, how it felt to be held so close, with Xie Lian whispering against his lips, pleading—

‘Just a little longer.’

But Zhao Beitong’s words echo now, striking a chord.

“This world is his future.”

The words cut deep. And—

They wouldn’t hurt so much if they weren’t true.

After all, was that not the reason that he chose to remain?

‘Because I still have someone precious in this world.’

In this world.

“...I know,” he rasps, agonized.

Because he doesn’t want to wake up. Not quite yet. Just wants...

Just wants this moment to last a little bit longer.

“Hong-er,” The god frowns, clinging to his arms. “What’s—?”

The Ghost King opens his eyes, glaring at the red silks of the canopy above, arms splayed out.

He doesn’t know that, hundreds of miles away, a blind Taoist stirs in the night, fingers drifting up towards his lips.

Hua Cheng doesn’t know how badly it frustrates the fallen god, who can never even manage to remember his dreams as clearly as he would like.

They're always present in the moments after he wakes up, flashing before his eyes like fireworks, but...They fade so quickly, leaving him with only vague recollections.

Hua Cheng doesn't know how the prince shivers, curling in on himself, clutching the chain around his throat.

And the god doesn't know that his dreams have shape and voice, that the creature who walks among them now crosses the paths of the continent, a journey he has walked once before...

But far more reluctantly this time, hesitant as the gates of Mount Tonglu loom before him.

They've been shut for three years now, locking millions of ghosts and spirits inside, dooming them to fight until only one remains.

For most, when the gates are shut, they become impassible.

As Hua Cheng stands there, a wraith butterfly returns to him, landing on his shoulder.

And he knows in that moment, before he takes a step forward— The gates will open for him.

Groaning and creaking with protest, mountains of earth and stone stretch apart, making a path.

Beyond, lies a wasteland. A bloodbath. Hua Cheng's pace is slow, unhurried.

His boots make dull thuds against the rocks beneath his feet, audible under the roars and screams of the battles unfolding before him.

Fewer, in the end, than Hua Cheng expected.

The majority of the fields have already been picked clean of weaker prey, left barren and empty.

Of the savage ghosts that remain—all have already fled within the confines of the kiln, even if the mountain has not fully sealed itself.

Hua Cheng can remember a time when ghosts of similar caliber left him on the verge of utter destruction.

They seem like ants to him now.

When he came to this place—he did so unsure of what his intentions were.

On one hand—he knows what his Guoshi would have done, placed in his position.

Exactly what she had done twice before. What she had attempted to do to him:

Destroy whatever creation emerges as the victor.

After all, she would never allow herself to issue a half formed creation —

And she would never allow the creation of more ghost kings. Not ever the reign of Bai Wuxiang's destruction.

Which begs the question—which will this be? A misshapen, ill destined beast—

Or a Ghost King?

He approaches just on the final figure in the kiln descends on it's last opponent, blood streaming from the figure's jaw as he defeats—no, devours—the other savage ghost's form.

Consumption isn't common, even among ghosts. For the strength it requires, and... For the memories.

You carry the weight of them with you, afterwards. Never quite able to shirk them in the years that follow, but...

The figure straightens—and in an instant, Hua Cheng recognizes that face. Remembers the night the seas roared, and the sky screamed back.

And in the end—part of him wonders if this is what Zhao Beitong felt, when she watched him crashing back down from the heavens.

Not surprise, no. Hua Cheng isn't shocked to find that He Xuan survived, or that he answered the call of the Kiln.

He's seen what the man can endure.

Come to think of it, aside from one other—

Hua Cheng never spent that much time watching a human. And in this man's case, it was out of sheer curiosity, to see how long it would take for him to break.

And now, seeing him here, the Ghost King feels almost...

Proud, oddly enough.

And resentful.

The savage ghost stands in the kiln, dark hair hanging around his face in a tangled mess, matted with blood, swaying in the breeze.

Hua Cheng's memories of this place are muddled—but he remembers one thing:

He had to devour something he loved in order to escape.

It's not a matter of whether or not he's willing to kill He Xuan.

If it was a choice between the younger ghost's survival and his own, Hua Cheng would —without question.

And yet, Hua Cheng is resentful of the thought that such a life could come to utter waste.

That must have been what Zhao Beitong thought, watching him crash back down. He knows that now.

Because she knew what it would take, for the Kiln doors to shut.

And that once they did, only one of them would be coming back out.

Hua Cheng will always be the one to walk away.

He takes one step forward, watching He Xuan's posture tense in response—seeming to sense what's coming, but—

When the calamity's hand comes into contact with the wall of the Kiln, his foot standing on the threshold, he stops.

He Xuan waits, trembling with anticipation, and...

Hua Cheng doesn't move, one hand braced against the frame to the cavern, his eye wide—

Remembering.

Thud .

His memories from the kiln have always been fragmented, disjointed. One face was always missing. Completely erased.

One name always left blank.

Thud .

'IF YOU TELL ME, I CAN KILL HIM FOR YOU!'

Slowly, his vision hazy, unsteady—his eye drags upwards, just in time to see He Xuan running towards him, likely in an effort to strike first, while Crimson Rain is clearly distracted.

'DON'T YOU THINK I'VE TRIED THAT ALREADY?!'

Hua Cheng's fingers claw at the kiln door, his temples stabbing with the memories rushing before his mind's eye.

A garden filled with flowers.

A butterfly, pinned in a gilded box.

A young man, plunging into darkness.

And one man, standing at the center of it all.

Jun Wu.

A voice snarls in his mind, baring it's fangs.

'He cursed me.'

Hua Cheng knows so much more now, about the world, than he did when he first walked free from the bowels of the Kiln.

His lips curl back into a snarl, and he whispers. "He cursed him."

The rage is immeasurable.

'HE USED ME!'

Used her, shattered her, then told her the cracks he placed in Hudie's heart were of her own making. Her own shortcomings and failings.

When Hua Cheng told Zhao Beitong of the death of Bai Wuxiang, she laughed— shrieking—

'He only knows one trick, doesn't he?'

She had meant the masks—the tricks. Taking credit for saving the day, when he was the cause of danger in the first place.

But ever since Hudie's fall from grace, Jun Wu has been playing the same trick, over and over again.

Forcing people to make impossible choices.

Between losing what they love, and doing nothing.

Between drowning in their own grief, and taking revenge.

And he always punishes them for choosing wrong.

Over the years, Hua Cheng has learned to treasure self determination above all else. The freedom to choose his own path.

And now, he's remembering the stories of the Crown Prince's second banishment— and understanding what the Heavenly Emperor truly did.

He stole Xie Lian's freedom.

Hua Cheng's god walked back into the cage willingly. Offered his neck up for the shackle with no resistance.

Because Jun Wu made him think that he deserved it. Make Xie Lian think the punishment was earned.

And when Hua Cheng leaves this place—he'll forget again.

Suddenly, the crazed fits of rage Zhao Beitong displayed before seem completely rational.

For a moment, it feels hopeless.

But Hua Cheng has faced hopeless situations before. Has dealt with problems that have always seemed as though they didn't have an answer.

He turned his back on heaven, after all. He has looked death on the face—and he has said no.

And after a moment—he begins to think.

He Xuan stands before him, ready to strike—and it only takes a simple flick of Hua Cheng's wrist to send him flying, slamming into the far wall of the kiln, the cavern rumbling in protest from the force of it.

Even if Hua Cheng could walk away from here with his memories intact—

He couldn't deal with Jun Wu. Not with the way things are now. As strong as Hua Cheng might be...

He's dealing with someone that doesn't play fair. Who will always get the upper hand when you fight him one on one, so...

Hua Cheng takes a step back over the threshold of the Kiln. So, the key must be not facing him alone.

Hua Cheng won't next time.

He'll consider it a lesson learned.

'What are you—?'

His palm presses against the door of the Kin, sealing He Xuan in once more.

Seemingly alone.

BOOM!

The doors to the kiln slam shut.

When He Xuan wakes again—it's inside of a cavern.

The walls and ceilings are a pure shade of white. And the inside—it's impossibly vast.

It takes him a moment to realize that he has company—standing in the very middle, his body tensing in response.

A woman.

Wearing silks of black, red, and gold.

Her hands remain clasped behind here, shoulders thrown back.

"...What is this?" He snaps, wiping the blood from his chin as he rises up onto his knees.

She doesn't answer, head tilted back, speaking to something He Xuan cannot see. A hammer trembles between his fingertips as he stalks forward, eyes narrowed. He's come too far, to be stopped here.

Again, he snarls—

"What IS THIS?!"

After a moment, the stranger finally answers, her posture ever unchanging.

"...This is my home."

He Xuan staggers slightly, clutching the side of his head, one hand pressing his weapon against the wall of the kiln, fighting to steady himself.

"...Crimson Rain..." He Xuan spits, his eyes narrowed. "Where did he go?" He knows the Ghost King by description. Everyone does.

The woman turns her head towards the sealed gates of the kiln, hair spilling over her shoulders as she does so.

"...The Kiln would not close without me inside," she explains, her eyebrows tense. "But if he entered, he would be forced to kill you in order to survive."

Her eyes flash as she turns back to face him.

"Of course, he assumes that I'll allow you to live."

A silvery flash of light flickers past her ear, the ghost's eyes flashing red. "Precocious little brat."

"Who are you?" He Xuan glares, watching the butterfly as it drifts closer.

"And what do you have to do with this place?!"

"..." The female ghost draws herself up to her full height, wiping a hand down her face. "I am Zhao Beitong. And Hua Cheng set me free to..." She looks He Xuan up and down, "...Deal with you."

The water demon glares.

"Please, don't hide your displeasure with the inconvenience on my account," he hisses, his voice snide.

Zhao Beitong raises an eyebrow. “I wasn’t.”

She reaches and, seemingly out of thin air, draws a blade. It gleams the same shade of silver as the butterflies that flock to her

It’s long, wickedly sharp—and then He Xuan watches it change shape between her fingertips, like it’s fluid—made from rays of pure energy—twisting and bending until it forms a spear.

Satisfied, she lunges—clicking her tongue with displeasure when He Xuan barely manages to parry.

“Sloppy,” she mutters, twisting the pole arm expertly, sliding it between He Xuan’s hammer and his body, forcing the water demon to open his stance as he retreats, arms spread—and that’s when she stabs forward with the end of the spear, piercing He Xuan between his ribs.

He snarls with pain, dropping down and rolling to get away from her, blood dripping sluggishly from his wounds—and when he rolls onto his hands and knees, panting, Zhao Beitong stands tall, the spear spinning lazily between her fingertips.

“Your reflexes aren’t terrible,”

She mutters, circling him like a lioness that has pinned down her prey, eyes burning against the glaring light of the kiln, footsteps echoing against the cavern walls. “But you’re no trained fighter.”

He could be, given time. There’s natural talent.

“...But you’re no San Lang,” she mutters under her breath, shaking her head.

He Xuan forces himself to his feet, spitting blood out onto white marble. “Who?”

Rather than answer his question, Zhao Beitong poses one of her own, her spear shifting into a scimitar.

Almost familiar.

She flips it into a reverse grip, the circumference of the circle she’s pacing ever shrinking as she closes in on the water ghost.

“...Or maybe he knew that I wouldn’t let you win,” Zhao Beitong mutters, her brow furrowed.

After all, he knows her better than anyone.

Which would mean that Hua Cheng saw something in this creature that made him think that He Xuan was capable of surviving her.

The thought of that makes her lip curl into a snarl.

Tonglu Hudie birthed three sons.

Lost them all—and while one survived, she had to let him go.

Zhao Beitong forged three ghost kings.

Lost the first two—though in the end, it was the last one that ended up losing her.

She sees no need to forge another.

And yet.

The Goddess of the Kiln watches He Xuan use spiritual energy to heal his wound, his gaze sharp. Calculating.

No, he isn't a prodigy in battle. Not like Hua Cheng.

But she can't say there's no glimmer of potential, either.

She watches the water demon run through countless scenarios in his mind—settling on the fact that, for now, direct combat is the only option.

He isn't a fool.

The two charge toward one another, weapons raised—his hammer, hardly what she would call a fine spiritual tool, but wielded with such ferocity—clashing against her blade of spiritual energy with a great—

CLANG!

And then, there is no kiln. No shrieking.

No wraith butterflies

He Xuan stands on a rooftop, overlooking a city.

The sun is just now starting to set, making the bay look like a sea of liquid flame, matching the long path of torches that light up the streets below.

He remembers this place.

His fingertips twitch by his sides, eyes wide. This is—

“Gege!” A voice calls from behind him, and the water demon stops—his eyes wide, filled with emotions he had long forgotten how to feel. “You got us the best seats ever!”

“...” He Sheng doesn’t move at first, his lips trembling—like he doesn’t know whether to enjoy the memory, or to resent the fact that he’s being forced to remember what he lost.

And yet, the boy can’t stop himself from turning around, a small smile on his face. “You like it?”

A-Zhong beams up at him, her eyes sparkling with happiness.

He forgot how happy they were that day, in the years that followed.

“I love it—you’re really amazing, you know that?”

“...” He Sheng’s smile is slightly lopsided as he kneels down, resting one hand on top of her head.

“...I’m only amazing because I want to make your life special,” he admits, ruffling her hair.

A-Zhong’s expression doesn’t change, smiling up at him happily, and He Sheng’s mouth trembles at the corners.

“I’m sorry that I didn’t—”

“She won’t answer, you know.” A voice calls out

He Sheng stiffens, not looking away from A-Zhong’s face as Zhao Beitong’s voice grows closer, pointing out the truth in a calm, almost distant manner.

“Because that isn’t what you said that day,” the ghost explains. “It’s what you wish you had said but you never did.”

A regret that he had for many years, after her death.

The words he often left unsaid growing up out of some misplaced sense of sheepishness. It all seems so foolish now, but...

He Sheng grits his teeth, his shoulders hunched.

“...Get lost,” he mutters. “It isn’t your business.”

Zhao Beitong’s smile is bitter, but bracing—knowing what will come next.

“Oh,” the ghost mutters, shaking her head. “You have no idea, boy.”

Of course—he charges her, and when he does, the memory goes black.

No kiln, no fire festival. No ghost kings, no younger sisters.

He Xuan rises to his feet once more, this time—standing in what seems to be a workshop.

Shelves of raw ore, finished blades—leather gloves cast aside here and there. The smell of soot and hot iron.

And the repeated sounds of a hammer slamming down.

CLANG!

CLANG!

CLANG!

It’s a dance that has played out before. Many times.

The boy turned scholar, then murderer—and then a savage ghost, the water demon He Xuan—

He watches as a bladesmith is turned to a Guoshi, then a princess, to a Queen, and finally—

The Goddess of the Kiln, Zhao Beitong.

The threads of their memories intertwine and knot together, flashes of scenes passing before their eyes.

Two children, walking down autumn paths, hand in hand.

A garden of butterflies—and then one sealed and pinned inside a gilded box.

He Xuan is quicker than her last pupil to understand the purpose of this exercise—

After all, he's devoured many souls himself before.

Life left him with an endless hunger. Consuming is what he knows, now.

They're chasing one another towards the end—and the victor will survive

But he also knows that—in spite of his own victories on the fields of Mount Tonglu— and Zhao Beitong's severely weakened state—

He's no match. Not in the ways of combat. Not right now.

But He Xuan is no fool—and he's always been aware of his own weaknesses.

As such, he's more than aware of his own strengths.

Now, he stands at the edge of his own memories.

On the edge of a cliff—a bloody hammer in one hand, the black waters of a wrathful sea churning below.

But there's a missing piece to this. A gap in the record.

"...Why did you let him go?" He Xuan mutters. He isn't exactly asking Zhao Beitong— he knows the answer already.

Hua Cheng tricked her. Soothed her with her own memories as she was devoured, then left her remains there to enjoy the dream until the end.

But there's more to it.

While He Xuan was watching, taking in someone else's life, he saw more than just Tonglu Hudie, or the monstrous creature that she would become.

He saw her memories of the Crimson Ghost as well.

Before he was the scourge of the heavens. The Crimson Rain Sought Flower.

The Ghost King, Hua Cheng.

He Xuan knows—maybe Hua Cheng was powerful enough—or even clever enough— to trick her. But to contain her entirely?

No.

He was merely a deadbolt in front of a door that would always be thrown open. That's why they're here again, now.

But why is always the primary question, ringing in He Xuan's skull like a gong. It always has been, all of his life.

Why, why, why.

When he was small, he would ask himself why he was so blessed—and as he grew, what he had done to deserve such ill fortune.

He's still asking now, even if the circumstances have changed.

Why, why, why.

But now, he knows why. It's right there in front of him.

"...You think he can kill Jun Wu," He Xuan mutters, rain pelting his bloodstained cheeks.

Thunder roars, the sea churns—and her eyes flash.

But Hua Cheng has made no actions towards the Heavenly Emperor in his time since his ascension as a Ghost King. There's the famed duel with Thirty Three heavenly officials, but no one knows why Hua Cheng did that, or why generals Xuan Zhen and Nan Yang were spared.

A few of the officials on that list were rather respected members of heavenly society— but their downfall didn't weaken the heavens as a whole. It only embarrassed the heavenly court, in the end.

One could argue that Hua Cheng is biding his time. Building his power..

And he has. There's no sense in denying that. Crimson Rain is well known as the most powerful creature in the Ghost Realm. That isn't in dispute.

His wealth puts even the most indulgent monarchies to shame. But still, his spiritual power cannot rival that of Jun Wu.

Even if it did—He Xuan has also learned the conditions of the curse by now. Hua Cheng forgets the truth of the Heavenly Emperor's identity when he leaves. How could he fulfill her wishes, in that case?

It places his actions—as well as that of Zhao Beitong—in a new perspective.

Just as the spirit rushes towards him, prepared to shove him off the cliff side, to end his memories and devour him, He Xuan mutters something under his breath.

“He needs me.”

Zhao Beitong stops, her claws inches from his throat.

Slowly, He Xuan meets her gaze.

“He needs me.”

When he repeats the words, he says them with even more conviction—his eyes burning brighter than they have in years.

Since the heart in his chest began to beat like a useless instrument, disloyal to the body it was meant to propel.

“Why do you think that he needs me?”

The Ghost is stopped before him, the violets and reds of her eyes burning like twin alchemical flames, threatening to burn him to ash—

But He Xuan isn’t afraid.

“You haven’t figured that part out yet,” he murmurs, a wry smile twisting his lips, “Have you?”

Her fingers seal around his throat just then, lips parted into an irritated snarl. “You think you can condescend to ME, child?”

He dangles over the edge now, the black waters churning below.

He Xuan’s expression remains unchanged.

He told a god something once. Many years ago.

“I can figure it out, if you let me,” he murmurs, dark hair hugging his cheeks wetly, eyes burning an unnatural shade of blue against the night. “I’m good at that sort of thing.”

Zhao Beitong’s eyes narrow sharply.

‘I can fix it, if you let me.’

Back then, life was so simple.

'I'm good at fixing things.'

"…If you still have no idea, why should I believe you can find an answer now?" She glares, her voice lowered to a hiss.

"Oh, I have figured something out," He Xuan shakes his head. "I just don't know the context."

"By all means, please SHARE!" She snarls, squeezing him tighter.

Instead of flailing, or reacting with discomfort, He Xuan simply lifts his chin, looking towards the skies. Watching as the clouds darken and churn.

"The heavens are my enemy as well," the scholar explains, "I just don't know why yet."

"…And I'm supposed to expect you to figure that out?" She glares, nails digging into his skin. Her words filled with venom, eyes with distrust.

"Open the gates," He Xuan murmurs. "If I fail, you can destroy us both—can't you?"

Zhao Beitong doesn't seem as confident about that.

Her power has long since been divided, with Hua Cheng absorbing her stores of spiritual power over time—and building up his own massive reserves.

He isn't the savage ghost that he was when they met. It would be a fair fight this time.

Perhaps He Xuan could tip the scales.

That presumes that he would attack the Ghost King, instead of both of them turning on her, but…

When she looks up into the water demon's eyes, she knows; They both want their answers.

The last time the doors of the Kiln slammed shut, it took two years for them to open again.

Now, the gates reopen after only a matter of weeks.

Weeks that Hua Cheng spent waiting, his palm pressed against the gates, allowing the spirit that has long been contained within his own soul to temper the water demon He Xuan into something that would suit his own needs.

But when he looks into the cavern—he doesn't see Zhao Beitong feasting on He Xuan's remains.

Or He Xuan, risen as a newly formed Ghost King.

He sees the two standing side by side—

And a gleaming silver whip clutched between Zhao Beitong's fingers.

Hua Cheng arches an eyebrow.

He steps back into the chamber, hands clasped behind his back, his scimitar gleaming at his hip.

"It seems like you two made friends," he comments, glancing back and forth between the two of them.

He Xuan carries no weapon.

He lifts his hands, pulling his hair up.

His mother always used to chide him for allowing it to fall in his face, explaining that it would be harder for him to concentrate that way.

Now, he ties it up over his head in a high, neat ponytail. 'See?'

He watches the Ghost King with a keen eye.

'That's better, isn't it?'

Ultimately, he knows that Zhao Beitong won't harm Hua Cheng, her affection for the ghost is deep—almost maternal.

But even a mother will raise her hand to her son, on occasion.

That gives him time.

"Keep him occupied," He Xuan mutters, rolling up the sleeves of his robe.

The goddess rolls her eyes, cracking the whip between her fingers, wraith butterflies beginning to pour from the ceiling of the kiln.

“Weren’t you paying attention before?” She replies, the end of the weapon curling around Hua Cheng’s ankle—

Dragging him back inside the Kiln. “Keeping men occupied is what I do.”

The scimitar E-Ming comes hurling out of it’s sheath, crashing against the line of the whip until it shatters, only to be reformed into a blade of matching power, the two clashing as hordes of Wraith Butterflies tear through the kiln.

CLANG!

The clouds of spiritual energy rip at one another as two of the most powerful beings to ever walk the earth clash, the air roaring with power.

Among them, He Xuan is a paper ship in a hurricane, tossed around by the current. His fingers clutch at the walls of the Kiln.

He refuses to be swallowed whole by it now.

Even when the force of the blows becomes to powerful, it knocks him off his feet— Each time, He Xuan repeats what he has always done.

He rises back up, like the waves returning to the shore after a storm.

Rushing forward like a willful tide—just as Hua Cheng clashes with Zhao Beitong in another blow, struggling to suppress her, the water demon’s hands collide with his back.

And they fall back into the path of the Kiln.

There’s no brilliant white cavern. No clash of blades.

When He Xuan opens his eyes again, he hears screaming.

DIANXIA!

DIANXIA!

DIANXIA!

He rises to his feet, standing in the middle of a crowd, flowers pouring down from every direction—

Now, he sees him.

A golden masked figure, moving like a painting brought to life.

Then the screaming as the crowd begins to see a red figure plunging from the sky, crashing towards the ground.

It's only when the Crown Prince catches the boy, his mask slipping from his face, that He Xuan realizes that he's seen the man before.

The weaver.

The blind Taoist.

The Greatest of all of the Martial deities, the Crown Prince who Pleased the Gods, cradling the child that would become the wrath of hell, King of Ghosts, the Crimson Rain Sought Flower in his arms.

It's a flashpoint—an intersection of two fates, changed forever by one encounter One act of kindness.

He Xuan watches the memories fly past—never lifting a hand to protest as Crimson Rain's mind flickers through his own.

There's a moment, when the Ghost King's gaze flashes over He Xuan's memories of Qin Meirong, when the water demon almost protests.

But instead, he straightens his spine from his usual slouch, throwing his shoulders back, hands clasped behind him.

After all, he's here with questions of his own, walking a quiet path deeper into the Ghost King's mind.

Hua Cheng keeps replaying one of He Xuan's memories.

Over and over again, like a gambler that doesn't know when to stop throwing his dice, even if he ends up with snake eyes over and over again.

He stands in a market, watching a white robed cultivator speak with a child clad in dark robes.

Smiling and laughing.

Watches the way that the blind Taoist fiddles with a silver chain around his neck as he speaks, thanking the local boy for fixing his loom.

Hua Cheng hasn't seen his love since that day.

His last memory of Xie Lian's face are of tear stained cheeks and frightened screams.

'You promised you would never lie to me.'

Oh, how the crown prince wept on the day that Wu Ming left this world, leaving only a white blossom and dark blade behind.

Hua Cheng kneels before his figure now, fingertips trembling as they stroke the memory's cheek, eyes wide.

He's always been so beautiful.

It's not that Hua Cheng has ever forgotten this. That would be impossible. But he's been a ghost, mourning for centuries, clutching onto a limited reel of memories, looking over the same images of Xie Lian's face over and over again.

In that time, the god almost ceased to be a living, breathing thing to him. He became a treasured memory, something that Hua Cheng would prefer to lose himself in, over and over again, as the world moved on around him, often forgetting—

Xie Lian was still living in this world.

All these years, even if Hua Cheng couldn't see him, couldn't find him—Xie Lian was still smiling and laughing with children, offering them encouragement. Even giving little He Sheng his own dinner.

'You turn your back on this world—and you tell yourself it's all for his sake.'

Xie Lian watches as He Sheng runs off, a quiet, happy smile on his face—fingertips still toying with the silver chain around his neck.

'But this world is his future.'

Centuries ago, a god clutched Hong-er's ashes and wept, apologizing, over and over again.

"I'm sorry!"

He Xuan stands inside that memory now, watching as a broken idol weeps beneath the rain, his head covered by a bamboo hat—clutching a smooth black stone against his chest.

"Hong-er—I'm so sorry!"

Inside someone else's memories, Hua Cheng whispers the same thing.

"I'm sorry."

His hands cradle Xie Lian's face, wishing he could speak to his god again.

Never before has the child prayed with the expectation of an answer, but god, how desperate he is for his love to look on his face one last time.

To hear his voice when he speaks, and give him an answer.

He Xuan listens as Xie Lian hunches over on himself, making a solemn oath:

"I won't do it again. I won't—I won't ever give up again!"

Centuries separated, with a different voice, a different body, a different name—the oath is repeated.

"I won't do it again," he whispers.

Hua Cheng doesn't remember the moment his faith began to waver. Not in Xie Lian— never in him.

But in himself.

In his ability to find his god again. To protect him.

Somewhere in the last three and a half centuries, doubt began to creep in. "I won't doubt myself," he mutters.

"Not ever again."

Xie Lian doesn't turn his head, doesn't look at him, his smile unchanging.

After all—this isn't Hua Cheng's memory.

That's where He Xuan stands now, diving deeper—and there, he finds it.

The answer to the question he's been asking all his life:

Why.

Before him, stands a little girl.

Dressed in green and white silks, warm brown locks of hair pulled back and away from her face, dimples in her cheeks as she smiles up at the Ghost King.

Silly and ignorant, but it makes her seem almost fearless. “What’s your name, little one?”

“Shi—!” She starts, then chokes, pretending to hack for a moment on her snack, turning around, curls bouncing all around her. “Shhhheeesh, this is good!” The child mutters, wiping at her mouth.

“It’s Mingxia!”

Liar, He Xuan thinks, watching her face. Such a terrible liar.

Still, he follows after them, watching what an odd pair that they make—a Ghost King (in disguise, but still fearsome) and a small child, skipping with a sweet treat in her hands, chattering off countless questions.

Why is this memory so important, he wonders. Why would she lie?

It isn’t until a face rounds the corner, that He Xuan begins to understand.

Like a weight settling in his gut, as his eyes settle on the visage of a man that he’s met before.

Young—younger than when He Xuan saw him. Rich and handsome.

The Water Master, Shi Wudu.

‘…You.’

That’s all that He Xuan can think, watching the Water Master snatch his younger sister up into his arms, his eyes narrowed.

“What’s going on here?”

‘It was you.’

He stands in the background, a footnote in his own demise as Shi Wudu explains the curse that haunts his family.

‘You took everything from me.’

A parasitic being, cast on them many centuries ago—one that won't unlatch from Shi Qingxuan until he's dead.

A jinx monster.

Oh, how He Xuan knows such beings very well.

All his life, He Xuan has been repeating one question, over and over: Why?

Why was he born so special?

Why did fate seem to turn against him so suddenly?

Why did his sister and lover have to die?

Why were so many always standing in his way?

Why couldn't he Rest In Peace?

Why is he here now?

And here, in this one moment, the truth comes to light.

When He Xuan watches Shi Wudu ask Hua Cheng if he can trick the monster again— make it latch onto someone else. If then, they could finally be free of it.

"That wouldn't work."

He Xuan's future, his fate—it wasn't lost, or broken.

"You can run from a curse, or you can face it."

His hands ball into fists at his at sides, trembling.

"But you can't cast it off onto someone else."

He Xuan's future, his family, his life—they were stolen away from him.

"Not without bringing it back down on yourself in a far worse form."

That's what this is.

That's why He Xuan is here.

He watches Shi Wudu's ascension through Hua Cheng's eyes, the rise of his younger brother along with him—

And with his own, He Xuan watches himself fall.

Now, with old questions finally answered, he begins to find himself asking a new one: Why?

Why was Shi Wudu's younger sibling more important than his own?

Why would he look upon a life, an entire family, and think that he had the right to push them off the cliff in order to save himself? Simply because he had the power to do so?

And why would the heavens accept that? He Xuan stops, looking towards the sky.

The cruel, blank, unfeeling sky—always looking down on the suffering of the world, never offering any kindness in response.

After watching the rise and fall of the Crown Prince of Wuyong—He Xuan thinks he knows why.

Jun Wu isn't a fool.

He saw two young men—He Xuan and Shi Wudu, and saw that both had the power to ascend.

That both would be powerful, fearsome gods in their own right.

Jun Wu is always clever. Generous, when he wants to be. Self aggrandizing—

And an excellent liar.

But he's also a coward.

Someone must have told Shi Wudu how to switch fates at one point or another. A mortal wouldn't have known. And if a ghost had done so, Hua Cheng would have learned of it.

Meaning it must have been a god.

A god that would have then had the new Water Master under his thumb.

And in doing so, it would have stopped He Xuan from ascending.

He Xuan, who has always been too clever for his own good. Always the first to reach the answer—

And set in his ways.

He Xuan was a good man, once. In the days when he still had a heart beating in his chest.

He would have learned the truth eventually, if he had been allowed to rise to the heavens. And he wouldn't have been susceptible to bribery or blackmail.

Jun Wu has allowed very few gods to approach his level of power, in the last millennia.

Xie Lian was cast down for it.

They make excuses now. Speak of the heavens interference, how cruel and malevolent the backlash of fate can be—

But now, looking through Zhao Beitong's memories—that was all a lie. A cruel, insidious lie.

The universe didn't unleash Bai Wuxiang on the people of Xianle.

Jun Wu did.

The universe didn't place a cursed shackle in the god's eyes. Jun Wu did.

The universe didn't write the rules of the heavens.

Jun Wu did.

And when a young, compassionate god threatened those rules—and in doing so, Jun Wu's power—

Jun Wu attempted to break him.

The only martial god in the heavenly court that comes close to Jun Wu in strength while retaining any level of independence is General Ming Guang.

But he's so wholemindedly focused on his own desires, Pei Ming is hardly a threat to political structures of the heavens.

It's almost reminiscent of Hua Cheng, in a way.

Two immensely powerful beings with very different callings—and yet, both of them seem to be protected from the Heavenly Emperor's wrath that way.

"...I understand," He Xuan mutters, watching a little boy play in a courtyard.

Giggling without a care in the world—not knowing the cruelty of his own fate, or the suffering that would be incurred to spare him from it.

Oh, how He Xuan hates him in this moment.

Hates his joy, his silly little smiles and laughs.

Hates him because he wants A-Zhong back.

Because he wants Qin Meirong in his arms once more.

But even then, there was a seed in He Xuan's chest.

Some small, nearly forgotten part of him that knows the truth.

That ignorance and guilt are not the same.

That you can't damn someone who never had a choice.

But that decision doesn't lay before him now—and it won't. Not for centuries to come.

For now, the Ghost King stirs upon hearing his voice, his head whipping to the side, finally looking away from Xie Lian's face.

"...What?" He questions, rising to his feet. The memory warps.

He Xuan watches as the courtyard begins to fade and collapse around him, taking Shi Qingxuan's laughter with it.

The water demon almost mourns the sound, but...

They'll see each other again.

He'll see to that.

"...I understand!" He Xuan calls out, charging towards the barrier.

The vision before him shatters like glass—and once again, he's standing in the cavern of the kiln, between a clash of two titans.

Blood drips down Hua Cheng's cheek, a deep cut underneath his eye—while Zhao Beitong spits blood onto the ground, clutching her ribs.

"When we walk out of here—I'll forget about Jun Wu," the water demon explains, rubbing his temple. "I'll forget about what he did to both of you, but—!" He holds up a trembling finger, pointing at his chest. "I won't forget that the Heavens are my enemy."

Zhao Beitong pauses.

Because He Xuan won't forget what Shi Wudu did to him.

Or that, in spite of his crimes, Jun Wu allowed him to ascend anyway.

"I know myself," the water demon continues, pounding his fist against his chest for emphasis. "I'll get close to them—I'll get revenge."

He takes a staggering step closer to both of them, his gaze fierce.

Now, finally, this half baked whelp of a Ghost King is beginning to remind Zhao Beitong of her San Lang. An echo of him.

Potential.

"The Water Master is the closest to Jun Wu of all of the gods."

He Xuan looks to Hua Cheng for confirmation—and even now, despite his irritation with having his memories scoured, the Ghost King nods.

Not in scales of power, no.

But the Heavenly Emperor trusts the Water Master, and favors him heavily.

Humans take this as a sign of fortune.

Pray to the Water Master, among the most powerful of the Gods. He can bring you wealth, good luck—even fertility, according to some.

Within the heavenly court, however—there are rumors. As there always are, when a god is favored in such an obvious way.

That the two share a relationship in private that might be very different than what is shown to the public.

Such rumors might have flown around about Xie Lian, if he had remained in the heavens long enough—but Hua Cheng can attest—

He rose through skill and power alone.

Shi Wudu, however, is no Crown Prince of Xianle. Talented and illustrious as he might be—he should not have risen so far so quickly.

In his case, there's a chance there might be truth to such rumors.

Particularly when you consider the secrets the two already share.

"It will put me close to him," He Xuan mutters. "I might learn the truth on my own that way, or—" He glances between Hua Cheng and Zhao Beitong, "—put me in the position to help carry out a plan in the future."

"...A plan," Hua Cheng repeats, crossing his arms.

Zhao Beitong presses her palm against the side of her head, thinking, and...

After a moment, He Xuan stares at the two ghosts, his jaw hanging open in abject shock.

"...You two really don't have a plan for dealing with him?"

"I do," Hua Cheng starts, only to be interrupted.

"Does that plan extend further than finding Xie Lian?"

The Ghost King shuts his mouth, and the answer is right there:

Any and all of his plans: absolutely none of them extend further than finding and pleasing his god.

Zhao Beitong shrugs, rubbing the back of her neck.

"I made many plans in the beginning," she mutters. "None of them ever seemed to work."

"...Well," He Xuan heaves out a sigh, crossing his arms. "I can help you fix that."

He's always been good at fixing things, after all.

"We're not lacking in intelligence," Hua Cheng glares.

"It's impossible to plan for something that you forget the moment you leave this place."

His method of counteracting that has always been assuming that in the end, finding and supporting Xie Lian, working to free him of his shackles—those actions would place him in Jun Wu's path

Not so different from what He Xuan himself just described in his trek towards revenge. How is that any better?

"Yes—but in this moment—we all remember." He Xuan points towards the walls of the Kiln. "Within this space—his curses hold no power."

He looks to Hua Cheng. "Hong-er."

The Ghost King freezes, his pupils dilating, and He Xuan shrugs, looking back up at the cavern ceiling.

"I can say that name here, but when I leave, I'll probably forget."

The truth of it hits heavily, but Hua Cheng has been living with the weight of it for a while.

"But—that also means that if Jun Wu is going to die—it'll be here." He Xuan continues. "So, if we already have a plan in place by the time we converge here again, we'll remember—and already know what to do."

"That requires information that we don't have," Zhao Beitong frowns.

"We don't know if Jun Wu would ever be foolish enough to come here, knowing that —and we don't know what the circumstances would be. That's why the curse has worked for this long."

And it's horribly, cruelly effective.

He Xuan already knows this.

"Right," He agrees.

"But your memories proved something," he murmurs, glancing around at the walls of the Kiln before pointing to Zhao Beitong. "He isn't invincible."

Her eyes widen slightly, and the scholar repeats— "How many times did you cut him with Zhu Xin?" A hundred. She counted them all.

"He wasn't as powerful then as he is now," He Xuan concedes. "But neither were you."

Both of them are creatures that have built up immeasurable stores of power over so many years on earth.

“Why were you able to cut him, back then?”

“...I surprised him,” Zhao Beitong admits.

Zhao Beitong is a builder. A long tested blade master. She builds things. Creates. Maybe if she had questioned life more—she wouldn’t have ended up on this path.

Hua Cheng is a survivor. Sharpened instincts, bare desires—lingering on despite all else, with incomparable strength.

But instinct isn’t the same as analyzing.

He Xuan is also a builder. And a survivor. But he’s more than that.

He’s a scholar.

“What if,” he mutters, still looking at the ceiling. “We knew something that he didn’t?”

The other two ghosts stare at him.

“...How?” Hua Cheng murmurs, watching him intently. Zhao Beitong wasn’t as eager to believe in the young ghost’s capability before, but after watching his memories...

Even she seems willing to listen.

“...You said this place was your home,” He Xuan glances over at her.

“But you aren’t the Kiln itself.” He points towards the exit, which now lies open, and the other three mountains that frame the hills of Mount Tonglu. “The other Guoshi, their spirits form those hills—but this mountain, it was here before you were even born.”

“...That’s right.”

Zhao Beitong agrees.

“...There was something that you didn’t see,” He Xuan murmurs, glancing around. “The Volcano exploding—it was never a natural disaster.”

Her expression falters.

“In all of recorded history, has there ever been another eruption like it?”

There hasn’t.

“...You think it was...resentment?” Zhao Beitong mutters, her eyes wide, trying to take that in.

In the end, that’s still another form of natural disaster—and even less preventable.

“A release of pressure, sure—but it also did something else, didn’t it?” He Xuan points out.

Zhao Beitong grows pale—but Hua Cheng is beginning to understand where this is going.

“...A calamity,” Hua Cheng mutters. “It led to the birth of the first Calamity.” Bai Wuxiang.

“Does that really change anything?” Zhao Beitong’s fists hang by her sides, tightly clenched.

He Xuan smiles back at her. He looks so young in that moment, his eyes bright as he tackles a problem. “It changes everything, Guoshi Tonglu,” he replies, pressing his palm against the wall of the Kiln. “Because this place existed before you—but you’ve been able to control it.”

He stops in the middle of the cavern. “I’m willing to bet that this place—it’s actually just a nexus point for positive and negative energy. When it falls out of balance— pressure builds, and the Kiln releases it. But it doesn’t have a consciousness, so...” He Xuan trails off.

“Whichever spirit has the most resentful energy—they control the path of the Kiln. There was likely a time when that was Bai Wuxiang, but I doubt he realized it then.”

Oh.

Zhao Beitong smiles, her expression filled with bitterness. How that must haunt him now, huh?

Knowing that he could have stopped his own downfall, if he hadn’t been so blinded by arrogance and greed to see what was going on around him.

She's glad to know that.

"Then, it was you. And now…" He glances toward Hua Cheng. "You." After all—the Kiln was open until he came.

"…How does that help us?" The Ghost King sighs. "Bai Wuxiang was a calamity himself. Jun Wu likely already knows that I'm in control of the Kiln now, if that's the case."

"Because," He Xuan taps his foot against the cave floor, "this place has more than one function."

After all—it's a natural geographic point where spiritual energy—negative spiritual energy, resentment, pools.

"We're able to look inside each other's memories." He continues. "But not before we commit the act of consumption. You saw Zhao Beitong's life before you defeated her."

"…And what difference does that make?" Hua Cheng frowns.

"You know what I'm talking about," He Xuan murmurs, watching Zhao Beitong.

After all—they both have a history of consuming other Ghosts.

And accessing consciousness and memories—that comes after, not before.

"This place," He Xuan glances around, "I'm willing to bet it's connected to the chamber where you found your friends. The room with the two doors?"

Hua Cheng's face suddenly pales with understanding.

The Kiln itself—it's a connection between the human realm, and something else.

"You can lie about your memories, bury them, forget things—but not here." He Xuan taps his foot again, clearly closing in on his point. "You both assumed that what you were experiencing was a connection between your minds, but it wasn't. It was the Kiln."

"How does that help?!"

Zhao Beitong snaps. "So, so what if it's just some weird cosmic quirk that's allowing us to see one another's memories—what does that have to do with Jun Wu?!”

“Because—the Kiln lets you look back,” He Xuan whips around to look at her “Theoretically—you could look forward, too.”

He kneels down, looking at the Kiln floor.

“…Well,” the goddess scoffs, turning away—arms crossed. “Divining my future didn’t exactly work out well for me.”

He Xuan’s palm presses flat against the marble. “This isn’t fortune telling,” he murmurs. “It won’t be like that.”

Hua Cheng watches him closely, taking a step closer to his figure. “…If that was possible, wouldn’t Jun Wu have already done it?”

“I doubt he’s put much thought into what this place actually is,” He Xuan replies. “He just uses it for his needs, then forgets about it.”

Zhao Beitong snorts derisively, half under her breath.

Sounds like him.

“And whatever we do see—the Kiln’s magic is tied to its geography. We’ll forget when we leave.” He Xuan mutters. “But when we return—we’ll know something he doesn’t, and we’ll have a plan.”

“…What future is it going to show us, exactly?” Hua Cheng kneels down beside him, watching him intently.

They almost look like brothers, huddled together like that.

In any other situation, it might have made Zhao Beitong smile.

“Our futures. The Kiln’s future. Who knows.”

He Xuan shrugs. “You’re the one in control of it. I’m just going to agitate it into action.”

Hua Cheng takes a moment to process that, watching as He Xuan pulls back his fist. “…You’re going to what?” He asks flatly.

Just in time to watch He Xuan’s fist slam down.

It plummets into the floor of the Kiln with all of his strength—which isn’t negligible, in this situation—and the marble—

A crack runs through it.

"...What is he doing?" Zhao Beitong questions, her eyes widening.

"Agitating..." Hua Cheng starts, then stops.

BOOM!

He Xuan's fist slams down again—and Hua Cheng watches the crack grow and fracture.

Hua Cheng glances up at the goddess, and—

For a moment, he looks so young, offering her an apologetic smile, tipping his head to the side.

"...I didn't think this through," he admits.

Zhao Beitong's eyes widen, vexed as she takes a step back, gripping the wall of the Kiln.

Which is for the best—her spirit is severely weakened, and whatever this is—

Hua Cheng suspects he and He Xuan are the only ones meant to move forward. Her story is already written.

But theirs is far from over.

"...Relax," Hua Cheng drawls, trying to sound confident—even as He Xuan slams his fist down again.

BOOM!

"Whatever it is—I'll deal with it."

He always does, after all.

The Kiln begins to groan, walls roaring and vibrating in protest. Waiting.

"..." Hua Cheng grits his teeth, pressing his hand against the crack, feeling it thrum beneath his fingertips.

A living, breathing thing.

Waiting for him, to tell it what to do.

The Ghost King squeezes his eyes shut.

“…SHOW ME!” He roars, his voice filling the chamber.

Just like that—the floor beneath them shatters, sending both ghosts tumbling into the abyss below.

The Future of this World

Chapter Summary

This is the Kiln.

He recognizes the white walls. The vast, almost endless height to the ceilings. But Zhao Beitong isn’t there—and the floor that He Xuan just shattered—it’s completely intact beneath them.

“...Great.” He mutters, sitting up and crossing his arms. “You broke it.”

He Xuan rolls his eyes, sitting up beside him, brushing off his arms. “I didn’t break anything.”

“Well, this isn’t how it’s supposed to work,” Hua Cheng mutters, shaking his head. “You broke it.”

“I didn’t!”

Chapter Notes

You can find me on twitter and keep up with current updates of the story HERE

See the end of the chapter for more notes

And for a moment, there is nothing.

No Zhao Beitong. No planning. No Kiln. Just darkness.

But when Hua Cheng opens his eyes again, he sits up, confused.

Because this is the Kiln.

He recognizes the white walls. The vast, almost endless height to the ceilings.

But Zhao Beitong isn’t there—and the floor that He Xuan just shattered—it’s completely intact beneath them.

“...Great.” He mutters, sitting up and crossing his arms. “You broke it.”

He Xuan rolls his eyes, sitting up beside him, brushing off his arms. “I didn't break anything."

"Well, this isn't how it's supposed to work," Hua Cheng mutters, shaking his head. "You broke it."

"I didn't!"

"You—"

BOOM!

They both fall silent, watching.

Then, there's a voice—one that Hua Cheng knows far too well.

He's been following it all his life.

"SAN LANG?!"

He Xuan watches the Ghost King go completely still, his eyes widening. How...does he know that name—?

A figure crashes down onto the floor of the Kiln.

Dressed in white cultivator's robes. Long, heart wrenchingly perfect waves of dark brown hair pooling around him.

For a moment, Hua Cheng can't move—can't breathe as he watches his god rise to his feet, brushing himself off—glancing around blindly.

"...San Lang?" He calls again.

Somehow, in his heart—Hua Cheng knows.

Xie Lian is calling him.

The ghost staggers to his feet without thinking—not an ounce of hesitation as he rushes to the god's side.

"I'm here," he answers, clinging to Xie Lian's hand—as he has so many times before. "I'm right here!"

But Xie Lian doesn't look at him—doesn't answer him.

His fingers don't even move in response to Hua Cheng's grip.

"Dianxia," he tries, squeezing tighter, reaching up to cup Xie Lian's cheek, stroking his thumb over his chin, nearly frantic. "Please, love—just look at me."

But he never does.

"He can't answer you," He Xuan mutters, rising to his feet. "We can't touch this, we can only watch."

Because this—

Hua Cheng looks around, finally understanding.

This is the Kiln's future.

Suddenly, Xie Lian jerks away from him.

"WHO IS IT?!"

Hua Cheng almost (stupidly) answers that it's him again, but before he can—there's another voice.

Coming from another white clad silhouette, facing away from him. Quietly, it replies—

"You know who I am."

"..." Hua Cheng's lips tear into a snarl, at the sight of that mask. Xie Lian doesn't need to see it to know what it is.

Half laughing, half crying.

"...SAN LANG!" He blurts out again, scrambling backwards, and Hua Cheng's heart aches.

Does this mean he'll fail again, even after he finds him?

Is that his future?

"There's no need to shout."

Bai Wuxiang's voice is as calm as ever as he walks through the kiln, gripping a staff in his hand. "It's just you and me here. No one else will come—the Kiln is sealed."

Hua Cheng watches Xie Lian's grip on Fangxin tighten, lifting the sword up, pointing it directly at him.

"Where is he?" The god snarls, his voice unafraid—not for himself.

"Where is he right now?"

"He's gone," the calamity replies simply.

Hua Cheng's stomach drops as Xie Lian's face falls.

'I'm not,' he thinks desperately, watching the prince's lips tremble. 'I'm right here!'

"What's that supposed to mean?!"

"He doesn't believe in you anymore. Dead. He left. What do you think?"

Hua Cheng watches Xie Lian's face briefly contort with fear, and his heart aches.

Never.

He reaches for the chain around Xie Lian's neck, feeling the ring there.

I would never—

Then, the god's expression contorts with rage.

"STOP YOUR NONSENSE!" He shouts, lunging, thrusting the sword towards Bai Wuxiang's chest. "SAN LANG WOULD NEVER LEAVE ME!"

Hua Cheng freezes, watching with wide eyes.

'Hong-er would NEVER leave me!'

Does he...?

Bai Wuxiang laughs, parrying the blow with ease. "Alright, alright—I've sent him outside the Kiln. But even if he does arrive—it'll be too late."

Hua Cheng's eyes never leave Xie Lian's face, caught on those words.

'San Lang would never leave me.'

...Does he know?

Hua Cheng's heart makes a home in his throat as he watches Xie Lian's every move, pounding needlessly.

"It's better that he doesn't see this," the white clothed calamity continues, stalking towards him. "Even if he doesn't realize it now—he won't want to see the state of you."

Hua Cheng's lips peel back into a snarl as he tries to step in front of Xie Lian protectively, unable to defy his instincts, even if he knows it's useless.

"Who knows if he'll still want to be with you."

In the background, He Xuan rolls his eyes.

"Something tells me he will."

Hua Cheng whips his head around to glare at him, his eye narrowed with annoyance —and it does take a toll on the seriousness of the moment, when he snarls—

"Shut the fuck UP!"

Before the water demon can respond, Xie Lian shouts—well—

The same thing.

"SHUT THE FUCK UP!"

The god flies towards Bai Wuxiang, attacking him in a fury. "WHAT DO YOU WANT?! WHY DO YOU KEEP CLINGING TO ME?!"

Bai Wuxiang dodges every single attack—and it only seems to infuriate the god even more.

"WHY HAVEN'T YOU DIED?! WHY DID YOU COME HERE?!" And then…

"Because you're here."

That's the answer, Hua Cheng realizes, watching as the two clash. "…What do you mean?"

"Because you've come," Bai Wuxiang replies. "So, I've come too."

Why, if Jun Wu knew just how dangerous this place was, would he return? It's really that simple.

Hua Cheng stares with disbelief. He's really that obsessed? He—

He would come to the most dangerous place on earth for him, just to torment Xie Lian?

He truly loathes the god that much?

Hua Cheng looks to He Xuan, opening his mouth, but—

Then the air is pierced with a shriek

“AAAAAAAIIEEEEEEEEEE!”

Both ghosts stop, clutching their ears, and—

Just like that, the scene shatters, and Hua Cheng and He Xuan are left tumbling through darkness.

“WE DIDN’T—!” Hua Cheng shouts, his arms flailing, “WE DIDN’T SEE ENOUGH!”

“No SHIT!” He Xuan cries. “You’re the one that’s supposed to be CONTROLLING IT!”

Right.

Hua Cheng squeezes his eyes shut, holding his hands out.

The energy pulsing around him is so immense, so vast, it’s nearly impossible to fathom.

It feels like the first time he made the sky rain blood—but stronger.

Still, he tries. Stretches out with his hands, fighting with everything he has. “…Show me,” he whispers, opening his eyes.

The void isn’t empty, like it always has been before.

Lighting the way…are butterflies. Silvery light casting his face in a gentle glow.

One of them lands on his fingers, wings flapping gently.

Tonglu Hudie used to have a recurring thought, over and over again. Hua Cheng has heard it many times over.

That a soul is a butterfly.

But really—

A soul is a wish.

“...Show me,” Hua Cheng says again—firmly now. Finally, the scene changes.

Hua Cheng and He Xuan watch, standing over a fiery pit of lava and inferno.

Watch as a small group take on the greatest threat the world has likely known until now—Jun Wu.

Among them being Xie Lian, his two idiotic former friends, Hua Cheng, and...

To his shock, Mei Nianqing.

“...I can’t believe you destroyed my lair,” He Xuan grumbles, his arms crossed.

“I didn’t destroy it,” Hua Cheng corrects him, his eyes never leaving the scene. “And apparently, you owe me money.”

He Xuan grimaces. “A lot of money.” “I get it!”

The two of them watch the battle unfold—and Hua Cheng waits, to see if there’s some special trick or weakness, something that betrays the truth behind Jun Wu’s downfall, but—

The answer, once again—is simple.

He Xuan watches as Hua Cheng’s future self embraces the god.

His jaw hangs open as he takes in the sight of the cursed shackles shattering, feels the overwhelming surge of spiritual power crashing through the place.

More than Zhao Beitong’s. More than Hua Cheng’s. More— More than Jun Wu’s.

Thud .

The very earth seems to rattle.

When Xie Lian’s eyes open—there are no shackles.

They burn a pure shade of gold, from pupil to the edge of his cornea, like the sunrise itself has been swallowed up by them.

And with each step he takes, the earth shakes.

He Xuan watches with mild terror, Hua Cheng with awe.

“...Well,” the water demon mutters, watching as the God and the Heavenly emperor clash again—and this time—

With Jun Wu clearly losing.

“We know how to surprise him, now.”

After all—there’s no reason Jun Wu would think that Hua Cheng would know how to shatter a cursed shackle.

But as they watch—it becomes clear that such an action comes with a heavy price. As the crown prince clings to Hua Cheng’s fading form, weeping.

“...Even knowing it would end this way,” He Xuan mutters, his gaze slightly narrowed. “Would you still do it?”

The Ghost King smiles.

“Without hesitation,” he answers easily.

He Xuan stares at him like he’s lost his mind, but Hua Cheng doesn’t seem particularly worried, his eyes fixed on the chain around Xie Lian’s neck.

The ring still intact.

“I’ll definitely come back,” the Ghost King murmurs.

No matter what. He’ll always come back.

He Xuan almost seems jealous in that moment—of the faith that Hua Cheng has. Not only in his god, but—

In himself.

The scene begins to crumble away again, and He Xuan glances back toward the Ghost King, raising an eyebrow.

“Taking us out?”

After all—this is what they came here to see. There’s no reason to remain any longer.

"…" Hua Cheng shakes his head, watching as the images collapse around them. "This isn't me."

He reaches out with his hand, and he's about to call them back—or try to, when—

Everything shatters, and they both plummet into darkness.

And they fall for a long time, far into the future.

Too far, Hua Cheng thinks, his arms flailing out, trying to find something to grasp onto, hair whipping around his face.

"PULL US OUT!"

"I'M—TRYING!"

Finally, they land on the ground—hard.

Hua Cheng's head aches and pounds as he rolls onto his side coughing out smoke.

He doesn't know how this happened—or what brought them here, but it wasn't him.

"Where…" He Xuan sits up first, rubbing his temple. "Where is this place?"

The air around them is completely dark, but it's difficult to tell if it's actually nighttime or not—

Not when the smoke overhead is so thick that it blocks out the entire sky. The earth around them is dry, crumbling, and barren.

When Hua Cheng sits up, he can make out the shape of trees, their limbs stripped and lifeless.

There's nothing here. Only resentment and death.

Hua Cheng can hear as much, the moans of hateful spirits groaning in the distance. "…I think…this is still Wuyong," he mutters.

He Xuan staggers to his feet, looking around, trying to see the shape of the kiln, but… There's nothing like that.

Black stone spires rise into the air, almost reminiscent of volcanic rock, but…

No Mount Tonglu.

“...If that’s true, where’s the Kiln?” He Xuan whispers.

Hua Cheng brushes the ash off of the front of his robes, looking around, “...Nothing lasts forever,” he admits. “Maybe this is a time when the Kiln as we know it no longer exists.”

Disturbing to imagine, as the resentment remains.

Now, He Xuan Realizes—

This isn’t smoke.

The black fog that hangs around them, that blocks out the very sky itself— It’s pure resentful energy.

“...If you didn’t bring us here,” He Xuan mutters, his chin tilted back, “...what did?”

Hua Cheng doesn’t have an actual answer, but before he can reply—notes pierce the air.

Not screaming, thundering, or shaking, but music.

A shrill, petrifying song—and yet, somehow—it’s beautiful.

And familiar.

The sound—

He Xuan stiffens beside him, and Hua Cheng feels himself go tense.

It’s the sound of a flute.

A vague memory tugs at his mind sharply.

Something Zhao Beitong saw once, when she looked into the future, trying to save the lives of her people—and her son.

That one day, the doors of hell would open, and when they did...

He Xuan sways, his eyes sliding out of focus.

...It would be to the call of a flute.

“...Don’t listen,” Hua Cheng mutters, whipping around, clapping his hands over the water demon’s ears. “Look at me!” He snarls.

He Xuan's eyes snap back to him, wary in their confusion, filled with a slight haze. "Don't listen!" Hua Cheng repeats, and, out of desperation—

He slaps He Xuan across the face—hard. So hard, the younger man's head whips out the side sharply, bones cracking.

But it does seem to do the trick.

"W...what the FUCK is that?!"

"..." Hua Cheng turns his head, glancing back towards the sound, his eyes narrowed. "Something you aren't strong enough to deal with," he mutters.

But whatever it is—it isn't powerful enough to effect a Ghost King.

Not yet, anyway.

Hua Cheng reaches out, wrapping his fingers around the clouds of smoke, gripping the resentful energy between his hands.

And he tries, in that moment, to drag them backwards. To some extent, it does work.

The scene shifts—and this time, they aren't plummeting downwards, but floating up— almost like pages of a book, being flicked a few chapters back.

But not all the way back.

THUD!

Hua Cheng lands first, on a hard, rock surface—only for He Xuan to come plunging down on top of him as he tries to raise him onto his hands and knees, sending him sprawling again.

"You are shit at this..." He Xuan groans in pain, and Hua Cheng snarls in response.

"Get off. Now."

"Fine," the water demon grumbles, rolling off of him. "It's not like you haven't already broken every bone in my body."

Finally, Hua Cheng sits up, rubbing the back of his neck. "I didn't," he huffs. "And apparently, you owe me money," he reminds He Xuan.

“Lots of money.”

“In the future!” He Xuan whines, flicking his hair back over his shoulder as he glances around, “You can’t give me grief about it yet.”

Hua Cheng grumbles, resting his head between his knees for a moment. Is this what it’s supposed to be like, having younger siblings?

They do nothing but smart off, complain, borrow money, then whine when you remind them of it?

In that case, he’s grateful to have always been an only child.

“...I was right,” He Xuan finally comments, crossing his arms—sounding pleased with himself.

“Good for you.”

Hua Cheng mutters, not even bothering to ask what he means, until—“I knew the two were connected.”

“...” Finally, the Ghost King actually forces himself to look around, and when he does...

He sees a familiar chamber, one made of all black marble.

Vast. Daunting in its size.

On either end of the chamber stand two doors, one black, one red.

And all around them...

The familiar light of green ghost fires.

Hua Cheng has been here many times before.

But now...

He couldn’t tell you where they stand in the timeline. They still have to go further back—

Both fall silent, however, when something different happens.

This is a place of diverging paths. Where souls move from one point in the cycle to the next. Hua Cheng has seen it all.

He’s seen people move on. He’s seen them plunge down into hell—even when they didn't deserve it.

He couldn't tell you how many children he's helped pass through the red door over the years, guiding them into reincarnation. Before it was their time, but it was the only merciful path left to them.

And it was always horribly unfair.

He was the first one to forge a new path.

To roll a set of dice, opening a new door.

To look the hall of death in the face, and say no—it wasn't his time yet.

And now, he watches as a new path forms.

SCREEEEEACH!

Hua Cheng watches, his breath caught, as the black door opens.

For the first time, from the inside.

And of all of the things he was expecting—

He wasn't expecting a teenager to come stumbling out.

Clothes torn, covered with soot and blood, long, dark hair falling half loose from a ponytail, pouring over his shoulders.

He lands on his hands and knees, coughing up dark matter.

And this time, when he looks up—he looks directly at the two Ghosts, his eyes wide and petrified.

The irises are a light shade of gray, slightly tinged with purple. Bloodshot now.

And it takes Hua Cheng a moment to realize, but—

Clearly, the child can see them.

His first reaction is to flinch back from the sight of the two ghosts, scrambling backwards, his frame trembling like a leaf, but...

Eventually, his back hits the cavern wall, his eyes never leaving Hua Cheng's, and... There's understanding that there's no malice between them.

Once that becomes clear—after a moment, his voice broken and hoarse—

(But that doesn't seem to be the true reason for why it's so difficult for the youth to say the words)

—he croaks,

"...Help."

Hua Cheng and He Xuan remain frozen at first, unsure, and the boy's lips quiver.

"...Please," he mumbles, deeply ashamed of asking at all, "h-help!"

He Xuan meets Hua Cheng's gaze, unsure if there's anything they can do, given the circumstances, but...

The Ghost King rises to his feet, crossing the chamber in slow, non-threatening steps —bells chiming.

It takes the boy a moment to realize where the noise is coming from, eyes flickering around in a startled panic—and that's when he notices the silver bells attached to Hua Cheng's boots, rattling gently as he walks.

For some reason, the sight makes the young cultivator smile.

Hua Cheng kneels before the boy, reaching for the outer robe he was wearing before.

Silk fading from black to gray, with red designs trailing from the ends of the sleeves.

He throws it around the young man's shoulders, shielding his shredded clothes and bare skin from the air.

The boy clutches it around his shoulders, shivering, curled up into a ball against the wall.

"...Thank you," he whispers—clearly unaccustomed to such kindness —and Hua Cheng realizes something.

This kid—

He has a heartbeat.

Pounding in the air, the sound filling his ears.

“...You’re alive?” The ghost King mutters, his expression aghast, and—

The boy seems just as shocked as he is, clutching the robe even tighter around him, knuckles white.

“...I am?” He croaks.

From behind him, He Xuan seems just as baffled. “How is that possible?”

The young man flinches at the sound of another voice, glaring in He Xuan’s direction with uncertainty—and Hua Cheng shrugs.

“I don’t know. But you hear it, don’t you?”

The heartbeat. The breathing. Sounds of life that are far too organic to be faked.

Finally, Hua Cheng looks back to the teenager—who sits back against the wall, his knees pulled back against his chest.

Eyes wide and crazed, clearly pulling deep into himself as a response to trauma.

And, given where he just came from, the Ghost King can’t blame him.

“How old are you?”

“...Seventeen,” the boy mutters, wiping at his face with his forearm, clearly trying to clean himself—but his entire body is so filthy, it’s of no use.

“And your name?”

Now, he seems reluctant to answer, and Hua Cheng sighs.

“...You’re a cultivator, right?”

The boy nods, and Hua Cheng continues, “Which clan do you cultivate under?”

Those eyes stare up at him, wide and distrustful.

Hua Cheng knows that look.

It comes from a lifetime of foul treatment.

The look of a child that is acutely aware of the fact that they are unloved.

"...Lan," he mutters, hugging himself a little tighter before looking away.

"..." Hua Cheng sits back on his heels, folding his arms around his knees. "You're a pretty good liar."

The teenager makes the mistake of looking flattered, and the ghost smirks. "But not that good."

"..." He huffs, blowing his bangs out of his face. "...I did live with them for a long time. My—" He starts, then stops, his eyebrows furrowed. "My..."

He notices Hua Cheng watching him closely, and the tips of his ears flush sheepishly.

"...There are people who are important to me, in the Lan Clan." He finally mutters, looking pointedly in the opposite direction.

"I've never heard of them," Hua Cheng admits, leaving the teenager gawking at him.

"Do you live under a rock?!"

"As far as you're concerned?"

He Xuan shrugs, covering his mouth as he yawns. It's been a long few weeks, after all. "We might as well."

The teenager casts him a distrustful look, shrinking slightly behind Hua Cheng's figure—but the other Ghost is still rather patient.

"But you don't cultivate under them."

"...I cultivated under the Jiangs," the boy finally admits, hugging himself a little tighter. "...But most of them are gone now."

Hua Cheng's lips slowly turn into a frown.

"...I'm sorry to hear that," he murmurs. "I was friends with a former Jiang sect leader, once."

That seems to put the boy slightly more at ease with him, his eyes slightly less combative. "...Really?"

"Centuries ago," Hua Cheng shrugs, "but yes."

"..." The young man sniffs, looking back towards the black door—the one he just came from. "...What is that place?"

Without thinking, Hua Cheng blurts out—

"The shit hole."

The cultivator's eyes widen slightly, "...What?"

"..." Hua Cheng snorts, shaking his head. "Sorry—someone called it that once. The... closest thing to a mortal term for it would be Hell."

The boy doesn't seem surprised.

"How did you manage to open the door, anyway?" He Xuan questions, watching the human with a slightly suspicious gaze.

Slowly, the boy lifts seeming that's been clutched between his fingers all this time— but somehow, in all of the chaos, the Ghosts didn't notice until now:

A flute.

Made from sleek black wood, gleaming under the lights—and there's a wickedness to it that even seems to make E-Ming tremble in it's scabbard.

He Xuan scrambles backwards, clearly put off by the sight of it, after what they heard before.

Finally, the boy stands up.

His hair hangs loose around his shoulders now, slipping completely free of the red ribbon that once kept it up and away from his face.

He looks unkempt now—like a man facing his own execution.

Hua Cheng catches it before it reaches the ground, offering it to the young man.

"..." The teenager drops his chin, staring down at the hair ribbon—before eventually reaching back, using it to pull some of his hair back from his face, still leaving most of it loose and low. "...Thank you," he murmurs, looking Hua Cheng in the eye. "For this, and the robe."

He looks back toward the black door, and He Xuan finally seems to understand what the child means to do.

"...Are you actually going back?" He mutters, eyes widening with shock.

The cultivator doesn't look back, his flute clutched in one hand—the other balled into a fist.

"I'd rather die than be useless," He mutters, his spine straight.

The fear Hua Cheng saw before—it's still there. Along with a fragile sense of vulnerability, hanging heavily in the air around him.

But the teenager willingly puts that aside, for now.

"...And if I go back like this," his fingers tighten around the flute. "I won't be able to return the favor to the ones who brought me here."

He Xuan's eyes flash with understanding.

He knows a vengeful tone, when he hears it. Can recognize the wrath, the hate in his voice.

Hua Cheng says little else, watching as the young man raises the flute to his lips. This is a dangerous way, he can see it. A cursed way.

Something a ghost could manage, but a human?

The damage that would do to a soul...

"By the way, my name—it's Wei Wuxian." The teenager murmurs, lips brushing against the wood of the flute as he speaks. "And you two should leave if you don't want to get caught up in this."

Far from the trembling, terrified child that he was moments ago, but—

He still is.

Hua Cheng can see the way his shoulders tremble, even now, as his voice speaks with such confidence.

The boy is still terrified—he's just resolved.

He Xuan, still remembering what it felt like to be caught under that spell from before, grips Hua Cheng's arm tightly.

"Let's go."

The Ghost King hesitates, and He Xuan grips him tighter, his voice sharp. "This isn't our fight. We have another purpose, remember?"

How could he not?

The first notes of the flute pipe out, but before they can hear anymore—the scene cracks and fractures.

No realm in the land between life and death. No red and black doors. No music. No dark robed cultivator with heartbroken eyes.

When they land again, it's in darkness, the path before them stretching long and wide, forking ahead.

"...Control it," He Xuan presses him.

Hua Cheng doesn't seem very receptive to advice at the moment.

"I'm trying ," he snarls, clutching at his head. "Do you think anyone has ever done this before?! That it's an exact science?!"

Of course, it isn't.

From what Hua Cheng can surmise, the two paths are their own.

Meaning that they can just turn back, and...

"Papa?"

Both men freeze, but it's He Xuan who whips around, his eyes flickering until they find a figure standing in the dark walkway, just to the right of the fork.

A little boy.

Dressed in fine silk robes. Dark hair, and...

Green eyes, just like the leaves on the trees, twinkling up at him brightly.

The child grins impishly, spinning around on his heel.

“Bet you can’t catch me this time!”

He goes running off down the tunnel, disappearing into the dark, and Hua Cheng…

He tries to stop him.

“Don’t follow,” the Ghost King starts, reaching for He Xuan’s hand. “I don’t know if it’s real, but don’t—!”

He Xuan is already gone, moving like a man possessed, chasing the child down the tunnel.

Hua Cheng hasn’t seen anything like it—not from him.

Such an immediate abandonment of rationality.

“…” Hua Cheng rises to his feet, rubbing a hand down his face with a groan, making ready to follow the two of them, so he can drag He Xuan back, but…

“San Lang.”

He goes still at the sound of that voice.

Echoing faintly.

When Hua Cheng turns his head, he hears it again.

Echoing through the tunnel, down the left hand side.

“San Lang.”

And in that moment, really—

He’s no better than He Xuan.

Because he chases that voice.

He runs down the tunnel as fast as his legs will take him.

Runs so far, so fast—

He couldn’t tell you how far forward he’s gone, or if he’s too lost to make his way back again.

He runs so far, that eventually—the tunnel collapses beneath his feet, spitting him back out again.

THUD!

"...This is getting old," The Ghost King groans.

He pushes himself up, body aching from so many falls in such a short period of time —and when he looks around, he goes still.

Knowing that he must have gone... Far.

He eyes the lights on the ceiling, burning not from a flame, but some other source, covered with glass.

Like lanterns holding small lightning bolts inside of them.

But when Hua Cheng glances around, the room seems very much like a Taoist temple.

Places for offerings, incense burning. Just as he starts to look for a name plate or divine statue, the doors swing open.

Hua Cheng turns around, and his breath halts.

Standing in the doorway, his hair pulled up into a messy bun, wearing clothes that seem utterly foreign, is Hua Cheng's god.

Holding a small metal rectangle against his cheek, speaking as though it can somehow hear him.

"We'll both be there," Xie Lian confirms, setting his bag down. "He's just about finished for the day, anyway."

Hua Cheng can't discern what sort of device it must be—maybe a way to enter the communication array without spiritual power? But...

"Alright—see you then."

Xie Lian taps his thumb against the device—and Hua Cheng watches as it lights up before going dark again, baffled, but...

He's far more focused on the fact that, even now—so far into the future—

Xie Lian has the same silver chain hanging around his neck.

And even now, when he walks before the altar—the god doesn't kneel or prostrate.

He bows his head politely, clasping his hands in front of him, and Hua Cheng notices something else. Something that makes his heart ache.

Xie Lian looks happy.

Not like he's fronting happiness.

Or like he's experiencing a moment of passing contentment. No.

In his moment, peace seems to radiate from the god. A sort of fulfillment that emanates from a soul like sunlight.

This is not a man who is living with loneliness or pain.

It's a man who is truly, honestly happy.

And the sight of that—

It's the most beautiful thing in the entire world. At any point, future or past. Enough so that it leaves Hua Cheng spellbound, just watching him.

He understands now, how willing Zhao Beitong was to live for so long inside such pleasant dreams.

Hua Cheng feels like he could live inside this moment forever, and be just as happy as she was.

The doors slide open behind them, and Xie Lian whips around, his expression rising like the sun, beaming.

“San Lang!”

Just as Hua Cheng's gaze starts to follow, however...

The scene shatters, splitting apart.

Dreams never last forever, after all—even if they're your own future.

But that's alright.

Hua Cheng closes his eyes, allowing himself to be dragged back, hair whipping around him in the darkness.

He'll get back there, eventually.

It's only a matter of time.

A long time—but still.

THUD!

When he opens his eyes again—it's to the familiar sight of the Kiln ceiling overhead, and the sound of He Xuan coughing and sputtering beside him.

"...Did it work?" Zhao Beitong calls out, cautious. "What did you see?" Hua Cheng sits up, glancing over at his companion, and...

He Xuan doesn't seem inclined to speak. Whatever it was that he saw...it seems to have left the ghost utterly...

Haunted.

For now, Hua Cheng settles for telling her the truth—and what she wants to hear.

"We get him."

Her eyes widen sharply, and Hua Cheng offers her a tired, haphazard smile. "It takes some time—but we get him."

"...How?" The former Queen of Wuyong whispers, hands clutched tightly against her chest.

Carefully, Hua Cheng tells her. As much of it as he can, anyway.

There's still so much of it that he doesn't understand.

But in the end—He Xuan's original idea was sound.

They have a distinct advantage now. And, they know that Hua Cheng and He Xuan's paths leave them on a collision path with what needs to transpire.

He Xuan knows himself. Knows that he'll seek revenge, which will place him close to Jun Wu.

He doesn't seem as comfortable with that now. Not like he was before.

Hua Cheng will pursue his god—and when Xie Lian comes to the Kiln, Bai Wuxiang will follow him.

In doing so, he'll seal his own fate, not knowing that, for once, he's about to be taken by surprise.

"..." Zhao Beitong sinks down to her knees between the two young men, her palms resting against the kiln floor. "...I never allowed myself to believe it was possible," she admits.

Learned helplessness is a powerful thing, after all.

Over time, part of her thought that this game they were locked in was endless. That true rest—that would never come.

But now, looking back and forth between the ghosts who sit before her... She smiles.

The gates of the Kiln remain open—and with that, comes a signal—sent far and wide throughout the ghost realm.

That a new Ghost King has been born.

The last Calamity, incidentally, that she will ever forge by her own hand.

Finally, she turns to look at Hua Cheng, holding her hand out.

"...I can trust you two to handle the rest until the time comes, can't I?"

"..." Hua Cheng smiles tiredly, reaching out to grip her hand in return. "You know that you can."

And until then, she can rest.

He Xuan watches as Guoshi Tonglu's form fades and flickers.

Eventually, she disappears all together, her form fading unti...

Only the butterflies remain.

They hover in the air for a moment, floating sluggishly—then disappear into the night.

Just as their master did before them.

"...Do you think it'll take too long?" He finally mutters.

Hua Cheng doesn't answer at first—nor does he ask for clarification.

He Xuan could mean anything, after all. And yet, in either case, Hua Cheng's answer remains the same:

"It might feel long," Crimson Rain murmurs, rising to his feet. "But it's only a matter of time."

He offers the new Ghost King his hand, and, eventually...

Black Water reaches up to take it, allowing the older man to help him stand up.

"...You're not going to charge me interest, are you?"

Hua Cheng barks out a laugh, walking towards the gates.

"I absolutely am."

"Not even a small exception for a co-conspirator?"

"I'm not running a charity."

He feels the memories start to fade away, as he passes through the gates of the Kiln.

Hua Cheng forgets Xie Lian falling into the Kiln. Forgets the young cultivator and his flute.

He forgets the young boy that He Xuan went chasing after—and he forgets the almost foreign, yet so familiar version of his god that he saw towards the end.

How happy he was, still wearing Hua Cheng's ring, and...

Still calling out to him.

But some things do remain.

He remembers the way Xie Lian looked in the market that day, smiling as he watched He Sheng repairing his loom.

Remembers his own whispered apologies, and his promise.

'This world is his future.'

Hua Cheng forgot that, for a time.

He won't make that mistake again.

No matter how long it takes. Because he knows now, even if he can't exactly remember how or why—

The path he walks now is the one that will bring him home.

He just has to keep moving forward.

The Ghost Kings walk separate paths, from the gates of Mount Tonglu.

One returns to his gambler's throne, ruling his city of ghosts—and continues his search.

The other slinks off into the dark, cold waters that he once called his grave. To find and hide his own remains.

Once there, he lurks, and he plans. Watches the prosperity of his enemies.

He doesn't make the name for himself that his elder calamities did, no. He Xuan allows his name to fade into mystery, only known for occasionally terrorizing and sinking the ships that the Water Master has gone out of his way to bless.

And, eventually, he hatches his scheme.

A long game—but one he knows that he can win.

But it's the memories that He Xuan lost that will be his undoing.

The consequences that he won't understand, not until a horrible choice is left before him, and he's forced to remember what he forgot by choice:

That a heart never really dies.

It can break down, fade, and waste away—but like a ghost, something will remain inside of you.

Waiting for the moment that a spark can resurrect it. And, the last words his first love ever gave him. 'You're a good man, He Xuan.'

He Xuan will spend the following centuries of his life trying to tell himself that he isn't. That he was a silly, naive child before. But he isn't a good man now, and he never was.

Oh, the things Black Water would do, the crimes he would commit, when he believed that he didn't have a heart.

And the pain he would feel. The deep, aching remorse that would consume him, when love would find him again.

No matter how hard he would try to resent it—to deny it. It would still find him.

Even as he tried to seal himself off and hide—it would seep through the cracks of his armor like the wind itself.

And until the last possible moment, he would fight it.

But, among everything else that he's forgotten—one memory isn't quite so damning. Because He Xuan's story, while long and often painful—does not end in tragedy.

It's just a long, winding path to get there.

But, like most things in this world—

It's only a matter of time.

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

Included with permission from the artists, do not repost or re-use for any reason.

[image]

CREDIT: Envy, support the piece HERE

And here is some incredible art of Jun Wu and Zhao Beitong!

@currant_bliss 2021
@junkyartist

CREDIT: KAT, support the piece HERE

Chapter End Notes

> Sorry for the break in posting—I got my wisdom teeth out last week, so I took some time away from the computer!
>
> Thank you so much to Kat and Envy for their beautiful artwork, and allowing me to share it! I am so grateful!
>
> xoxo, Evie

The Guoshi of Yong'an

Chapter Summary

> The boy smiles—just a little. "...Mister?"
>
> "Hmm?"
>
> "What's your name?"
>
> After a moment, he replies— "Fangxin."

Chapter Notes

> You can find me on twitter and keep up with current updates of the story HERE

YEAR FOUR HUNDRED AND EIGHTY FIVE

Xie Lian has never been prone to remembering his dreams.

Not the good ones, anyway—his nightmares he remembers quite well.

Which is a shame, because this is something he thinks he would like to remember: Being held in someone's arms.

He turns his face into someone's chest, his eyes half-lidded.

The smell is familiar.

Fresh, like the forest. Clean, but with a wildness to it.

The God's lips turn up at the corners as he reaches up, looping his arms around his companion's neck, pulling himself closer.

"Hong-er," he mumbles, feeling someone's face press against his hair, shivering in response.

"Dianxia."

His voice sounds different now. Deeper, more self assured. Xie Lian supposes this is what it would have been like, if he'd had the chance to...

His stomach twists with grief.

It's been four centuries since he lost him. And Xie Lian—he's never forgotten. Never tried to. But...

There are moments like this, when he remembers how strong that the ache can be. "...I should probably wake up now," he mumbles, a little mournful.

"Probably," the dream agrees. "But if you want to sleep a little longer, why shouldn't you? You have time."

Too much time.

Xie Lian presses his palms against Hong-er's chest, rising up until he's straddling his waist, "If you had it your way, I'd never lift a finger."

There's the soft rumble of a chuckle under his hands. "Is that such a bad thing?"

The prince finally opens his eyes—something he can only do in his dreams.

And just like every other time, he wishes he could remember.

Because if this is what he would have looked like...

Xie Lian's hands slide up from his chest, cupping the younger man's cheeks—and he smiles so softly, thumbs stroking over his jaw.

His Hong-er was always so handsome.

But then he notices the dark leather covering the right side of his face, and the prince frowns.

"Hong-er," he murmurs, rubbing the skin underneath the eyepatch, "What happened to your eye?"

The younger man's face briefly twists into a scowl, then turns sheepish, glancing away like he's about to be scolded.

"...I lost it," he mumbles.

"How on earth did you do that?"

"Doing something stupid," the dark haired man mutters, shaking his head. "It doesn't matter."

"...Of course it does," Xie Lian's frown only manages to deepen. "There's only one Hong-er out there, and he's very important to me. Take better care of him, won't you?"

The young man underneath him arches one slim, elegant eyebrow—and in an instant, his weight shifts as he sits up. Xie Lian almost goes tumbling backwards with an undignified yelp, caught off guard—but he's caught by an arm wrapping around the small of his back.

"I—um—!" Xie Lian starts, then stops.

He's always been more than a little ashamed of his thoughts sometimes turning in his direction. It feels disrespectful to think of the dead in such a way. After all, there's no reason to think Hong-er would have even wanted—

But when long, cool fingers dip into the front of his robes, he lets out a violent shiver, his cheeks growing hot. "That's—!"

"—a little hypocritical, don't you think?"

Xie Lian opens his eyes, slightly half lidded, only to find...

Hong-er smirking up at him, holding up a ring.

Dangling from a silver chain around Xie Lian's neck, now delicately looped around Hong-er's pinky, allowing him to hold it up for the god's inspection.

"You're the one always taking such good care of me," Hong-er murmurs. Xie Lian's first reaction is to feel mortified.

Even in his dreams, he's the one thinking about such unnecessarily inappropriate things, when all Hong-er is trying to do is pay him a compliment.

But then...his throat is thick with emotion, too.

"But who is taking care of you, dianxia?"

"...I'm trying," Xie Lian mumbles. "I'm doing my best, really," he glances up at Hong-er through his lashes, arms still wrapped around the younger man's neck. "I'm just not as good at it as you."

"And you get lonely," the dark haired young man murmurs, his eyebrows knitting with sadness.

“…Yes,” Xie Lian admits. “But…there are moments that aren’t so bad,” he mutters, trying to justify it. “I’ve learned how to do my own hair, too—not as nice as you or Mu Qing, but not so bad either. And my cooking…”

He cringes.

“Well, I make enough to eat out most days, so I—mmmph!”

The mouth on his is slightly cold, but soft, and always so loving.

And in these quiet, gentle moments that Xie Lian is always doomed to forget, he’s happy.

Sighing, sinking deeper into the kiss as Hong-er’s fingers thread through his hair, his arms tightening around his neck.

“I miss you,” the younger man breathes against his lips, arms clutching Xie Lian closer. “I miss you so much.”

The God’s chest aches, because he knows.

It’s not forever. He tries to tell himself that, but…

Immortality is a long, lonely path to walk.

“…I love you,” Xie Lian mumbles in return, his fingers digging into the back of Hong-er’s robes.

Hearing that always makes the young man tremble in his arms, kissing him more frantically—until the god feels his thoughts start to become slow and heated, like warm caramel.

“I love you,” he whispers again, his breaths becoming ragged, wishing —

Wishing he could just stay here a little longer. Maybe until the end of the world, if that was possible.

“I’ll find you,” Hong-er rasps, hands sliding down the prince’s back, gripping his waist firmly.

“I promise, I’ll find you.”

Xie Lian sinks back into the sheets with him, his head a little fuzzy—but filled with confusion.

Find him?

What does he—?

THUD!

Noise cracks through the dream, and now—Xie Lian isn't gasping with want.

He's groaning with annoyance.

"...Dianxia?"

That's the last thing Xie Lian sees, hears, or feels before the world goes black again. And he wakes up...

Sleeping in a ditch.

The god sits up, rubbing his forehead, all memories of the dream rapidly fading, but... He knows it was a good one, and that he's annoyed to be awake.

But that's not the pressing matter at the moment.

That would be the thing that woke him up.

The sound of shouting in the distance. Screaming and arguing—the clash of blades. And somewhere, not so far from him, Xie Lian hears someone scream—

"PROTECT THE CROWN PRINCE!"

'Yes,' Xie Lian agrees silently, glaring blankly at the darkness ahead, his arms still spread out on either side of him. 'Protect the crown prince. He's been woken up too early, has a crick in his neck, and would like some mantou. Chop chop!'

Obviously, they aren't talking about him.

After laying on the ground and feeling sorry for himself for approximately ten seconds, like he does every other morning, the god sighs, fumbling for the chain around his neck, bringing the ring hanging from the end of it to his lips.

"Morning, Hong-er," he mumbles.

(He has said this one hundred and seventy seven thousand, two hundred and thirteen times.)

“Today is going to be a good day.”

You have to put positive energy out into the universe in order to get it back. His mother always used to say that.

His luck might not be fantastic, but maybe a good attitude can manifest a lack of complete and utter disaster.

Xie Lian tells himself that, listening to the utter chaos of the battle that is currently going on up on the main road.

But first, he goes about combing his hair.

If there’s still a ruckus going on by the time he’s done, he’ll deal with it then.

Normally he would be a little more immediate when it comes to offering his aid, but, well…

Whatever that dream was, Xie Lian was enjoying it, and it’s early, and his head hurts.

Oh, and he’s been out of mantou for three days now.

That might have something to do with the stabbing headache.

Once his hair is neatly pulled back into a low ponytail, he listens closely, expecting the imperial guards to have handled it by now, but…

“FORM UP, MEN!”

Annnnd they are still struggling.

Xie Lian sighs, scratching one of his ears—which have become unbelievably sensitive, over time—and when he listens closely, he can get a pretty good idea of what’s going on.

Two groups clashing. Expensive steel against cheap pig iron.

The rebels seem to outnumber the guards from the sound of it—and they’ve outflanked them.

Cheap. Sloppy.

Xie Lian managed his own security as the crown prince, hand-selected every single guard who worked under him.

Feng Xin handled their training, but Xie Lian tested each one.

The idea was that, while the Crown Prince certainly could handle any ruffian he came across, the purpose of the palace guards was to ensure that he never needed to expend his energy or sully his blade with such trivial matters.

Now, however—nothing is too trivial to avoid warranting his attention, and…

He can hear the terrified cries of the prince they're protecting, and Xie Lian realizes— he's just a child.

"…" The god lets out a heavy sigh, rising to his feet. "Ruoye."

The spiritual tool wiggles to attention, eager to be of use, and Xie Lian sighs, waving at the bandage with a gentle sort of annoyance.

"No fighting for you."

The tool sags, almost sulkily.

It took time for the two of them to get used to one another.

The problem was almost entirely on Xie Lian's part.

In those early years, it…took time for the prince to completely come back to himself. It was good that he was alone, because he was prone to…

Moments of madness.

He even lashed out at Ruoye when the tool tried to help him.

There was one afternoon, when he tripped on the way down to the river, and Ruoye caught him by the wrist, like always, but that one time…

The other end brushed against his throat.

And at that moment, Xie Lian remembered exactly what the tool was. How it was made.

Those were the moments when he would lash out.

Grabbing the bandage between his hands, like he wanted to rip it apart or throttle it, sobbing—

'You killed my parents.'

'Why are you helping me?!'

'Oh god, you killed my parents!'

For a time, Ruoye was frightened of him.

It would tremble with nerves, every time it got close.

But it never stopped trying to catch Xie Lian when he was falling.

And slowly, over the centuries—they built up trust, even if it took a long time. "Just cover me up, okay?" Xie Lian murmurs.

He pulls his hood up, covering his eyes and the top of his head, while Ruoye wraps itself snuggly around the lower half of his face, still covering the cursed shackle around his throat.

Xie Lian can't show his face right now, not since the incident with the Circus in Banyue.

He's fairly sure there's still more than a few arrest warrants out for that, even though Xie Lian is quite sure that he never broke any laws...

Well.

There's something to be said for being in the wrong place at the wrong time.

He makes his way up the hill, contemplating.

Given the fact that he looks like a beggar right now—using Fangxin would make him stand out, so...

He reaches out, feeling for a nice, sturdy tree limb—and, upon finding one, twists it free with a flick of his wrist.

Not much worse than their weapons, honestly.

At the top of the hill, a young boy cowers beneath his guards, his arms thrown up and over his head, breathing hard. "W-Why are they trying to get me?!" He whimpers, scrambling backwards until his back slams against the side of his carriage.

“Probably to get leverage over your parents,” one of the guards in front of him grunts. “Listen, just stay behind me, and it’ll be—!”

He cuts off with a pained cry, blood spurting from his chest, splattering across the prince’s face when a blade springs through.

A boy of just eleven years old, one who has never seen such horror—

The child can’t do anything but scream, cringing away, waiting for his inevitable demise, but—

But no blade ever reaches him.

As a matter of fact, even though most of his guards are dead…

The fighting seems to intensify.

Actually—

The rebels seem to be…losing, somehow?

“Where did he COME FROM?!”

“Look pal, if you chill out, we’ll give you a cut of the—!”

“OH GOD, MY LEG!”

Trembling, the prince slowly peeks his head out from behind one of his guard’s arms.

That’s the first time that he sees him.

White robes swirling around, his face entirely covered, dark hair peeking out from underneath his hood. And the way he moves—

It’s like nothing else the young prince has ever seen. Like water, or something inhumanly graceful.

With nothing more than a tree branch, every single bandit is strategically disarmed and knocked out, left groaning and unconscious on the road.

All thirty of them, by just—

By just one man, who doesn’t even wield a proper weapon. The last one drops—and with him, the branch.

“Are you alright, little one?”

The prince looks up, his face pale, and…

The figure kneeling before him isn’t so scary.

Maybe a little dirty and bedraggled, but not frightening at all.

“Y…Yes, I am!” The child whispers.

“You aren’t hurt?”

“N-No…”

The prince shakes his head, his voice just a little unsteady, but then—

“Mister!” He sits up quickly, eyeing the stranger’s arms. “You’re hurt!”

Xie Lian blinks, glancing down at his limbs stupidly, constantly forgetting that he can’t actually SEE them, but when he checks…

And when he rubs his palms over his forearms, he realizes. Oh dear, he really did get sliced up, didn’t he?

It’s probably to be expected, given that he couldn’t actually guard properly without a proper sword, and he was groggy from waking up, but…

That’s still embarrassing. Really, what would his Guoshi think, if they could see him now…

“Oh, it’s fine,” he smiles, trying to wave it off—

(He’s bleeding so much that the action actually makes more blood splatter on the ground, leaving the prince and his guards horrified.)

For some reason, they’re downright insistent on taking him back to the palace with them, all in the name of him receiving treatment in exchange for saving the prince’s life.

Over and over, Xie Lian tries to insist that it isn’t necessary, but… They don’t take no for an answer.

Which is fine, he supposes. Even if it feels odd, accepting Yong’an’s charity. Or gratitude, he supposes. After all—he did save the heir to the throne’s life. A few days laying in an infirmary isn’t so bad. Better than a ditch, at least. And it gives him more time to sleep.

Even if he doesn't remember his dreams when he wakes up in the morning—he's always happy, curled up on his side underneath soft sheets for once, listening to the birds singing through the window.

And even with his back turned, he can always hear it. The taps of little feet.

"..." A small smile tugs at Xie Lian's lips, even if he doesn't turn over just yet. "It's rude, you know."

There's a pause near the doorway, breath halting, a heart skipping a beat. His smile widens.

"Spying isn't very nice," he muses.

"I'm not spying!" A voice protests.

That of a little boy.

Probably just eleven years old.

Xie Lian curls up in the hospital bed, hugging his knees closer against his chest, fiddling with the chain around his neck.

"Is that a little bird then, flapping around in the rafters?" "Maybe," the boy replies, pouting.

"Birds don't talk," Xie Lian chides, but with no real scolding in his voice. "Were you worried?"

"...You got hurt trying to protect me," the little boy mumbles, standing in the doorway of the infirmary. "I want to make sure you get better."

The god's expression softens.

He pushes himself to sit up, patting the edge of his bed. "Well, why don't you come on over here and see for yourself, then?"

The boy seems a little hesitant at first—but he slowly creeps forward, cautiously climbing up onto the cot.

Xie Lian offers one bandaged arm.

The boy stares down at it, wary, and the god bumps him gently with his shoulder. "Why don't you give it a little smack? It doesn't hurt at all."

"...You want me to hit you?" The prince frowns, shaking his head. "I can't!"

"Sure you can," Xie Lian assures him. "I'm all better."

"..." He seems hesitant, so Xie Lian goes first, giving his forearm a hard slap.

THWAP!

The sound nearly makes the boy jump out of his skin, but...Xie Lian doesn't even flinch.

"See?" The god wiggles his fingers. "I'm just fine."

The boy smiles—just a little. "...Mister?"

"Hmm?"

"What's your name?"

After a moment, he replies— "Fangxin."

An odd one, but he can't use Hua Xie right now. Not after the goat thing—even if it was a decade ago.

"What about you?"

The boy hums. "...You don't already know?"

Fangxin shakes his head with a sigh, "I'm a traveler," he explains. "I've been to so many places, I don't always know the names of every royal in the area."

Well, that makes sense.

"Lang Qiangqiu," the boy mumbles, and finally—he gives the stranger a gentle smack on the arm.

It's hard to tell, but it looks like Fangxin might be smiling underneath the bandages.

"See?" He holds his arm up again, before reaching up to ruffle the boy's hair. "You can't hurt me, Lang Qiangqiu."

The boy seems a little surprised. "...Most people don't ever call me that."

Xie Lian figured as much.

No one ever called him by his actual name, when he was a boy.

It was always dianxia, your highness, his excellency, and so on.

But his mother always called him ‘son,’ and— Gege.

Someone used to call him that, once.

But never his actual name.

“...Apologies, taizi dianxia,” the god murmurs, ruffling the young prince’s hair once more. “I’m not used to being around nobility anymore.”

“...” Lang Qiangqiu offers him a lopsided grin, unaware of the fact that Fangxin can’t see it. “That’s okay! I kinda like it!”

From then on, the prince makes a point of coming to the infirmary every chance he gets. Between breaks in his lessons, after meals. When he wakes up in the morning, and just before he goes to bed at night.

Even the King and Queen take notice.

“...He’s besotted, isn’t he?”

His mother comments, leaning against the king as she takes in the sight.

The King of Yong’an nods, watching as the young prince eagerly trails behind the hospital patient—whom they now know is a young, gifted cultivator, Fangxin.

“I don’t think I’ve ever seen him listen to someone so easily. Not without having to be strong armed into it.” The King sighs, rubbing the side of his neck.

Their son is talented in martial arts. Maybe naive, yes—but still, he’s gifted. If he would only apply himself, he...

Out in the courtyard, the prince stops in the middle of chattering on and on about his lessons, looking up at Fangxin with a curious eye. “Fangxin-Laoshi, can I ask you a question?”

“I’m not a teacher,” the god reminds him with a sigh, “but sure.”

“Why do you hide your face?”

“...” Underneath the bandages, Xie Lian smiles. “Oh, I’m not like you, dianxia.” He murmurs.

Playing pretend. Impersonating someone.

“What do you mean?” Lang Qiangqiu questions, tilting his head. “I’m not beautiful.”

‘Liar,’ Xie Lian thinks to himself. ‘He was such a liar.’

The prince doesn’t seem to believe him, not for a single second. “No way!” He shakes his head, reaching over to pluck at the longer strands down the cultivator’s back. “You’ve got pretty hair! So, your face can’t be that bad!”

Xie Lian fights the urge to flinch.

He isn’t used to being touched anymore.

Beaten, stabbed, throttled—he’s accustomed to all of those feelings. But casual touching—no, he’s forgotten all about that.

And after the torture he endured under Bai Wuxiang—

He still fears gentle touches.

Thinks they’re tricks.

“...Hair really doesn’t have anything to do with it,” Xie Lian mumbles.

“Your voice is nice too,” Lang Qiangqiu points out, spinning around on his heels, walking backwards with his hands clasped behind his back, watching the cultivator cheerfully. “And I can kinda see your nose.”

He leans his head back, looking closely. “It’s a nice one!”

Unfortunately, Xie Lian is more than aware of the fact that he’s beautiful.

And oh, how he came to loathe the fact that anyone ever called him that.

“...Maybe I’m ugly on the inside,” he whispers.

The prince pauses.

The way Fangxin says that—

It isn't teasing.

It sounds like he believes it—with his whole heart.

"...Why would that make you hide your face?"

"Does a horrible person deserve to be praised for his good looks?"

"Mmmm..." The child frowns. "You're not horrible! You saved me."

"I heard them calling you the prince," Xie Lian points out. "Maybe I just wanted a nice stay in the palace, hmm?"

"..." The boy pauses, thinking that over, and the cultivator sighs.

"You need to stop being so naive, dianxia. It'll be the end of you."

"I'm not naive, I just..."

Lang Qiangqiu shrugs, offering him a happy smile. "I just trust you, that's all!" He turns around, rummaging with something. "Fangxin!"

The cultivator turns his head, raising an eyebrow. "Bend down here for a minute? I can't reach!" Xie Lian is somewhat exasperated.

But he still complies.

And when he does, Lang Qiangqiu tucks something behind his ear, leaning back with a smile.

"There!" He beams. "Even with the bandages, you look good now." Xie Lian reaches up, slightly confused—then he stops.

It's a flower, tucked into his hair.

Oh.

The prince can't see it, but for the first time in centuries, Xie Lian's eyes sting.

Someone else did that once. When he had nothing. When he was so horribly, horribly alone.

Xie Lian didn't appreciate it then. Didn't thank him for it.

And then Wu Ming was gone.

God, Xie Lian forgot how much he missed him, too.

He kept that white flower that was left behind until it wilted, crumbling into dust.

He doesn't have anything left to remember the ghost by. The last creature that was so kind to him.

The first and only kiss he ever chose.

"...Thank you," he mumbles, squeezing the flower petal between his fingertips. The prince pauses, surprised by the emotion in Fangxin's voice.

"For the flower," the cultivator explains. "It's beautiful."

Silently, he wishes that he could have just mustered those words before.

But he's always been such a slow learner, hasn't he?

In the days that follow, he finishes healing the rest of the way—even though he insisted, he really was ready to leave by the second day—and when he makes ready to leave, he's offered a proposition.

By a King, no less.

The King of Yong'an, offering Xie Lian the opportunity to take on the Crown Prince as his student.

To become their state preceptor in one fell swoop.

After all, it has missed no one's notice, how exceptionally knowledgeable he is. And his sword skills are beyond comparison.

Who better, to teach a crown prince? To mold the future of a nation?

To Xie Lian, the whole thing feels like some sort of cruel joke.

And yet.

When he remembers the cruelty he once wanted to unleash upon Yong'an, and it's people...

It feels like a fair penance to pay.

After all, that was why he lost Wu Ming.

And that—

That's why he took on these shackles again, isn't it? To pay for that?

So, it seems fair.

He agrees to take the crown prince as his student, and in doing so, takes on a new name.

Fangxin Guoshi, the Imperial Preceptor.

Known across the land for his skills, his knowledge—always trailing through the palace of Yong'an, a prince flocking to his side with adoration.

Dressed in fine, black and gold silks—and always wearing a golden mask over the top half of his face, hiding his eyes.

He's a patient teacher. Always fair, when handing out discipline.

Xie Lian has never had a student, until now—but to his surprise, he actually takes to the challenge rather well.

His only regret is his inability to get close to the boy. It's clearly what Lang Qiangqiu wants.

In a way, Xie Lian's heart goes out to the boy—because he can understand.

His childhood was so lonely.

No equals. Not really.

The closest thing he had to a friend was a boy who was trained to die for him. And when Xie Lian tried to make another? Well.

He didn't do a good job.

And yet, Xie Lian keeps him at a careful distance.

With one glaring exception.

There is one great equalizer among rich and poor—particularly among women.

Childbirth.

The Queen of Yong'an was older, to be carrying a child—everyone knew that.

There was fear on the king's part, that she might not be able to carry the child to term. Even the doctors showed some concern.

But no one expected to lose them both.

He sat by the Queen's deathbed, holding the king's hand as he wept, explaining there was nothing to be done.

That with how much blood had been lost, there was no way to make her healthy again.

Lang Qiangqiu was just fourteen, when he lost her.

And oh, how the boy wept.

Alone, because his father was too lost in his own grief to come to his aid. And Xie Lian, he...

He knows all too well what it feels like to mourn alone.

It was the only time that Fangxin Guoshi ever opened his arms to the teenager like that, and his student came running to him.

Clinging to him as he sobbed, crying out for the one thing that he couldn't have: His mother.

"Does it ever hurt less?" He whispers.

It's late in the afternoon, in the palace gardens. They're sitting on a marble bench. The Guoshi's posture is straight and proper, but the prince has been weeping for so long, his head rests against his teacher's leg.

"...No, it doesn't."

Xie Lian tilts his head, listening to the boy sniffle, his fingers stroking through Lang Qiangqiu's hair. So softly.

His Guoshi has always been so cold with him, so far away—

The prince never realized how soft his hands could be. How much comfort they could bring.

“But you know, there was something that my own mother used to tell me.” His Guoshi murmurs, catching Lang Qiangqiu’s attention.

It’s rare that Fangxin ever talks about himself, after all.

“...What?” He croaks.

“I used to love building golden palaces, remember that game?”

The prince nods shallowly. It’s been around forever, after all.

“Well,” Xie Lian smiles faintly. “I used to work so hard, building them—and I’d throw the worst tantrums when they fell down.”

Lang Qiangqiu snorts. “It’s hard to imagine you doing that, Guoshi.”

The god hangs his head for a moment, not speaking—and when he does, he sounds almost remorseful. “I was a rather spoiled child, actually. It took me a long time to learn my lesson.”

And it was always at the expense of so many others. “But...” Xie Lian sighs.

“She taught me—that was always the point. Part of building them is that they fall down.”

Lang Qiangqiu doesn’t speak at first, turning his cheek into the Guoshi’s leg. “How does that help me?”

Gentle fingers stroke through his hair.

“Part of loving people is losing them.”

Xie Lian explains, tilting his chin back.

He knows that the sun hasn’t come down yet, and now—he misses the sight of it, slipping underneath the horizon.

“But that doesn’t mean that it isn’t worth it. And you can keep them with you as you move forward.”

“...How do you do that?”

Lang Qiangqiu glances up—just in time to see the corners of his Guoshi’s lips curve into a smile.

Soft, yet bittersweet.

"My mother—she used to name every single dish that she cooked. Even if it was something as simple as plain rice."

"Like the royal chefs do?"

The Guoshi hums, pleased to hear that the prince isn't weeping anymore, just quietly sniffling.

"She said that it could make any meal special. Worthy of a palace—even though she was horrible at cooking, to be honest with you."

Still, Xie Lian regrets every plate he turned away.

"Now, I name every meal I make too," he explains. "And I think of her." It's even more reminiscent, given that he's just as bad of a cook as she was. "...What happened to her?"

Lang Qiangqiu watches as the smile on Fangxin's face freezes.

It takes him a long time to answer.

"...I let her down," Is the only explanation that the Guoshi gives.

His student remains quiet for some time after that, but eventually—he asks another question.

"Fangxin Guoshi?"

"Hmm?"

"Why do you wear that ring around your neck, instead of your finger?"

Xie Lian stiffens.

Of course, the child has seen the ring before. They spar every single day, and have for the last three years.

"...It's too precious," Xie Lian mutters. "I wouldn't want to damage it."

"You wear other jewelry, though." The prince frowns. "You never seem worried about it."

"Yes," Finery given to him as the royal preceptor, expected to maintain a certain look, "but this came from someone important to me."

Lang Qiangqiu doesn't try to touch it. He knows—Fangxin Guoshi is very fussy about that. But he does look closely.

"Like…family?"

Xie Lian takes a moment.

He's used the ring to pass himself off as married many, many times—ever since his days with Jiang Kuo.

But now, he tries to be just a little more honest.

"…Someone I was in love with," he mutters. "But he isn't here anymore."

For some reason—hearing that doesn't seem to bring Lang Qiangqiu much comfort at all. Not like when Xie Lian spoke of his mother.

"What happened to him?"

Xie Lian reaches for the ring around his neck, slowly turning it over between his fingers, stroking it lovingly.

Eventually, he gives the same answer that he did before, when the prince asked him about his mother:

"…I really let him down," Xie Lian admits, his voice a little hoarse.

So many times. In so many ways that the prince has lost count of them all.

Lang Qiangqiu doesn't ask him much more, clinging to his leg even more tightly, and Xie Lian is patient with him. Allows the boy to cry his heart out, carrying the prince on his back when he falls asleep, tucking him into his bed.

That night, Xie Lian sits in the garden.

Until sunrise, he keeps his head tilted back, staring at the stars that he can no longer see.

And yet, he still feels the warmth of the moonlight against his cheeks. The breeze through his hair. Smells the flowers, scent drifting all around him.

Xie Lian doesn't understand it.

When he took on these shackles, over four centuries ago—he thought that he was simply waiting to fade away.

Wu Ming was his last believer. Without him, in time, Xie Lian would surely fade to nothing. And then—he might move on. Might see Hong-er again. But…

His soul carries on.

And on, and on.

Xie Lian fiddles with the ring around his neck, laying back against the soft grasses.

Who still believes in him now? There can't possibly be anyone praying to him anymore. Those who haven't forgotten him only curse his name.

"…Why am I here?" He whispers.

There was a time when Xie Lian's life had such purpose. Such unending faith in himself. In the righteousness of the path that he walked.

But what has all this time been, if not a wandering path of penance? And when will it end?

His mask lays on the ground next to him, a rare moment of nakedness outside of the confines of his chambers.

Eyes wide open, the cursed shackle pattern burning in the dark as he stares up at the stars.

He used to do this when he was a child, on the palace grounds in Xianle.

Lay back on the grass and count the stars, always falling asleep before he got that high.

Back then, Feng Xin and Mu Qing would be laying down on either side of him.

Feng Xin was always quiet and stiff, jumping each time he accidentally bumped elbows with his prince.

And Mu Qing…It was the only time he never seemed inclined to grumble, reaching up and gripping the grass on either side of him, dark hair splayed out as he looked up at the stars.

When Xie Lian asked what he was doing, he explained it was something that his father used to say.

Mu Qing spoke about him very little. Xie Lian only knew that he used to be a woodworker in Mu Qing's village near Mount Taicang.

'Me and my sister would lay out on the grass with him when he came back from work sometimes,' his friend murmured, eyes lit with starlight.

'Just like this.'

Xie Lian never saw the way that Feng Xin would prop himself up on his elbow, turning on his side to watch Mu Qing talk, his expression unreadable.

Mu Qing never looked away from the sky, so he didn't know it either.

'And he used to tell us, if we didn't hang onto the grass tight—we'd float away.'

It was the sort of thing that Xie Lian's friend normally would have sneered about with his typical cynicism, but—he didn't.

He sounded…

Longing, in a way Xie Lian didn't understand back then.

He remembers the way he leaned back against the grass, hands folded over his stomach, wiggling his toes to keep them warm as he asked—

'Where is your father, Mu Qing? I don't think I've ever met him.'

Xie Lian's friend was quiet for such a long time after that.

And when he finally did answer, his voice was so small.

Not arrogant or condescending. No hostility at all.

'…He let go of the grass, your highness.'

Just so achingly filled with sadness.

A pain Xie Lian would come to understand so well, later on.

Back then, the prince didn't say a word. Just reached out with one hand in the dark, fumbling until he found Mu Qing's.

Instead of swatting him away or mumbling something about it being inappropriate— Xie Lian's friend gripped his fingers tightly.

With his other, the prince reached down, twisting blades of grass between his fingertips.

'I won't let go, then,' he whispered—not complaining when Mu Qing gripped his fingers even tighter. 'I promise.'

He fell asleep like that back then. Holding Mu Qing's hand.

Dozed, when Feng Xin carefully lifted the prince up into his arms, carrying him back towards the palace.

Xie Lian never said anything about being awake, content to be held—and he listened, as Feng Xin turned his face towards Mu Qing, his voice gruff, but...sympathetic.

'You never said anything.'

Mu Qing always stayed a couple of steps away from him, hands tightly clasped behind his back as he walked, head hung low.

" You never asked.'

And there were so many things that Xie Lian should have asked him back then. He knows that now.

There was a time when he desperately wanted to take that back. To change it. To throw himself down in Mu Qing and Feng Xin's temples and pray. Apologize for...for everything.

Now, he knows that it's better for them if they don't hear from him.

All of this is for the best.

Now, laying in the imperial gardens of Yong'an, Xie Lian lets go of the grass.

Reaches up blindly, silk sleeves slipping down his arms, pooling at his shoulders as his fingertips reach for the sky.

Like he could scoop up the stars in his hands, if he reached far enough. He doesn't float away.

There's something keeping the god firmly tethered to the earth, but he couldn't tell you what.

He stares through the shackles blankly, mouth turning down at the corners.

Try as he might, he's never quite able to see anything through them.

Just darkness.

As his time in Yong'an stretches on, the prince grows older. Into less of an uncertain little boy, and far more a cocksure, overeager young man.

He never gets the upper hand on his Guoshi during sparring, but he certainly tries. Hunts, drinks to his heart's content.

And just like Xie Lian, he has a few friends—maybe not as close or as genuine as he would like, but friends—to keep him company along the way.

Present more often than not is a wealthy young man by the name of An Le. Always lingering in Lang Qiangqiu's shadow.

The Guoshi never spares him any time or attention. Only ever offers him a gold glance from underneath that golden mask of his—but An Le never really seems to mind.

He's content to whisper to Lang Qiangqiu when Fangxin Guoshi is across the feasting hall.

Planting seeds.

"Your Guoshi," An Le muses, teasing a strawberry over his lips before taking a bite, "He's always rather lonesome, isn't he?"

The Prince glances over to his teacher, watching as Fangxin politely rebuffs the advances of several noblewomen with a smile.

"He's shy, I think!"

The teenager tilts his head to the side, watching as Xie Lian agrees to dance with a younger, far less attractive girl than the rest, one who had been struggling to find a partner all evening.

To her, he's perfectly charming, even going so far as to kiss her hand when they part.

Then, there are more young men showing interest in her—and the Guoshi seems all the more pleased for it.

"...But he doesn't have a wife, does he?" An Le points out, kicking his feet up on the table.

"His cultivation method doesn't allow that sort of thing," the prince explains.

And even if it did—the way Fangxin has spoken about his former lover, the one that he lost—

Lang Qiangqiu suspects that his Guoshi has no such interests in women. Which is his own business, and the crown prince knows it is not his place to share it.

"Does he have any friends?"

"Me," he answers quickly, offering An Le an impish smile. "I'm his friend."

"..." The young man smiles at the prince sympathetically, patting his shoulder. "You're his student, your highness. Not his friend."

He watches, as Lang Qiangqiu's face falls.

In part, out of sadness.

And then...mild defiance.

"If he doesn't have me as a friend—that would just mean that he didn't have friends or family at all," the prince mutters, shaking his head. "That would be too horrible."

An Le lifts his drink, watching the Guoshi closely.

"Sometimes the truth is horrific, your highness." He shrugs. "That's the way life is." But not the way that Lang Qiangqiu wishes for it to be.

And when you're a prince, raised to think that the world is yours to command—you often get it in your head that you can change it.

Simply by willing it to be so.

One afternoon, the prince stops in the middle of his calligraphy, setting down his brush.

“Fangxin Guoshi?”

His teacher sits on the open window sill, one leg thrown over the side, his back leaning against the frame.

His hair is low, today—held behind his head with a black jade comb, inlaid with gold. It leaves several loose locks hanging in front of his face, swaying gently in the breeze.

“What is it?”

“Are you sad, again?”

For a time, his teacher doesn’t answer.

Xie Lian has phrases.

He uses them often, to deflect such attention.

HIs lips quirk into a small smile, and he offers his most common excuse, “This old man is just tired, dianxia. Continue with the lesson.”

“...You aren’t that old, you know,” the prince grumbles. “It’s weird when you say that.”

Xie Lian doesn’t say anything more, looking out the window once more.

The Prince has no idea that he can’t see the sights below—and the old enjoys feeling the breeze.

He has phases, too.

When there’s no energy. No motivation. When all he wants is to sleep, and hide.

Everything frightens him, even if he doesn’t say it. He feels fragile and pried open, like the slightest invasion could shatter him.

Those times—they come and go, and Xie Lian doesn’t know why. Doesn’t have a word for what they mean, other than just...

Being depressed.

It passes. If he gives it time, it always passes.

He’s been in one of those phases for nearly two years now. And he’s just ready for it to be done with.

"...FangXin Guoshi?"

His shoulders slump slightly as he sighs. "Yes?"

"Why do you still wear that mask?"

His teacher doesn't answer him immediately.

He's wearing deep blue robes today, with golden threads stitched in the shapes of flowers along the sleeves, trailing into black at the ends.

The color is beautiful—contrasting against his skin and hair like he's been painted that way

"I told you a very long time ago, your highness. Back when we first met."

Xie Lian doesn't move, when he hears the sound of Lang Qiangqiu's stool scraping across the floor, or the sound of his approach.

"But you're not ugly, Guoshi," the prince presses him. "We both know that."

He's standing just beside Xie Lian now, the god can hear his nervous little heartbeat. What must he be, sixteen, now? When the years get so long, boys grow up quite fast. "And you remember my answer to that?" The god murmurs.

"You aren't ugly on the inside either, Guoshi."

A hand reaches out. Xie Lian can feel the movement of it.

And when he feels gentle fingertips brushing underneath the curve of the mask, something inside him snaps.

"Stop." He offers one warning, but the prince seems too lost in his own curiosity to heed it.

Xie Lian once embraced being touched in such a kind and gentle way. Would lean into someone's hand gratefully, for the reassurance that he wasn't alone in the dark.

Now, he only remembers one thing:

'You've always had such beautiful eyes.'

CRACK!

For a moment, there's only shock.

Xie Lian pressed back against the window sill, trembling, his hand clutched against his chest.

Lang Qiangqiu, with his head turned to the side—a red handprint forming on his cheek.

A gentle blow, considering the god's actual strength.

But it still stings quite a bit.

And when Xie Lian speaks, it's with a voice he hasn't used in quite some time.

Not the voice of a beggar, or a teacher—but that of something much higher.

"You forget your place, boy." He hisses, like a snake that's been threatened.

Slowly, the prince reaches up to touch the growing mark on his cheek, too startled to be angry. When he finally speaks, he simply asks—

"...My place?"

Xie Lian clutches both hands against his chest, trying to stop them from trembling so violently.

"Don't touch me," he whispers.

'Oh god, just—please, don't touch me.'

There's a long silence, filled only with his own ragged, frightened heartbeat.

"...I'm sorry," the prince mumbles, his voice small. Genuinely contrite, and—

So, so lonely.

"Please don't be angry, Guoshi—I was only...I was only trying to..."

Xie Lian doesn't speak at first, his lower lip wobbling.

Because he knows.

Knows that the boy didn't mean any harm. That he was only trying to feel close with someone.

Xie Lian knows how lonely that feeling can be.

He lets out a long, heavy sigh—catching the prince by the wrist before he can retreat. "I'm sorry," he mutters, dipping his head. "I shouldn't have struck you."

Xie Lian told himself long ago that he would not strike out in anger anymore.

"I was frightened."

Lang Qiangqiu's eyes widen apologetically. "I-I'm sorry, Guoshi, I wasn't trying to—"

"I know," Xie Lian mutters. "Close your eyes."

"I…what?"

"If you want to look," his teacher explains flatly, "You'll do as I say."

Hesitantly, the prince complies, eyes sliding shut.

When he does, Xie Lian reaches up, checking his lids with a delicate touch of his fingertips—making the prince shiver—before covering them completely with his palm.

"…" Lang Qiangqiu's eyebrow's furrow under Xie Lian's touch. "Guoshi," he mutters, "I don't understand—?"

The hand that's gripping his wrist lifts the prince's palm up, and then —

His palm is pressed against his Guoshi's cheek, and he can feel the lack of a mask there.

This—

This must have been what he meant by looking, then.

It takes a moment for the prince to actually move.

And when he does, his fingertips find a face that…

Isn't ugly at all.

The skin is perfectly smooth, unblemished. Not a wrinkle in sight. (So much for being old, huh?)

Symmetrical features. Surprisingly delicate actually—

Soft. Young.

Not what the prince expected at all.

"…" He frowns, his hands cupping the Guoshi's cheeks. "Why did you ever try to say you are ugly?" He mutters, too far ahead of himself to be embarrassed. "You're beautiful, Fangxin Guoshi."

The god doesn't reply, but now—the prince notices.

His teacher is shaking.

Subtly, but he's trembling from head to toe.

"…Fangxin Guoshi," the prince mutters, his eyelashes brushing against Xie Lian's fingertips as he blinks underneath his palm. "Are you still scared?"

Still, he receives no reply.

"Someone hurt you before, didn't they?"

His thumbs stroke over Xie Lian's cheeks, worn with callouses after so many years of training with a blade.

The god's teeth clench, his nostrils flaring with the effort it takes not to panic, but… He manages, in a brief moment of honesty, to nod.

Those hands hold him tighter.

"…I won't let anyone do that, ever again—okay?" The prince mutters fiercely. "I'll be king one day—and I'll be even stronger than you. I won't let anyone hurt you ever again. I promise!"

The god almost smiles.

"That's kind of you to say."

"I'm not just saying it—I swear!"

It’s daunting, for the most powerful person you’ve ever met to seem so fragile, even if it’s only for a moment.

Lang Qiangqiu doesn’t care about any of that. Not right now.

He just doesn’t want his teacher to seem so frightened and sad anymore. So lonely.

“...I believe that you’ll try,” the older man concedes, making Lang Qiangqiu frown.

“Really—!”

Then, with a rush of air, his teacher isn’t in his arms anymore—and the prince is opening his eyes with a frantic gasp, looking around.

“GUOSHI?!”

Xie Lian lands on his feet beneath the window—two stories below, his mask back in place.

“Finish your calligraphy,” he folds his hands into his sleeves, his voice stern. “Or you can forget about sparring again this evening.”

With that, he walks through the courtyard.

As the prince watches him go, he realizes— His Guoshi is really, truly alone.

And all he wants, in the end—is just the chance to stand a little closer to him. Maybe even beside him, if Fangxin would allow it.

But time goes on, and his teacher remains at a distance. With one exception. The day of his seventeenth birthday.

The Gilded Banquet

Chapter Summary

> "Dianxia..." Xie Lian sighs, his voice tired. "I've little left to teach you."
>
> "That's not true!" The prince protests. "I still need more time! I need—!"
>
> I need you.
>
> That's what he tried to say.
>
> Before a servant walked into his chambers, interrupting him. Before his Guoshi gently patted his hand, reassuring him—
>
> "We can talk more, after the banquet." Fangxin reassures him gently, rising to his feet. "I don't want to spoil your birthday."
>
> "...Okay."
>
> That's right. Today is his Seventeenth Birthday—and tonight, is his Gilded Banquet.

Chapter Notes

> You can find me on twitter and keep up with current updates of the story HERE
>
> CONTENT WARNING: depictions of sexual harassment, violence, and death

See the end of the chapter for more notes

When the prince awakes in the morning—his Guoshi is already there, sitting on the sedan on the other side of his bedchambers.

And, as usual—staring out the window.

The youth sits up, eyes groggy, hair askew.

"...Did I oversleep?" He mumbles. "Have the lessons already started?"

Fangxin shakes his head, never looking back at him.

“No,” the Guoshi murmurs. “I just wanted the chance to speak to you alone, before the preparations started.”

Right—for the feast being held in his honor.

After all, it’s his coming of age. When he’ll start performing the duties of a full fledged crown prince.

“Sure,” the prince mutters, adjusting his hair slightly as he tries to sit up properly. Even goes through the trouble of clearing his throat, trying to deepen his voice.

“What is it?”

“...” Slowly, the Guoshi rises to his feet—wearing black and gold today, sleeves trailing elegantly as he walks to the prince’s bedside.

The youth doesn’t speak as he watches his Guoshi sit on the edge of the bed, heart pounding, until—

A hand lands in his hair.

When his eyes trail up—

Fangxin’s mouth is turned up into a soft smile, his fingers ruffling the teenager’s hair.

“You’ve done well, Lang Qianqiu,” he murmurs, tilting his head.

The prince stares at him with eyes the size of dinner plates, lips parted.

“I’m proud of you.”

The Guoshi doesn’t get much more out before Lang Qianqiu surges forward, flinging his arms around Xie Lian in a tight embrace.

Then, he seems to remember just as soon that he’s crossed a boundary. “Sorry, sorry, I know, no touching—!”

“It’s alright,” the Guoshi mutters stiffly, adjusting his hair. “I just—you’ve done so well, that there’s a very strong chance that you are going to ascend.”

The prince reacts with blind joy. “You really think so?!”

“Yes, but—listen,” Fangxin stops him from cheering.

"There are some things that you'll need to know when you do."

Now Lang Qiangqiu stops, watching him very seriously. "Like what?"

"You can't just do exactly as you like if you ascend, understand?" His Guoshi explains firmly. "Even if it means going against what you believe in."

"..." The prince frowns, his brow furrowed. "But you told me I should always do what I think is right. Without exception."

"And I meant that," Xie Lian agrees. "Unless the Heavenly Emperor ever tells you to do otherwise. Understand?"

The young man hesitates.

"Lang Qianqiu," His teacher speaks again, his tone stern. "I need you to promise me." "Why is it so important?"

"Promise."

"...Alright," he agrees, glancing away, squirming a little. "I promise."

The sigh his Guoshi lets out almost sounds relieved.

"...It will be overwhelming, when you first arrive—especially if you ascend young," His teacher continues. "It's best to seek out older gods to help you. Nan Yang would be best."

"...You think so?"

"Yes," Fangxin nods emphatically. "Go to him as soon as you arrive."

"Tell him...the friend who offered a third cup sent you. He'll know what it means, and he'll look after you. Remember that. Understand?"

He has to impress these things upon the young prince, who is prone to forgetting minor details.

"You know General Nan Yang?"

"Remember it."

"Okay, okay—!"

"And spend as much time with your father as you can," The Guoshi mutters. "You won't get the chance to after you ascend. You don't want to regret that. Understand?"

"Yes," the prince agrees, startled.

Fangxin sounds so...urgent, right now.

So anxious.

"...Why are you being like this, anyway?" Lang Qianqiu mutters, "Couldn't this wait until later?"

Fangxin looks away, hair covering his face. "I was this age, when..." The teenager stares.

"...When what?!"

Finally, the Guoshi replies—

"I'll probably be leaving soon."

Lang Qianqiu stares up at him, his eyes widening with shock—and hurt. "What?!"

"Dianxia..." Xie Lian sighs, his voice tired. "I've little left to teach you."

"That's not true!" The prince protests. "I still need more time! I need—!"

I need you.

That's what he tried to say.

Before a servant walked into his chambers, interrupting him.

Before his Guoshi gently patted his hand, reassuring him—

"We can talk more, after the banquet." Fangxin reassures him gently, rising to his feet. "I don't want to spoil your birthday."

"...Okay."

That's right.

Today is his Seventeenth Birthday—and tonight, is his Gilded Banquet.

The servants usher him out, to prepare him for a day of activities—and he doesn't get the chance to do more than spare one last look over his shoulder, and…

Fangxin Guoshi seems as lonesome as ever.

Xie Lian, as one might expect, isn't particularly fun at parties.

He used to be. There was a time when he could dazzle the room, swirling about in brightly colored robes, jewels glittering in his hair, charming generals and foreign dignitaries alike.

Now, he's a wallflower.

Watching as people in golden robes and masks—much like his own, but far more gaudy—dance and drink, making merry.

Ironically, it does seem to be an attempt to mimic the festivals they used to hold in Xianle.

Xie Lian tries not to feel bitter, but it's more of a cheap imitation.

But that's the point. Gilded.

The gold here isn't real. Not most of it, anyway.

But the irony—it lies in the fact that Xie Lian can hear it, right now—as one of the King's generals tries to goad him into another purge.

That's a delicate way of phrasing it.

What he really means is that the harvest this year was poor, and no one wants to be another Xianle. Best way to avoid that? Relocating descendants of the former Empire to the border with Banyue.

Border towns with little food, constantly wracked by violent raids.

So, when they say they're committing a 'purge,' or a 'relocation,' they really mean that they're enacting a death sentence.

Mostly against women and children, the elderly. Young men end up conscripted into the Yong'an army.

The current King, however, thinks it's barbaric.

"They're our citizens too, now." He chastises the general, shaking his head. "Anyone who would hold a grudge against them for wars that are four centuries past is out of their mind. Don't you agree, Guoshi?"

The masked man glances up, startled.

"…Yes, your highness," he agrees

The general makes a face, clearly annoyed as he stomps off, looking for more wine.

The King of Yong'an looks toward his royal preceptor with a smile. "It's nice at times, to know that someone thinks I'm not a fool."

"There is nothing foolish about mercy, your highness."

The King hums with agreement, looking out over the party. "…I'm grateful, you know." He sighs. "It seems as though you truly came into our lives at the right time. I…Since my wife, I…"

He starts when Fangxin rests a hand on his elbow, feather light. "You were grieving."

The Guoshi murmurs, "No one ever does that gracefully."

After a moment, the King smiles—and he covers the younger man's hand with his own. "Maybe so—but you were there for my son in ways I could not be. I'll always be grateful for that."

Fangxin offers him a small smile.

The night carries on—with no Lang Qianqiu. It's traditional for the person the banquet is being held for not to arrive until the peak of festivities, anyway.

Xie Lian, however, is thinking of excuses to leave.

See, most flirting—he can deal with. Particularly from women.

They never really cross a line—and the line of flirtation is never particularly aggressive. It's easy for Xie Lian to sidestep their inquiries, or gently let them down.

With men, however, it's far less comfortable. Particularly this one.

"Guoshi, Guoshi…" The noble smirks.

They're standing near the wall, with the noble's hands resting on the marble on either side of Xie Lian's head, caging him in, "Come now, there's no need to be such a tease. How long have we been doing this?"

“Too long,” Fangxin replies flatly.

“I couldn’t agree more...”

The man reaches for Xie Lian’s chin, and when the Guoshi pointedly pulls out of his reach, the noble settles for grabbing a longer lock of hair instead, twisting it between his fingers and lifting it to his lips, inhaling deeply.

“Has anyone ever told you that you smell divine?”

Underneath the mask, the god’s eyes are narrowed into a glare. “Has anyone ever told you that it’s dangerous to push a man’s boundaries?”

“Dangerous?” The noble purrs, waggling an eyebrow. “Maybe I like danger.” “You have three seconds to let go.”

“Or?”

“I’ll break your arm.”

The noble stiffens—then glares. “There’s no need for such violence in response to a proposition, Guoshi. Are you really so ashamed? We both know it’s not because my gender offends you.”

Xie Lian stiffens.

“...No,” he replies, even if that statement makes him feel deep shame.

He often tells himself that he’s come to terms with his own sexuality, and then he hears something like that—that his preference for men is obvious—and the shame and paranoia comes roaring back to life.

Now, he opts for a slightly less aggressive method of denial.

“I can’t.”

“Your cultivation—”

“Leave me physically incapable of what you’re asking for,” Xie Lian explains with an awkward smile. “I’m afraid you’ll have to find another partner.”

To his annoyance, even that doesn’t deter him.

“Ah, is that so? But you see, Guoshi...” He leans closer.

“For what I have in mind, you don’t necessarily need to…perform,” he murmurs. “And we can both enjoy ourselves nonetheless. How does that sound?”

Xie Lian’s brow furrows beneath his mask—

What on earth is he talking about?

After sleeping in so many alleyways, Xie Lian would consider himself somewhat knowledgeable on intercourse, despite having absolutely no experience himself.

He’s blind after all, not deaf—and he’s heard quite a bit. He’ll be honest, most of it didn’t sound very enjoyable.

And on the rare occasion that it was between two men, it was always with hands and mouths, and Xie Lian can’t exactly imagine a way he could enjoy that under such circumstances.

In truth, Xie Lian has come to the conclusion that he probably wouldn’t enjoy any of it at all.

While he’s been in love before—those circumstances never allowed him to feel…that sort of desire for the object of his affections. And since then…

Xie Lian hasn’t felt anything close to temptation. Maybe once, one flickering thought while he was kissing Wu Ming, but that…

Xie Lian’s not particularly proud of his motivations, back then. The context behind what he almost asked the savage ghost to do.

And it wouldn’t have been out of real desire—it would have only been out of a need to give something away willingly before Bai Wuxiang could take it.

“…I’d still rather not,” The Guoshi finally speaks again, his voice less firm than before —but not because of this man, no.

He’s simply distracted by his own memories, as he often is. “…Fangxin Guoshi, no need to be so—”

A hand lands heavily on his shoulder.

“How about this,” a voice speaks lowly, and Xie Lian is almost startled by the tone of it. “If you don’t let him go, he might break your arm—but I’m going to cut off your head. How does that sound?”

The noble—an arrogant man by the name of Tan Xiaodan—stiffens "D...Dianxia, I..."

Xie Lian doesn't think, in all of the years he's been teaching Lang Qianqiu, he's ever heard the boy speak like that.

"Get out of my sight, before I change my mind," the prince snarls.

The noble lets Xie Lian go in an instant, stumbling away with a few rapid apologies.

"...It's bad luck to be early for your own gilded banquet," the Guoshi murmurs, his head turned in Tan Xiaodan's direction, like he's watching him go. "You aren't due for another half an hour."

"...I know," the prince agrees, sheepish. "But I needed to speak with you." "About?"

"...Not here," Lang Qianqiu shakes his head. "Could we go somewhere quiet? The garden, maybe?"

Xie Lian can't imagine what the prince wants, but, given what he said during their last conversation—he can't imagine this will end well.

"I already said we could speak about it tomorrow," The Guoshi mutters, tilting his face down, golden mask flashing under the candle light. "I don't want to ruin—"

"You wont ruin my birthday," Lang Qianqiu shakes his head, "I promise! I just...this is really important."

"Your highness—"

"Please?" He pleads.

"..." Xie Lian lets out a heavy sigh.

"Alright."

He offers his wrist, allowing himself to be led through the crowd, out of the cheerful murmur of the ballroom, away from the music and the dancing.

Finally, they reach the garden.

There's something off about the prince this evening. Something fidgety and nervous. Xie Lian doesn't comment, only follows along.

“Here, ah—you sit here, alright Guoshi?” The hand on his wrist guides him to take a seat on a marble bench.

They’ve been here many times before.

Since Lang Qianqiu was barely more than a child. Now, he’s taller than Xie Lian—and broader too, awkwardly pacing while Xie Lian sits.

“What is it?”

“I—ah, well—” The prince swallows dryly, and Xie Lian arches an eyebrow. Why is his heart beating so fast?

“I think I know your secret,” Lang Qianqiu mutters, and the Guoshi goes very still. “Why you don’t get close to anyone—why you’re always pushing me away, why you’re so sad all the time, I get it now.”

“Your highness—”

“It’s because you’re a descendent of Xianle, right?”

His teacher doesn’t move, and he doesn’t speak.

Lang Qianqiu’s gaze softens. “So, it is true.”

“I—”

“That doesn’t make a difference to me,” the prince explains quickly, and Xie Lian—he feels it when the boy sets something in his lap, and when he reaches to see what it is...

Flowers.

The Guoshi’s eyes soften underneath his mask, fingertips stroking over the petals.

Lang Qianqiu brought him flowers.

Xie Lian almost feels guilty, because the prince doesn’t know it—but his Guoshi is incapable of seeing how beautiful they are. The array of colors.

“I don’t care who your family was,” the prince explains, “or where you come from. None of that makes any difference to me.”

“...” Xie Lian’s fingers tighten around the stems. “Your highness is very kind, but why are you telling me this now?”

Lang Qianqiu's heart beats faster.

"...Because I..." He clears his throat—and again, just like this morning, he's clearly trying to make his voice sound far deeper than it actually is. "Today is my birthday."

"...Right," his teacher agrees slowly.

"And I, well," the prince makes a point of rising to his full height

Not realizing that this is a futile effort, because his teacher cannot see the posturing that the young man is currently projecting.

"I'm a man now."

Xie Lian accidentally lets out a small chuckle, and the prince deflates. "Guoshi! It's true! I'm of age now. Don't laugh!"

"I—" Fangxin Guoshi cracks a small smile, shaking his head. "You're right, dianxia. I'm sorry. You're a man now."

The way he says it—it makes the prince feel like he's being placated, but he's too far gone to turn back now.

He sucks in a deep breath.

Then, he offers a gesture that is so meaningful, for royalty. One that Xie Lian is startled by, the moment Lang Qianqiu does it—because he understands the seriousness of it.

Lang Qianqiu drops to his knees before his Guoshi.

He reaches for Xie Lian's hands, gripping them firmly—but with a gentleness that actually makes something in the god's heart move.

It's been a long time since he didn't fear someone touching him gently.

But slowly—ever so gradually—something has been building between them:

Trust.

"...To me, Guoshi is the strongest, most capable—and most beautiful person in the entire world," The prince explains earnestly, and while Xie Lian isn't afraid—

His stomach begins to sink.

“And I—I’m getting stronger every day. You still think I can ascend, right?” ...Oh dear.

“I do,” Xie Lian agrees cautiously.

“When I do, I can appoint you as my deputy,” the prince explains. “And we can go to the heavens together. You could see General Nan Yang again, and keep teaching me —”

The God’s heart aches.

“...And I can protect you.”

Lang Qianqiu is so earnest in everything he does—and now is no different. “I meant it, when I made that promise. I won’t let anyone hurt you, Guoshi. Not ever again.”

Slowly, his lips trembling with nerves, he lifts their joined hands—and kisses the one of Xie Lian’s knuckles.

Xie Lian is silent, working through many different emotions—almost none of them pleasant, but...

This isn’t about him.

Actually—this moment is far more significant to the young man before him than it could ever be for Xie Lian, and so—he tries to take it seriously.

And gently.

“...Is there something that you want to ask me, Lang Qianqiu?” He murmurs, his voice so soft—and the prince nods, his hands shaking slightly with the nerves, but holding onto Xie Lian’s so tenderly.

“Would you just...let me?” The prince whispers. “Let me protect you?”

Fangxin squeezes his hands gently. “I’d be a sore excuse for a teacher, if I allowed my student to shield me from the world.”

The prince swallows dryly, filled with determination as he kisses Xie Lian’s hand again. “You were the one who said you didn’t have more to teach me.”

“I did...”

“So, don’t stay by my side as my teacher, then.” Lang Qianqiu murmurs. “Stay as the state preceptor, and...as...as my...”

He stops when Fangxin pulls one of his hands away—only to cup the prince’s cheek— so gently.

“...Guoshi?”

“You used to be so little,” he whispers.

Like a tiny little bird, flapping around in the rafters. Singing nonsensical little songs and following him around, flapping his half grown wings. “When did you grow up?”

The prince’s cheeks flush slightly, not sure as to whether or not he’s being rejected.

Xie Lian’s thumb strokes his cheek for a moment longer, looking for the right words to say—

And then he goes still, his head whipping in the opposite direction, posture suddenly stiff.

The prince stares up at him, confused. “...Guoshi—?” “Stay here.”

The Guoshi rises to his feet, carefully tucking the flowers into his robes, and his student watches him with confusion. “I don’t—?”

“Stay here,” Xie Lian repeats, his voice suddenly hard and stern. “And don’t move until I come and find you again.”

“But—!”

“Do as I say!”

He couldn’t hear what his Guoshi did, his ears were never quite so sensitive, so...

The Crown Prince of Yong’an never heard the screaming.

When Xie Lian left this place, only minutes before—it was a gleaming show of wealth and prestige.

Now, it’s a bloodbath.

Not so dissimilar from the day that Xie Lian and Lang Qianqiu met— the kidnapping attempt, but this...

This is a massacre.

By the time the Guoshi enters the room, the floors are already slick with blood, the stench of it filling the air. The clash of swords.

And the screaming.

From the sound of it—there are very few attendants from the original banquet that are actually left alive, but—

But still, Xie Lian tries.

His blade appears in his hand—dark, like black jade, gleaming with sharpness.

There are twenty five attackers remaining.

Before, Xie Lian faced the same number with nothing more than a tree branch and little motivation to speak of.

Now, with a blade in his hand and sadness in his heart—because, in the last five years, he had come to know these people well—

Xie Lian slaughters them.

He's quick about it, flashing from one enemy to the next, his blade moving so sharply, it's invisible to the human eye.

And internally, he curses himself for not listening more closely. For being distracted, if only for a brief moment.

How could this happen?

How could Xie Lian have allowed it to happen?

He dispatches the last one, wiping the blood from his blade as he listens closely, trying to find survivors—and the sound of one voice makes his heart sink.

"G-Guoshi..." He rasps.

It's the King of Yong'an.

The God is at his side in an instant, quickly checking his body for wounds, and...

When he feels the gash in the king's stomach, his heart plummets even further.

Maybe he could survive, if he was lucky. But he's losing so much blood...

"What happened here?" Xie Lian whispers.

The King clutches his wrist weakly, his breathing ragged.

This will be a long, painful death. Xie Lian can feel that. Can see how deeply the king is suffering already, each intake of air deeply labored. "X...Xianle..." The god's eyes widen sharply. "It was rebels...from Xianle..."

"...That can't be right," the Guoshi mutters, cradling his king in his arms. "Your highness, you said it yourself. It's been centuries. Holding onto such a grudge would be—"

"Madness?!" The King chokes, blood streaming down his chin. "They identified themselves when they came!"

Still, it doesn't make any...

"Guoshi..." The King clutches at the front of Xie Lian's robes, staining them with blood. "You must...we have to...protect...Lang Qianqiu..."

On that, the god immediately agrees. "I—"

The next words the King says, however, make his blood run cold.

"Tell...tell the guards to purge them all," the King whispers. "N...Not just a few cities. All of them. I—"

Xie Lian's hands begin to tremble.

"I want them all gone."

For a moment, the Guoshi doesn't react.

"My son...he...won't be safe...until they're all...gone..."

But that isn't exactly true. Xie Lian knows that much all too well.

What the King is asking him to do—

It would ruin Lang Qianqiu's future. Stain it with blood. Curse him to live with that guilt. That responsibility.

And even if that weren't true…

Xie Lian can't allow it.

Because it's genocide.

And he promised himself—no matter the personal cost— He wouldn't hurt people again.

But—in this case, the alternative is… An awful choice.

Reminiscent of the sort that Bai Wuxiang would have forced him to make, all those years ago.

"…Guoshi?" The King whispers, eyes unfocused. "D…Did you hear me?"

"…" Xie Lian leans his face close, his hair shielding them both from prying eyes.

He wanted to kill a King of Yong'an once.

A selfish, confusing man. Xie Lian used to think that he hated Lang Ying.

Maybe he needed to hate him, back then. Needed someone to blame.

But in the end, he was just weak.

A coward, who needed to live with his ghosts—so he dragged the entire world down with him.

But he was just a pawn of Bai Wuxiang in the end. Xie Lian wasn't any better.

He doesn't hate Lang Ying now. Just pities him. And maybe, to some extent—he understands him.

"…I'll make sure the prince is alright," Xie Lian whispers, making a solemn promise. "And I'll find and deal with the ones who are responsible for this. You have my word."

The King nods weakly, and for a moment, Xie Lian hopes he can avoid staining his hands once more, but…

"And…t…the order," he whispers. "Bring…one of the guards…so I can…" The Guoshi grits his teeth.

“F...Fangxin?”

Xie Lian doesn’t want to hurt anyone anymore.

But he can’t allow this.

The blow is quick. Xie Lian pinches a pressure point near the juncture of the King’s shoulder as he does it.

He doesn’t feel it. Doesn’t suffer when the dark steel of the blade pierces his heart. It’s a painless death, one without fear.

A mercy.

Until Xie Lian hears that awful scream. Not from him. Not from the king.

But from the door to the banquet hall. “FATHER!”

At first, the prince doesn’t understand what he’s seeing.

When he sees the Guoshi and the King on the ground together, he thinks they’re both gone.

That everyone in his life he has ever loved has been taken from him. Until Lang Qiangqiu watches Fangxin rise to his feet.

Until he sees the blade sticking out of his father’s chest.

It’s one that the prince knows quite well.

At first, he can’t bring himself to believe it.

“You...” Lang Qianqiu whispers, trying to see through the smoke and the blood. At some point, someone must have set a fire. “You didn’t...”

That golden mask stares back at him blankly, stained with blood.

His father’s blood.

“...You wouldn’t!” the prince chokes, tears falling.

Xie Lian stood in a palace once. Just like this one.

Standing over a dead king as his palace began to burn.

Listening as a crown prince cried out with horror.

"...Oh, Wu Ming," the god whispers, fingers trembling where they grip the hilt of his sword. "What did I do?"

No one answers him now, and after a moment—Xie Lian remembers that this isn't a memory. Or a nightmare.

This is really happening.

Wu Ming is gone. And Xie Lian—

His throat tightens with emotion.

"YOU WOULDN'T!" Lang Qianqiu sobs, fighting his guards as they restrain him.

He watches his teacher's form, still standing over his father's body, dripping with blood—gripping the handle of the blade that is still buried in the King's chest. "GUOSHI!"

Xie Lian's heart cracks.

He hurt someone again.

"WAIT!" The prince cries, fighting to get to him. "JUST EXPLAIN, I KNOW THAT YOU WOULDN'T—!"

But he did.

And that becomes clear when the blade is yanked from his father's chest, blood spattering across the floor.

The prince freezes, falling silent.

And Xie Lian is left with another awful choice.

To protect Lang Qianqiu's memory of this father, and his future—or to avoid breaking his heart.

One of those things can be healed from. The other cannot be undone.

He sheathes Fangxin without a word—

And he disappears into the smoke, the prince's sobs and screams following.

He didn't want to believe it.

He desperately didn't want to think that it was true.

But there was no alternative explanation left behind.

Only blood, massacre, and death.

With it, the young man's heart shattered.

And Xie Lian knew exactly where to go.

There was one person missing from the feast that night, his absence notable. After all, he was the crown prince's closest friend.

And he was also the one person in the Court of Yong'an that Xie Lian never trusted. An Le.

There's something almost reminiscent about this.

Arriving in a fine manor, decked out for a party—but no guests.

Just one man, sitting alone at his table.

Gleefully reading the reports of the deaths of the Yong'an nobility. Only one survivor —a naive, foolish little crown prince who won't make it far.

"Why?"

He looks up with a start—only to see the bloodstained mask standing across the table from him.

And An Le smiles, his expression vaguely bitter. "I should have known that it would have been you," he mutters, setting the reports aside. "You never did like me, Fangxin Guoshi."

The older man doesn't answer, his expression hidden. "Answer me."

"...Because it's my birthright," the human shrugs, throwing his hands up, watching the Guoshi's lips twitch with surprise, and he smirks. "My family name? It's Xie. Xie An Le. My parents weren't subtle, huh?"

He tilts his head back, watching the candlelight dance across the ceiling.

"Yong'an took everything from us. And for what? That's the thing that everyone forgets about the story."

He clicks his tongue woefully. “My ancestor—the one everyone loathes—he tried to help Yong’an.”

Fangxin doesn’t speak, just allows hm to go on.

“And look how they thanked my family for it. Are they any better now? No. They’re worse than Xianle ever was. They deserve to rot. If it wasn’t for what they did, I’d be the Crown Prince now. How is that fair?” He muses. “How is it fair that, that little idiot gets to be king, and I’m...what? His second fiddle? After what my family has endured? No. No—I wouldn’t allow that.”

An Le shakes his head, fully prepared to die now, expecting that’s why the Guoshi has come. “

So, go on.” He lifts his chin, resolved. “If you’ve come to kill me, go on and do it. I have no regrets.”

But the blow doesn’t come.

Instead, all he hears the sound of a mask falling to the floor with a clatter.

And when he looks up—For the first time, he sees the face of Fangxin Guoshi.

Young, handsome. No—handsome isn’t the right word. It doesn’t quite do it justice.

His face is too perfect, too delicate to be called handsome. There’s not a single flaw in his features to be found, no—

Beautiful is the word.

But his eyes are the most striking.

Burning under the candle light, glowing with a pattern that An Le knows to be inhuman, something of magic.

How, he wonders now, did no one ever notice that the Imperial Preceptor was a blind man?

“It was my birthright,” the figure finally replies, his voice low.

“...What?”

“The throne of Xianle,” he explains. “It was my birthright, not yours.”

An Le stares for a moment, struggling to put the pieces together, but—
Then, he understands what he's looking at.

A god. A blind one, no less. And—

A cursed shackle.

"...It's you?" He whispers, eyes wide.

No one has heard from the god of misfortune in many, many years. Some assumed that he had faded away long ago.

"You were there for the same reason as me, then," An Le breathes, his eyes widening with excitement. "For revenge, right? You can help me —!"

Then, he falls silent.

The sword in Xie Lian's hand has now been raised, leveled directly at the young man's chest.

"You know nothing."

Now, he can see it in the god's eyes.

Wrath.

A horrible, almost frightening level of wrath.

"None of those things happened to you," Xie Lian whispers. "I..."

"They happened to me."

Xie Lian was the one who was hated, cursed, and banished. His parents were the ones that were left to flounder and die and squalor. His friends were the ones who were forced to watch him suffer.

His Hong-er was the one who died to protect him.

"You speak as though you have been fighting in a war..." Xie Lian mutters, knuckles white where he grips his blade. "But you have only ever lived in a time of peace."

Peace that, in many ways, Xie Lian sacrificed everything to provide.

"I'm—"

“You’re a murderer.”

The Crown Prince of Xianle rises to his full height—which has never been the most imposing thing about him, but he seems to tower now.

“You sit here, speaking of birth rights—you aren’t even a direct descendent. Just some distant cousins, centuries after the fact.”

“I—!”

“I never fathered any children,” Xie Lian explains. Knowing that he had never planned to, given his own circumstances. A fact that saddened him, for a time. “And I never will. The Royal Bloodline ends with me.”

“The House of Xie—”

“Is my Clan.” Xie Lian glares. “Not yours.”

He doesn’t speak their language. Likely doesn’t even know any of their rituals, songs, or stories.

Was born in a time when Yong’an was all he knew. What could he possibly be mourning?

What right does he have, to feel robbed of anything? It’s just an excuse for murder.

“There were children,” Xie Lian mutters, eyes somehow managing to burn brighter. “Children died tonight.”

“I didn’t—”

He falls silent, when the tip of fangxin presses against his ribs. The wrath in those eyes burns like a small sun.

“You don’t get to do that,” the god snarls.

“You don’t get to use what happened to me as an excuse to hurt children.”

It might be something that An Le feels ownership over. His ancestry. His history.

But it’s Xie Lian’s life, his pain, and it’s his own.

“But we’re...” An Le stares up at him, his eyes lost “We’re family!”

No.

You choose your family. Xie Lian learned that long ago.

Casting one vile cousin aside. Accepting a boy with nothing, who came from nothing, into the deepest recesses of his heart.

“If this is what my family has become,” the god mutters, “then I would rather be the last.”

Fangxin vibrates in his hold.

It’s a rare technique, one that Xie Lian thought he would never need to use, but…

Vile as he is, if anyone ever learned the truth of An Le’s actions, it would still come back down on the descendants of Xianle.

And…it would hurt Lang Qianqiu.

An Le got so close to the boy, before the end. Learning the truth now, just like learning the truth of what happened to his father…

It would hurt the crown prince. Break his faith in people a little more. When they find An Le, it will look like a disease took him, not a blade. And the truth of his sins will be lost to time.

Maybe it’s more than he deserves, but…this isn’t about that.

This is about protecting someone else. The only innocent party in all of this sadness. But even still—

There’s one thing left that Fangxin Guoshi must do.

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

All pieces are included with permission from the artist, do not reproduce or re-use for any reason.

[image]

[image]

[image]

CREDIT: Envy, support the artwork HERE

Guoshi Fangxin "comforting" the king of Yong'an after his wife's death, supposedly

[image]

CREDIT: SEONG, support the artwork HERE

CREDIT: EVE, support the artwork, HERE

Chapter End Notes

> Thank you so much to Eve, Envy, and Seong for your artwork, and allowing me to share it! It means the world!

xoxo, Evie

A Sinner's Burial

Chapter Summary

> "Why?" The prince presses. He left his personal guards at the foot of the hill, insisting on confronting his teacher alone. "I know you wouldn't have done something like that —so why?!"
>
> There is no good end to this. Xie Lian knows, no matter what choice he makes, he'll end up hurting Lang Qianqiu. The only thing he can do now is try to make the least painful decision available. And right now, that seems to be... Not answering at all.
>
> Instead, he rises to his feet, blade in hand. Shattering himself, instead of the rest of the prince's world, seems to be the best option.
>
> "Dianxia," he murmurs, slowly turning to face the teenager. "What do we do, when faced with the wicked?"
>
> The prince takes a step back, his lips trembling, eyes wide with fear.
>
> In the centuries that follow, this story will be told differently. A courageous prince, carrying out his revenge against an evil, jealous teacher. Not a frightened young man, facing down the man who taught him how to weird a bade, tears in his eyes.
>
> "You aren't wicked."

Chapter Notes

> You can find me on twitter and keep up with current updates of the story HERE
>
> CONTENT WARNING: horror elements, violence, claustrophobia, suicidal thoughts
>
> There will be a link to catch up on twitter for those who want it included in the next chapter, which should go up in the next 24 hours!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

It takes some time for the Prince to find him. Not because the Guoshi was hiding, no.

But because it takes time, to face the things that you're afraid of. Even as you boast and cry out to your people about taking revenge—

You're still afraid of what awaits you.

In all honesty, even when he did find Fangxin Guoshi—months after the Gilded Banquet, sitting at the top of a hill—the Crown Prince of Yong'an still didn't want to believe the truth.

He's alone, just as he's always been.

Sitting on a rock, facing away from the prince.

The wind blows gently through his hair.

Still, like always—he wears that mask. Hiding him away from the world—and, by extension, his student.

"...I wondered when you would come," he murmurs—and the prince trembles, gripping his blade tightly.

"Are you going to tell me now?"

The Guoshi doesn't reply, his gaze facing ever forward.

"Why?" The prince presses. He left his personal guards at the foot of the hill, insisting on confronting his teacher alone. "I know you wouldn't have done something like that —so why?!"

There is no good end to this.

Xie Lian knows, no matter what choice he makes, he'll end up hurting Lang Qianqiu. The only thing he can do now is try to make the least painful decision available.

And right now, that seems to be...

Not answering at all.

Instead, he rises to his feet, blade in hand.

Shattering himself, instead of the rest of the prince's world, seems to be the best option.

"Dianxia," he murmurs, slowly turning to face the teenager. "What do we do, when faced with the wicked?”

The prince takes a step back, his lips trembling, eyes wide with fear.

In the centuries that follow, this story will be told differently.

A courageous prince, carrying out his revenge against an evil, jealous teacher.

Not a frightened young man, facing down the man who taught him how to weird a bade, tears in his eyes.

“You aren’t wicked.”

He whispers those words, taking a stumbling step back, but…

CLANG!

Lang Qianqiu barely manages to deflect the blow, sparks flying from the edge of his blade, eyes wide.

“What do we do,” Xie Lian repeats, their blades crossed as Lang Qianqiu struggles to hold him off. “When we are faced with the wicked?”

Through clenched teeth, arms trembling as he holds his own, the prince cries—

“Slay them in order to protect the innocent!”

One of the many lessons his Guoshi taught him over the years.

That mask stares back at him.

Blank. Cold. Unfeeling

“Then you already know what you must do.”

Xie Lian can see it in the prince’s eyes.

That fragile state of heartbreak. Of trust shattering.

It hurts to see, but he accepts it.

It’s a choice that he made.

The battle is fierce, blades clashing with increasing ferocity.

Not from Fangxin Guoshi, no. His movements are as calm and as measured as ever.

It's Lang Qianqiu who fights harder, with a fury, tears pouring down his face as he moves faster, more agile by the second, taking in every lesson that he's ever been taught, moving like a demon.

A far cry from the frightened child he once was, cowering behind his guards.

"How—" He sobs, even as he attacks, "How could you kill him, when you saw how I mourned my mother?!"

That mask never changes.

He's never given an answer.

"HOW COULD YOU TAKE HIM FROM ME?!"

They clash again, and this time, there's the distinctive edge of the younger man taking the upperhand.

He's never been able to beat Fangxin before. Never even came close during their sparring matches. Now, he assumes his passion is what drives him further.

Maybe so.

Xie Lian almost smiles, seeing how much the young man has improved. He has to use one sixth of his strength now, to parry. That's not bad.

It doesn't take so much effort to fake it, when his blade is knocked from his hand, landing in the grass a few yards away.

'You used to be so little.'

THUMP!

Under the mask, his eyes widen just a fraction.

'When did you grow up so fast?'

The blade runs him all the way through before being ripped out, blood pouring down. It doesn't hurt. Not exactly.

Not as much as what comes after.

Lang Qianqiu doesn't let him hit the ground.

He catches his teacher in his arms, sinking to his knees, casting his own weapon aside.

Weeping.

"I...I didn't want to do that!" The prince sobs, pressing his forehead against a gilded mask. "Why did you make me do that?!"

As far as he knows, the blow he dealt was fatal. And to be fair—Xie Lian does feel a little woozy from how quickly he's losing blood, his limbs trembling.

Lang Qianqiu clutches him tight against his chest, losing the last loved one he had in this world—this time by his own hand.

"I...I don't know how to do this," the prince whimpers, his face pressed into Xie Lian's hair, fingers trembling as they stroke blood stained locks from his face. "I...I still need..."

I still need you.

A hand lands in his hair, fingers trembling, and he falls silent.

"...You did well, Lang Qianqiu," his teacher rasps, blood dripping from the corners of his mouth.

Weakly—he ruffles the prince's hair. "I'm proud of you."

Wide, horrified eyes stare down at the Guoshi. Filled with endless pain, confusion, and hurt.

"Why?" He whimpers, shaking.

No matter how many times he asks, the prince never receives an answer—just silence. Maddening, heartbreaking silence.

Xie Lian's hand starts to fall, lacking the strength to hold itself up any longer. That really was a powerful blow—he even infused some spiritual power into it.

Xie Lian taught him that, but he's never managed to do it successfully—not until now.

He isn't faking the shakes that wrack his body now. It'll take time, recovering from this.

The prince rocks slowly, holding Xie Lian close, and he whispers—

“…I…I’m so sorry, Guoshi.”

Xie Lian stirs, shaking his head weakly. That—

That wasn’t what he wanted.

“I broke my promise,” the prince mumbles, choking on an endless wave of tears. ‘I won’t ever let anyone hurt you—not ever again.’

For the first time in so long, Xie Lian’s own eyes are wet.

‘Don’t cry for me, little one. I broke mine first.’

“…N…No,” Xie Lian whispers, choking slightly as blood gurgles in his throat. Blindly, he finds Lang Qianqiu’s hand—unable to see how the prince is watching him now— holding it tight.

“I…It’s alright, L…Lang Qianqiu, you…”

Now, he smiles, fingers trembling slightly in his student’s grip, remembering all those years ago, when the prince was so much smaller. How Xie Lian had to coax him into giving his arm the tiniest smack, just to show he was alright.

“You…you can’t hurt me,” he whispers.

That’s when everything starts to blur, his head spinning. Lang Qianqiu’s sobs sound so far away now, and…

He faints, going limp in the prince’s grip, his breaths slowing. Until eventually—it seems like they stop.

The Crown Prince of Yong’an doesn’t know how to let him go.

He sits there, in the grass—his screams piercing the air as he clutches his teacher in his arms, soaked in his blood.

His idol. His trusted advisor. His friend. His first love.

He doesn’t allow anyone else to handle the Guoshi’s body, even if his guards try to insist.

Lang Qianqiu cradles him in his arms as he carries him back down the hill.

His advisors warn him that a powerful being like Fangxin Guoshi might come back as a powerful ghost. That some with ill intentions might try to summon him back with ill intent.

He won't allow that.

He looks after the body with great care, combing his hair, changing him into clean robes, but...he leaves the mask in place.

Lang Qianqiu wants to see that face, if only once, but even now... He's still a good student, reluctant to disobey his master's wishes. But when he does, he discovers—

Flowers.

Petals dried, slightly stained with blood, but familiar.

Lang Qianqiu sinks to his knees, clutching them before his face, lips trembling. "Why did you keep these?" He whispers, his voice hoarse.

It—

He still struggles to understand.

How someone who looked after him for so long could take everything from him.

How someone who loathed him enough to take everything from him could smile just before his death, and tell Lang Qianqiu that he was proud.

How someone he murdered could die with the Lang Qianqiu's flowers tucked into his sleeves.

So many questions, leaving a young man feeling so utterly lost and alone in the world.

But his Guoshi gave him few answers in life—and he offers even fewer in death.

The coffin is specially made—to prevent any malicious attempts at resurrection. Partly at Lang Qianqiu's own request, desiring that his master be allowed to Rest In Peace.

And also, because the people now fear the menace who slaughtered the nobility of Yong'an in a single night.

The place he finds is quiet, on a hill—secluded, unlikely to be disturbed. His men dig the hole deep into the ground as Lang Qianqiu carefully lays Fangxin down, arranging his hair, hands folded over his stomach.

Flowers tucked between them. The Holly stake wasn't his idea.

That came from one of the priests, insisting it was the best way to keep him permanently sealed. And Lang Qianqiu—

He wanted to burst out crying all over again, plunging it into Fangxin's heart, staking him to the bottom of the coffin.

Later, he would lie to himself.

When his grief turned to anger, confusion, and regret—he would say that he did this out of cruelty. As punishment, for the havoc that this man wreaked on his life.

From the permanent scar that his loss would leave on the prince's heart. But at the time...he was only heartbroken.

The priest—the only one that was willing to assist him in giving the Guoshi funeral rites—stands by his side, leaning over to look inside the coffin, expression contemplative.

"Red robes were an interesting choice," he comments. "He looks...almost like a bridegroom."

The prince doesn't reply. Only offers up a small shrug.

A white and gold mask is replaced with a funeral veil that, in truth, almost looks bridal.

Even still, he never looks at the Guoshi's face.

For just a moment, they're left alone one last time.

The young man who kneels beside Xie Lian's coffin isn't a boy anymore. Or a student. He isn't even a prince.

He's a King now. The last Lang who will rule over the Kingdom of Yong'an.

But he will never marry, not in the years before his ascension. Will sire no children.

Carefully, he lifts one limp hand from the coffin, pressing a kiss against those knuckles one last time.

"...I'm sorry," he murmurs, carefully laying that hand back down, arranging it with the flowers once more.

He broke his promise, after all. But...

The coffin is sealed, all three layers—and buried deep into the ground, with mounds of earth poured over it, locking it in place.

No one will hurt his Guoshi again. Whatever his reasons were for doing what he did. For making Lang Qianqiu do what he had to do.

He'll protect him.

Eventually, he leaves the gravesite. Isolated, intentionally unmarked. And he tries to put this time behind him. To tell himself that it's over now, and leave that part of his life behind.

But in the end, part of him always remembers. And he's the one that is left haunted.

When Xie Lian wakes again, it's to a very different kind of darkness. Not the kind that he's used to.

This feels heavy, almost suffocating. But eventually he realizes—there just isn't any air.

Panicked, his fingers scramble, and—

The chain around his neck is still there.

The god lets out a shaky breath, stroking his fingertips over the ring, his other hand feeling around in the darkness, feeling only wood in every direction, and eventually, he realizes—

It's a coffin. He—

He's in a coffin. Buried alive.

At first, he doesn't panic. Not exactly.

His body is still healing from the blow, after all—and while it's hard to breathe, he...he just has to wait.

Xie Lian grips Hong-er's ring tighter between his fingers, lips trembling. He's never minded being a little cramped.

And he's relieved that, even though everything else was changed and his sword was taken, Lang Qianqiu left Hong-er with him.

He knew how precious the ring was to Xie Lian. It was kind of him not to take it.

So many centuries on earth have also taught the god patience.

It took him an entire week to notice the stake.

A week of laying there, fading in and out of unconsciousness from a lack of air, only to realize that he's not dreaming, and he's still—

He's still trapped.

Eventually, his legs started to kick out, feeling for the dimensions.

The coffin was a little wide and long for him, tall enough that he should have been able to roll over, but—

When he tried, he couldn't.

There was something locking him into place. A vague, dull sort of ache. One that he barely noticed until now, fingers fumbling in the dark.

It's not until then that they wrap around the stake sticking out of his chest—and Xie Lian realizes why his body has been so slow to heal.

Because his heart is slowly, constantly reconstructing around the stake running through it, burning his energy and healing capacity.

Trembling, he tries to yank it out, but—it's buried so deeply into the coffin underneath him, and his wounds are so serious, and he can't get any leverage—

Xie Lian can't pull it out.

He can't—

After three weeks, it really starts to dawn on him:

He can't get out.

And in this small, confined space—

Xie Lian already couldn't see, but he's robbed of the sense he's spent so long depending on, to fill in the gaps of his world.

Sound.

There's nothing down here but endless, oppressive silence. Finally, he lets out a strangled whimper.

"...Ruoye," he finally speaks—and after so long of being forced to hide around his neck, the silk band trembles. "H-help me..." He rasps, squirming—blood dripping down his chin whenever he agitates the stake.

The spiritual tool slithers out from around his neck.

THUD!

It tries to slam itself against the roof of the coffin—but it's not like a blade. It can't use nearly as much force without the ability to build momentum.

THUD!

THUD!

THUD!

Maybe, in a normal coffin—it would have been effective, but now...

It doesn't do much of anything, no matter how long or how hard the spiritual device tries.

Eventually, Xie Lian croaks, "J...Just stop," he mumbles, tears gathering at the corners of his eyes. "You should rest, it's no use."

Trembling, Ruoye returns, nuzzling under his chin.

"I...It's alright," Xie Lian tries to reassure it, stroking his fingers over the silk band weakly, staring into the dark. "You...did your best, it's...not...your fault."

The bandage quivers against him, miserable about it's own uselessness. His first breaking point is two months in

When he starts crying hysterically, clawing at the underside of the coffin lid, screaming until his throat goes raw, until there isn't enough oxygen left for him to make a sound, begging someone to save him.

Until his fingernails break and bleed, skin left raw to the bone.

But no matter how hard he fights, no matter how loudly he screams, no one ever comes. The coffin never breaks.

And he tries so hard not to, to be brave, to not cry out for his help, but — After eight months, he cries out for Jun Wu.

Prays fiercely, writing around the stake.

Help me.

Help me.

Help me, help me, help me.

Help me, help me, help, help, help, help, help, help, help, help, help, help, help, help, help, help me!!!!

Why won't anyone help him?

Why does no one ever answer him?

He sobs hysterically, pounding his fists.

Does he...is it...

...Does Xie Lian deserve this?

That's what he starts to think after five years, palms pressed flat against the coffin lid.

How could anyone ever be so hated, so alone and abandoned, if they didn't deserve it?

And why is he alone?

Wasn't that his own doing?

He pushed everyone away. He got Hong-er and Wu Ming killed.

He asked for these shackles, the ones that keep him bound here now.

Wasn't this his own doing?

Wasn't he the one who left the feast unprotected? Was he not the one who broke a young man's heart so deftly?

Xie Lian stops praying, not long after that. He knows why no one will answer him. Knows why he's alone.

Because he does deserve this.

If he can't go to hell, then he can have the next best thing. Like the rest of his centuries of life, the god falls into phases.

He goes an entire year without moving. Laying limp against the wooden floor of the coffin, feeling the earth move around him.

His hearing sharpens to the point where he can hear rodents and insects burrowing into the earth.

Just that sound feels like company, after a decade.

But every now and again, that panic swells back up, and his mind breaks all over again, shattering to pieces in this small, dark space that he's trapped in.

Where he'll sob, and scream, and claw. There are deep gauges in the coffin lid now, stained with his blood.

He'll become too exhausted to move before long, choking on the vacuum inside the coffin, tears pouring down his cheeks.

Ruoye is the only thing that ever calms him down. Gently rubbing over his face, wrapping around his hands, trying to imitate a comforting embrace.

But even then, it doesn't stop the god from weeping.

In his less lucid moments, even now, well over five centuries old, he weeps for his mother.

Thrashing, head whipping around, lacking all sense or real consciousness.

"Mom? I—why is it dark?!" He cries, his legs flailing.

Why can't he see anything? Where's Feng Xin? Why has no one come to wake him up yet?

Why can't he move? Where's his father? He's screaming so loud, why is no one coming?

Is he dead?

He didn't think dying would last so long, or hurt so much.

It always looked so easy.

But his mind always comes back eventually, and he realizes—

His mother isn't answering him, because she's dead.

She hung herself, with the silk bandage that's comforting him now. That's why his father is gone too, for the very same reason.

Feng Xin is gone because Xie Lian broke his heart and sent him away.

Hong'er isn't here because Xie Lian was too careless. Not sending him away, like he should have. Not protecting him well enough.

Wu Ming is gone because Xie Lian was hateful, and he was selfish.

He's blind, because he chose to wear these shackles as penance.

He's alone, because he deserves to be.

He's here because of his own failures. And all he could do to comfort his student was allow Lang Qianqiu to murder and bury him.

So many years pass, and he has no idea.

There's no way of counting the days. No means of keeping track of time anymore. He's lost all sense of it.

His only comfort comes from his dreams—but even then, eventually those grow hollow.

Because even as he clings to Hong'er, he knows.

Knows he'll wake up to darkness.

"What's wrong?" He whispers, holding Xie Lian against his chest, stroking his hair.

The god can't manage to lift his head from Hong'er's shoulder, crying silently, shaking all over.

"Dianxia..." Lips press against his hair. "Just tell me what's wrong."

"I can't die," Xie Lian replies, his voice lacking any semblance of humanity, hope, or life.

It’s just an empty shell. A flat note being played without meaning. The younger man goes still against him.

“…Don’t say that,” he whispers, hugging his god fiercely.

“Don’t ever say that.”

Xie Lian is limp in his hold. Can’t do much more than just lean against him and cry. Not sob, or weep. He doesn’t have the energy for that anymore.

Tears just slip from his eyes like rain, gently drizzling down.

“It would be better than this.”

“Better than what?”

“…Being trapped,” the god mumbles, feeling Hong’er stiffen with worry, but… Before he can ask more, the dream dissolves again.

The good dreams are brief lately. Few and far between.

Most of the time, Xie Lian is left with nightmares.

And while he forgets his dreams, he always remembers his nightmares.

Sometimes, he’s running down a mountain, screaming Hong’er’s name, shivering from the cold, desperately wondering why the boy won’t answer him.

Or he’s chained down in a temple, blindly flinching from the next slice of a blade that’s always coming. And he knows, no matter how many times he begs for it to stop, it won’t.

There are nights when he’s back in his old house, and all he can hear is that… That creaking sound.

But eventually, after running through them so many times, he just…

Falls into it.

Walks blindly through the mountain path, following the exact trail to Hong’er’s body, one that he knows well from walking so many times.

He doesn’t flinch from the stabs of the blade anymore.

He just lays limp in Bai Wuxiang's arms. Sometimes, he even turns into it when the calamity strokes his cheek, allowing himself to find comfort in it.

Why shouldn't he? It doesn't matter. All he has to do is lay there and count. Just to one hundred.

There are worse things.

When he hears that creaking sound, he just reaches up, grasping the hands dangling in front of him.

"Hi, mom," he mumbles, his voice low and empty, squeezing her fingers. "Hi, dad."

And it's fine, that it hurts.

Fine, that he's alone.

Because he deserves this.

YEAR FIVE HUNDRED AND NINETY NINE

"Hey—did someone say you could take a break?!" The foreman snarls. "Move your asses, you aren't getting paid to sit around!"

One of the workers groans, rubbing his lower back, grabbing at his shovel once more. "Fucking bastard..."

They've been working on digging out the foundations for the new villa all month, round the clock. He could stand to give them a break, right?

"Hey, boss!" A voice cries out before the foreman can respond, "We found something!"

He leans back with a frown. "What is it?"

"Uh..." The worker stops, scratching the side of his head. "It kinda looks like a coffin? But I’ve never seen anything like it.”

“...A coffin?” The foreman frowns, shoving his paperwork aside as he follows his employee towards the center of the worksite. “There’s no graveyard.”

But when he approaches—it certainly looks like one, and all of his men... They look absolutely terrified.

“What’s gotten into—?”

Thud .

The foreman stops, staring down at the box.

Thud .

Well.

Thud .

That explains why...they’re...

“Is something...moving in there?!”

Everyone scrambles back, but...

Originally, hoping it was some sort of buried treasure horde, one of the men has already loosened the locks.

BOOM!

The lid swings open with a heavy creak, kicking aside countless layers of earth and dust.

Slowly, a figure sits up. Honestly, it looks like a monster.

Covered in dried blood, dust, and...and what looks like a bridal gown, dark, impossibly long hair tangled around it’s face, arms red to the elbow, skin impossibly pale, it...

The creature opens its mouth, and all they hear is a dull hiss.

No one dares to move, dares to breathe as they watch these hands reach for it’s chest, and—

They all watch as a wooden stake is pulled out, tossed to the ground with a quiet clatter.

One worker lifts a trembling finger, pointing.

“V…V…VAMPIRE!!!”

The screaming starts again.

Everyone flees the scene, running down the hill as fast as their legs will take them.

For one moment of madness, the foreman almost asks them what they’re doing, running off on the job. But…

He takes one more look at that thing, and he starts running too. For a moment, the god just sits there.

Taking in the sounds of the screams, the footsteps racing down the hill. The breeze on his face.

And warmth.

Xie Lian shivers, tilting his head back.

That’s—?

That’s sunlight.

He’d almost forgotten what it felt like.

Then, he feels something crawling up his arm, slow, tiny little legs.

E—

Eight little legs.

“…AIIIIIEEEEEEEEEEE!”

The men at the bottom of the mountain screech when they hear that scream, running even faster. One even pisses himself.

The coffin is in shambles around him.

Xie Lian trembles, examining the tiny little bite on his forearm with his fingertips, and then—

His shoulders start to shake, and a tiny little giggle slips out. Then a chuckle.

Finally, there's full blown, roaring laughter as he rolls onto his back in the dirt, howling.

"WHAT THE FUCK?!" He cackles, clutching his stomach, kicking his feet against the ground. He can't imagine what a grotesque sight he makes right now, but—

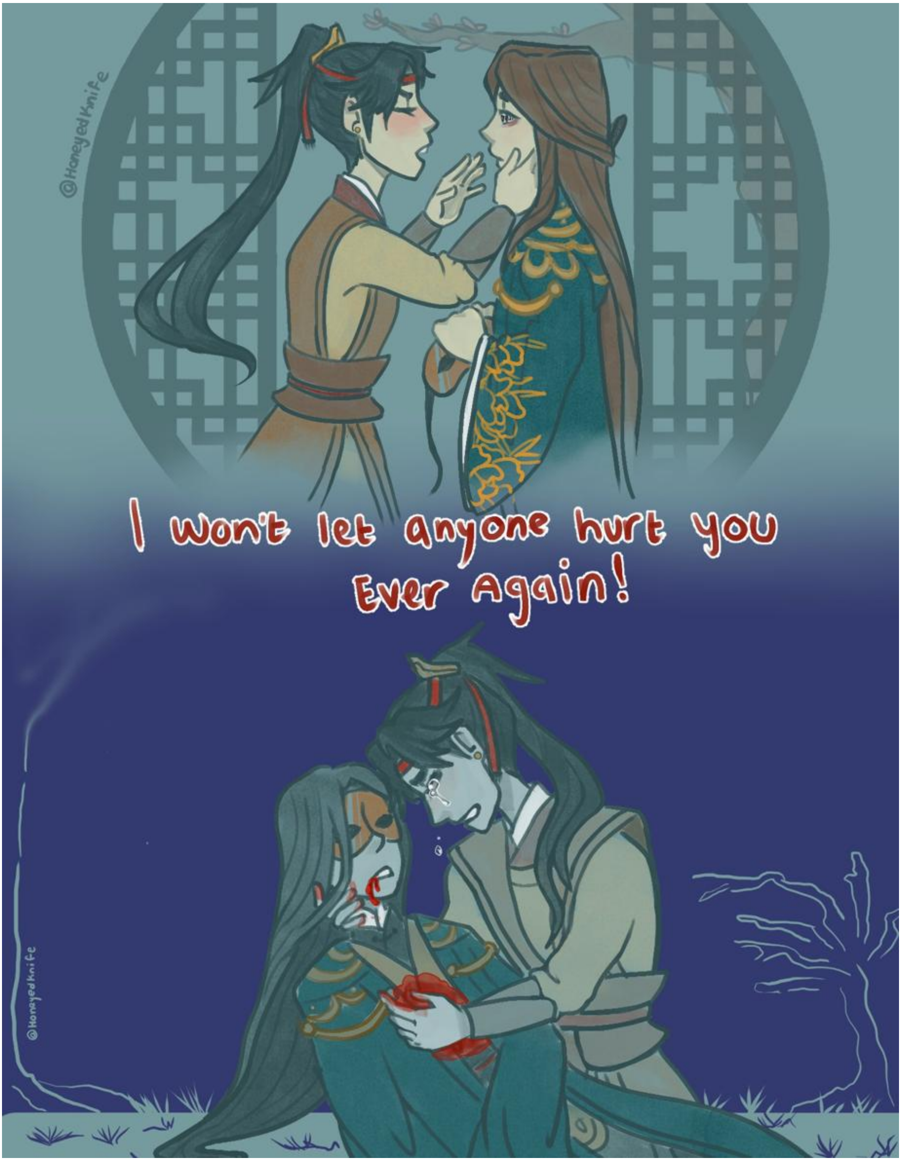
"HOW?!"

He laughs, laughs until he cries, his ribs aching.

How the fuck, after all of that, is he still afraid of spiders?!

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

Included with permission from the artists, do not reproduce or reuse for any reason.



@HoneyedKnife
I won't let anyone hurt you Ever Again!
@HoneyedKnife

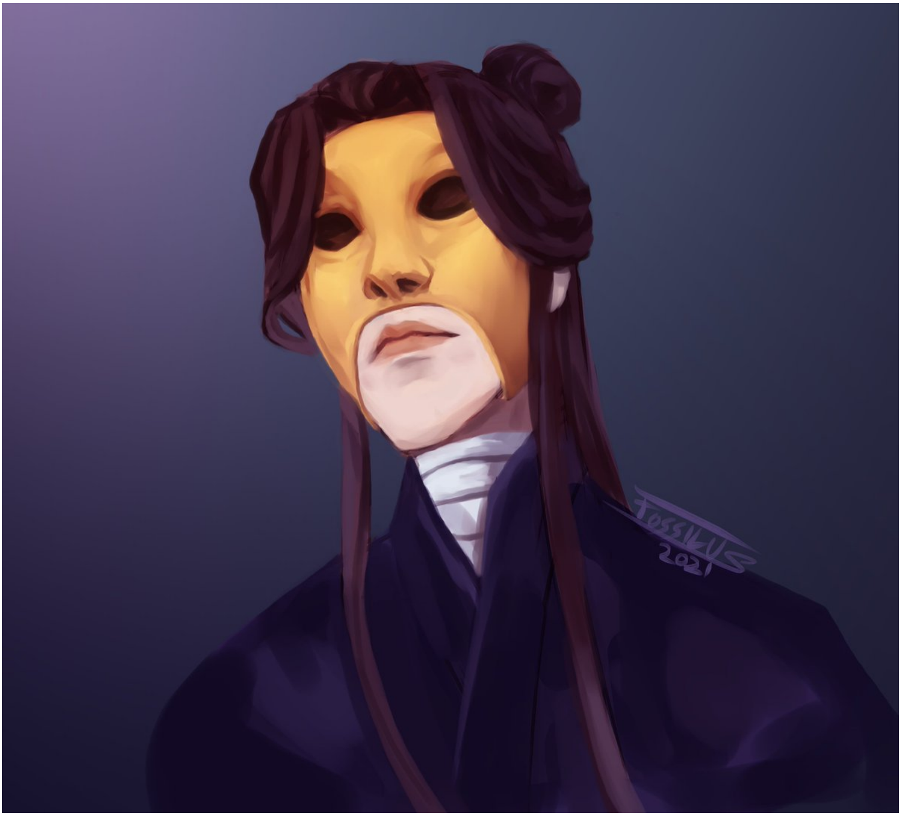
CREDIT: Honey support the artwork HERE

[image]

CREDIT: LACE, support the artwork HERE

CREDIT: LAKITSUNE, support the artwork HERE

CREDIT: PRI, support the artwork HERE



Fossilkus 2021

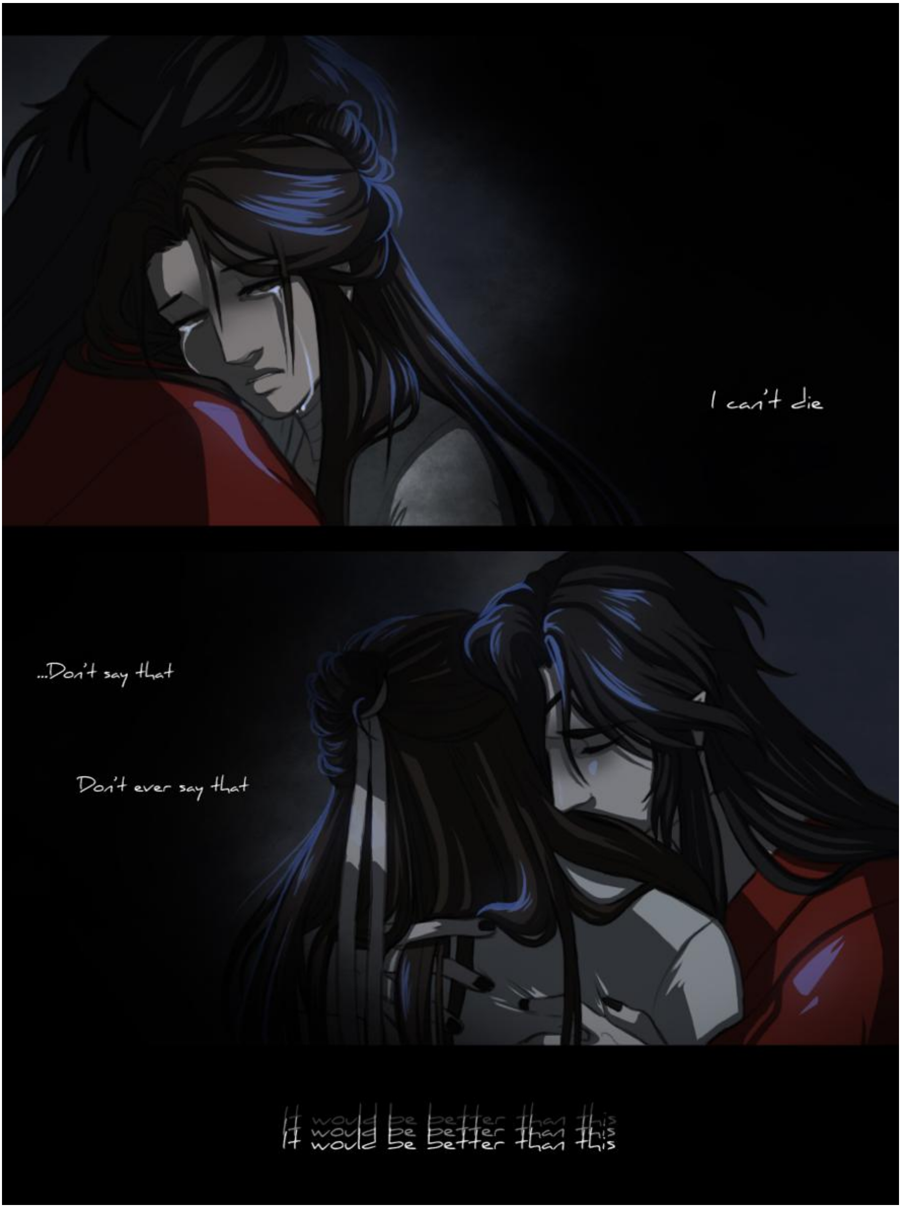
CREDIT: FOSSIL, support the artwork HERE

[image]

CREDIT: SEONG, support the artwork HERE

[image]

CREDIT: REN, support the artwork HERE



I can't die
...Don't say that
Don't ever say that
It would be better than this
It would be better than this
It would be better than this

CREDIT: HITHREN, support the artwork HERE

Chapter End Notes

thank you so much to Honey, Lace, Seong, Fossil, Pri, Hithren, Ren, and Lakitsune for their beautiful work, and allowing me to share it! It means so much, and I'm very grateful!

xoxo, Evie

Campfire Stories

Chapter Summary

> Xie Lian stops in the street, tilting his head back.
>
> It’s started to snow. Small flakes land on his face, melting against his cheeks.
>
> Grief is a learning process. It’s also—it’s different from a broken bone, something that you can heal from and forget about it.
>
> Xie Lian used to think it was something that he needed to keep on rebreaking, that if it didn’t hurt, remembering Hong’er, then he was forgetting him. Now, Xie Lian is starting to understand that grief is more like a torn tendon, or a bad knee.
>
> He has good days, and he has bad days. On the bad days, he nurses it. Holds himself close, and clings onto his dreams.
>
> But on the good days?
>
> Remembering Hong’er makes him happy.

Chapter Notes

> You can find me on twitter and keep up with current updates of the story HERE
>
> For those who are interested in that sort of thing, this section is heavily inspired by the song "Stories" by Lilli Furfaro!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Eventually, he finds a river. Has to sit in it for countless hours, letting the current rub over his skin before there’s any sign of progress, loosening decades worth of mud, dust, and blood.

His hair has grown so long, it actually trails behind him when he walks.

Most of it is so tangled and matted with blood, he ends up going at it with a sharpened rock. Sitting on the riverbank, soaked and shivering, rocking back and forth, trying to self soothe after so many years just…just…

Xie Lian doesn't have a word for what that was. He's suffered before, but never like that.

His body feels shaky and unsteady, like it's forgotten how to be anything more than a corpse.

And now he sits here, alone, sawing at his hair, trying to cut away what isn't salvageable, whimpering like a wounded animal.

It takes him time to remember how to just...be.

Eventually, he manages to bring himself to wash his robes. They aren't much anymore, but better than going naked.

Wanders into the nearest town, finding a corner to sit on, barely able to do more than beg.

Eventually, an elderly woman takes pity on him. She brings mantou every now and again, takes the time to help him comb out his hair fully, and eventually, when it's clear nothing more can be done, gives him a proper haircut.

It barely reaches his shoulders, now.

He's...surprisingly mournful about it, when he remembers the way that Hong'er used to fawn over his hair. Carefully combing it every night before bed, and when he mentioned the 'type of person' he liked...

Long, pretty hair. That was what he said. Not everyone has hair like that.

"...I'm sorry I couldn't save more of it," the old woman sighs, helping him pull it up and away from his face. "On the bright side—everyone can see how good looking you are now, yes?"

"..." Xie Lian offers a small smile, but it's awkward.

"It's...just hair," he mumbles.

He's careful, enunciating each syllable slowly.

He had to ask someone the date, and when he did, he realized—

It was a hundred years, give or take. Probably a little more than that. And in a hundred years, he forgot how to speak to other people.
"It...grows back."

It'll be fine, he'll—

He'll get better. He always does.

Eventually, he's able to exchange the bridal robes for a cheap set of cotton clothes. He has no idea what color.

He'll have to try and find a new loom soon, if he can start scrap collection again. Who knows...

Who knows where it is now. He left it somewhere in the palace of Yong'an. It might have burnt up that night, who can say.

One day, when he's passing by a temple, he hears people praying to a new martial god —warden of the East.

The Crown Prince of Yong'an, Lang Qianqiu.

Even now, after all of that—the god can't find it in himself to feel any bitterness. Really—

Can any teacher ever feel bitter, when they see a beloved student do so well?

In time, with his wandering, he turns to the one thing that no one ever allowed him to do, in the old days.

Busking.

Sword swallowing, fire eating, shattering boulders on his chest.

Despite Feng Xin making a scene over not allowing him to do it, he's not half bad. Even makes a bit of a reputation for himself, wandering the border towns, making children cheer and clap.

It's all the more impressive when you consider the fact that he's blind. People pay more.

It's enough for him to have enough to eat day in and day out. And after a century of no food and water, just having the sun on his skin, the wind on his face, and food in his stomach...

That's practically paradise. It's all that he can ask for.

He learns to enjoy the acrobatics shows the most, jumping as high as he can, twirling and flipping in the air as the children gasp with delight, adults breaking into applause.

It’s not much, no. But it’s living.

It’s enough for him to wake up in the morning with a small smile on his face, stretching his arms over his head, letting out a tired yawn as he reaches for the chain around his neck.

He missed this the most.

“Good morning Hong’er,” he murmurs, pressing a kiss against the metal.

He’s said that one hundred and eighty thousand, seven hundred, and sixty six times now.

“Today is going to be a good day.”

He would have said it more often, but he couldn’t keep track of the days before. Didn’t know if it was morning or night.

So this—this is so much better.

Even when the army shows up, making the elective decision that the local street performer is not, in fact, blind.

If he was, how could he be so good at so many different things? It made no sense. Xie Lian doesn’t wear Ruoye around his eyes anymore, he can’t.

Human’s cannot be allowed to see cursed shackles. That is part of heavenly law. Ruoye has to cover the shackle around his throat, and Xie Lian’s boots look after the manacle around his ankle.

And when the army demands he open his eyes, he’s forced to refuse to comply. Naturally, as a result, the presumption is that he’s a liar.

Xie Lian started his life as a prince, but in reality—he’s always been a soldier. Fighting one battle or another, but the lessons were always the same.

This isn’t new to him. And so, he goes along.

And, in a turn of events that shocks everyone else around him in his platoon—he does incredibly well.

Xie Lian, however, is not particularly surprised.

This isn’t his first war. It isn’t even his 5th.

He's a skilled fighter, a seasoned strategist. An inspiring leader at times.

He rises quick, obtaining the rank of general—younger than anyone else in the country's history.

And, in his own fashion—he falls just as fast.

"...People think you're insane, you know." One of his men comments, watching as the officer lays back in the grass.

Enjoying the sun.

Xie Lian smiles. It comes easier now, than it used to.

"Sometimes, you have to be," he sighs, stretching his arms over his head. "You got any extra mantou?"

Instead of immediately offering, the young soldier blurts out— "Is it true that you're blind, General Hua?"

"..." Xie Lian sits up. His hair is longer now, and when he doesn't have a mission, he lets it flow free, tumbling loosely around his shoulders. His armor gleams gently in the sun as he turns his head, offering his subordinate a cheerful smile. "Sure am— now, about that mantou—"

"Wasn't there a famous blind cultivator named Hua Xie?" Another soldier speaks up, rubbing his chin, and Xie Lian's smile fades slightly.

"Yeah, I remember something like that...wasn't he some wandering sage, the one who trained the founder of the Jiang Sect?"

"Yeah..." Whoops.

"That's actually an ancestor of mine," Xie Lian explains, and when he can sense the soldiers looking at one another with confusion, he adds —

"Most men in my family go blind fairly young."

He's gotten better at lying over time, especially to people who don't know him well.

They accept that, but Xie Lian is going to need to come up with a better alias, the next time he needs one. He's been underground for so long, he forgot what it was like to need to think about that sort of thing.

His time with the army sort of goes by in a bit of a blur.

It's so soon after he came out of that coffin—he still struggles with his memory. The passage of time—it gets hazy for him. He'll lose days, even weeks, in a daze.

But some things never change.

That advice that Xie Lian gave Lang Qianqiu? About following the rules of Heaven, even if that meant going against what he believed in?

Yeah, that was more of a 'do as I say, not as I do,' sort of order. Because Xie Lian, even after all these years, can't seem to cut it out.

He's still throwing himself in the middle of things, constantly intervening with humans and their battles. Never using an inappropriate amount of force—it's not like he could, anyway—but—

Xie Lian told himself that he wouldn't hurt people anymore.

He also won't stand by.

It makes him popular with the people, but not with his superiors.

It's not something that Xie Lian ever cared about to begin with—and his fall, it's in pace with everything else he's done so far.

He never complains—never feels sorry for himself.

Not even when he's back as a foot soldier, working to make some crude attempt at soup in his helmet.

"What the hell is that?!" One of his comrades groans, kicking it over. "Who said you could cook on your personal time? That shit looks lethal!"

Xie Lian frowns.

"It's called seven swans soup!" He huffs. "And it wasn't finished."

"...Does it have swans in it?"

The soldier opens his mouth, then shuts it. "Well, no."

"Then why did you call it that?"

"...Flair?" he offers with a helpless shrug. "And why seven?"

“...Alliteration?”

“Huh?”

Xie Lian is struggling to explain the finer points of literary devices to a man with hardly more than a primary education, when he hears the helmet rattling on the ground and—little hands pawing at the stew inside.

Oh. Oh no.

“...I wouldn’t do that!” He warns, turning around.

But before he can say more, he already hears the pathetic sounds of retching.

On one hand, he’s dismayed. It’s that bad? Sure, he didn’t expect it to taste good, he’s never had great results, but...

Instant puking? He’s that bad?

“Oh, hell...” One of the men grumbles.

“It’s that half breed that’s always in the market.”

Xie Lian pauses, his eyes narrowing.

“...Half breed?” He questions flatly.

“Father was Yong’an, but her mother? She was Banyue. Little piece of—!” He stops when the former General catches him by the wrist.

“Your watch is about to start,” the young man reminds him with a pleasant smile. “You don’t want to be late.”

His smile is pleasant, his words are pleasant. But the grip on the man’s wrist?

That’s downright unpleasant.

“...Right,” he mutters, shaking his head. “Suppose I do.”

When the others walk away, he turns back towards the sound of the retching—which has now been replaced by tired sniffling, and kneels down.

“...Here,” he murmurs, fumbling in his pocket for a moment—pulling out some mantou. “It’s cold, but…”

She doesn’t hesitate to snatch it.

Xie Lian smiles, listening to her eat voraciously, clearly half starved, but not lacking in spirit.

Good, she might end up alright, then.

From then on, he has a little shadow, trailing behind him at every turn.

And that—that makes him remember a time so long ago.

When he was stumbling around, so lost in the world.

And a little boy would come to the steps of an abandoned shrine to bring him food.

“…” Xie Lian stops in the street, tilting his head back.

It’s started to snow.

Small flakes land on his face, melting against his cheeks.

Grief is a learning process. It’s also—it’s different from a broken bone, something that you can heal from and forget about it.

Xie Lian used to think it was something that he needed to keep on rebreaking, that if it didn’t hurt, remembering Hong’er, then he was forgetting him.

Now, Xie Lian is starting to understand that grief is more like a torn tendon, or a bad knee.

He has good days, and he has bad days. On the bad days, he nurses it. Holds himself close, and clings onto his dreams.

But on the good days?

Remembering Hong’er makes him happy.

He’ll tilt his head back, holding Hong’er’s ashes, and feel the snow on his face, remembering the nights that they used to huddle close next to the fire.

And Xie Lian will smile, because even after every horrible thing that’s happened, this is still the world that gave him that.

It still snows, and the air is biting on his face, but it makes him feel alive.

People are still cruel to one another, but they're also good, in these brief moments of grace that break Xie Lian in the most beautiful ways, each and every time.

And every time, it reminds him.

When he hears the sound of children playing in the streets, or mothers scolding them to come inside.

Even when he's stopping different groups of soldiers from killing one another, or slaughtering civilians.

Xie Lian adores this world, in all of it's cracks and blemishes.

Humans are most beautiful at their points of fracture, because that's where healing begins.

Courage, his Guoshi used to tell him so many years ago, always grows from the wound.

He remembers that, on his bad days, when the pain is almost to difficult to brace against.

Xie Lian remembers what a spoiled child he used to be, building golden palaces, only to weep when he watched them fall back down. Even though that was the point.

Remembers the arrogant teenager he became, judging the world, foolish enough to think he could change it.

And now, he's a broken man.

But broken things aren't worthless. And pain isn't the same thing as taking a step backward.

Xie Lian—

He's just growing up. Slower than he has any right to, but he's getting there.

And sometimes, that hurts.

He takes a seat next to the campfire, his head tilted back so he can enjoy the snow, leaning back against the city walls.

And still, he hears the patter of tiny little feet—probably bare against the cold. Xie Lian used to be such a brat, he had little patience for children.

Now, he can smile gently, holding up a piece of mantou from the inside of his sleeve, not showing an ounce of displeasure when it's snatched away.

But now, instead of scurrying away, she sits with him, eating by the fire. And now, he opens his arms in offering.

It's cold, after all, and his military uniform is padded and warm, with a cape that can be pulled around them both.

The little one—Banyue, named for her mother's people—used to be so hesitant. Now, she clamors into his arms, grateful for the warmth.

In all of the time that she can remember—in a short, often unbearably cruel life, this is the place where she's felt the safest.

Cradled in a blind man's lap next to a campfire, watching it's flames crackle and spit sparks as she chews on bits of mantou.

General Hua tells the best stories, some of them unbelievable, others sad. But even when she points that out, he reassures her that the lessons are the point behind them.

Some stories might be sad, but if you learn something—that makes it all worth it. She tries hard to listen.

The one about the boy in the mountain always makes her cry, but—

The one about the circus, it always makes her laugh. And no matter how sheepish he seems when she asks, General Hua is always ready to tell it again, stroking her hair, his voice soft and calm as she falls asleep.

Some nights, he sings songs in a language that she doesn't recognize. It almost sounds like the language of Yong'an, but not quite. Like it's too ancient for her to understand.

When she asks about it, he explains that they're old lullabies, from his home. His voice is nice.

She doesn’t know why he’s so kind to her. No one else is, aside from the older boy occasionally lingering in the market place, but she’s the only person that he seems to like.

General Hua always makes sure she has something to eat, and a place to sleep. No one hurts her, or calls her names when he’s nearby.

He teaches her things. Sometimes silly little games, like building with little stone pebbles, or cat’s in the cradle.

But he also teaches her important things.

Like how to read. How to hold a knife, and hide one away.

One day, when he finds her weeping and beaten in the street, he carries her back to camp, taking the time to patch her up. When she tries to push him away, saying that it doesn’t matter—

The soldier rests both hands on her shoulders firmly, his expression stern.

“Of course it does,” he murmurs, dabbing at the bruises on her cheeks. “You matter, Banyue.”

It was the first time in the little girl’s entire life that anyone ever told her that she mattered.

And oh, how her eyes welled up with tears that day, her cheeks splotchy and red.

General Hua never complained. Even offered his sleeve for her to wipe her tears and snot away on.

And he’s the only one who ever speaks to her like she has a future. A real one. Something more than surviving from day to day.

One night, when she’s dozing in his lap, he asks:

“Banyue, what do you want to be when you grow up?”

Her answer honestly startles him. It takes her a while to come up with it, but when she does, she sounds completely resolved.

“A wife.”

General Hua sputters, and he tries not to be judgmental.

"Just a wife?"

"Yes."

She's so emphatic, that he has to ask—

"What makes you so sure about it? You're too young to be thinking about marriage. Or boys at all. They're not that great, you know."

"You're a boy, General Hua."

He lets out a noncommittal grunt, "They're more trouble than they're worth."

Banyue shrugs, cuddling closer underneath his cloak, until only her eyes and nose poke out, her voice slightly muffled. "Because wives have families. And when you have a family, you're never alone."

"..." The General holds her a little closer, his gaze unreadable.

"And they take care of everyone," Banyue mumbles, "Kind of like you." She yawns, and her next words—they draw a surprised snort out of the god.

"You'd make a really good wife, General Hua."

"..." He can't stop himself from smiling—just a little. "Well, thank you very much." She hums, pressing closer. "...What about you?"

"Hmm?"

"What did you want to be, when you grew up?"

When you're born a prince, that certainly is a complicated question to answer. He never exactly had to think about future career prospects. And then, he was focused on godhood.

Slowly, he tilts his head back into the sky, his breath fogging up in front of him. "... When I was a kid?" He sighs, the firelight illuminating the high points of his face in a warm glow. "...I wanted to save the world," he admits, knowing how silly that must sound now, but...

Banyue shakes her head, her eyes wide, watching him intently.

"It doesn't sound silly to me, General Hua." She mumbles. And—

Xie Lian can’t see her expression, but he can tell from her voice—

Banyue really does believe that he could.

Save the world, and all of that.

Children always tend to think that the people they look up to can do whatever they set their minds to. It’s that believe that makes them so precious, but Xie Lian…

He’s painfully aware of just how fallible he is. “General Hua?”

“Hmm?”

“Could you tell another story?”

He smiles faintly, settling down a little more comfortably, so she can sit easier in his lap. “Which one?”

“The Goat one!”

“Alright, well—once, there was a shepherd—”

“Wait, actually…” She thinks it over. “The Bridegroom, tell me that one?”

“Are you sure, this time?”

“Yes!”

His fingers twitch, and she swears—somehow, the fire manages to burn just a little brighter.

“Once, a long, long time ago, there was a young man from a small village, and he was good at everything he tried,” Xie Lian murmurs, biting back a small yawn.

“And nobody liked him?” Banyue prompts, more than familiar with the story by now.

Xie Lian smiles faintly, nodding in agreement. “And nobody liked him,” the prince murmurs. “Because they were really very jealous.”

“Not very nice…” She mumbles. “Not at all,” Xie Lian agrees.

“And it made the young man sad, because he was always alone. Eventually he got so lonely that he never tried to talk to anyone. And even on festival days, he would go all by himself…”

“Wearing red!” The child interjects, finishing her mantou. “Wearing red,” the god smiles.

“And one day, when he was watching a parade all by himself on a city wall, he fell down. It was very high, and everyone thought he was going to die, but—”

“The prince caught him!”

“He did,” the sparks from the fire drift lazily in the air before flickering out.

“He was leading the parade, but when he saw the boy falling, he jumped without looking back. And when the prince caught him, the boy in red was so grateful, he wanted to protect the prince in return.”

“So he followed him…”

Banyue never once questioned the fact that the story was about two men. Maybe because she was so young, and Xie Lian spoke about such things like they were normal. It’s difficult to say.

“…and he always thought he was a burden.”

“But he wasn’t!”

“No, he certainly wasn’t.”

“But he never realized—the prince was lonely too, and he was very happy for the company.”

Xie Lian doesn’t know why Banyue always liked this story best, the ending isn’t exactly sad—but it isn’t happy, either.

He explains how the two fell in love, looking after one another.

He closes over the details of the bridegroom’s death, explaining simply that he was buried in red.

And here—this part is where he always fudges the details. Just a little bit.

After all, Hong’er’s story ended that night, but with the way Xie Lian tells it…

He lies a little.

He says that the bridegroom came back as a ghost fire, following his love through the world. Keeping him company through every hardship.

It's wishful thinking, and maybe a little disrespectful, to combine those memories, but...it's just a story.

That's what he tells himself.

Explains that he managed to come back—for just one day, and give his prince a kiss, but then he disappeared again.

"...And why couldn't they just find each other again?" Banyue yawns, almost asleep.

"Well, you see—the prince had really awful luck," Xie Lian explains.

"But his love kept on looking for him, still wearing the red robes he was buried in..."

"...Because when they meet again, they'll get married," Banyue finishes, a contented smile on her face.

"Why do you like that story so much?" Xie Lian sighs. "'Cause it's really romantic."

Banyue mumbles, cuddling closer to Xie Lian's chest, her words slurring a little with her fatigue. "And it sounds like...that one ghost."

The prince raises an eyebrow, "Which ghost?"

"Y'know...the red...no...crimson...r..." Every pause is punctuated by a yawn, and then she's snoring.

Xie Lian sighs, pushing all thoughts of ghosts and bridegrooms aside, for now— enjoying the weight of the little girl in his arms.

Company never lasts long, not with him. And as much as he wants to say in the lives of the people he meets...he's learned by now.

He can't.

His luck can be dangerous—especially to humans. He's narrowed it down to around a four year time frame. That's about as long as he can stick around without causing immediate disaster.

They're creeping up on that cut off, now.

And he won't let Banyue end up like…like…

There are so many examples, it honestly depresses him.

And in the time that follows, when his bad luck does come for Banyue—Xie Lian has learned his lesson well enough to bodily throw himself in front of it.

Even if that means quite literally being crushed by it. It's worth it

At least he'll get lucky next time, and they'll just toss his body in a river instead of burying it underground.

But Xie Lian doesn't know that yet. Doesn't have to worry about what's to come, or anything other than the fact that, for now, he isn't alone.

He enjoys the warmth of the little girl in his arms, the sting of the cool breeze on his face—and he remembers what he said to An Le, that night.

The last real conversation he had, before he went into that coffin:

'I never fathered any children, and I never will.'

Of course, he knows that's true.

Even now, it's difficult to see himself as an actual parent—for more reasons than one.

First and foremost: that would require being with a woman. The thought of being with a man might make Xie Lian feel clueless, but…

The thought of being with a woman makes him feel queasy in an unpleasant sort of way, and even if he could manage it…that just doesn't sound very fair to his hypothetical partner, in that situation.

But beyond logistics…Children deserve parents who can give them what they need

Xie Lian can't even take care of himself very well. Much less a helpless little person.

He makes a good replacement parent, he thinks. He's not awful at looking after children who don't have anyone else, but…

He’s finally learned his lessons. He deserves to be alone.

He has a tendency to wreck things—and if he wants people to be happy, then it’s best to keep his distance.

What he doesn’t deserve, is a family.

He lets those desires go. Tells himself that the time in his life when those possibilities existed has passed.

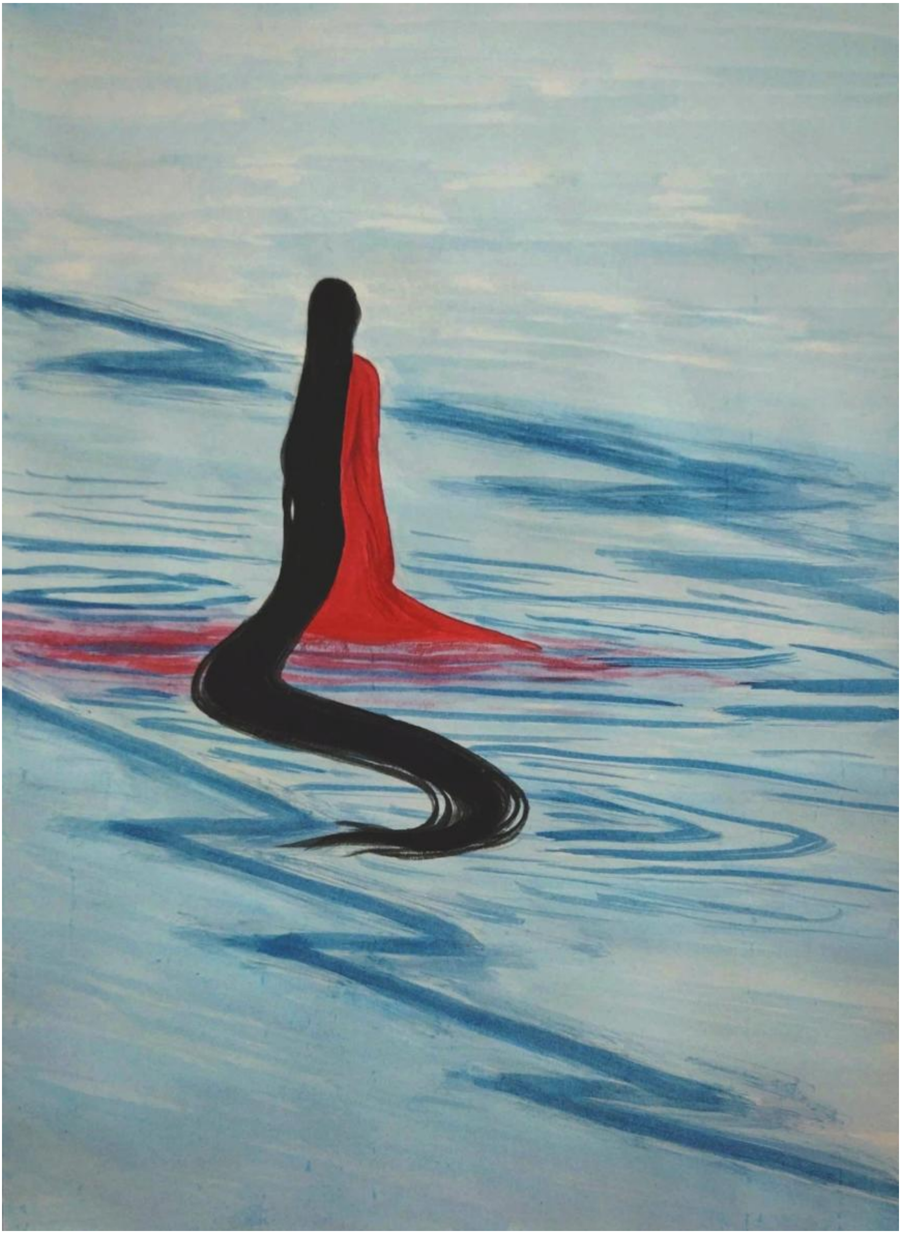
And it’s not so bad.

Because on nights like this—when he’s holding Banyue, he knows that it won’t last. But in the moment, it feels like a glimpse of something he wouldn’t have gotten to have, otherwise.

And for that, he’s grateful.

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY: XIE LIAN WITH EXTREMELY LONG / OR SHORT HAIR EDITION

Each piece is included with permission from the artist, do not reproduce or repost for any reason.



CREDIT: ESME, support the artwork HERE

CREDIT: PRI, support the artwork HERE

[image]

CREDIT: ENVY, support the artwork HERE

[image]

CREDIT: SEONG, support the artwork HERE

FOR THOSE WANTING TO CATCH UP ON TWITTER, YOU CAN DO SO HERE

Chapter End Notes

Thank you so much to Envy, Pri, Seong, and Esme for your beautiful artwork, and for allowing me to share it! I'm so grateful!

xoxo, Evie

The Ghost Officer

Chapter Summary

> “I have recently come into an...interesting situation,” He Xuan shrugs, tossing his hair back over his shoulder. “In large part due to the funds you loaned me.” Hua Cheng stares at him, lifting his drink to his lips—clearly unimpressed. “...And I have an opportunity for you.”
>
> “An opportunity?” Hua Cheng repeats flatly, crossing his arms.
>
> “A hiring opportunity, to be more specific.”

Chapter Notes

> You can find me on twitter and keep up with current updates of the story HERE
>
> This chapter starts off somewhat sad, but! It has some comedy towards the end!

YEAR SIX HUNDRED AND FIFTY

“You’re sure?”

Hua Cheng has been in this chamber many times. More than he can count—and one of those occasions is one that he can’t even remember, but—

It’s been centuries since it was for something like this.

“Don’t try to change my mind.”

He’s led countless children through this door before, and now, well...

The woman who stands before it is tall, heavy dark hair pulled up into two neat buns on either side of her head, wearing lavender robes.

They have silver rabbits stitched into the sleeves.

Shuo stands by his side, hands balled into fists. Yanlin doesn’t look back.

The three of them have known each other longer than most beings on earth. Though, to be fair—they know each other best.

Hua Cheng has watched over them—but from a distance.

For six entire centuries.

They lost Bao a century ago. His spirit was dispersed in a conflict with, well…

Qi Rong only escaped with his life because Hua Cheng was focused on making sure Shuo survived, and has been intelligent enough to hide himself well ever since.

Since then, it's been just them.

Shuo and Yanlin aren't children anymore.

In fact, in the time since Hua Cheng took the two under his wing, they've both aged to the point where they look older than him.

Both in their early thirties, while the Ghost King is eternally young.

"It's not like you have a reason to go," Shuo tries to reason, his eyebrows knitting together. "You—!"

"I don't have a reason to stay, either." She mutters, her head held high. "I was six when I died, Shuo."

"I was seven."

"It's not the same for you!" She snaps.

"You…"

Shuo has done well, as a ghost. Far better than any other under Hua Cheng's direct command, obtaining a savage rank.

Hua Cheng doesn't imagine he'll ever become a true calamity. The odds of another being born this millennia are rather low. But he rivals Qi Rong, now.

"You might be fine with all of this," Yanlin mutters. "But there were things I wanted from my human life that I'll never get to have."

"Like what?!" Shuo glares. As far as he's concerned, the afterlife beats his human life any day. "What can't you have now?"

"A family!"

She snaps, turning around and stomping her foot. "And don't you DARE treat me like I'm silly for wanting that!"

"You..." Shuo pauses, looking slightly uncomfortable. Hua Cheng doesn't say a word, his arms crossed as he watches the two bicker. "You could still...there are..."

"Ghosts that would have me?" Yanlin scoffs, and Hua Cheng sighs.

He's more than aware of the fact that the female ghost has had an interest in him for quite some time. He isn't a fool.

But he's also belonged to someone else for his entire life, and that will never change.

She's never forced those feelings on him. Never made it a problem. But her frustration has occasionally been palpable. Particularly when Hua Cheng would refuse to let them any closer than they already are.

But the one that he pities, in the end, is Shuo.

"...Yeah," he mumbles.

"There are."

Shuo, who has loved Yanlin since they were children. Only to constantly fall in the shadow of someone the girl wanted, but could never truly have.

"...Even if there were," she shakes her head. "I want children. A home. A life. What's wrong with that?"

In truth, there's nothing wrong with it. They're all normal things for a girl her age to want. Things that were taken from her, in the end. Cruelly and unfairly.

Shuo can't begrudge her that. But Hua Cheng can see the heartbreak in his gaze. "Couldn't you wait a little longer?

Shuo's voice is small now, almost pleading.

But Yanlin just shakes her head, her gaze firm, never leaving that door.

The red door.

“I stayed this long for Bao,” She mutters. “He needed to take care of someone—and you got too independent after a little while. But now...”

She wraps her arms around herself tightly. “I’m ready.”

Shuo’s hands ball up into fists by his sides. “You...don’t even know what kind of life you’ll have, next time around. What if it’s worse? What if you’re better off here?”

“Then I’ll die again, and I’ll try again.” She shrugs.

Hua Cheng’s gaze softens, becoming slightly fond.

That’s Yanlin.

Anger is her natural fear response. It’s not always the most endearing. Actually—it makes most people turn away from her.

But she’s strong. And to the people she loves? Utterly selfless. She’ll be a good mother.

“I’ll keep going until I have a rich husband, and a cute son!” She snaps, crossing her arms, “If I get that, then sure—I’ll stay as a ghost as long as I can. But that’s what I want.”

Shuo looks at Hua Cheng helplessly, desperate for the Ghost King to intervene. If he asked, Yanlin would stay. They both know it.

But the decision to stay or move on is precious. Hua Cheng appreciates it more than once.

Slowly, he walks to the female ghost’s side, surveying the door as he stands next to her.

“You’re ready?”

Her lips turn up weakly.

“...Yeah,” she mumbles, reaching over.

Hua Cheng doesn’t often allow others into his personal space, not outside of a fight. But now, he lets her grasp onto his hand, squeezing his fingers tightly.

“...Thank you, Hua Cheng.”

He arches an eyebrow. “What for?”

Yanlin bites her lip, so hard that it begins to throb.

“...When I died, I was so, so scared.” She whispers, eyes still staring straight ahead. “And—when the bandage man—”

“Lang Ying,” Hua Cheng reminds her gently.

Yanlin swallows dryly. “L-Lang Ying. When he took me, I...”

Her teeth clench, and her chin tilts down.

“I had a horrible life.” She whispers. “I loved my mom, and my little brother. But... horrible things happened to me.”

She’s never said what, not in six centuries. Even now, taking about it brings tears to her eyes, and her hand shakes.

Hua Cheng squeezes it silently, offering her reassurance. It’s not something he would do for most.

She sniffles, wiping at her eyes. “And—when Lang Ying took me, I thought the same thing was going to happen again. And I was so, so scared. I—I hate feeling scared.”

“I know,” Hua Cheng murmurs, never looking away from the door, knowing that she only feels comfortable talking like this when no one is looking at her.

“It makes me so mad...” She mutters, and the Ghost king almost smiles.

“I know.”

“But then...Shuo and Bao found me.” She smiles, and the tears flow just a little bit faster. “They gave me that string, and they told me...if I stayed with them, and I held on, I would be safe. And—” Her voice cracks. “So many people in my life promised to keep me safe, but...”

For once, Hua Cheng feels a little...

Moved.

“You were the only one who ever actually did,” the ghost admits. “And I...was never scared like that again. Not ever.”

Because Yanlin worshipped a man who always denied being a god, but he protected his believers like no other.

“I just wish I could have been...”

“You were useful,” Hua Cheng murmurs, eyes straight ahead.

Her lips tremble, and the Ghost King bends over.

He’s never been an affectionate person, she’s never seen him do more than shake someone’s hand, but...

Hua Cheng kisses the top of her head.

“They needed you.”

She was the youngest of the three, it’s true—

But Yanlin was always Shuo and Bao’s big sister. Looking after them. Anticipating their needs. Putting them first.

And if this is what she wants, moving on...

She deserves to have it.

Her hand clings to his so tightly, trembling.

Over half a millennia ago, when she was still so small, and he was barely a calamity at all, she held his hand just like this.

‘I’m not ready yet, but...when I am, will you bring me back here?’ He kept his promise, right up until the very end.

“...Thank you, Hua Chengzhu.”

Finally, Yanlin lets go of his hand, turning around, bowing low, hands clasped in front of her.

When she straightens, a tear stained smile is on her face. Not sad tears, or frightened, just...

Bittersweet.

“I wish you good fortune, and...happiness.”

She glances over her shoulder, giving Shuo one last look.

“...If you’re actually gonna stick around for a long time, you need to find connections," She warns him, her voice stern. "Being a ghost is about more than just being the strongest, you know."

Shuo nods, eyes glassy. "I know," he murmurs.

"If you aren't careful," She jerks her thumb at Hua Cheng, "You'll end up just like him."

There are worse things to be, but he nods once more.

The Ghost King waits to see if he'll say anything but...

The young man stays silent, fists clenched.

He watches as Yanlin turns back around, reaching for the door handle. He doesn't tell her.

Some might think of it as cowardice, but...

Hua Cheng disagrees.

It was the selfless thing to do, letting her go without any regrets. The door is thrown open wide, the light blinding.

And when she steps through—it's just the two of them.

Hua Cheng turns away without a word as the door slams shut, rattling the dice in his palm, opening their own way back.

"...You know something?" Shuo mutters as they climb the steps back to the mortal realm.

"What?"

"Ghost Stories are bullshit."

That draws an amused chuckle from the calamity.

"How do you figure?"

"It's always about scaring humans, but..." The muscles in the savage ghost's jaw work tightly. "I lost so much more after I died than I ever did before."

Hua Cheng falls silent.

"It's way scarier, being a ghost."

They part ways when they return to ghost city. Shuo walks off on his own path, shoulders hunched, and Hua Cheng doesn't chase him. He has his own work to do, and, well...

The boy needs space to mourn.

When Crimson Rain returns to the gambler's den, however, it's to an unwelcome sight.

The ghouls and ghosts are in a stir over something, and the moment he steps through the door, the reason for that becomes clear.

"...What do you want?" He mutters, his expression darkening.

Black Water glances up at him over his playing cards, his feet kicked up on top of the gambling table. "To make a proposition."

"You better not be betting with gold," the older calamity mutters, stalking past him. "You still owe me."

"Relax, I'm betting spiritual power."

He Xuan sets his cards down, and, sure enough, he has a royal flush, making the other ghosts groan with annoyance. He's quick to move to his feet, following Crimson Rain up the steps, toward his private viewing area.

Black Water is the only one who has ever dared to venture up.

Now, watching the two ascend side by side, one of the ghosts can't help but notice how the two share a similar posture.

When Hua Cheng isn't around, He Xuan often tends to slouch. But when they walk together, both have their shoulders thrown back, hands clasped behind them.

Once they're behind the red beaded curtains at the top of the steps, Hua Cheng immediately goes for the liquor cabinet.

A necessity, for when Black Water shows up unannounced.

"What do you want?"

"Well, on the subject of owing you..." The water demon takes a seat.

"Go on."

"I have recently come into an...interesting situation," He Xuan shrugs, tossing his hair back over his shoulder. "In large part due to the funds you loaned me." Hua Cheng stares at him, lifting his drink to his lips —clearly unimpressed. "...And I have an opportunity for you."

"An opportunity?" Hua Cheng repeats flatly, crossing his arms.

"A hiring opportunity, to be more specific."

The Ghost King could not be less amused, and He Xuan holds up a finger. "Have I ever come to you about something frivolous?"

Hua Cheng opens his mouth.

"...Besides the fish thing," He Xuan cuts him off quickly, before he can speak.

Hua Cheng closes his mouth.

"Just stop being vague and get on with it," he eventually mutters, already finishing off his glass. "I'm not in the mood."

"Fine," the water demon shrugs. "I happen to know of a former heavenly official that's looking for a job," he explains, and before Hua Cheng's hopes can lift (to be fair, they weren't high to begin with), he clarifies—

"Not the Crown Prince of Xianle, obviously. No one has been able to locate him."

Hua Cheng stares back at him frostily. "I didn't think you were talking about him, but thank you for that pleasant reminder."

"..." Black water glances down at his nails, examining his cuticles. "But he was an ascended martial god, he likely has useful intel."

That's...true.

Hua Cheng huffs, refilling his cup once more. Honestly, if he had lived long enough to be of an appropriate drinking age, he would have truly relished in the opportunity to get absolutely shitfaced.

Now, he just has whiskey and wishful thinking. "And what do you want for it?"

"Three million knocked off my tab?" Black Water offers, and Hua Cheng snorts derisively.

"One."

"That's stingy, for a man with your coffers."

"I'm not running a charity," Hua Cheng mutters, taking another sip. "And this official of yours might be useless. Most of them are."

"I wouldn't bring you someone useless," He Xuan sighs, kicking out his feet. "I know better."

That's generally true. Black Water is one of the few beings that can push his luck with Crimson Rain Sought Flower. He's the closest Hua Cheng has to a peer, and...

They share things.

Memories. The most intimate form of knowledge one can have of another person. Secrets. A common goal.

As such, there's an understanding that they won't destroy each other. And, if one is in dire straits, the other will come to their aid.

But lets be clear: while aid is rarely needed, it's always Hua Cheng aiding He Xuan, not the other way around.

By far, he's the muscle of the operation.

But Blackwater isn't useless. In fact, he's generally helpful in a fight—but his real strength lies in gathering information.

He's disturbingly good at lying, and an impeccable actor. Just as good as Hua Cheng, which is a first—and his obsession puts him close to the heavens.

That's useful, and—it makes it likely that he knows this official isn't worthless. "One million," Hua Cheng repeats.

"Pah..."

"You should be grateful I'm letting you barter at all," The Ghost King sighs, toying with the red string knotted around his finger. "Normally, when someone fails to pay up—I don't let them negotiate."

"This isn't really negotiating..." The water demon grumbles with a heavy sigh.

Hua Cheng's eyes flash. "Someday, you'll go long enough without paying that I'll decide on my own way to get my money's worth, and you aren't going to like it."

He Xuan shivers, casting him an annoyed look. "It's a wonder you aren't more popular. A real fucking head scratcher."

"You must be referring to the gods you've been chasing around," Hua Cheng retorts with a sharp smirk, "Ghosts and Mortals like me plenty."

In truth, he's developed quite a salacious reputation, in spite of having never taken a lover that anyone knows of.

Probably because of the hedonistic image that he projects to the world, but no matter. "...Would you like to meet him, or not?"

"I suppose," Hua Cheng rolls his eyes, setting his glass down. "Is he nearby?"

"I left him in Paradise Manor," He Xuan shrugs. "Here seemed too public. He's freshly banished, still reeks of Heavenly Aura."

"I'm surprised you didn't offer to rid him of that," Hua Cheng mutters, making his way for the curtains.

That's the irony of it all.

Hua Cheng projects indulgence, but possesses restraint.

Actually, his self control is extremely impressive.

He Xuan, however, struggles deeply with controlling his own desires. His hunger, his thirst—and, despite his calm, intellectual exterior, his lust.

Hua Cheng has never been known to take a lover, but He Xuan?

He indulges.

"Oh, no," the water demon shakes his head. "It would have felt..."

Hua Cheng glances over at him, arching an eyebrow, and Blackwater waves his hands, like it's difficult to explain.

"...like taking advantage, I suppose." The calamity mutters.

"Oh?"

"He's useful—but pitiful."

As Ghost Kings, they don't really have peers—that isn't possible. But He Xuan makes a point of not going after especially weak partners.

Still, Hua Cheng can't imagine how someone he deemed as too weak to take into his bed (a rare occurrence in itself) would still be "useful."

But he follows along, intrigued enough by the prospect of the former god's supposed utility, and...if nothing else, a break in the monotony.

It doesn't take him long to see what He Xuan meant by 'pitiful.'

The youth standing in his hall is slim, and not particularly tall.

His hair is long, smooth, and dark, hanging against his back in a low ponytail, his robes black and purple. They hang off of his frame, like he might have lost weight.

There's nothing signaling that he's especially weak, but... There is a pitiful air about him, it's true.

When he hears them coming, he turns his head, and at first—Hua Cheng is startled by how young he looks, but...

He's Baby faced. That's the word. The sort of person that never really loses the softness in their cheeks, always looking younger than they actually are.

Not particularly handsome, but boyish, Hua Cheng supposes.

In any case, the moment he sees the Ghost Kings approaching—the former official drops into a deep bow, waiting to be spoken to.

...Well, he seems more open to the idea of serving than Hua Cheng was expecting.

"...You must be the official He Xuan was telling me about," the Ghost King mutters, tilting his head. "What's your name?"

He's asking to be polite, of course—only one official has been cast out recently, and so he already knows before the young man murmurs a reply—

"...Yin Yu." Right.

The one that used to be the martial god of the west, sharing with…Quan Yizhen, if Hua Cheng remembers correctly.

And the two of them were involved in the brocade immortal fiasco.

Messy business—rather embarrassing for the Heavens.

Hua Cheng walks past him smoothly.

“I have been informed that you might be useful to me,” the ghost king sighs, dropping down on the chaise lounge in his sitting room. “Would you care to elaborate?”

“…” The former god swallows dryly, and he nods, taking a deep breath. “I’m a hard worker, very efficient. And I—”

“Want to work for the ghost realm.” Hua Cheng raises an eyebrow. “That won’t endear you to the heavens. Or make it easy for you to get back.”

Yin Yu hangs his head, bangs falling in front of his face. “…I don’t think I want to go back anytime soon, sir.”

Shame is evident on his face, and that much Hua Cheng can understand. The story of his fall is especially bruising. Rather unpleasant.

“But you don’t wish to return to the mortals, either.” The Ghost King presses—and Yin Yu shakes his head.

“It would be harder to hide.”

Hua Cheng raises an eyebrow. “You think your shidi will come looking for revenge, then?”

Yin Yu hesitates, squirming a little with discomfort. “Not…not exactly, no.”

“But you do think he’ll come looking?”

The former official nods, hanging his head even lower.

Well, since he was an ascended martial god, Hua Cheng thinks it’s only reasonable to test and see if he actually knows anything.

“What about Generals Nan Fang and Xuan Zhen?”

“What about them?’

"What have those two been doing, exactly?"

"Oh," Yin Yu mutters, thinking.

"...Xuan Zhen hasn't left the heavens much, recently," Yin Yu murmurs. "But in the last seventy years or so, Nan Yang hasn't really been around at all."

"Really?" Hua Cheng arches an eyebrow. "Know anything about that?"

"Uh..." Yin Yu rubs his chin, thinking it over. "He's pretty attentive to his worshippers in the mortal realm," the former official explains, and Hua Cheng fights the urge to roll his eyes.

Nan Yang is a strong martial god. Not as popular as the Water Master or as fearsome as Ming Guang, but respected and well regarded.

But not brave enough to face Hua Cheng's challenge. And, well...

Words cannot describe how frustrating it was, watching Feng Xin fail to protect Xie Lian all those years ago—when he had a body, when he could actually talk to him, and Hong'er could only...

Watch, helpless.

It's left him with little fondness for the Martial God, aside from, well...

"...Are you going to speak?" Blackwater drawls, "Or are you going to glare at the boy until he faints?"

Hua Cheng isn't exactly glaring AT Yin Yu, he's glaring through him, but point taken.

"And he's been away from the heavens for seventy years, just answering prayers?"

"Well, no." Yin Yu shakes his head. "He had some sort of argument with Xuan Zhen before he left—a bad one, even for them. And he's supposedly been searching for something ever since."

"For what?"

"No one knows," he shrugs, fiddling awkwardly with the end of his ponytail. "A lot of people think it might be some sort of heirloom of Xianle? Or maybe a weapon."

Hua Cheng arches an eyebrow. “Why?”

“Well—because he keeps on digging up ruins,” Yin Yu explains. “Rumor has it that a lot of valuable gifts from Jun Wu were pawned when the Prince of Xianle fell, so maybe he’s looking for…” The former official trails off, noticing the way the air in the room has suddenly changed.

From behind Hua Cheng’s back, Blackwater is dragging his hand over his neck in a sharp, ‘Cut it out’ gesture, and—

Yin Yu is left slightly confused.

Is the Crown Prince of Xianle a sensitive subject? That’s odd. No one has strong feelings about him one way or the other lately.

“…Well, you’ve made the introduction,” Hua Cheng turns his head to look back at He Xuan, who is suddenly once again examining his cuticles. “Get out.”

If anyone else spoke to the water demon that way, they would end up torn to shreds. But in this case, Blackwater shrugs.

“Fine,” he drawls, twirling a knife between his fingertips as he rises to his feet, “I’ll be away for a while, anyway.”

“That means your tab is just going to keep going up,” Hua Cheng reminds him flatly. “That’s why I brought him.” He Xuan replies, his tone rather dry.

The doors slam shut behind him, and Yin Yu does his best not to wither under Hua Cheng’s gaze as the Ghost King’s attention comes back to him, standing ramrod straight.

“And what are your thoughts on the matter?”

“I…” He swallows thickly. “What?”

“You were talking about the crown prince pawning Jun Wu’s gifts,” Hua Cheng explains calmly. “What are your thoughts on the matter?”

“Uh…” Yin Yu has no idea why it matters, but it feels…like his answer is quite important for some reason. “I’m not in a position to judge.”

He certainly isn’t.

“And if you were in a position?”

The former god stares at him for a long time, before eventually forming his reply.

“He was banished for trying to do the right thing. I was banished for...” He trails off, his expression slightly anguished.

“Being a jealous fool,” he finishes the thought, shaking his head. “And I’m pretty sure begging for employment from a ghost king is probably worse than pawning a few swords...” He stops his eyes widening when he realizes what he just said, throwing his hands up nervously.

“I didn’t mean—!”

Hua Cheng shakes his head, laughing under his breath. “I’m not that fucking sensitive, brat. Relax.”

The former god falls silent, pressing his lips together with a nod. “I’m not very good at relaxing, sir.”

“I can tell...” The Ghost King tilts his head. “Come over here.”

The young man looks a little hesitant.

“I’m not Blackwater, I don’t bite.”

Yin Yu doesn’t know what to make of that statement, but he creeps over cautiously, until he’s standing in front of Hua Cheng’s seat.

“Show me.”

“I—What?”

“The Shackle.”

At first, he gawks at the suggestion. “I-I can’t do that...” “Why?”

“It’s against Heavenly Law to show the shackles to any...”

Mortals, technically. Do ghosts count?

Hua Cheng watches him, and he can’t help but...agree with He Xuan’s statement.

It really is pitiful.

But he’s agreeing for very different reasons.

It's pitiful that even now, cast aside and abandoned, so many heavenly officials still find themselves so desperate to please Jun Wu.

If you ask Hua Cheng, the Heavenly Emperor's love is fleeting, cheap —and it's not worth chasing.

"We break many heavenly laws here," the Ghost King reminds him. "If that's already a problem..."

"..." Yin Yu gulps, knowing...he doesn't have much of a choice. So, he rolls up his sleeve, holding his wrist out.

The pattern is all too familiar.

Hua Cheng reaches out to grip his arm before he can pull it back, watching closely. His expression is completely unreadable as Yin Yu watches him with a tense, nervous gaze, unsure of what he's going to —

"Fine."

Hua Cheng lets him go.

Yin Yu stands there, arm hanging limply.

"I...What—?"

"You're hired."

The former official stands there awkwardly, tugging his sleeve down over his wrist once again, unsure...of how that just happened.

"I am?"

"Even with your spiritual powers sealed, you're still a martial god," Hua Cheng shrugs. "That's useful."

The mention of being useful makes Yin Yu's eyes flash with something other than shame for the first time that evening, even if he can only repeat the same words, gaping like a fish. "...I am?"

Yes. In more ways than one.

Ascending as a martial deity requires a certain skill set.

If Hua Cheng loans him spiritual power, the official would likely be more than capable of regulating Ghost City during his absences. His knowledge of the current politics of the Heavenly Court can update Hua Cheng's gathered information.

But there are other benefits.

First being: he has nowhere else to go.

Second being: he's terrified of double crossing Hua Cheng.

(Likely because the Ghost King did inform him that, if Yin Yu ever betrayed him, he would eat the former god's beating heart and use his ribs to pick his teeth.)

Third, and most important being:

"Uh...do I really need the blindfold?" The Waning Moon Officer mumbles, stumbling a little in the city street.

"Yes," Hua Cheng agrees flatly. "That's key."

"And...what am I supposed to do?"

Hua Cheng has been looking for another banished god.

"Wander around like you're trying to survive."

Who better to assist in that task, than someone in a near identical situation?

Of course, simply having him try to recreate the Crown Prince's path doesn't work out.

Yin Yu's luck isn't bad enough, it would seem.

In any case, when he isn't ordered to watch over Ghost City in Hua Chengzhu's absence, the officer's primary mission is to focus on the search.

And whatever task the Ghost King comes up with in the moment, but still.

It leads to awkward encounters for Yin Yu.

After all, he's still hiding from his past.

His determined to the point of insanity, bullheaded, annoying, clueless past.

So, he usually goes out in a mask. But sometimes, particularly when he's trying to retrace the Prince's steps, he'll try on the blindfold.

After all, Hua Chengzhu was very insistent when he brought him out that one time, saying it was key to help the former god, 'get into character.'

There must be something to that, right? He wasn't just messing with Yin Yu, was he?

It would be several decades before the god came to understand his employer's mischievous nature.

(But even now he's starting to wonder if he actually gets paid enough for this.)

But one day, when he's out searching, running into street signs and stumbling over curbs, he hears—

"Your highness?!" Uh-oh.

Does he have enemies? How could he have enemies? Hasn't everyone forgotten about him?

Yin Yu attempts to dart down a back alley, only to end up caught by the wrist. "What are you—?!"

"I—!"

Both fall silent when the blindfold slips down his nose.

Both Heavenly Officials (current and former) stare at one another.

"...You?!" The martial god huffs, holding the Waning Moon Officer against the alley wall.

"G...General Nan Yang," Yin Yu croaks in return.

"Why are you..." Feng Xin sputters, looking him over. "Wearing that?!"

"Uh...I...um..." The former god stammers, fumbling for a reason to be walking around with white cultivation robes and a blindfold that doesn't sound utterly ridiculous, but —

"G-Getting into character?"

(Feng Xin makes him nervous.)

"..." The god's brow creases. "...What?"

They stare at each other for a long moment, and Yin Yu quivers under the martial god's stormy gaze, growing more and more angry by the second.

(In reality, Feng Xin is the sort who simply looks angry when he's confused.)

"I'm...I'm an actor now!" He blurts out, voice cracking.

"An...actor..." Feng Xin repeats slowly, looking him over suspiciously. "...In what sort of production?"

"I..." Yin Yu swallows hard, clearing his throat. "Um...it's...like...one of those tragedies? They cast me because I'm...so...depressing?"

"Oh." The god blinks. "That makes sense."

"..." Maybe Yin Yu left himself open for that one, but he hadn't expected the martial god to agree...Honestly, no wonder Xuan Zhen is always calling him an insensitive—

Suddenly, the exiled god goes rigid, and Feng Xin pauses. "...Are you alright?" Oh.

CRASH!

Uh-oh.

BOOM!

Feng Xin whips his head around, trying to find the source of the commotion. "What the—?"

"...I'm really sorry about this, General Nan Yang," the former official mutters under his breath.

"You—?"

Suddenly, Yin Yu grabs Feng Xin by the wrist with surprising strength.

The Martial God gawks, "How—?!"

After all, he shouldn't be that strong, not with his powers sealed. So how is he—? But instead of hurting him, Yin Yu drags Feng Xin's hand forward, and...

Makes the god slap him across the face. Rather hard, actually.

"I'm sorry!"He repeats.

Now Feng Xin is so confused, he's starting to feel the beginnings of a migraine.

(Therefore, he looks absolutely furious.)

Why is Yin Yu apologizing to him? He just made Feng Xin slap him silly.

"What the fuck—?"

Suddenly, there's silence.

Dangerous silence.

Yin Yu groans.

Feng Xin slowly turns his head, and in the mouth of the alleyway, he sees a youth standing there.

One with wildly curly hair, pulled up into a high ponytail, golden earrings hanging from his ears.

And his eyes? They're red with rage, literally flashing with spiritual power.

At first, Feng Xin actually thinks he understands what's happening.

"Now, Quan Yizhen," he starts, his voice stern, "He's already been punished—!" From behind him, Yin Yu suddenly whimpers, spitting out blood, clutching his face. "G-General Nan Yang, please stop! It hurts!"

What the—? Did he really make Feng Xin hit him that hard? And why is he—?

Feng Xin doesn't get the chance to pull another conscious thought together before he's being hit with the sentient equivalent of a wrecking ball, toppling an entire building to the ground.

"...THE HELL?!"

Yin Yu runs as fast as his legs will physically take him, fumbling for the dice in his pocket.

“Asshole,” he mumbles under his breath, “What do you mean, ‘that makes sense?!’” He drops his voice down several octaves in an imitation of Feng Xin’s voice as several explosions echo.

He almost doesn’t feel bad for—

BOOM!

CRASH!

SCREEEEEEACH!

“OH GOD, NOT THE HOSPITAL!”

Okay, he feels a little bad, actually. But Quan Yizhen wouldn’t hurt any mortals, and Feng Xin will be fine.

That day, Yin Yu comes to the conclusion that he’ll use other methods to help his employer look for the crown prince. Somehow, just dressing up like him brings horrible, absolutely rotten luck.

(It explains why so many theaters that showed plays mocking the prince burned down.)

He’ll just have to use his wits. Or…something of the sort.

When he returns to Paradise Manor to finish his duties for the day, he already thinks his day has gotten about as rotten as it could get, but…

Then he hears the roaring, cackling laughter, and he deflates.

Of course, one of his boss’s wraith butterflies was monitoring. So…

He saw the entire thing.

You know, Yin Yu doesn’t even know why the Ghost King wants to find the Prince of Xianle so badly, but he feels sorry for the man.

It’s probably so he can torture and boss him around, embarrass him on purpose, laugh at him all the time and make jokes at his expense, but…Compared to the alternative, it isn’t so bad.

Unlike the heavens, Hua Chengzhu is fair. Still, Yin Yu doesn’t think he gets paid enough.

False Idols

Chapter Summary

Deep in the central plains, near the edges of the now fallen Empire of Yong’an, lies the city state of Daqing.

An ancient city, one of old blood.

In it’s earliest days, it was warred over in the conflicts between the clans of the central plains and the Kingdom of Wuyong.

Later, it would be the crown jewel of Xianle’s military might—and after that, Yong’an’s greatest fortress.

The walls of Daqing are world renowned, and they have only ever fallen once:

Over a thousand years ago, before the armies of General Ming Guang. His last great victory before the death of the Queen of Yushi.

Chapter Notes

You can find me on twitter and keep up with current updates of the story HERE

YEAR SEVEN HUNDRED AND NINETY NINE

“Liao Yong!” A mother calls sharply, “Get away from there!”

The little boy stops, hand outstretched.

Deep in the central plains, near the edges of the now fallen Empire of Yong’an, lies the city state of Daqing.

An ancient city, one of old blood.

In it’s earliest days, it was warred over in the conflicts between the clans of the central plains and the Kingdom of Wuyong.

Later, it would be the crown jewel of Xianle’s military might—and after that, Yong’an’s greatest fortress.

The walls of Daqing are world renowned, and they have only ever fallen once:

Over a thousand years ago, before the armies of General Ming Guang. His last great victory before the death of the Queen of Yushi.

The place where he would return, following the failed military revolt.

He ascended here, shattering his own sword upon hearing of his own King's betrayal, before the eyes of thousands of onlookers.

A monument was erected in the central square to honor him, a statue cast in bronze, painted in gold.

Since then, the walls of Daqing have stood firm.

Even now, after the fall of Yong'an, they have not been breached. Not by swords.

A young child stands before them now, staring at his ball, which has rolled just outside of the city gates.

They stand wide open, just as they always do.

But he doesn't dare go any closer.

"Get back here this instant!"

"..." The child sighs, giving up on the toy, turning around to return to his mother, when...

"Excuse me," a voice behind him pipes up, and the boy's eyes widen sharply. "Is this yours?"

It's the first time that Liao Yong has ever met a stranger.

He didn't know that they could smile so kindly, or give back the toys you thought you lost forever.

For a city of such size, word travels quite fast in Daqing.

There's a new stall in the market square—for the first time in years. A modest one. They say there's a new weaver.

With patterns so delicate, so intricate, no one can fathom how the prices are so reasonable. Honestly, he's practically giving them away, barely making enough to feed himself.

But he never seems to mind, smiling and chatting pleasantly with anyone who stops by.

"…Mister?" One of the children asks one day, making the weaver tilt his head back, bamboo hat dangling over his shoulders.

"Hmm?"

"What's your name?"

The weaver smiles. "Oh, it's Hua…" He stops himself, trailing off, and the boy frowns.

"Hua…?"

He already said that he couldn't keep on using that alias. It's been nearly two centuries since the Banyue incident, but after the thing with that Poet…

"Lian," he murmurs, offering his hand, "My name is Hua Lian. And you?"

After a moment, the child shakes it.

"Liao Yong."

When he leans over to shake the weaver's hand, Xie Lian notices something that makes him frown.

This distinctive noise of clinking metal. He hears it all over this city.

Such a quiet place, for having so many people. No one ever seems to speak unless it's necessary.

Then, the boy whispers something that makes Xie Lian pause. "Mr. Hua, are you a god?"

His head whips to the side sharply, but before he can ask the boy what he means—he hears the sound of his feet smacking against cobblestones, running away.

Daqing is an ancient place.

It has been blessed as many times as it has been cursed, and the power of the land is great—for those who know how to use it well.

And yet, Xie Lian has not encountered a single cultivator in the city.

Merchants, yes. School teachers. Builders and bricklayers.

But no priests.

Xie Lian encounters the occasional soldier—the only people, from what he can tell, who don't seem to carry that unfamiliar clinking sound. With them, it's the rattle of blades in their scabbards—a tune the prince knows well.

But there's very little need for them.

Xie Lian has never been in a city with so little crime. Even after a month sitting in the market, he hasn't run into a single pickpocket. No sexual assaults.

(Which, in his experience, are horrifically common everywhere else.) Not even a drunken brawl.

Daqing is a quiet place.

People speak quietly on the doorsteps near their homes. There's rarely haggling over prices in the market stalls. Even the children seem to stop when they catch themselves laughing or playing too loudly.

The quietest of them all is the weaver in the market square.

He sits before his loom, working in easy silence, barely making a noise as he moves the bailing wires into place, pulling the reed back and forth as he works layer after layer of thread into his pieces.

And each day, he listens closely. Daqing is a strange place.

He's learned better by now, than to ask the boy what he meant that day, when he asked Xie Lian if he was a god. Each time he's started to inquire, Liao Yong has fled like a startled field mouse, wary of being caught by a wandering barn cat.

He learns to ask better questions.

Liao Yong is twelve years old. He was eleven, when they met—but his birthday was last week. His mother works as a server in a nearby tavern. He likes reading, but there aren't many books around.

(Xie Lian asks why, and the boy finds a reason to flee once more.)

Liao Yong had an older brother, once—he joined the army when the boy was small, and left on an expedition through the desert. They never came back. It's just him and his mother now, but he doesn't really mind. He keeps busy.

(Xie Lian asks why he isn't in school, and he bolts.)

At first he wondered if the child was being mistreated, to be so skittish. But after a week, he realizes that Liao Yong speaks more than any of the other children in the city. He's the only one brave enough to approach the weaver on a daily basis.

For Daqing, he's quite social.

One day, Xie Lian asks about that. Asks if there's something wrong with his face—if that's why the children stay away, and the boy beside him shakes his head, patiently holding threads for the weaver while he works.

"They've just never talked to a stranger before."

Xie Lian thinks about that, tilting his head to the side. "...Do you not get travelers often?"

It's strange.

He came to the city of Daqing when he was just a boy near Liao Yong's age. He was old enough to ride by himself, but he usually shared with Feng Xin, following the King.

Daqing was so lively back then. Merchants shouting as they peddled goods that had been ferried up from the sea by the river. People dancing and singing in the streets. Children playing with firecrackers and glass marbles.

Liao Yong shrugs. "Who would want to come here?"

That's when Xie Lian realizes a new, ever more strange thing about the city:

He hasn't heard any music since he arrived.

No singing. No flutes or drums. Not even clapping in a particular rhythm.

Even in the pubs, they drink in near silence.

Something is wrong here. Deeply wrong.

He can feel it in his gut. Can taste it in the air.

When he asks about the music Liao Yong simply says that it's been outlawed. When the god asks why, the boy replies that he doesn't know.

He's lying. Xie Lian can tell.

One day, he asks— "Liao Yong?"

"Yes?"

"Would you mind taking me to the Ming Guang temple?" The weaver murmurs, setting down his thread. "It's been a long time since I prayed, I'm worried it might bring ill fortune if I put it off much longer."

"Um…" The boy pauses.

"There isn't a Ming Guang temple in Daqing."

Xie Lian frowns, because he knows that can't be right.

"There used to be."

The prince might not keep up with heavenly politics of the modern era as well as he should, but Daqing is where Ming Guang ascended. He had a grand temple.

Xie Lian prayed there, when he visited as a child—as all visiting nobles did, to pay their respects. It was the only time in his life that he worshipped in a temple that wasn't Jun Wu's—and he remembers it well.

It was livelier than what he was used to.

People would dance and sing as they paid their respects to the martial god, laughing together.

It made Jun Wu's temples feel almost like tombs, upon his return to Xianle.

That was when he first got the idea that you didn't need to kneel, in order to pray.

"Well," Liao Yong shrugs. "There isn't one anymore."

That’s hard to believe. Even Xie Lian knows that Pei Ming is still quite popular.

“Well…” He tries to think of another possibility. “What about Nan Yang, does he have a temple here?”

“…No,” the boy shakes his head.

“Xuan Zhen?”

“Nope.”

“Lang Qianqiu?”

“Nuh-uh.”

“…Alright,” Xie Lian sighs, feeling a little frustrated. “Where is the temple for Jun Wu?”

“…We don’t have a temple for Jun Wu.”

The god sits in stunned silence.

A city of this size, with no temple for the Heavenly Emperor?

“…Do you not have any temples here?”

“Um…we have one,” Liao Yong mutters. “But that’s about it.”

Xie Lian’s eyebrows knit together. “For who?”

“Wen Jiao.”

The god wracks his mind—but he’s never heard of that name before. It’s possible it could be a newer deity, but…

“If he’s popular enough to be the only god with a temple in your city, why does he not have any cultivators?”

“…” Liao Yong squirms a little. “He doesn’t need any. We all pray to him. Besides… Cultivators were banished from Daqing a hundred years ago.”

Xie Lian pauses.

“…Banished?” He questions softly.

“…” The boy looks around carefully before scooting closer to Xie Lian on the ground. Not knowing that a set of eyes are already watching them intently.

“Wen Jiao banished them when he came to the city,” the boy whispers.

What sort of god would banish cultivators? It’s self-destructive.

“Most of them went to other cities, but one cultivation sect moved to the mountain, just to the North,” he speaks so quietly, like he’s frightened of being overheard. “They cultivate under the Rain Master.”

“...If they’ve been gone for a century, how do you know they’re still there?” Xie Lian murmurs, his fingers never slowing on his loom.

Nearby, a city guard pushes away from where he’s been leaning back against the wall, slowly walking towards them.

“They’re allowed in every now and then, to recruit disciples,” Liao Yong murmurs, dipping his head low. “Wen Jiao doesn’t want people who can cultivate to stick around, so...”

Xie Lian frowns, trying to put the pieces together. There’s something wrong with Daqing.

He sensed it before. Like a chill down his spine, but now, it’s becoming harder and harder to ignore. Something unnatural is going on here.

“That’s why I asked you that question, when you told me your name,” the boy mumbles.

Xie Lian turns his head in his direction, “Why?”

“...Because you aren’t from the monastery,” Liao Yong explains, and Xie Lian doesn’t know how he could have known that so early on, but he sounds absolutely certain. “But you aren’t wearing a...”

On instinct, Xie Lian reaches out with his hand—and he finds what he’s looking for.

The source of that sound—the metallic clinking.

There’s something wrong with the city of Daqing.

Xie Lian hisses, jerking his fingers back. It’s rare for him to feel pain, but now—the pads of his fingers are scalding.

There's an iron shackle around Liao Yong's neck.

And the cursed energy in the metal is so potent, it reacts violently with Xie Lian's spiritually fortified flesh.

That shackle, no—the entire city— It all reeks of evil.

The city guard makes his way closer, elbowing around merchants, "Hey!" He starts to call over. "You—!"

Liao Yong falls silent, trembling all over, the blood draining in his face as he turns around. Xie Lian tenses, tapping the side of his throat, silently indicating to Ruoye that it might be time to—

Then, another voice breaks out, and for the first time since he arrived here...

"As time draws near, my dearest dear, when you and I must part..."

Xie Lian hears singing.

A young man sits on a nearby open window sill, one leg dangling down, a book loosely clutched between his fingertips.

His voice is low, soft, and clear.

Eyes fixed on the city guard.

Xie Lian can't see how handsome he is, with long, dark hair pulled away from his face, shining under the sun like silk. Eyes that burn like liquid gold. But, from the sound of his voice—he must be in his later teenage years.

The guard rounds on the young man, glaring.

"Xiong Li!" He snaps, turning away from the weaver and the child sitting beside him. "You really can't help yourself, can you?!"

The young man smiles faintly, and the guard's wrath doesn't stop him from singing another line, snapping his book shut before he sets it down.

"How little you know of the grief and woe, in my poor aching heart..."

He drops down from the window sill, dark boots landing heavily against the ground, bangs settling around his face.

The guard's glare intensifies as he stomps over, "Enough!"

Xiong Li's smile widens.

"You don't like it?" He's smirking now, dodging around the guard as he lunges for him, book clasped behind his back. "That's so mean," the teenager pouts. "I wrote it for you!"

The guard, who is almost certainly a decade his senior, has turned purple. "You little —!"

Xiong Li steps close when he lunges, twisting on the ball of his foot until he ends up behind the guard, pressing a shove against the small of his back.

"Each night I suffer for your sake, you're the boy I love so dear..."

"I'm not kidding, brat—I'll have you whipped for this!"

Xie Lian's fingers have completely abandoned his loom now, his brow furrowed.

Whipped, for singing a song to a city guard?

From beside him, Liao Yong seems to understand what the older boy is trying to do for him—and he takes his chance to run back home as silently as he can.

Xiong Li keeps singing his song, dodging around the guard's attempts to catch him, fluttering around like a little song bird, watching the young boy's escape from the corner of his eye.

"I wish that I was going with you..." He hums, as Liao Yong disappears around the corner. "...Or you were staying here!"

With that, he offers a deep, dramatic bow, spinning on his heel before taking off himself in the opposite direction, egging the guard on to chase after him.

The shouting fades into the distance, and disturbed whispers echo through the town square.

"...They aren't going to let him off easy, this time..."

"It's his own fault for never minding his own business..."

Would his punishment truly be so severe? And if that's the case—how much danger was Liao Yong in, for the teenager to think it was worth distracting the guard?

The boy—Xiong Li—doesn't return to the market square for several weeks. And even though Xie Lian can't see him—he can hear the raggedness of his breathing. The pronounced limp.

He couldn't be more than seventeen, and he's clearly been beaten within an inch of his life.

For singing.

Presumably, to prevent Liao Ying from facing an even more violent punishment for speaking to Xie Lian about the shackle around his neck.

Shackles that nearly everyone in the city seems to be wearing.

And Xie Lian is left to wonder...

What is going on here?

Xie Lian knows enough to think it must have something to do with this 'Wen Jiao' that everyone in the city is worshiping. But...

He can't understand how any of this would benefit a god. Or why Jun Wu would allow an entire city of mortals to be placed in chains.

Part of him wonders if he should go. If his bad luck might only make their situation worse, but...

He listens to a group of children playing in the street, struggling to toss a ball around without making too much noise.

Xie Lian can hear the quiet rattle of their shackles. And that's when he knows that he cannot leave. No child belongs in chains.

So he stays, listens, and waits.

Not long after, in a city without laughter or song, there's a bit of a stir.

Liao Yong looks up from his seat beside the weaver, nearly dropping his threads.

Xie Lian tilts his head, turning his head in the direction of the commotion. "What is it?"

"The cultivators," Liao Yong whispers, untangling the threads in his hands, "from the mountain."

The god listens closely as the townsfolk flock to the small group of newcomers.

It takes him a moment to realize, but... Most of them are parents. Pleading.

"Please, my son—he's the brightest in his class! He would make an excellent cultivator!"

"My little Ma Lihue can run faster than any of the other children, take her, please sirs!"

And in a horrific way, it's logical.

Since he arrived, Xie Lian has not heard a single soul leave the city, and he's willing to bet the shackles the citizens wear bar any chance of exit.

Sending their children to the mountain is their only chance at freedom.

From the sound of it—there's six or so cultivators in the group. They're quiet, but not in the frightened, forced way of the other citizens of Daqing.

They're disciplined and orderly. Xie Lian imagines whatever cultivation methods they use, they're well trained.

One breaks off from the group—and from the lighter sound of his footsteps, the god surmises it must be a younger disciple.

The children in the square sound delighted to see him.

"An-Xiong!" Liao Yong cries, beaming with excitement. He almost gets up, but his threads...

Xie Lian offers him a gentle smile, bumping his arm. "Go ahead," he murmurs, pulling the threads from his fingers. "I've got it, go on and say hello."

"..." The boy nods eagerly, leaping to his feet and running over. "An-Xiong!"

"An-Xiong, you're so tall now!"

"An-Xiong, did you really learn magic?!"

The small crowd of children jump around the teenager's knees, clinging to his robes. He pats their heads in polite acknowledgement, but he isn't looking at them, not really.

He's watching a young man, sitting in a nearby windowsill.

Long strands of raven hair falling into his face, the rest pulled back with a white ribbon.

The cultivator's eyes settle on the welt on his cheekbone, and they narrow as he marches over.

When he's right in front of him, Xiong Li pretends he's only just now noticed his arrival.

"Ah, An-Xiong," he murmurs, looking up from his book. On him, the honorific sounds slightly sarcastic, but he smiles up at the cultivator slyly. "You grace us with your presence."

At first, the other young man doesn't speak, eyeing the bruises on Xiong Li's face. "Have you been fighting again?"

Xiong Li huffs, snapping his book shut. "No! I was actually being pretty cool, I'll have you know. Very heroic."

"Right."

"I was…" he grumbles, looking over An's shoulder, at all of the children who are eagerly awaiting his attention.

Xiong Li's lips turn down into a slight frown, and he sighs. "You should give them attention, you know," he mutters. "One of them might be able to go back with you."

An's eyes remain fixed on him. He's always been prone to staring. Xiong Li really hates that.

"So could you."

"I swear, if you ask me that one more time—"

"Come back with me, Xiong Li."

Thud!

Xiong Li punches the other teenager in the shoulder, slipping down from the window sill so he can make him turn around. “Go do your job and stop bothering me!”

Xie Lian listens to the exchange

He can’t help but smile at first.

Xiong Li makes a point of sounding so blasé and uncaring, but his heart is beating a little faster than it was before.

But the more they talk, the more the god wonders.

“You won’t last much longer here,” An mutters, his gaze pinched with worry

On that note, Xie Lian agrees. Not only has Xiong Li been beaten and whipped to the point of near death three times since he arrived (which hasn’t been that long at all), but in a city without cultivators, where the children with potential are sent away...

It doesn’t make sense that Xiong Li is still here.

He’s far more intelligent and talented than any of the other boys his age. And while Xie Lian may be blind, he can feel the warmth from Xiong Li’s golden core.

He would be a strong cultivator indeed. Still, he acts blasé.

“Then I guess I won't make it...” He sighs dramatically, shoving An back towards the groom of children. “Ah...poor, poor me!”

“Xiong Li...” An mutters, his voice filled with worry and annoyance. “You don’t even know what it’s like outside.”

“Probably just as shitty as it is here.”

To anyone else, it sounds like silly bickering, but Xie Lian is listening intently.

“Do you have any idea how much they made us forget?” An questions. He’s always had a handsome face. Sharp eyebrows, a thin nose, and a strong jaw. Now, it’s twisted with concern.

Forget?

“Even the name of this place—”

The name.

Xie Lian stops weaving, his fingers paused on the edge of the loom.

That's right.

This place wasn't always called Daqing. It had a different name, when he came here as a boy.

What was it?

It's—

It's so odd, because Xie Lian can't...

He can't seem to remember the name that Daqing used to be called either. His memory isn't as sharp as it used to be. He's learned how to prioritize what he wants to remember, casting useless information aside. After all, he has centuries to keep track of.

But still.

Xie Lian never even realized that Daqing had been called something different to begin with—not until An pointed it out. And even now, no matter how hard he tries to remember, he can't.

It's more than just odd. Xie Lian recognizes that.

It's some sort of curse.

But...is that even possible? Xie Lian has never heard of anything like that before.

Is it even possible to steal a name? The name of an ancient, famous city for that matter?

And from the sound of what An is saying... If you leave the city walls, you remember.

So, up until Xie Lian stepped inside the gates, he probably knew exactly what this place was.

Did he come here for a reason, then? Was it more than just wandering?

And if that's so, how do An and the other cultivators from his sect keep their memories when they return?

Finally, Xiong Li coaxes him into paying attention to the other children, who all seem far too eager to display their knowledge and skills, hoping to get taken along to the mountain with him.

And, as the god listens, he learns more about this cultivator—An. He's seventeen, the same age as his friend.

He was born in the temple of Wen Jiao, and along with the other city orphans, was raised by the worshippers of Daqing's only god.

Which was how he came to know Xiong Li, another orphan raised within the temple walls.

The boys grew up together, both showing great promise from a young age.

But when the time came, An took the chance to go to the mountain and learn how to cultivate—and Xiong Li chose to remain within the city walls.

The visit doesn't last long.

Eventually, the older cultivators make ready to leave—and with a reluctant sigh, their disciple makes to go with them.

But not before sending Liao Yong a look from the corner of his eye.

"You can come, if you'd like."

The little boy stiffens, his jaw dropping. "...Me?"

Xie Lian isn't particularly surprised. Liao Yong is quick witted, brave—among the other children of Daqing, he stands out.

But after a moment of pondering, the child shakes his head, shrinking back. "...No thanks," he mumbles.

Xiong Li seems to be following Xie Lian's, 'Do as I say, not as I do, ' method, gawking at the little boy.

"Are you stupid?" He mutters, giving Liao Yong a little shove. "Go with him!"

"...No," the boy shakes his head, moving to run and hide behind Xie Lian. "My Mom needs me!"

An stares at the child for a long moment, before letting out a low sigh, shaking his head. “As you wish.”

He begins making his way from the market, and Xiong Li sends the child one more annoyed glance before following him.

“I didn’t tell him to do that, An.”

“I know.”

Xiong Li glances back at the boy, still hiding behind the weaver’s back, rubbing his elbows sheepishly. “...It sounds like you blame me.”

“He idolizes you, Xiong Li,” An mutters, his tone flat. “All of them do.”

“Not as much as you,” the teenager retorts.

An rolls his eyes.

But...

He only gets to see his friend once a year, and he doesn’t want to spend the entire time arguing.

“What’s that book you were reading?”

“Hmm?” Xiong Li glances up, eyes wide. “Oh, you’d hate it, it’s silly, romantic. Very inappropriate.”

An’s face flushes slightly at the mention of the word ‘inappropriate ,’ but he keeps his chin turned away, so his friend doesn’t see.

Xiong Li doesn’t pay any mind to that, walking close to his side. “Oh,” he muses, his eyes widening. “I forgot—we’re of age today, aren’t we?”

Another thing about the two young men—

They were born on the same day.

An nods, clasping his hands behind his back, fidgeting.

“Happy birthday, An.” Xiong Li smiles, mimicking his posture teasingly. Then, he bumps him with his shoulder. “Aren’t you gonna say it back?”

“...Happy birthday, Xiong Li,” he mutters, his face still turned away.

The teenager’s eyes sparkle with amusement, “Any luck finding your fated person?”

An keeps his gaze fixed on the opposite side of the square. “No.”

Xiong Li clicks his tongue. “That’s hard to believe.”

He tilts his head sideways, until his temple presses against An’s shoulder.

They were the same height, when he came last year.

When did his friend get so tall?

“You’re such a charmer…”

An’s jaw clenches. “Stop making fun of me.”

He can’t see the softness in Xiong Li’s eyes.

He’s not making fun of him. Not really.

“…C’mon,” he sighs, straightening, “Stop being a grouch. You got to pick a family name today, right? What’d you decide on?”

Xiong Li’s mother left a note with his name on it—but An, he was born with nothing.

He didn’t even have a name in the beginning. ‘An’ was just something that Xiong Li called him when they were little more than toddlers, chasing each other around. By the time he was old enough to understand what names were—the boy just took ‘An’ as an actual name.

Now that he’s officially ‘of age’ he gets to pick a surname of his own—something that Xiong Li knew he looked forward to.

“…Lan,” the cultivator replies quietly.

“Lan,” Xiong Li repeats, tilting his chin, testing the name on his lips, “…Lan An?”

“Is it no good?”

“No, no…I like it,” Xiong Li assures him. It’s a little awkward on the tongue at first, but it’s simple. It suits his friend’s minimalistic tastes. “Did you think it over carefully?”

"Yes..."

"Good," the teenager huffs, crossing his arms. "It's very important."

"I know."

"It's the name you'll give your wife and children one day," Xiong Li sniffs, rubbing his nose. "Family names, and all that."

Lan An's eyes cut over to look at him sharply, burning silver under the setting sun. "I know," he murmurs, looking Xiong Li over. "I kept that in mind."

The city gates stand only a few dozen meters away, and Xiong Li's smile fades slightly, no matter how hard he tries to keep it bright.

Still watching him, Lan An's eyes sadden. "...Have you written any more songs?"

Xiong Li snorts, finally meeting his gaze. "How do you think I got this?"

He means the welt on his face, of course. And from the slight limp in his gait, Lan An knows—he's been whipped again.

"...You're not about to ask me to sing, are you?"

Xiong Li's smile turns sly, trying to deflect Lan An's concern.

"Sorry, but I only sing for boys I like," he shrugs. "Don't cry about it, okay? I'm no good at dealing with people who get sad over being rejected—"

"Xiong Li."

He stops, when the cultivator places a hand on his shoulder. "...What?"

The weight of Lan An's gaze is suffocating.

When he looks at you, it feels like you're the only person in the entire universe. Really, it's—

Xiong Li swallows dryly, and in spite of his teasing, he takes a shallow step to the side, heart beating fast.

It's so annoying.

"Come back with me."

And just like that, the moment is broken.

Xiong Li rolls his eyes, giving his shoulder a shove. "Would you shut up about that already? I'm not going! Persistent guys like you are creepy, you know that?"

Lan An's gaze drifts down to Xiong Li's throat.

To the iron shackle.

"If you stay here..." It's hard for him to even say it. "You'll die."

Xiong Li's face freezes for a moment, his smile slightly more fragile than it was before —but it remains.

"Everyone dies, Lan An."

He's adopted that new name so easily. It almost makes the cultivator smile. Almost.

"Not everyone," he murmurs.

"..." Xiong Li purses his lips, glancing back towards the market. All of the people. The merchants, the teachers, the children playing. Even the weaver, whom he's barely spoken to. "I'm staying."

"Xiong Li—"

"I'd rather die."

Lan An's eyes widen sharply, and he falls silent.

"I'd rather die trying to help people," Xiong Li explains, "than live out there. It would feel like running away."

And that isn't who he is.

His eyes slide up to Lan An's face. "...Besides," he murmurs, "you have a shackle of your own, don't you?"

Lan An's fingertips drift towards his forehead, self conscious.

Xiong Li's smile isn't bright at all now—but still, he can't seem to stop trying to pass it off as genuine.

“Take care of yourself, Lan An.”

But before he can completely turn away from him, his friend catches him by the wrist.

“…You’re going to get in trouble with your teachers if you don’t hurry,” he starts— until he feels his friend press something into his hand.

A book.

“What’s—?”

“It’s our birthday,” Lan An mutters, and Xiong Li understands.

It’s a gift.

“Don’t show it to anyone else.”

“…” The raven haired man waggles his eyebrows. “It’s like that, huh?”

Lan An doesn’t even acknowledge the teasing. “Promise me, Xiong Li.”

After a moment, the boy nods, watching Lan An’s face carefully. “…I promise,” he agrees.

The cultivator nods, seeming relieved. And with that, he lets him go.

He follows his cultivation masters—and they walk right through the open gates once more.

Xie Lian ponders.

A Temple in the Clouds

Chapter Summary

> This is a proud place. An ancient place. One of old, powerful blood.
>
> A city of science and cultivation. Where the streets once rang out with music, so sharp and clear, it would ring through the mountains and the valleys on the northern edge of the central plains.
>
> Two gods have ascended on this soil, and it's magic is strong, pulsing with a force. This city is not a prison. The lords of Daqing were not arrogant oppressors.
>
> These walls were built to protect the people. Xie Lian's people. And the people trapped within them now are their descendants.
>
> The God will not allow them to live as slaves any longer.

Chapter Notes

> You can find me on twitter and keep up with current updates of the story HERE

A few hours later, Xiong Li sits on the same window sill as always, this time with a new book held in front of him.

And this time, his eyes are impossibly wide, his expression frightened and pale. Could that...could it all really be tr—?

"Excuse me, young man?"

Xiong Li jumps, quickly stuffing the book into his sleeve as he looks up, "Huh?" But as soon as he sees who it is, he relaxes.

It's just the weaver—the blind one, no less.

"Could you help me with something?"

For once—he's a little reluctant, he was sort of in the middle of...

"..." Xiong Li sighs, slipping down from the windowsill. "Sure," he sighs, "What do you need?"

After all, he's not going to refuse to help a blind man. He's not that much of a brat. Xie Lian smiles gratefully. "It's been too long since I prayed," he explains.

"Could you bring me to the temple of Wen Jiao?"

Xiong Li is a little baffled by the request, but...

"Sure," he sighs, offering his arm. "It's not too far."

He's not the most experienced guide, but he's kind. Walking at a considerate pace, helping the god when he stumbles.

But when they reach the temple gates, Xie Lian begins to understand.

Before they even walk in the front doors, he knows exactly what is going on. What has been done.

"...You alright, Mr. Hua?" Xiong Li questions, eyeing the weaver's sudden change in expression.

"Oh," the weaver smiles, patting Xiong Li's arm. "Yes, yes...thank you."

He steps inside the gates, pressing one hand against a pillar as he walks by.

He's been here before—and this is no temple of Wen Jiao.

This is the Grand Temple of General Ming Guang, warden of the North.

Xie Lian recognizes the location. The size and shape of it, from when he came here as a boy.

He walks through the hall, listening—and hearing nothing but the sounds of chains clinking together.

"...Wen Jiao must be quite powerful, to have a temple of such size."

"I guess," Xiong Li mutters.

For someone who grew up in the temple, he doesn't sound particularly fond of him.

Xie Lian's footsteps echo as he walks, his fingertips reaching out to trail along the walls. Slowly, he arches an eyebrow.

"What are the suns for?"

They weren't here before, and Pei Ming has no association with them. Those must have been an addition.

"He's a sun god," the teenager explains.

Xie Lian tilts his chin back.

That's a lie.

There is only one god that has dared to lay claim to the sun, and that is the Emperor.

"...Tell me more about him," Xie Lian murmurs, running his fingertips over the engravings.

"Ah..." Xiong Li sighs, leaning back against one of the pillars. "He came to Daqing over one century ago, and freed us from the oppression of the cultivators of Xianle."

The god coughs.

"X...Xianle?" He mutters, thinking back on the sect that was here this morning. "I thought the cultivators here were under the Rain Master."

No one cultivates in Xie Lian's name, he's sure of that.

"What?" Xiong Li blinks. "I mean—the cultivators were descendants of Xianle."

That—that makes more sense.

"Most of the old families in the city could trace their roots all the way back to the old nobility," Xiong Li explains. "Daqing closed it's gates during the outbreak of Human Face disease, and the wars that followed."

Xie Lian remembers that.

It wasn't called Daqing back then, but he remembers that the great walled city of the North closed its gates, surviving the storms that followed.

There was thought of bringing his parents there for shelter, in the end, but...he never got the chance.

“The lords of Daqing were proud of their ancestors, their history—but to the rest of the world, they were oppressors.”

Xiong Li walks beside him now, head tilted back. Xie Lian can’t see it, but the teenager is glancing over the murals on the walls, depicting the story he tells.

“Wen Jiao arrived in the city, shining like a star in the central square—and he gave the lords of Daqing and their cultivators one chance,” Xiong Li stops in front of one mural, tilting his head back.

“They had three days to burn their temples to all other gods. To sing and feast in Wen Jiao’s name. If they did, he would give them wealth and power. If they did not, he would punish them.”

Burning temples?

That doesn’t sound like a god at all.

“But the Lords of Daqing were proud, and loyal to their gods—so they refused.” Xiong Li reaches out to touch the fading paints, worn from the decades.

You can almost see what was once underneath.

“Wen Jiao returned on the third day, and he shattered their Golden Cores.”

The mural depicts as much. A god, casting down the rulers of a once proud city.

“He cast them out, and the descendants of Xianle that remain…” Xiong Li presses a hand to his throat, wincing. “We all pay penance for the disrespect. And the crimes of our ancestors.”

“Xiong Li.”

The teenager starts at how different the Weaver sounds now, how serious his voice is. “…Yes?”

The white robed young man stands before the divine statue of Wen Jiao, his arms crossed. “Thank you for your help—you should go now.”

Xiong Li stares, baffled.

“Don’t you need—?”

“I can make it home just fine,” Xie Lian reassures him, “but it’s late. You should go.”

“...Alright,” the boy agrees cautiously, making to leave, when the weaver adds—

“And Xiong Li?”

He looks back once more.

“Don’t come back here. Not if you can help it.”

The teenager sends him an odd look, but shrugs, mumbling an acknowledgement before he disappears through the temple doors.

Humans don’t belong in this place.

Xie Lian glances around.

Even under the shackle, it feels darker than normal. This place is full of resentful energy.

Toxic death chi, so rotten, it’s difficult for the Crown Prince of Xianle to breathe.

The incense does little to cover it. Like planting flowers to cover the stench of a rotting corpse.

This is no longer a functioning temple.

And Wen Jiao is no god.

Xie Lian knows what he is.

If he had his spiritual powers, he could sweep the issue away in an instant. Maybe if he even had two cursed shackles, instead of three—he could do more. Now, Xie Lian knows that he cannot deal with this matter single-handedly, but... He knows someone who might.

He figured out very quickly that no one is allowed to leave through the gates of Daqing. The shackles on the citizens stop them. The soldiers remain for the pay.

Xie Lian was turned away gently each time he approached the gates, because no one saw a blind tradesman as a threat.

No one knows he’s of Xianle blood. And no one has seen reason to place a shackle on him before.

Now, in the dark, stillness of the night, he darts across rooftops, changed into midnight blue robes for the purposes of stealth.

Approaching the great walls of Daqing.

They're a wonder of the modern world. The tallest walls of their kind, reaching over one hundred meters at their highest point.

The task of building them was so daunting, the engineer behind it ascended as a civil god among the completion of their construction.

Xie Lian can't see them, but he remembers how imposing they looked, when he was just a boy. The white marble and sandstone blocks rising so high into the sky.

He even remembers the sign over the city gate, as tall as three men standing on one another's shoulders.

And he can feel the shadow of those walls now, upon his approach. "Ruoye!" He whispers, leaping from the spire of a nearby tower.

Upon his call, the silk band stretches out, shooting up to the very top of the walls, latching on, pulling it's master up.

Xie Lian stands at the apex for a moment, looking around. "...Take me to the nearest temple," he murmurs.

Immediately, the spiritual device obeys, helping him down to the ground on the other side.

The minute Xie Lian's feet touch the earth, it comes rushing back. Daqing isn't the name of this place.

He turns around, knowing, even if he can't see it, that the sign above the city gates is only a few hundred yards to the east.

He knows now what that sign says.

This is a proud place. An ancient place. One of old, powerful blood.

A city of science and cultivation. Where the streets once rang out with music, so sharp and clear, it would ring through the mountains and the valleys on the northern edge of the central plains.

Two gods have ascended on this soil, and it's magic is strong, pulsing with a force. This city is not a prison. The lords of Daqing were not arrogant oppressors.

These walls were built to protect the people. Xie Lian's people. And the people trapped within them now are their descendants.

The God will not allow them to live as slaves any longer.

Ruoye leads him north, up the side of a large, steep mountain, rising high into the clouds. He stumbles several times, scraping his hands and knees on the rocks, but his spiritual tool always stops him before he falls too far.

The air is slightly bitter from the cold—but clean.

The higher he climbs, the more it feels like he's rising through a layer of mist—Xie Lian feels grass underneath his feet once more as he reaches the plateaus near the summit.

Hears the sound of wind passing through the leaves, and nearby waterfalls. This is a peaceful place.

The spiritual energy here is powerful as well—and clear. Likely more than enough to support a sect of strong cultivators. Xie Lian suspects it could last for millennia to come.

Finally, he approaches a gate, where he is stopped by a guard. "Do you have an entrance permit?"

Xie Lian tilts his head, looking around. "...A what?"

"To enter the Cloud Recesses, you must either be a disciple in the local sect, or you must have an entrance permit." The Guard explains. "Do you meet one of those requirements?"

Xie Lian rubs his chin. "...I suppose not."

The guard stands at a stiff posture. "Then you may not enter."

Xie Lian thinks that over. "...Can I appeal that decision with someone?"

"The sect leader," the guard replies. "But he will not rise for another few hours."

"Ah, I understand..." Xie Lian sighs.

After a moment, he drops to the ground, folding his arms around himself in a meditation stance. “I’ll wait.”

The guard watches him sit like that for some time, impressed by his discipline. “...Are you a cultivator, Mr...?”

“Hua Lian,” the blind Taoist replies. “And I used to be.”

“...Have you come here to study?”

Xie Lian smiles faintly. “Oh, no—just to pray.”

The guard seems to approve of that answer.

After quite some time, the prince dozes.

When he awakens again, there’s something soft in his lap. Fluffy, even.

A...rabbit.

And with it, a permit.

Xie Lian smiles faintly, scratching the creature behind the air.

Such a precious little thing.

The temple to the Rain Master is not particularly large or ostentatious, as per the Rain Master’s own wishes. Xie Lian remembers that much.

But when he stands before the altar... There’s nothing.

Xie Lian frowns, trying to find some sort of spiritual connection. He knows that the shackle around his neck, the one sealing his spiritual power—it stops him from being able to collect spiritual energy effectively. He can’t use a communication array anymore.

Not without help, anyway—of which he has none. But that’s never stoped him from praying before.

Seven Centuries ago, he prayed to Mu Qing. Briefly, but he felt the connection there. Even when he’s prayed to Jun Wu—he knew the Emperor could likely hear him.

But now? Nothing.

Xie Lian tries calling out to Jun Wu, next—and still, he receives no reply. The fact that he doesn't answer isn't surprising, it's the fact that Xie Lian feels no spiritual connection at all.

Hesitantly, he tries praying to Feng Xin next. It's…awkward, but it's not about him.

Still, he hears nothing.

With even more hesitation now, he tries Mu Qing. The only one who he knows for a fact could hear him, back then…

Silence.

Slowly, the god rises to his feet, watching his incense stick burn to ash, turning to one of the sect disciples.

"Is your sect leader nearby?" Xie Lian questions softly, rubbing at his eyes. They ache, now—but he couldn't tell you why.

"Ah…" The two disciples look at one another. "He's meeting with the other sect elders right now—"

"Perfect," Xie Lian murmurs, walking past them.

"Sir!" One of them cries, following after him. "Wait—!"

"No need to show me the way," Xie Lian smiles pleasantly. "I can hear them."

They're over a hundred meters away in one of the main buildings, but he can hear a meeting going on.

The disciples find it ludicrous that their fellow Taoist could possibly hear the elders from that far away, but they follow after him.

For a blind man, he walks…surprisingly fast. "You can't just barge in unannounced!"

"It's forbidden!"

"And I am deeply sorry for that."

Xie Lian bows his head respectfully. "But this is a crisis."

The two young disciples look to one another again, baffled.

A…crisis?

For the first time in months, Xie Lian hears music. Actual music. The notes drift out over the air, soft, soothing…

It sounds like a guqin.

The player must be quite skilled. Xie Lian doesn't think he's ever heard someone play so elegantly.

In a matter of moments, he's bursting through the doors to the meeting hall, and the music stops—punctuated by the gasps of several elders.

"This is a private meeting—!"

The man who stands before them, his hair unadorned, pulled into a simple bun on top of his head, wearing deep blue robes, bows sharply—clasping his hands in front of him.

"Apologies, esteemed masters, but you are all in grave danger." Silence falls across the room.

From the head of the table—a silver haired Cultivator speaks, and from the way people hush at the sound of his voice, Xie Lian can assume he's their leader. "What are you talking about, young man?"

"…I'm sure you're all aware of the curse that is laid upon the city."

When no one denies it, Xie Lian nods, taking that as a point to continue, "How long has it been since you received any communication from the heavens?"

The elders look at one another, baffled.

"…Yushi Huang is not known for being communicative," The Sect Leader murmurs.

"Not hearing from the Rain Master for a stretch of time is not something to be concerned with."

"But have you heard from ANY of the other gods?" Xie Lian presses urgently. When none of the cultivators reply, the prince shakes his head. "This entire region has been blocked."

Which would explain why General Ming Guang hasn't realized what's become of one of his temples. Nothing here is getting in or out, spiritually speaking.

“We are well aware of the curse you’re referring to,” the Sect Leader rises to his feat. “But it’s limited to the city walls.”

“No,” Xie Lian shakes his head vehemently. “That might have been the case in the beginning, but it’s grown with power, and it will continue to swell until it’s something you’re incapable of stopping.”

It’s bizarre, listening to a young man speak with an air of such authority.

“Young sir,” one of the other elders speaks up, not unkindly. “Your intentions are clearly good, but if the curse is meant to grow beyond the city walls, there is little we can do.”

The prince turns his head in the direction of the old man’s voice, frowning. “What do you mean?”

Now, the sect leader speaks again, stroking his beard as he looks Xie Lian over, “Because the curse that has been leveled on the city was cast by a God. We are sympathetic neighbors, but we cannot disobey an edict of heaven.”

“An...” Xie Lian’s jaw goes slack. “An edict?!”

“I understand it must be upsetting, if you have witnessed the suffering that goes on there—but we are mortals. It’s not our place to interfere with the will of Heaven.” The leader of the Cloud Recesses frowns, examining Xie Lian’s aura. “A fellow cultivator should know that.”

Xie Lian clenches his teeth, frustrated by the madness of it all.

Gods, being told it’s not their place to intervene among mortals. Mortals, being told it is not their place to intercede the will of heaven.

And each time, the people suffer more for their inaction.

For the first time in so long—Xie Lian really can’t remember the last time he spoke so loudly, with such firmness—

“Wen Jiao is no God!”

Shock falls over the room, and Xie Lian squeezes his fists tightly.

“Have you been inside the temple?”

“...No,” one of the cultivators admits. “Part of the conditions of us being allowed inside the city is that we may not enter the Grand Temple."

"It's Ming Guang's, not Wen Jiao's."

That seems to give the men pause.

"And it's not being used as a temple at all!"

Xie Lian shivers slightly, disgusted by the grotesque nature of the truth. "It's being used as an array to feed off of the people of the city. It's been running for over a century now, and it's gotten strong enough to even cut communication between the Cloud Recesses and Heaven!"

"An array?" The Sect Leader sputters, shaking his head in disbelief. "I've never heard of an array being used to such ends—"

"It's ancient, high level magic," Xie Lian explains desperately, "beyond anything people of your generation have ever seen."

"People of our generation?!"

One of the elders sputters. "Lad—there isn't a man here who isn't old enough to be your father!"

There isn't a man in this room that is old enough to be Xie Lian's great great great great grandson, but no matter.

"What you're dealing with isn't a god—it's a demon."

Xie Lian slams his fist on the table before him for emphasis, making the men gathered jump with surprise at his passion. "A powerful, intelligent demon. It's probably capable of overpowering heavenly officials at this point—"

"A demon could not take an entire city hostage."

The Sect Leader shakes his head. "And if it did, that would be a matter for the heavens to intercede with."

Xie Lian bites back the urge to lash out in his frustration. "The Heavens don't know this is happening!"

"If you're correct, and it's capable of overpowering gods..."

Another elder speaks up with a frown, "What would we be able to do about it?"

After all, what are they, compared to gods?

Xie Lian doesn't have an immediate answer to that, and the Sect Leader opts for a compromise.

"We already have several disciples that will be traveling to Lotus Pier next month to study under the Jiangs for the summer. While they're there, they can pray in the local temple of Ming Guang for assistance."

That...won't work.

"You don't understand," Xie Lian shakes his head. "This is going to require a massive response from the heavens. Multiple martial gods might be required. That requires a lot more than the prayers of a few disciples, and it could take years to even get a response—!"

"The curse has been on the city for over a century now," another elder frowns. "A few years or so would hardly make a difference. And how do you know so much about the logistical decisions of the heavens, hmm?"

"The city doesn't have years!" Xie Lian finally snaps.

"They might have one more year, but after that—everyone inside those walls is going to die!"

He hears one person stir. Not seated at the table, with the others—but on a cushion near the corner.

The one who was playing the Guqin before. "What would you suggest?"

"...Send all of your disciples to Lotus Cove, now. Have them pray day and night until they receive a response. Or go back to the city with me now, and we can—"

"All of our disciples?" The Sect Leader shakes his head. "Even if I believed you—that isn't possible."

"Do you have any idea what it means, for a city like that to be cut off from the entire region?"

Xie Lian falls silent, because... He can imagine.

"Our sect is responsible for the education, public safety, and law enforcement of every village from here to Yunmeng."

The sect leader shakes his head. “If I send all of my disciples to Lotus Cove, there’s no one to enforce law and order in the region, and it falls into chaos. If we go to the city now, and it turns out you’re right —just how many of us would die, you think?”

In truth? Many.

“I am sorry for the plight of the people who live there,” the old man mutters—and Xie Lian—he believes them.

He sounds truly agonized.

“But we have already stretched ourselves thin trying to help them, and we cannot dispense any more resources than we already have.”

The Sect Leader sits back down. “Maybe I would take that risk if I knew for sure that you were correct—but I cannot risk the wellbeing of the North on the hunch of a man who…heavens, you can’t be that much older than Lan An.”

Xie Lian pauses, realizing— That’s the guqin player.

For a moment—he almost falls back into what he might have done, when he was a younger god.

Feeling frustrated and sorry for himself. Focusing on how helpless he was. Sightless, without his spiritual powers, or even a little bit of luck…

But that wasn’t why he asked Jun Wu to give him these shackles.

Xie Lian did it to punish himself, yes. Because he deserves to be alone, and he deserves to feel this pain that he’s been living with.

But Xie Lian also did it because he didn’t want to make the same mistakes again

He didn’t want there to be another fall of Xianle. He didn’t want to fail someone again the way he did Hong-er. Didn’t want to take someone like Wu Ming for granted ever again.

Xie Lian took these shackles, because he wanted to learn.

And he did learn something, in all of this.

He learned that he is human. That he is flawed, and he can fail.

Those are lessons that you don't get to learn, when you're raised as a prince.

But he also learned something else:

That you can have all of the power in the world, and still be helpless.

You can also be powerless, and change people's lives in ways that you never imagined. But Xie Lian knows now, in this moment—he isn't helpless.

Even without sight, spiritual power, or luck.

He's still resourceful. Intelligent. And, if nothing else, brave.

That's very little compared to the self esteem that he once had. It's more of a practical evaluation of what little strengths he has left, but still.

'I'd rather die trying to help people, than live out there. It would feel like running away.'

Xiong Li is a boy who was born into chains. He's never known life without a shackle around his neck—and he can still say something that brave.

Xie Lian can't guarantee that he can save anyone.

But he can guarantee that he'll try.

And…he remembers something, from long ago.

"…Alright, fine." Xie Lian mutters. "Can one of you tell me how you've been evading the curse inside the city walls then? Tell me that, and I'll go."

The elders seem hesitant, and a quiet, familiar voice speaks up. "…It's me."

Lan An.

"I have a way of dealing with it."

Xie Lian whips his head in the boy's direction, "How?"

He plucks out a few notes on his guqin, in a calming melody—but one that feels rather purposeful.

And, to Xie Lian's fascination—there's spiritual power in the sound itself. It has great potential.

Cultivation has been rather stagnant, in the last thousand years or so. The methods practiced today are the same as what was being taught when Xie Lian's Guoshi was a student himself.

This crude attempt at using Spiritual Power through an instrument... It's highly advanced.

As a matter of fact—Xie Lian has never witnessed a mortal attempt something like that, even on this crude level.

"It's called the song of Clarity," Lan An explains. "It can ward curses off from the mind. I've been using it to treat patients with Qi Deviation, but...

It works on the curse in the city, clearly.

Xie Lian nods. Having heard it once—he can repeat it later, if he needs to. He'll just need to find a way to get his hands on a little spiritual energy, but...

He has a plan forming in his mind. He knows what to do.

He bows once more, this time to Lan An, "Thank you," he murmurs—straightening up once more, walking towards the exit.

"..." The Sect Leader watches him with growing concern. "What do you mean to do?" Xie Lian stops with one hand on the door, turning his chin back towards them.

It startles the men, to witness the calm determination on the young man's face.

Like someone who has weathered a thousand storms.

"I'm going back to Gusu," he explains firmly. "And I'm going to do something for those people."

Because even if he fails, it's more than nothing.

He strides out of the room, knowing that the elders won't follow him.

But one person does, and that's just fine.

Xie Lian smiles, bowing his head, thinking on what he remembered earlier:

He only needs one person to believe him. Just one.

When he's far enough away, he stops.

When he does, he hears Lan An's voice, quiet—but burning with worry.

"...Do you really think everyone in the city is going to die?"

Xie Lian nods, not turning around. "If nothing is done, that's a certainty."

"...How can you be sure?" Lan An questions. "How do you know so much?"

He watches the back of the blind man's head, contemplating many possible answers, but...

The last thing he's expecting is for the Blind Weaver of Gusu to turn around, opening his eyes—and when he does, Lan An gasps at the sight of the glowing pattern in his irises, stumbling back.

Xie Lian doesn't seem offended by the response. If anything, he seems to have expected it.

"Do you know what this is?"

The young cultivator shakes his head, heart pounding in his chest.

"...No," he admits. "I don't."

But he can see that it's not of mortal make.

"It's called a cursed shackle," Xie Lian explains, "Do you know what those are for?"

Lan An swallows dryly, gripping the trunk of a nearby tree for support. "...Yes," he whispers.

To seal the powers of a God.

Which means—he really does know what he's talking about, but also...

"...I'm mortal," he murmurs. "I'm not allowed to see..."

Xie Lian closes his eyes once more. "There are always exceptions," he murmurs. "I couldn't show the elders or your sect leader. Do you know why I showed you?"

Lan An shakes his head.

"Your cultivation level is high enough."

That's what most people don't understand, when it comes to ascensions.

There are many cultivators who are far more powerful than Heavenly Officials who never ascend themselves.

Ascension is a matter of fate and circumstance.

For potential Martial Deities, once they reach that level—they could ascend at any time. After that, it's all about fate, and facing a heavenly calamity.

At that point, the only difference between the Cultivator and Godhood is immortality itself.

In nearly eight centuries, Xie Lian has never encountered a mortal that was powerful enough to reveal himself to willingly.

Not even Jiang Chi, who simply put the pieces together on his own—just like Hong-er did.

And Lan An is a youth of only seventeen years old.

A genius. Probably only surpassed as a cultivator by Xie Lian himself. "...You followed me because you want to save Xiong Li," The god murmurs.

Lan An turns slightly pink, but he doesn't need to reply. It's not a question, it's a statement of fact.

He simply nods.

"I have a plan," Xie Lian admits. "But it won't work without a cultivator helping me."

Lan An doesn't hesitate.

"What do I need to do?"

“...Train.” The god replies, turning back around. “For the next three hundred and sixty four days, do nothing but cultivate. Every moment.”

He continues making his way towards the edges of the Cloud Recesses, and Lan An follows, confused. “That’s...what do you want me to do after that? Where will you go?”

“I’m going back to the city. In one year—come back to Gusu.” Xie Lian replies, hair swaying in the breeze.

“When you arrive, you’ll know what to do.”

The cultivator watches him go, his jaw slightly slack—and it’s only after Xie Lian leaves the cloud recesses that he realizes—

Lan An never asked the god his name.

Xie Lian left Gusu under the cover of night—and that’s how he returns.

For a moment, he stands on top of the city walls, wishing he could see the sight once more.

His eyes ache once more underneath the shackle, and he presses his palm to the marble under his feet.

Gusu is an ancient, powerful city.

Many have called it the forge of the Gods.

Two immortals have ascended on this soil, defying the old myth that lightning never strikes the same spot twice.

The most powerful cultivators in the last millennia have all paid homage to the spiritual lands of Gusu at least once.

Even Xie Lian is no exception.

The people of Gusu are strong, proud, filled with the strength of their shared history.

And they deserve to be free.

Xie Lian reaches into his robes, pulling on the silver chain that dangles there, lifting a ring made from diamond and ruby to his lips.

The sun cracks over the horizon, and the first rays of light begin to shine over Gusu. "...Good morning, Hong'er," the god whispers, taking in the breeze on his face.

He's said that two hundred and fifty five thousand, six hundred and thirty five times now.

"Today is going to be a good day."

With that, he jumps from the edge of the city walls, Ruoye aiding him in his descent towards the ground.

When the market opens that day, he's back in his stall, working on his loom once more. As if nothing happened.

But something is different now.

Now, the children of Daqing flood to the cultivator's stall each and every morning, huddling around, listening to him as he speaks.

From a windowsill on the far side of the market square, lounging like an intrigued cat, Xiong Li observes.

The Weaver works at his loom, and the children watches as he tells stories—not only with his words, but with the threads he works between his fingers.

Stories of gods, princes, and monsters. Bridegrooms, demons, and golden palaces.

Xie Lian wasn't the best at weaving when he started. Honestly, his first attempts were pretty pathetic. But now?

The tapestries he builds beneath his fingertips look like they belong in the halls of royalty, not some street stall.

Impossibly intricate, telling stories that turn back through the decades. Most tapestries like this tell myths or legends, but in this case—

The stories that the Blind Weaver of Gusu tells are of humans.

Of orphans who fall from the sky. Servants who dream of more. Guards that are loyal to the very end—and beyond.

Of rogue cultivators with flirtatious smiles and kind hearts. Of beauty pageants gone...more than a little awry.

Circus disasters and pastoral debacles.

Of Princes who slay their masters, and little girls who dream of family.

And with each story, his little audience grows. Until every child in Daqing sits before his stall, eagerly watching the weaver, Hua Lian, work his craft.

Even the boy in the windowsill abandons any pretense of reading, drifting to the edges of the crowd, his eyes...

Suspicious.

And then, when the white robed youth has so many eyes on him, he does something that makes Xiong Li's eyes widen with shock.

He begins to sing.

His voice is gentle, but strong—maneuvering between higher and lower octaves with ease, and...

It's beautiful, ringing far and wide.

In a language that no one speaks—but still feels vaguely familiar.

The children crowd in closer, eyes enraptured, but Xiong Li—

He sees the city guards turn their heads, and his heart drops.

"Stop..." He mutters, trying to push through the crowd. "Someone make him stop!"

He's been beaten countless times for singing in the streets, almost always in order to save someone else, but...

Xiong Li has been through worse. He can take it. His body might not be as big as Lan An's, but he's durable. He—He isn't a blind man, and —

They might kill Mr. Hua.

The children don't even look at him, too caught up in the weaver's song, and Xiong Li knows—he won't have time to stop him.

His only option now seems to be to charge one of the guards to distract them, but... When he glances back at the weaver, Hua Lian pauses to take a breath.

And when he does, right in Xiong Li's direction, he mouths the words:

Trust me.

That makes the young man stop, his brow creased with confusion.

...What?

Trust—?

One of the guards shoves several children over, pushing his way to the front of the crowd. "What's going on here?!"

The weaver stops in his song, dropping his hands from his loom as he turns back to the guards, raising an eyebrow. "I was just telling the children here some stories," he offers pleasantly. "Would you care to listen?"

"...The god Wen Jiao has forbidden music," The guard hisses.

Xie Lian smiles, tilting his head. "Really? That sounds a little silly. Like something out of a children's story."

He's not exactly good at provoking people. Rudeness doesn't come naturally to him. But whenever he needs to—he just tries to imagine what Hong'er would say.

"You—!" Another guard sputters, balling his hands up into fists, but—
No one is eager to beat a blind man. Not in the middle of the square.

Xie Lian's smile turns a little biting. "Is he going to kidnap a princess next? Or plunge the land into an eternal winter?"

The guards glance at one another, stunned. Even the children don't know how to react.

In the back of the crowd, Xiong Li sulks, irritated that he didn't come up with that first.

"Oh, don't tell me," The weaver leans forward, "you break his spells with true love's first kiss?"

CRACK!

That earns a slap across Xie Lian's face, making his head whip to the side.

“Disrespect to his eminence will not be tolerated! And—” The guard glares, “What was that language, anyway?”

Xie Lian smiles, palm pressed against his cheek. “Xianle.”

The guards stop, looking at one another with confusion. “What?”

Xie Lian lifts his chin, “It’s the language of the Kingdom of Xianle. Don’t you know it?” There’s silence, and his smile turns into a smirk. “I thought your god was an expert.”

Someone hoists him up by the collar.

Xiong Li watches with confusion, realizing—He’s…getting arrested on purpose? Why?

“How would you know the language of Xianle?!”

Xie Lian’s smirk doesn’t fade, even as his feet dangle off the ground. He’s never been a very good liar.

That’s why he sticks close to the truth.

“I’m the last living descendant of the Royal House of Xie.”

Several gasps echo around him, their hands covering their mouths with shock. “Starting with the founder, Xie Bolin,” he explains, “and ending with me.”

Xie Lian.

“…Well then,” the guard sneers, dragging him away. “Allow us to give you the royal welcome!”

Xie Lian doesn’t bother with putting up a fight, knowing exactly where he’s being taken.

The temple of ‘Wen Jiao.’

The ‘Sun God,’ and ‘Guardian Spirit of Daqing.’

Even now, the aura of this place is still suffocating.

Xie Lian doesn’t cry out when they cast him down on the temple steps with a rough shove.

“Your eminence!” One of the guards cries out, “We have another heretic!" "One who says he's a descendant of Xianle! From the Royal House of Xie!" At first, there's silence.

Xie Lian pushes himself to sit up, waiting.

After all—now that he's given them that information, he doubts that the demon will be able to resist.

"...Get on your knees," one of the guards snaps, "you're sitting before the altar of the sun god."

Xie Lian sits back, thinking.

"Hmm...no," he shakes his head. "I won't be doing that."

The guards stop, glaring at him with annoyance.

One even goes as far as to punch the weaver in the back of the head—hard enough to make him bleed from the temple.

"You dare disrespect him in his own temple?!"

The young man might be bleeding—but he shows no signs of feeling any pain. "This isn't his temple."

The aura of the room suddenly thickens, and Xie Lian wrinkles his nose as one guard levels a kick at his ribs.

"If you want to live, you'll pray for forgiveness!"

The prince sits up once more—and still, if he feels the pain, he does not show it. But when he smiles, there's blood on the whites of his teeth.

Somehow, even sightless—he knows to turn his head toward the altar.

"I only pray to gods." He replies dryly, "So, I cannot."

Another god cries out with outrage, going to kick him again, but...

Now, a voice calls out—hissing from behind the altar.

"Leave us."

The guards stumble backwards at the sound of their deity's voice, their faces suddenly going pale.

Xie Lian, however, seems unbothered.

“That’s probably for the best,” the weaver agrees, “it would be a little awkward otherwise.”

One guard looks like he wants to kick him again, just for that, but…

After a pointed hiss from the altar, the group flees out of the temple gates. Xie Lian sits back and waits.

After a moment, he hears heavy footsteps walking towards him, and the stench of Death Chi grows stronger in the air—so thick, Xie Lian has to fight back the urge to gag.

“That was an awfully big scene you made, just to die,” the creature hisses. Xie Lian smiles.

“I won’t die.”

He’s pretty familiar with just how much his body can withstand, by now. There’s no demon that can kill him.

“Brave little mortal.” the creature hisses, stalking closer.

Xie Lian can’t see how pale his skin is, or the pointed tips of his ears. Eyes blood red, fangs razor sharp.

Even so, he doesn’t seem particularly impressed.

Still. The only other person in this room is a demon—and as such, Xie Lian has no qualms about opening his eyes, making the creature scramble back with surprise upon seeing the shackle.

“There are no mortals here.”

Wen Jiao falls silent, but Xie Lian can hear his heavy, shocked breathing.

“Did they tell you about the stories I was telling, out in the square? I’m sure they must have,” the god muses, twirling a lock of hair around his finger. “There was one I didn’t tell them.”

See—when he was in the Cloud Recesses, he did take a quick peek inside their libraries.

The sect wasn’t good for much, really—but they’re excellent record keepers. And Xie Lian’s fingertips are sensitive enough to read characters just from feeling the ink on a page.

The prince can hear it, the way the demon slowly paces around him—like it hasn't quite decided what to do with him yet—and he smiles.

"Once upon a time, in the City of Gusu, there was a young cultivator by the name of Wen Jiao."

His pacing stops, and Xie Lian smiles.

"He had one dream—to become a god. He went to every single sect in the center of the Cultivation world, but no one would take him…" the prince trails off, leaning his elbow against one of the temple steps. "Because he was cruel, and prone to violence."

There's an angry hiss.

"In his desperation, he climbed to the top of the city walls during the mid autumn festival, hoping to release his Lanterns from the greatest height—but in his eagerness, he fell to his death."

Xie Lian shakes his head, clicking his nails against the marbles. "Very sad."

"It's a shame you'll never get the chance to tell the story to anyone else," The Demon snarls, eyeing the cursed shackle in the crown prince's eyes, his own gaze narrowed. "Even if I can't kill you—I can still imprison you here."

"True," Xie Lian agrees. "But that's fine."

The demon stares at him with uncertainty, and he explains—

"I've been in your city for a little while now. Have I interfered with you until now?"

Xie Lian has never been the best liar.

"…You haven't."

But to a creature like this? He can do it without remorse.

"Why should I care if you want to impersonate a god?" Xie Lian shrugs, "Look what the heavens did to me."

After all—compared to what he used to be, he knows he must make a miserable sight.

Wen Jiao looks him over, and…he doesn't seem to disagree. "Then why did you come here?"

He sits up, stretching his arms over his head. "Because—I know why you're doing this," he muses, glancing around at the heavy state of dark energy all around him. "At first—I thought it was an array built to inflict a curse, but then I realized…"

The god raises his chin.

"You're cultivating, aren't you?"

Well, he's trying to. In a sick, barbaric way. That much is obvious.

"Still trying to ascend."

Wen Jiao glares, a forked tongue flicking out between his lips, tasting the air with annoyance.

"But it's not a matter of spiritual power, is it?"

That lock of hair is still twirling around his finger, just as nimbly as the threads he pulls all day long.

"If it was, you would have ascended many times over," Xie Lian shrugs. "But you haven't."

"What's it to you?!" The demon snarls, eyes flaring.

"I was cast out, remember?" The prince points out, stretching his legs. "Nothing would please me more than to spit in their eyes by helping a fellow reject ascend. I've done it twice, you know." Xie Lian adds airily. "I'm a bit of an expert."

Wen Jiao pauses, and…

He's listening.

"What can you do that I haven't already tried?"

"You just need a Heavenly Calamity," Xie Lian murmurs.

He sounds especially believable now, because he's sticking close to the truth, only occasionally diverging.

"And I know how to trigger one."

“...How?”

The god snorts, standing up. “I’m not telling you. Then you wouldn’t need me anymore.”

Wen Jiao slithers around him, wrapping himself around a nearby pillar with a sulking sigh.

They do have aligned interests, and...

He doesn’t have anything to lose by agreeing. “...What would it require?”

“Timing is key,” Xie Lian explains. “The next auspicious moment will come in eleven months. And when it does, I will help you call the calamity. Until then—I’ll work on your tapestry.”

Wen Jiao pauses, nails digging into the side of the pillar. “Tapestry?”

“Oh, yes.” The god nods, blinking owlishly. “All of the gods in Heaven—my tapestries hang in their palaces, telling the stories of their lives and ascensions. Imagine how jealous they’ll be, when you arrive with yours already made.”

Wen Jiao likes the sound of that.

“I’ll need a new loom, and proper threads,” Xie Lian stops in the middle of the hall, tapping his chin. “Oh—and an assistant.” He tilts his head back over his shoulder, looking in the demon’s direction—as if he could see him. “Think you can manage that?”

Wen Jiao huffs.

“Obviously.”

He doesn’t see the smile on Xie Lian’s face, when he turns around.

“Perfect. We’re in business, then.”

It feels a little dirty, playing tricks—but...

When Xie Lian feels the evil all around him, so sharp, it makes his eyes sting—he doesn’t feel so guilty.

He’s transported to the palace of Gusu—still a fine, elegant building. Walls of white jade, floors tiled with hues of green and blue.

Meant to mimic the pattern of the mighty river that flows outside the city walls.

As a city state, Daqing technically has a king, not a lord.

In this case, that would be Wen Sicong, Wen Jiao's son and living heir.

A greedy, selfish man who acts as little more than a figurehead—drinking himself into a stupor, locking himself away with his swords and his courtesans.

The prince of Daqing is his grandson.

Wen Mao is a boy of just seven years old—and shy by nature.

He watches Xie Lian from a distance—curious, but clearly too nervous to ever actually approach.

And it saddens the god—because clearly, the boy has very little to do with the sins of his father and grandfather.

But the crimes of Wen Jiao are so severe, so profound—without a doubt, disaster will come to their bloodline, sooner or later.

Maybe Wen Mao will be lucky and escape karma's wrath—but somewhere down the line, his descendants will suffer.

The god sets up his work space in a set of chambers on the eastern end of the palace, with so many unoccupied rooms, he ends up with an entire wing to himself.

Which suits his plans just fine.

But in one regard, his accommodations fall short. "Amateur! UNACCEPTABLE!"

A bronze chalice smacks against the wall, making the assistant flinch and tremble. "I- I'm sorry sir, I'll get it right next time!"

"You think I'll give you another chance?!" The weaver snarls.

(He feels horrible. Absolutely awful. He's probably going to cry about this later.)

He rounds on one of the guards, crossing his arms. "I've had enough of this—just go and fetch my old assistant for me. Everyone you've brought so far has been an absolute disgrace!"

The young man hesitates, looking back and forth between Mr. Hua, and the newest assistant.

But before he can say much more—the weaver grabs him by the front of his shirt, yanking him in with surprising strength.

“Did I stutter?”

(Forget crying a little later, he’s going to cry himself to sleep.)

“...What’s the name of your assistant, Mr. Hua?”

The hostile act drops a little too quickly—but Xie Lian was already overstretching his negligible acting skills, trying to pull that one off.

“You’re actually already familiar with him.”

After sundown, a platoon of guards returns with Xie Lian’s official “assistant.”

And the teenager is thrashing and howling like a cat that’s about to be given a bath.

“I said let GO of me! I didn’t even DO anything this time!” The teenager has one soldier gripping him under each arm, practically carrying him along as his feet flail and kick. “HEY!”

He might be thin—nearly everyone in the city is—but he’s strong enough so that both of the soldiers dragging him seem slightly belabored.

“You know what, Captain Chen?!” The teenager cries, glaring at the leader of the squad. “I always KNEW you were a creepy old PERVERT!”

The leader of the squadron stops ahead of them, turning his head back to glare at the young man.

“Hah?!”

“You always enjoyed whipping me a LITTLE too much, I’m just saying!” The teenager glares, dark hair whipping around his face as he struggles. “And look at you now!”

“You aren’t even trying to make up a reason to drag me down here anymore! Well, I’ll have you know—I’m saving myself for marriage! Or the first man that asks—but definitely not you!”

"You know, we really didn't bring you here for a whipping, but you make it tempting." "See what I mean?! You—!"

The door to their destination opens, and Xiong Li is thrown inside without much preamble, tumbling across the floor until he lands at Xie Lian's feet.

"Mr. Hua, your assistant has arrived."

The young man lifts his head up, slightly disoriented.

On one hand—he's relieved to see that the Weaver isn't dead. But on the other—he's never been quite so confused in his young life.

Xie Lian smiles politely at the guards, bowing his head. "Thank you, Captain Chen. That will be all for today."

When the doors shut, Xiong Li sits up, rubbing the back of his head, glancing around the room.

By far, this is the fanciest place he's ever been in—in his entire life.

There's an actual door, for starters. And multiple bedrooms. Art hanging on the walls.

In the center of the room sits a massive loom, with threads of every color hanging in spools along the walls, waiting to be selected.

"So I'm...your weaving assistant now?" Xiong Li questions

Xie Lian scratches the side of his head, having the sense to look a little sheepish.

"I'm sorry about the way they treated you," he mutters. "But I needed an excuse to have you brought here, and that made the most sense."

At first, Xiong Li waves him off, not particularly upset. "They always treat me like that, it's not your fault."

But then, he pauses.

"But...why did you need me? And why are you in the Wen's palace? And where have you been—?"

Xie Lian holds up a finger to stop him, and the boy falls silent, watching him intently.

"I wish I could make this easier," the god sighs. "But I'm about to put a lot on your shoulders."

Xiong Li's brow furrows. "...Like what?"

He hasn't bothered to stand up—not quite yet. Besides—he didn't take that fall quite as gracefully as he's pretending he did, and his shoulder is screaming with pain.

After a moment, Xie Lian kneels beside him.

In general, he's never been the most conventional person—but even for him, the idea of liberating an entire city from the grip of a powerful demon with no spiritual powers, and only the help of two teenagers...

It's requires a stretch of the imagination. Still, he has to try.

"I am going to give you a lot of information at once," Xie Lian explains slowly, flexing his fingertips. "And I'm not going to be able to explain how I know most of it."

Xiong Li frowns, because that isn't exactly comforting. Still—Xie Lian knows exactly what to say.

"But the next time you see Lan An," he murmurs, feeling the way Xiong Li immediately stiffens upon hearing that name, "He'll verify that everything I am about to tell you is true."

There are few things in this world that the boy has faith in—and Lan An is one of them.

He's the only person that has Xiong Li's unconditional trust. So, if he'll verify it, then...

"Why me?" He mumbles, still not understanding why Xie Lian sent for him, of all people.

In truth? Because he's the strongest mortal left within the gates of Gusu. But also...

"The day that those cultivators came," Xie Lian explains, "I heard you tell your friend that you would rather die helping people than run away. Did you mean that?"

The teenager stiffens, surprised that the weaver actually heard that, but...he nods. The god smiles, and he braces himself.

Xiong Li nearly jumps out of his skin when the weaver reaches for his throat, instinctively distrusting of being touched by a stranger, but—

Then, Xie Lian's fingers wrap around the iron shackle there, gripping tightly. "...what are you—?"

CRACK!

Xiong Li goes completely still, his eyes widening.

In Daqing, your first shackle is placed around your throat in infancy, before you ever leave your mother's arms.

They're replaced as you outgrow them, but—

His entire life, he's felt the weight of chains on his skin.

Now, for the first time—he watches as the iron of the shackle that once sat at the base of his throat fragment and crumble, falling to the floor in several different pieces.

At first, all he can do is sit there, staring blankly.

Xie Lian rarely reacts to pain anymore.

But this—this is more than just damage to his body.

To shatter cursed iron with no spiritual energy requires incredible strength—and it also leaves your own body vulnerable

Xie Lian's fingers are scorched to the bone—but it's his spirit that stings with agony.

He lets out a pained nose, clutching his limbs to his chest, biting back any other sound, and Xiong Li...

Just sits there, eyes impossibly wide, fingers wrapped around his throat—now, for the first time in his life, bare.

"You...how...how did you—?"

It takes Xie Lian a moment to speak, lips trembling. He isn't accustomed to actually feeing his pain anymore—so when something is severe enough for hm to feel it like this—

He really doesn't know whether to laugh or cry. "I...already told you," he rasps. "I can't explain."

Xiong Li still has his fingers clutched around his neck, trying to wrap his mind around what just happened, because—

In a century, no one in Daqing has ever had their shackle removed without Wen Jiao releasing it himself. Never.

And now…

He swallows dryly, shaking himself out of it.

“Are—are you alright?” He mutters, dropping his hands as he leans closer to Xie Lian, who is still clutching his hands to his chest like he’s been burned. “Your hands—”

“It’s fine,” Xie Lian mutters, shaking his head. “I’ll heal.”

He always does, after all—and while this isn’t pleasant, Xie Lian doubts recovering will take more than waiting overnight. He knew after touching Liao Yong’s shackle, when he first came to Gusu, that his body would protest touching it again.

He planned for this.

Xiong Li sits back, shivering. He feels—

He feels everything more sharply now. The cold against his skin, the aches in his body. How hungry and tired he is.

But his sight also feels sharpened, like the world is brought into greater focus. Even scents and sounds are heightened.

It’s like he’s spent his entire life living with something shrouding over him, muffling his senses—and now, for the first time—

Xiong Li’s hand drifts down pressing over his chest, his eyes welling up with tears. He’s free.

There’s warmth under his palm.

This unfamiliar sense of heat building in his chest, like a small crackling flame—and when he looks up at Xie Lian, his eyes wide, he whispers—

“Mr. Hua, what’s happening?”

“That…” Xie Lian closes his eyes, fingers still trembling, “That’s your golden core.”

Xiong Li tries to process that, eyebrows knitting together. “But…I don’t have…”

Xie Lian has to lean against the wall for the moment—sitting up without assistance is too difficult.

“Wen Jiao was an average cultivator at best when he died,” the gods mutters. “He doesn’t have the means to shatter a golden core.”

It’s something that the children who are spirited away to the Cloud Recesses already know, but—Xiong Li never had the chance to learn.

He takes deep, unsteady breaths, and it’s almost like…feeling alive for the first time.

It’s like there’s a fire in his chest, sparking brighter and faster with every breath he takes.

“Why…” He swallows dryly. “Why did you do that for me? And what…what do you mean about Wen Jiao being an average cultivator—?”

And this is where they get to the part with Xie Lian dumping information on the young man—all at once.

That Wen Jiao is not a god, but a demon.

That this city is known by the name of Gusu, not Daqing.

That the chains the citizens wear are not out of punishment at all.

The chains exist to allow Wen Jiao to feed off of their golden cores like a parasite— until, eventually, they die.

“Gusu…” Xiong Li repeats slowly, his expression pinched with thought. “That’s why…”

Xie Lian wipes a bead of sweat from his brow, brought on by the exhaustion of his body fighting to purge the cursed energy from the shackle. “Why what?”

The teenager reaches for the book that he has tucked into the waist of his pants, “Lan An…the last time he was here…”

The book he gave Xiong Li—it was another romance.

Lan An has always been aware of it being Xiong Li’s favorite genre, and while he typically doesn't enjoy stories like that—he'll bring one for Xiong Li once a year, and the boy will read it until the spine breaks from wear.

But this year was different.

Lan An never gave Xiong Li a book that he wasn't allow to show anyone else before.

And when Xiong Li read it, he didn't understand why it had to be a secret. It was just some fantasy, not even that romantic, written about a general and a princess.

It was interesting enough, but it ended with her slitting her own throat, and him ascending as a god—so he wasn't really that fond of the ending.

Still, he listened to Lan An's request—and he showed it to no one. Except now, he's realizing…that general…He ascended in Gusu.

Which means…not only is the weaver likely telling him the truth— It means that story likely isn't a fantasy at all.

"Gusu…is a real place," he repeats slowly. "We're in Gusu?"

Xie Lian nods, pulling his knees up against his chest. "One of the oldest cities in the world."

Xiong Li presses his hands to his temples, his eyes wide. "And…" he glances back up at Xie Lian, one question still unanswered, "Why did you choose me?"

The God sighs, focusing on taking even breaths to steady himself. "Two reasons: first, I needed someone capable."

Xie Lian can't collect Spiritual Power on his own—but now, without his shackle, Xiong Li can. And from what he's watching now, he can tell that even with no training, Xiong Li's golden core is strong. Rapidly sparking with power, like a star that has just sparked to life.

He's also clever, perceptive—with a durable body. The perfect combination for a cultivator.

"And…" Xie Lian sighs. "Most arrays—like the one Wen Jiao has in the grand temple —are sealed with blood. But Wen Jiao was already dead when he built it."

Xiong Li's brow furrows. Most of this is high level magic—going way above his head in terms of understanding, but he tries to keep up.

"Why does that matter?"

"His own blood couldn't have sealed that array," Xie Lian explains. "How much do you know about cultivation?"

"Pretty much nothing," the teenager admits.

"Most of the time, cultivators are born equal in terms of capability. There are those with natural talent, but golden cores are almost always the same at birth. It's how you train and develop your core that determines your strength."

It has nothing to do with who your family is, or what position you're born into.

For example—Mu Qing was the son of a woodworker and a house maid. and yet, his cultivation level will always be higher than that of someone like Lang Qianqiu, who was born in a royal bloodline.

Both are powerful, to be sure—but Mu Qing has a natural intelligence and skill, allowing him to reach a higher level.

While class divides matter in terms of social perceptions—they don't when it comes to the bare science of what cultivation actually is.

"But..." Xie Lian takes a deep breath, flexing his fingers—they hurt less now, which means his body is finally starting to recover. "The exception to that is blood magic."

"Like...the kind of magic sealing the array?"

"Yes," Xie Lian nods. "I don't think that Wen Jiao targeted the descendants of Xianle blood out of some sort of grudge."

In his conversations with the demon, he seemed apathetic on the subject of politics— and he's too young to have genuine reason to hate the people of Xianle.

"I think it's because it's Xianle blood that created the array in the first place."

And for an array this powerful—that would require old blood. Ancient blood, even by the standards of Gusu.

“...And...what does that have to do with me?” Xiong Li frowns.

“I mean—I’m a descendant of Xianle, but so is almost everyone else in Daq—Gusu.”

Xie Lian takes a deep breath. “They don’t teach you much about Xianle, I’m assuming?”

The teenager shakes his head, eyes wide.

“The founder—his name was Xie Bolin,” the god explains.

“Not much is known about the family before that—just that it was already ancient. He founded the city of Xianle, and his eldest son, Xie Feng, carried on the family name and royal bloodline. But—” Xie Lian holds up a finger, “The Central Plains are a vast territory.”

There’s a misconception among many, that the rapid turnover of empires in the center of the continent is because their predecessors were weak—but this isn’t true.

It’s because the territory is immense, surrounded by enemies—and as such, it’s difficult to defend.

Xianle lasted far longer than any of its predecessors—and certainly longer than the kingdom of Yong’an did, afterwards.

Because Bolin had been raised through a war, and he had learned his lessons well.

“At the time, Xianle was vulnerable to invasions from the north, so...”

Xie Lian feels odd now, repeating lessons he learned as a boy, barely able to focus on the page in front of him, whining and trying to take naps in Mei Nianqing’s lap—but his teacher was stern, insistent even —

Saying it was important to know one’s history.

“He sent his second son, Xie Cheng, to help defend and fortify the great walled city of the north, Gusu.”

As such, all of the invasions that Xianle would face, up until the end—came from south, east, or west—never the North.

“After the fall of Xianle, Gusu became an independent city, and the Xie Branch that ruled over the walls took on a new name—Xiong.”

Xiong Li stops, his breath halting. "But…I…"

He never knew his mother, or any other relatives. Never knew…anything about where he came from.

"They would have been the oldest bloodline in Gusu when Wen Jiao arrived," Xie Lian explains carefully. "The last King of Gusu, his name was Xiong Zhan. When I looked into the records of the evacuees from Gusu after Wen Jiao's arrival—there's no indication that he escaped."

Meaning—Wen Jiao most likely slaughtered the King of Gusu, and it's his blood that binds the curse to the city now. That curses the iron in the shackles his subjects wear around their necks.

And, from what Xie Lian can tell, Xiong Li is his last living grandson.

At first, part of him hoped that, as an ancestor of the Xiong line, he might be able to use his own blood to break the array.

He already tried that in the temple, provoking the gods into beating him while he stood before 'Wen Jiao's' altar, but to no effect.

He's too far removed at this point—and while Xie Lian's blood is incredibly powerful in it's own right—it can't break the array.

Xiong Li's, however, stands the most likely chance of doing that.

"Um…" the teenager trails off, thinking. "Does that mean I'll have to…die?"

Xie Lian stops, then laughs—almost surprised by the morbidity of that idea. "No! It doesn't take that much blood—just a small cut, and you'll be fine."

Xiong Li nods, forming a plan in his head. "I guess…I could find a way to sneak in—"

"That won't be necessary." Xie Lian shakes his head. "Wen Jiao would kill you before you got that close. No— when the time is right, you'll be able to walk right in."

"And…what am I supposed to do until then?"

Xie Lian flexes his fingers again, testing them—and they hurt even less now.

"Train."

“Train…in what?”

“Well…” Xie Lian tilts his head back against the wall, turning his head towards the window. Facing away from Xiong Li, he opens his eyes. They ache more now, by the day—but he couldn’t tell you why. “I’m going to make a cultivator out of you.”

By day, Xie Lian works at his loom. It’s difficult at first, fingers aching with each move—but after one day, he’s fully recovered.

Xiong Li sits by his side, holding his threads—trying to look knowledgeable on the subject when the guards arrive.

But the nights are different.

Xie Lian shows the young man how to develop his core—new cultivation methods—

But not his own, which requires abstinence. Xiong Li flat out refused that idea, and when Xie Lian asked if he had a particular reason for that—

Well, the young man turned red all the way to his ears.

They practice sword forms with blades swiped from the palace armory, Xie Lian teaching him ancient methods, passed down for generations.

And Xiong Li absorbs every lesson like a flower reaching towards the sun. Bright, eager—and burning with talent.

He finds it surprising at times, that two young men with so much talent—more than Xie Lian has seen since he himself was a young cultivator—could be born on the same day, in the same city.

In many ways, it almost seems like fate.

Nearly eight centuries before, the cultivation world changed.

A young, impossibly talented prince—beloved by his people—defeated a heavenly calamity far beyond what had been faced in the past as a mere mortal.

It’s impossibly rare to rise so high.

And almost as if pulled by the inevitable nature of gravity, this crown prince fell like no other.

By his own choice. His refusal to turn his back on the world.

And now, centuries later, that same refusal will change the Cultivation World once more.

But this time, it marks the beginning not of a fall—but an ascension.

Not of a tragedy, like every other story that Xie Lian, the Flower Crowned Martial God, the Guoshi Fangxin, General of Yong'an, the famed Blind Weaver has told before.

This was the beginning of a new tale.

A tale of lies, death and betrayal.

But also hope, forgiveness, and grace.

It would mark a new age in the heavens, and, in turn, lead to a new era—sparking a revolution in the world of Cultivation.

Before any of that, there was only a fallen god, two young cultivators, and a city enslaved.

Before there was a war for the heavens, there was a battle for the great walled city of the North.

Before there was a tale of redemption—there was a love story.

And it began in Gusu.

The Battle of Gusu

Chapter Summary

> “This—doesn’t make me look anything like a god!” Wen Joao howls. “How is anyone going to be jealous if I show up with this?! You tricked me, you—!”
>
> “You aren’t a god,” Xie Lian replies calmly. “Why would you look like one?”
>
> “I—I’m about to face my calamity!”
>
> “Are you?” Xie Lian replies coldly, and Wen Jiao only now seems to notice— The bandage around his neck—
>
> It’s...moving?
>
> “You better hurry down here and face it then.”

Chapter Notes

> You can find me on twitter and keep up with current updates of the story HERE

YEAR EIGHT HUNDRED

Night lies quietly over the city of Daqing. Like a heavy, dark blanket—pulling her people into their homes, sleeping in their beds.

The streets are lit only by the light of the moon, shining down like a final witness. A weaver sits before his loom.

In the center of the city, a sword rests patiently in it’s scabbard.

Outside the walls of Gusu, a guqin’s strings remain silent.

Slowly, one last golden thread is pulled into place—and the tapestry, one that was a year in the making, has been finished.

The god rises to his feet, pulling and tying off the edges of the tapestry from the loom, carefully rolling it down, summoning the guards to help him lift it.

After all, Xie Lian started a countdown, three hundred and sixty four days before. A Heavenly Calamity is coming.

It takes three men to carry the tapestry, rolled up and propped on their shoulders like a carpet. Xie Lian trails beside them, hands folded in his sleeves, allowing himself to enjoy the breeze on his face.

His eyes pulse, like there's a new heartbeat beneath each lid.

Finally, they approach the steps of the grand temple, the moon rising high in the sky —as Xie Lian insisted.

After all, the events about to unfold are not for mortal eyes. Better to face them while the city sleeps.

The tapestry is dropped on the temple floor with a heavy thud.

Dust is kicked up in the air—and this time, the guards don't wait for Wen Jiao to descend down from the ceiling, hissing, before they take their leave.

When the temple doors shut, Xie Lian smiles, hands still calmly folded inside his sleeves. "Are you ready, Master Wen?"

There's the sound of scales sliding over tile as the demon descends down from the rafter. Sometimes, he has the capability of pretending to wear a somewhat more human skin, but...

Wen Jiao's true form is half man, half snake. "I've been ready for a hundred years..." He hisses.

"Good," Xie Lian turns his chin down, to where the tapestry lays at his feet. "It's almost time. Would you like to take a look?"

The demon slithers forward eagerly, tongue flicking out between his teeth as clawed hands grip the edge of the tapestry, giving it a heavy shake.

The cloth rolls out, tens of meters in length and diameter—and from the sheer scale of the thing—it's difficult for Wen Jiao to really see the story it tells from the ground level.

So, naturally, he coils around a nearby pillar, slithering back up to the rafters. Now, looking down upon the tapestry from a height of dozens of meters... Wen Jiao glares, his eyes narrowing into slits.

"What is this?!" He hisses, irises burning like brimstone in the dark.

Cursed shackles gleam up at him.

“It’s what I promised you,” Xie Lian explains.

“You—” The demon sputters, his voice ringing throughout the empty, desecrated temple. “You said you would make a tapestry for my heavenly palace!”

“Tapestries tell stories,” the edge of Xie Lian’s boot taps the bottom corner of the piece, “and this is yours.”

“It’s a disgrace!”

The scenes before him—they depict a monster.

Maybe not so much through his form, but through acts.

They show a city that looks like a hellscape. Hundreds of miserable humans, piled together, flailing for freedom, and…

Wen Jiao sitting on top of the heap, holding the chains.

“This—doesn’t make me look anything like a god!” Wen Joao howls. “How is anyone going to be jealous if I show up with this?! You tricked me, you—!”

“You aren’t a god,” Xie Lian replies calmly. “Why would you look like one?”

“I—I’m about to face my calamity!”

“Are you?” Xie Lian replies coldly, and Wen Jiao only now seems to notice— The bandage around his neck—

It’s…moving?

“You better hurry down here and face it then.”

Slowly, it begins to dawn on the demon.

“You…” He whispers, voice trembling with fury. “You TRICKED me!”

“Mmm…” Xie Lian shrugs, “Actually, I think I’m the only one in this situation that’s been honest.”

The demon plunges down, claws outstretched—and the god easily dodges out of his way, leaving him to punch a hole in the temple floor.

His next attack is so ferocious that when Xie Lian dodges it, his momentum carries him all the way down the temple hall, crashing through the front doors, sending demon tumbling down the steps.

He lands in the street below as Xie Lian makes a calm, orderly exit from the temple.

“You aren’t a god,” Xie Lian says those words again, but this time—he intentionally raises his voice, allowing it to carry across the square and into the home of the sleeping city dwellers. “And the name of this city isn’t Daqing!”

Wen Jiao sneers and hisses, rising up.

His tail whips and rattles behind him, eyes burning in the night. “Cities are reborn every year. They are named by the people who rule them! And I AM the God of Daqing!’

He lashes out now, talons bared, aiming straight for Xie Lian’s face, but—

He’s caught by the wrist.

A smaller, pale, almost delicate hand—gripping the limb of a powerful demon—

Seemingly without any strain.

When Wen Jiao looks down, the pattern of those shackles stares right back up at him.

Xie Lian believes in speaking softly—even if it might make him look weak.

He isn’t a young, arrogant prince anymore.

His blood is ancient, and his scars run deep.

But when the Crown Prince of Xianle finds the right moment, he reminds the world that he can roar.

“GODS DO NOT ENSLAVE THEIR BELIEVERS!”

BOOM!

Using that grip in on the demon’s wrist, Xie Lian flips the creature over his head, slamming him down so violently, the front steps of the grand temple turn into something much more similar to a crater, stones and timber collapsing under the force of the impact.

The sound is loud enough that it leaves several citizens stirring in their beds, drawing close to their windows to peek outside.

Where they see a foul, scaled beast, half human, half serpent, struggling to pull himself out of the wreckage.

Ruoye whips around Xie Lian in a fury.

Kicking up a wind that makes his hair stir around him, hands balled into fists by his sides.

“This city is called GUSU!” He cries, his voice ringing through the air like the strike of a bell, signaling a call to action. “AND HER PEOPLE ARE NOT YOUR SLAVES!”

Wen Jiao smiles.

“…You surprised me,” he admits, “I wasn’t expecting you to have a grip like that.”

He slithers out of the hole—and suddenly, his form begins to grow.

Xie Lian stands still, grimly aware of the fact that the demon is expanding to nearly five times it’s original size.

After absorbing countless lives over an entire century—Xie Lian would expect something like this.

Now, the serpent is large enough to fill the city square—and when he laughs, it feels like the sky itself rumbles.

“But you know…I think I’ve decided on a new plan!”

His tail whips around, taking out an entire terrace, sending rubble and debris raining down.

Xie Lian doesn’t react as Ruoye smacks the most threatening projectiles out of the way. A small shard of class slices his cheek—and he doesn’t even flinch.

“MAYBE THE BEST WAY TO BECOME A GOD…” The demon snarls, “IS IF I BRING JUN WU YOUR HEAD!”

An interesting thought. Xie Lian can't imagine the heavenly emperor would be pleased.

Despite everything, Jun Wu was always kind to him.

"You can try," the prince replies calmly.

"YOU THINK YOU STAND A CHANCE?" The demon howls. "You have NO spiritual powers—YOU DON'T EVEN HAVE A WEAPON!"

That reminds Xie Lian to push up his sleeves, binding them at the elbow.

"I tend to do too much damage with swords," he murmurs. "My bare hands are better suited."

That makes Wen Jiao snarl in annoyance—no, with offense that Xie Lian would think him so easily dealt with.

"Before you get so cocky, you should ask yourself—are you sure these people AREN'T MY SLAVES?!"

As he says those words, tens of thousands of iron shackles, all around the city—they begin to glow red hot, and Xie Lian's expression turns grim.

From several blocks away, a young cultivator leans back against an alley wall, whistling under his breath—listening to the commotion.

Technically, he's supposed to be waiting for some sort of signal—but Xiong Li isn't sure if the battle starting is much of a signal. After all, wouldn't Mr. Hua have worked something into the conversation? Like...

'I guess we should...START fighting!'

Or,

'It TIME to kill you!'

You know. Something subtle, like that. How else is Xiong Li supposed to know when the opportune moment arrives?

He kicks a rock with the tip of his boot, fidgeting eagerly.

It's not like he's a mind reader, y'know, but—

But then, the city takes on a reddish haze.

"..." Xiong Li tips his head back—and then he sees it, creeping over the sky. A red shadow, growing along the edges of the full moon.

A...Lunar eclipse? Right now?

"...Well," he mutters, pushing off of the wall. "That feels like a sign."

He darts into the street, knowing his path well—and as soon as his feet touch the cobble stones...

Doors begin opening all around him.

All in pace with each other, almost like...

Ants, moving in a hill.

Xiong Li pauses, glancing around—until he sees the first person.

A young girl, her hair in low pigtails, standing in the doorway of her home.

At first, Xiong Li sees no reason for worry, until he sees her eyes.

Glowing a violent shade of red in the dark—matching the cursed iron shackle around her neck.

There's no awareness in that gaze.

"Uh..." Xiong Li takes a step back, glancing around.

There's an awkward moment in any young man's life, where he sticks out in a crowd. Xiong Li is pretty used to that, he's a very unique person.

But you don't want to be the only conscious one in a crowd of violent zombies.

It's not fun. He definitely wouldn't recommend it.

"Oh god, oh god, oh god!"

You know, in the stories they'll tell about this later, he's always described as this brave, heroic figure.

And Xiong Li is brave, it's true—but he's never been great at keeping a straight face.

He also might be strong, for a human—but he isn't a god, and he's only been training as a cultivator for a year, so...

The teenager wheezes a little, throwing himself up onto the rooftop, scrambling to find purchase.

"This...is not as easy as they make it look in the books!"

And leaping between rooftops? Not easy. Not at all—but better than nearly getting clawed to death by his neighbors on the streets below.

He barely manages to catch himself when he leaps onto the temple roof, biceps trembling as he heaves himself up onto the ledge.

Honestly—he's seen Lan An do this a thousand times, and he can yank himself up with one hand, like nothing! And he weighs more than Xiong Li does, since disciples in the cloud recesses actually get regular meals.

For a moment Xiong Li sits there, wiping the sweat from his brow. "...Just how strong is that freak?!" He mutters under his breath.

Well, this would probably be easier if he was using spiritual power—but Mr. Hua told him that he should save it until he absolutely needed it, so...

Xiong Li sighs, glancing to the east.

The battle between Wen Jiao and the weaver is still raging and...

Xiong Li knows now, why Mr. Hua couldn't explain much to him in the beginning.

Because he's obviously not a ghost or a demon—but no human could fight light that either. Especially not blind.

In any case—he's got his own job to do.

The mortal finds an open window—slipping his feet inside, carefully scaling down one of the temple pillars.

"Just a little bit of blood..." He mutters under his breath, running towards the altar. "And then it's over."

It'll all be over.

He pulls a dagger from his hip, slipping it across his palm with ease, barely wincing when his skin splits open.

For a moment, he stands over the altar, watching as the blood drips down his fingers, wondering.

He bleeds just the same as anyone else. Is it actually special?

He's spent most of his life going to bed hungry. With shoes that didn't even fit him. Struggling to get by on scraps.

And now, staring at his blood, he can't help but wonder? Is it really the blood of kings?

Three drops land on the altar.

Thud!

Thud!

Thud!

Xiong Li waits, staring, but…nothing seems to happen.

He can still hear the screams of the citizens outside. The temple—it still feels like death in here.

Did he not use enough? Mr. Hua said it would only take a few drops, but…

Xiong Li squeezes the cut on his palm, gritting his teeth as more blood wells up, dripping down onto the altar until a small puddle forms.

Still, nothing.

Hell—part of him even wonders if the array isn't directly ON the altar, so he tries the floor, the walls.

He turns the back half of the temple into some twisted, macabre version of a child's art project, finger painting with his own blood, but…

Nothing.

Xiong Li glances down at the knife in his palm.

Maybe since he's the grandson and not the person that was used, it needs more? He almost goes to cut himself again, but—

Mr. Hua seemed certain, when he told Xiong Li that it wouldn't take much. He knows far more about cultivation than Xiong Li does—hell, Xiong Li has reason to suspect that he's a god now, so...

It can't be that.

The amount isn't the issue. It's something else.

Then, it occurs to him.

Mr. Hua has taught Xiong Li a lot about cultivation in the last year. And while the teenager might not have perfected his parkour skills—he did learn quite a bit about magic.

And, by extension, arrays.

"...It's not in the temple," he mutters under his breath, and then—it really starts to hit him hard, and he goes running towards the demolished front entrance. "Mr. Hua!" He calls, knowing he doesn't have to be that loud for the god to hear him, "The array isn't in the temple!"

It made sense originally, when you consider that the temple sits in the center of the city but...

This array is meant to keep people caged in—and it's aura extends all the way to Gusu.

Xie Lian, overhearing him—even a quarter of a mile a way—frowns, eyes widening.

"...It's in the walls," he mutters under his breath, head instinctively whipping in that direction, even if he can't see the white marble behemoths looming in the distance.

Wen Jiao smirks, spitting venom down at the little god. Xie Lian dodges,and the ground hisses on impact.

"I'll admit, using the Xiong boy against me was clever—but now, he's as far away from the target as he can get, isn't he?!" The demon cackles.

It was clever, Xie Lian admits—clearly choosing to set the Temple up as a decoy, by not allowing any cultivators inside.

By sending Xiong Li to the city center, technically Xie Lian allowed the boy to slip right into a trap—because now, he's in the middle of Wen Jiao's horde of mindless subjects.

Still, Xie Lian doesn't seem particularly worried.

"He'll make it," the god shrugs. "But you won't."

Wen Jiao hisses in offense, but before he can retort, the god wraps his fist around the demon's tail, and his eyes widen.

Xie Lian yanks, swinging his arms around until Wen Jiao, who is scrambling to try and find purchase, is yanked into the air, spinning around like a lasso.

See—Xie Lian doesn't have to be worried about whether or not Xiong Li makes it to the walls, because he already planned for that.

And, despite the exceptional strength he's displaying now—the real muscle of the operation hasn't arrived yet.

No, he's not worried.

Not even when he hears Xiong Li struggling through the crowds, his sword clashing as he attempts to get through the horde, a seemingly hopeless task.

After all, he's just one person, but...Xie Lian never planned on having Xiong Li work alone.

The teenager stumbles. There's just...

He lands in the market square, hard—barely catching himself with the hilt of his sword.

There's too many of them.

His neighbors. HIs school teachers. Kids he's known since they could barely walk, and—

Xiong Li doesn't want to hurt them.

His head turns to the side—and he can see a window there, the same one he used to sit in, every single day. The shopkeeper never minded, since Xiong Li never caused him any trouble.

He liked that spot. It was in the sun. Easy to watch the other kids play, and...

It had an easy view of the front gates.

That way, he'd always know first, if...

If Lan An came back home. Even if Xiong Li always desperately pretended not to care.

A set of hands close around his throat, and Xiong Li starts to think it might be time for—

BOOM!

The citizens in the square go still, their eyes flickering slightly, and... Xiong Li hears music.

Playing a soft, calming tune—sort of out of place, in the hellish atmosphere all around, but...beautiful.

The notes carry through the square, bringing...

The sound of a guqin.

His head whips to the side, and—

In spite of everything, Xiong Li smiles.

Standing in the gates of Gusu is a lone cultivator.

Robes flapping slightly in the breeze, the strands of his headband blowing behind him.

His eyes rest on the young woman holding Xiong Li by the neck, eyes narrowed with intent.

There's another flick of his fingers across the strings, and just like that—she's sent stumbling back.

"You don't get to touch him," the cultivator mutters flatly, his expression dark. That's when he notices Xiong Li's neck—

Stripped free of it's shackle.

His friend beams, leaping to his feet. "You know something!" He calls over "You're always the one trying to get me to go with you, but why should I? You always come back anyway!"

Lan An almost smiles.

Even in this situation, the idiot still tries to get a laugh out of him.

“Look, I—” Xiong Li pushes himself free, “I need to get on top of the wall, can you keep the path clear?”

Lan An surveys the crowd around them.

“…Yeah,” he replies, his gaze determined. “I can do that.”

Xiong Li smiles, running past him. “Guess we ended up cultivating together after all, huh?”

Lan An’s widen with surprise—and he wants to ask Xiong Li what he means, but…

There’s work to be done.

The song of Clarity has a thirty meter radius—but it isn’t a complete solution.

It soothes the citizens of Gusu, keeps them standing in place, or slows them down— but it doesn’t completely strip them of Wen Jiao’s spell.

Doing that—that requires shattering the shackles entirely.

Which is possible.

Lan An couldn’t have done that a year ago, but…

He was tasked to train non-stop for an entire year. And when a god makes such a request, exiled or not, you obey.

Even if it hadn’t been a god—he would have done it anyway.

If he hadn’t, the alternative was allowing everyone in Gusu to die.

And that would include…

TWANG!

He strums another chord from his guqin, slamming into another wave of the living zombies as they try to make their approach again.

Yes, he can shatter a cursed iron shackle.

If he concentrates enough energy into the guqin, and aims it at one target—he can inflict enough damage to make the metal crack.

But it requires an extensive amount of spiritual power to inflict that on just one target. Which wouldn't be a problem for Lan An—not normally.

Even for senior cultivators, the level of power he's collected is extremely high. There likely isn't a man alive currently that could compare.

Still, the population of Gusu is well over three hundred thousand. Half of what it was before the occupation, but still.

He can't shatter every single shackle in the crowd. Probably couldn't even shatter a tenth.

It would take a god to do something like that—multiple gods, just like Xie Lian said to the sect elders.

So really...Lan An can't imagine how this plan is supposed to work.

Still, there's no way out but further in—so he fights, finger moving furiously across the strings of his guqin as Xiong Li hurries up the stairwell leading to the top of the walls, his heart pounding.

His entire life, he's grown up leashed, in a cage.

Just once—even if it's only for a day, or even a minute—

Xiong Li wants to know what it's like to walk outside of the city walls, and know that he's free.

Lan An has to slowly move up the staircase behind him—using the narrowness of the pathway to pinch the onslaught in.

Only three men can ascend that way, shoulder to shoulder—and with the crowd reduced to that—

Lan An can target his spiritual power more narrowly, and as a result—he can start shattering shackles.

Each time someone wakes, they stop, disoriented, and they slow those behind them.

It's not perfect—most of the freshly awoken citizens end up injured and trampled in the end, but it's necessary.

He told Xiong Li he would keep the path clear, and so he will.

The teenager practically flies up the steps, boots thundering underneath him, lungs burning.

Finally, for the first time in his life, he reaches the top of the walls of Gusu.

For a moment—a brief one—he stops.

It's—

"Oh, wow…" he mutters. His hair is pulled up into a high ponytail, over his head— blown sharply from the winds at this altitude.

It's beautiful.

From here, you can see impossibly far, for miles and miles. The peaceful grasses of the central plains to the south, like an emerald sea, cast under the moon's blood red glow, and to the north…

A mountain, framed by the clouds.

That—that must be where Lan An cultivates.

It looks…peaceful.

Maybe, when all of this is over, he should—

"Xiong Li!" Lan An's voice barks from behind him, and the teen's eyes narrow with determination.

Right.

It's time to end this.

He pulls out his dagger again, slicing into his palm once more, reopening the wound.

Blood pours down his palm as he kneels down, pressing it to the marble surface of the wall, his eyes closed.

Part of him still thinks it won't work. Xiong Li—he's never been that special. Lan An is the only one who has ever thought differently—which is kind of ironic. Xiong Li is smart, yes. He's strong. He's talented.

But so are a lot of other people in the world.

Lan An, though? He's a genius. A literal miracle. Everyone is going to remember him. It would make more sense for him to be some long lost descendent of royalty...not Xiong Li.

And yet, the world works in mysterious ways—the ones you least expect. Because, as his blood streams over the marble...

The walls of Gusu begin to rumble.

All around them, the heat on the shackles around the necks of the citizens begins to fade, their eyes flickering.

Red light begins to billow up from the walls beneath them, the wind whipping around so violently, Xiong Li finds himself scrambling for purchase so he doesn't get blown off of the wall, but—

An arm wraps firmly around his waist, holding him in place.

When he glances up—Lan An is right there. One hand holding his sword, plunged deep into the wall's surface, the other holding Xiong Li tightly against him.

Overhead, a red cloud gathers and swirls, before exploding in a shower of sparks.

"Was..." Xiong Li has to turn his head and shout into Lan An's hear to be heard over the wind and the thunder, "Was that it? Did it break?"

Lan An nods, glancing down at the citizens around them.

All of them seem to be coming back to their senses, however slowly.

For once—Xiong Li doesn't say a word. Just smiles, leaning against Lan An's side contently.

The taller young man seems a little startled at first, the tips of his ears going a little pink—but then, his lips turn up at the corners, and his arm tightens around Xiong Li's waist.

He mumbles something under his breath, making his friend lift his chin, confused. "...What was that?"

"..." Lan An clears his throat, looking away. "I played a song for you, this time."

Now it’s Xiong Li’s turn to look startled, his eyes going wide—but then, he laughs.

“…Yeah, I guess you did,” he admits, reaching up to poke Lan An in the cheek. “But don’t expect me to start singing for you or anything, alright?” He grins, leaning a little closer—even though Lan An is pointedly looking away, leaning away in response.

“I only sing for boys I like!”

Lan An makes a slightly annoyed, disbelieving sound under his breath, but he’s basically holding Xiong Li’s waist in a vice grip now, and the raven haired teen couldn’t be happier, poking his cheek again for emphasis.

Until he hears it.

A quiet, terrified gasp—then a scream.

A little boy, only just now coming back from the effects of the spell, stumbled backwards—and when he did, it sent him plummeting off of the side of the wall.

Xiong Li doesn’t hesitate. Not even for a split second.

He wrenches himself from Lan An’s arms, charging right after him, plunging off the edge without a second thought, even as his friend tries to stop him.

“XIONG LI—!”

But after a moment, Lan An stops.

Xiong Li catches the boy about halfway down, coming to a halt.

It takes Lan An a moment to understand, until he sees the sword underneath Xiong Li’s feet, gently carrying them both to the ground.

Once he lands on his feet with the child in his arms, Xiong Li beams up at him. “DIDN’T I TELL YOU BEFORE?” He calls up from the ground. “WE’RE BOTH CULTIVATORS NOW!”

After a moment, Lan An manages a relieved smile.

And if the battle had ended there—the course of history would have gone rather differently.

Back in the city center, Xie Lian dodges another swipe of Wen Jiao's claws. "It's pointless, now!"

Xie Lian cries, "You saw it, the array is broken! You can't gather any more spiritual power!"

Wen Jiao shakes his head, barking out a laugh, swiping his tail out, forcing the god to leap high into the air to avoid it.

"You really think I never planned on someone breaking it?!"

That gives Xie Lian pause, his eyes narrowing. The demon cackles, shaking head.

"All of you gods are the same! Always looking down on people like me—thinking you're so much better! So much stronger! Of course I had a plan for someone breaking it—in case I got caught!"

Xie Lian pauses, trying to think of what his plan could be—and that one split second of hesitation is costly.

It allows the demon to surge forward before he can dodge—and in an instant, the prince feels something seal around his throat with a click.

The pain is instantaneous.

It feels like having a spiked rope wrapped around your neck after it's been set aflame —and it makes Xie Lian's entire spirit quiver with agony.

The god gasps, dropping down onto his knees for a moment, eyes blown wide.

The cursed shackle pattern in his eyes brightens sharply.

And—

It flickers, the black and gold squares within the pattern moving and coiling like snakes within his irises, bloody tears welling up before slipping down his cheeks.

Wen Jiao smirks, "You thought you had me outnumbered with those two cultivators, didn't you?"

The shackle around Xie Lian's throat burns bright red, and even he can't stop himself from crying out, barely catching himself before he hits the ground, breathing raggedly.

“Well, I’ve got back up of my own!”

Speak of the devil, and he will appear.

On the edge of Gusu, before the city gates, applause breaks out.

Slow, sarcastic—with only one person clapping.

Xiong Li glances up from where he’s helping the little boy in his arms sit down to rest, his eyes narrowing.

“Ah, how heroic!”

Heavy, expensive leather boots crunch against the gravel as the figure strides forward, clad in red and white.

“It’s to be expected from the last Prince of Gusu, is it not?”

Xiong Li sets the child aside, blade resting on the handle of his sword.

“I’m no prince,” he replies evenly. “Just a simple cultivator.”

The King of Daqing, son of the demon Jiao, Wen Sicong, smiles. “In that case, you should kneel before your leader, shouldn’t you?”

“...Hmm,” Xiong Li tilts his head. “I don’t see any leader nearby.” Wen Sicong glares. “If you could point him out to me, I’ll get on my knees and pay my respects right now,” the teenager smirks, clearly seeing that he’s gotten a rise out of the pretender to the throne.

“You think I won’t make you pay for that?” He hisses.

THUD!

Dust swirls for a moment, and when it settles, there’s another cultivator standing by Xiong Li’s side.

Wearing simple blue robes, chestnut colored hair swirling, a simple white headband around his forehead.

And eyes that glint like steel in the moonlight, staring him down.

“You think you’ll be fighting one on one?” Lan An questions coldly.

Wen Sicong glances back and forth between the two young men.

He remembers the day they were born—this day, eighteen years before. They were always watching Xiong Li closely—but Lan An—he was a surprise. Now, they make quite a pair.

Light and dark. Silver and gold.

Slowly, Wen Sicong smiles.

Oh, how he'll relish in seeing that bond severed.

"You think I'm the one that's outnumbered?" He raises his hands—and when he does...

Iron shackles begin to glow all around them.

He can't control an entire city without the array, even his father couldn't do that, but...

He can control enough.

The battle that breaks out is a thing of chaos.

With enemies coming from every single direction, leaving the two young men faced with an onslaught.

Lan An can slow them down in large groups, or target them one by one—and his method doesn't cause physical harm to the puppets.

Unfortunately, Xiong Li isn't left with the same options.

He has his blade, which he can knock people out with blunt side of, but other than that...

His options for dealing with them would end up killing them—and he doesn't want to do that.

None of them chose this, and they don't deserve to die for it.

So, he's essentially left fighting with one hand tied behind his back—and Lan An is forced to carry the brunt of the battle

He does so without complaint, but...

No matter how many shackles he breaks, there are always more puppets for Wen Sicong to call on, and...Lan An's spiritual power, while immense, won't last forever.

Xiong Li can see that much— And so can their opponent.

They're strategic about it, with Lan An focusing on the puppets while Xiong Li attacks their master with his blade, but…

CLANG!

Their blades cross, and when they do, Wen Sicong smirks down at the boy, eyes glinting vindictively, "You can hear it, can't you?"

Xiong Li glares, hooking his foot around Wen Sicong's ankle, yanking him out of his stance, but the king is able to dodge beneath their blades before breaking apart again.

"The battle between my father and your god is over now!"
That…seems to be true.

Xiong Li can't hear anything from the center of the city—all fighting seems to have stopped, but…

"…and he hasn't come to help you, has he?!"

CLANG!

It's true, he hasn't. Which means…

The realization dawns on him, slow and horrifying, that—

It means Mr. Hua lost.

With their blades caught together again, Wen Sicong takes advantage of the opportunity to reach out, clutching Xiong Li's chin between his fingers.

"Listen closely, little brat," he growls, "because I'm about to tell you your entire future."

Behind them, Lan An stiffens.

His first instinct is to protect his friend—but, if he does, they'll be overrun by the puppets.

Xiong Li struggles, trying to pull his chin back, but Wen Sicong's grip only tightens. "I'm going to shackle you again," the king explains. "Then, I'm going to kill Lan An."

He watches with satisfaction as the boy's eyes widen, color leaving his face.

"I'm going to make you watch, and you're going to know the entire time that it's your fault," he croons, his grip on Xiong Li tightening.

If he managed to shackle Xiong Li again, killing Lan An wouldn't be particularly difficult. He would have them both hostage at that point, because...Xiong Li knows.

Lan An would never leave him. Not ever. Even if it meant giving himself up. He's stupid like that.

It's—

Xiong Li fights back tears, refusing to allow this man to see his weakness.

It's really annoying.

"But I'll let you live, you know why?" Wen Sicong hisses.

Lan An seems to decide he's had enough, starting to round back on them—but then, another swarm attacks with a fury.

"For the same reason we've allowed you to live, over and over again," the king explains, watching with great satisfaction as the realization slowly starts to dawn over the teenager's face. "Because we're going to use your blood to rebuild the array."

It makes sense, in a horrifically simple kind of way.

Xiong Li's blood was strong enough to break it, therefore—it's more than enough to reforge it under the same circumstances.

"Then, you'll watch as we suck the rest of this city dry."

He gains more leverage now, and it's all Xiong Li can do to stop their crossed blades from getting too close to his face, gritting his teeth.

"You'll watch as every person you have ever known dies," Wen Sicong hisses, just as Xiong Li stumbles backwards. "But we still won't kill you, you know why?"

"Xiong Li," Lan An tries to warn, his tone tense. "Don't listen to him."

The worst part is—it's not like Wen Sicong is lying. He isn't. He really does plan on doing all of those things, he's just—

He's just taunting Xiong Li with it.

Torturing him with it.

“Because after that, we’ll take you to Yunmeng,” Wen Sicong sneers, pressing forward until Xiong Li stumbles back again, pushing him closer and closer to the horde. “We’ll build another array, and we’ll start all over again.”

That’s when the real horror starts to sink in, and Wen Sicong relishes in the sight of it.

“Don’t worry, you’ll live long enough to have an heir—whether you want to or not,” the king laughs cruelly when the boy flinches. “Oh, don’t be like that—fatherhood is one of the greatest joys in life! And your children, they’ll help the Wen sect spread it’s influence to every corner of this continent. You should be proud!”

“Xiong Li!” Lan An cries again, this time snarling with anger. “He’s a liar!”

But he isn’t. He means every word. And there’s a good chance it might come to fruition, because where things stand now?

They’re going to lose.

And if they do, Lan An will die. Everyone here will die, and—

Xiong Li knows why Lan An wants him to believe it’s a lie.

Because the truth is too horrible to live with.

That being, that the people of Gusu—the people of the continent—they’ll never be safe. Not while Xiong Li...

“...I won’t let you,” he mutters.

Suddenly, his feet stand firm, and Wen Sicong smiles.

“Oh, is that so?”

Xiong Li closes his eyes, his nostrils flaring as he pushes his golden core into overdrive, allowing it to crackle and swell in his chest, burning with a fury.

“I grew up in your cages,” the teenager mutters, shoving at Wen Sicong with so much force, it actually startles him.

Xiong Li was born a penniless orphan. He was raised on scraps. But right now, in this moment, he…

Certainly does look princely, in a way.

“You’ll never use my family’s blood to put people in chains,” Xiong Li snarls. “Not ever again!”

Then, he does something distinctly un-princely.

Before Wen Sicong can say another word, or try to stop him—the cultivator slams his knee into the older man’s crotch, making him shout with agony, stumbling back.

Xiong Li turns around, and—

He makes a break for the city gates.

He used to try that, when he was a kid. Run as close as he could get before his iron shackle would kick in. Lan An would grumble every time, telling Xiong Li how stupid he was, but…

He was there, every time.

And now, just as he darts past Lan An, dodging through the crowds as he moves, he mumbles—

“Thank you for everything.”

It’s a complete rarity, to get a statement like that from him, and once he hears it—

It dawns on Lan An.

In a slow, horrible realization.

“XIONG LI!”

For the first time in his life, Xiong Li leaves the city gates of Gusu, feels the grass underneath his feet.

It’s the first time in his life that he’s ever stood outside of this city, knowing that he was free.

It lasts for one moment.

One beautiful, peaceful moment.

But he has to cut it short, because his freedom—it would come at too high of a price.

The loss of everything he holds dear. Of other cities, of people who don’t deserve to suffer like this.

And when that moment passes, he lifts that dagger from his hip, turning it on himself once more.

Not in the hand, this time—no.

This time, he plunges the weapon into his chest, while his friend screams with horror.

“XIONG LI!”

His knees hit the ground with a heavy thud.

He’s learned a lot in the last year.

Blood magic—it only works if the subject is living.

That very blood drips down his chin now, as he looks up at the stars.

The Xiong family spent a thousand years protecting the people. First of Xianle, then of Gusu.

This makes sense.

All Xiong Li’s life, he wanted to be free.

But for the people of his city, the people he loved so dearly to be free—

That means he has to go. And—

And maybe that’s fine.

At least he got to see outside the walls. At least he got to see him again. At least—

At least he—

Arms catch him before he hits the ground, holding him close.

Xiong Li manages a faint smile.

Lan An has never let him fall before. That makes sense.

Ever calm, ever steady, but…

Now, he's trembling.

He rolls his friend over in his arms, one hand frantically trying to stop the bleeding, abandoning the battle behind them, his guqin cast aside on the ground.

His other hand forms a sign, burning with power as he starts to pour his spiritual energy into the wound, fighting—

Xiong Li pushes at his wrist weakly, shaking his head. "Lan An," he rasps, fingers trembling. "Stop."

The cultivator shakes his head vehemently, tears dripping silently from his chin, his golden core burning in an inferno, pouring everything he has into trying to save him, to—

"It's okay," Xiong Li's fingers wrap around his, pulling until the hand sign breaks, and the golden light fades.

Lan An looks down at him blearily, unable to see clearly through the tears, but… Xiong Li is smiling up at him, and even the blurriest sight of that—

It shatters him, just like a shackle.

A choked sob wrenches from his chest as he clutches Xiong Li close.

"Why…" His shoulders tremble, fingertips digging into the raven haired boy's shoulder blades, "Why didn't you come with me?!"

He tried so hard.

Everything he did, it was all for…always for…

Always for him.

Lan An can't remember a moment of his life, when Xiong Li's smile wasn't at the center of it.

"I already said," Xiong Li murmurs, "remember?" That he would rather die, trying—

Trying to help people.

Xiong Li has never seen Lan An cry before.

But like everything else, he does it well.

Even his tears are beautiful, falling down his cheeks like diamonds, something precious.

And maybe they are, because they're all for him.

"Hey, hey..." He mumbles, squeezing his hand. "...Aren't you...gonna tell me happy birthday?"

Lan An shudders, pressing their foreheads together.

The funny thing is—Xiong Li was the taller one, when they were younger. Up until they were teenagers, and Lan An hit his growth spurt.

Now, he feels so small in Lan An's arms.

Like, if the cultivator hugs his friend too tightly—he might just disappear into stardust.

And still, Lan An can't stop himself from holding him as tightly as he can. Like that could somehow stop him from leaving.

He's wracked with another sob, but he forces out the words.

"H...Happy birthday, Xiong Li."

His breaths are a little hitched now, growing weaker.

"I...I'm giving you something this year, okay?" He mumbles. "D-Don't bother with the book this time, I...I'm not gonna get around to reading it, anyway."

That isn't funny.

Lan An clings harder.

Xiong Li is always making scenes and telling stupid jokes, and they're never that funny.

It's—

Lan An rocks, his tears falling onto Xiong Li's cheeks as he weeps silently.

It's annoying.

It’s so annoying, he—

Suddenly, the cultivator freezes.

“As t-time draws near, my dearest dear...when you and I...must part...”

His voice is weaker than usual, breaking and catching on the lyrics, but—

Still, it’s perfect.

“H-How little you know...of the grief and woe...in my poor a-aching heart...”

Lan An struggles to breathe, to see through the tears—but he listens as closely as he can.

He hasn’t been given many gifts in his life. All of them have come from Xiong Li. And this—

This is the sweetest one his friend has ever given him.

“E-Each night I suffer for y-your sake, you’re the boy I love so dear...” Xiong Li is singing for him.

Not very loudly, but he doesn’t have to—not when their foreheads are still pressed together, breathing close.

“I-I wish that I was going with you, or you were staying here.”

He trails off, breathing raggedly.

“T...The second verse is too embarrassing, so...that’s all you g...get...” Lan An strokes his hair, leaning back to look at his face.

To look down into those eyes, the only stars he ever wanted to see.

“You kept writing songs,” Lan An murmurs, pushing Xiong Li’s bangs from his forehead so tenderly, tucking them behind his ear—and his friend nods.

“I-I told you...”

Lan An’s thumb wipes the blood from his lips, and he whispers—

“I thought you only sang for the boys you liked.”

Xiong Li smiles up at him, his eyes shining.

And in that one moment, the entire universe is there, tucked inside Lan An's arms.

"That's right," he whispers.

They stare at one another, on the brink of so many words, so many things to say. And at the same time, just one.

But by the time Lan An musters the nerve to open his mouth, he...Xiong Li...

His eyes have slipped shut.

There isn't any singing anymore.

No smiling. No dramatic scenes. No stupid jokes.

Lan An presses their foreheads together one more time.

Behind him, he can hear shouting.

Angry, frustrated shouting.

Because the last living descendent of the Xiong family is d—d—

Because Wen Jiao's sick plan has been thwarted.

"..."

Carefully, with a heartbreaking level of gentleness, Lan An lays his friend down in the grass, rising to his feet.

"Didn't you say you were going to kill me?"

Wen Sicong pauses in the middle of his angry screaming, in the middle of beating one of his puppets to death out of frustration.

The cultivator stands in the gates once more, expressionless. His voice is like a cold wind.

"...Is that your way of asking?" The king sneers, his knuckles stained with blood as he allows the young woman to drop to the ground, limp. "Eager to join your little friend?"

Lan An stares him down for a moment—with a stare so piercing, so heavy— Even Wen Sicong shrinks.

“No,” he murmurs, “it ends here.”

At first, the king doesn’t know what the cultivator means.

In truth, no one could have predicted what the young man was about to do—not until it happened.

See, there are consequences to having people pray under false pretense.

After all—even as they were being fed off of, for an entire century, the people of Gusu prayed in the temple of ‘Wen Jiao,’ not knowing that they were kneeling before a false idol.

Those merits, those prayers—they didn’t go to the demon.

But, cut off from the heavens—the prayers in the city of Gusu couldn’t be sent to General Ming Guang either.

Thus, they were left trapped—a century’s worth of prayers, the hopes and dreams of tens of thousands of people, all trapped in the soil beneath Gusu.

The land was already ancient, pulsing with power—and now, it’s almost seismic. Overflowing.

Lan An didn’t notice it before, the buzzing.

But now—now that the entire world has gone suddenly quiet, without song, he can hear it there.

He kneels, pressing his palm to the earth.

When he looks into the distance, he sees a flash of light, and his will turns to steel.

It will end here.

It—It won’t be for nothing.

Wen Sicong takes a stumbling step backwards, “What...are you...?”

He stops, when Lan An’s eyes begin to burn a brilliant shade of white.

Like Xiong Li, Lan An was born into chains.

He thought, for the longest time, that he only had one path by which he could follow in order to shatter them.

He lived his youth away from the boy he loved, in a monastery—because he thought that was the best way to free him.

That was the only path he thought there was, and—

And Lan An wasted so much time.

Now, for the first time in millennia, a new form of cultivation is born.

It began with the song of Clarity, but now it becomes something fully formed.

The teenager rises to his feet once more.

His body pulses with so much spiritual power, it feels like it might rip apart down to the cellular level, but—

That's alright.

Lan An lifts his guqin.

He doesn't plan on holding it for long.

The first chord he plays rings so loudly, every window in Gusu shatters.

It's a song that will be passed down for a hundred generations, played on the fields of battle for millennia to come.

A song that will haunt the nightmares of demons and mortal foes alike;

The Song of Vanquish.

With the second chord, every iron shackle in Gusu breaks in two.

Wen Sicong watches, his head whipping around as the wind blows through the city with a fury, the people stumbling and clutching their necks—

None of them familiar with the nakedness that comes without the weight of iron on their throats.

"Are you INSANE?!" The king shouts. "OR ARE YOU JUST TRYING TO KILL YOURSELF—?”

On the third and final chord, the earth rattles and shakes so violently, only one man is left standing.

So forcefully that, after countless centuries looming over the landscape, acting both as a shield and a cage…

The Great Walls of Gusu come crashing down.

Not immediately. First there are cracks, then rattles, and suddenly, all at once—

This impossibly loud, impossibly vast crash, the air becoming a sea of dust and smoke.

Lan An’s fingers bleed against the Guqin strings.

The magnitude of the act doesn’t dawn on him. Not in that moment. Not even as the people of Gusu stop, coughing and peering at him through the fog, like he’s some sort of unearthly being.

No.

All Lan An thinks of, in that moment, is getting to the other side of the rubble.

Back to where—

Back to where he left his friend.

He’s slightly numb, covered in soot, headband askew as he picks his way through the carnage, dropping down lightly on the other side, casting his guqin aside without a thought, but…

Xiong Li isn’t there.

Not where Lan An left him.

The cultivator freezes, his eyes widening with confusion, hurt, and worry.

How—? How could it have—?

BOOM!

For a moment, there’s absolutely nothing.

Just golden light and this impossible warmth, filling him from head to toe, and a rush of wind.

Gusu is an ancient city. One of powerful magic and old blood.

Famed as the place where lightning struck twice. Where two gods ascended across the centuries.

When the sun rises, it will become known as the city where three gods ascended—all in one night.

When Lan An opens his eyes, he isn't standing among the rubble, looking over the grasses of the central plains.

He's standing in front of a city of golden palaces and jewel lined streets.

A city where no one wants for anything—

And no one is born into chains.

But he doesn't look at the palaces. Or the fountains of gold. Or even the Grand Martial Palace.

All Lan An looks at now, is the only thing that he's ever had eyes for. A young man with hair as dark as ink, and eyes like stars.

The world has taken so many things from him.

Without a word spoken, they rush into each other's arms.

Now, for the first time—it gives something back.

Lan An clutches onto him tightly, and—ascension or not, dead or alive—

Here, in the space between his arms, is heaven.

The City of Three Ascensions

Chapter Summary

> "I told you before," Xie Lian murmurs.
>
> The blade twists slightly, and Wen Jiao's eyes widen.
>
> "There are no mortals here."

Chapter Notes

> You can find me on twitter and keep up with current updates of the story HERE

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Wen Jiao watches now, as the walls of Gusu come crashing back down. As, one after another, the shackles of the people slip from their necks.

Watches the flash of golden light as a new god ascends to the heavens—

But not him.

Before him kneels a fallen god, hands clutching at his throat.

Of course, with his luck—his shackle would be the only one in Gusu that doesn't break.

"...You took everything from me..." The demon whispers, his eyes flaring. "I'll...I'LL KILL YOU FOR THIS!"

Xie Lian tilts his head, taking shaky breaths. "Is it possible to steal from a thief?" Wen Jiao's form trembles.

"Have you ever, once in your life, earned something honestly?"

CRASH!

The demon's tail slams into Xie Lian while he's too weakened to move, sending him flying.

He slams into the side of the grand temple, the walls shuddering and groaning, paint facades that were placed years before cracking—revealing the name, ‘Ming Guang,’ underneath.

“You think I need to ascend to kill you?!” Wen Jiao snarls, slithering toward him.

“I don’t need old man Jun Wu to make me a god. That mountain is opening soon—”

Mountain?

“And when it does, I’ll become more powerful than you can POSSIBLY imagine! I’ll seal you here, and when it’s finished, my brothers and I will come to SLAUGHTER you, AND GUSU!”

Brothers?

Wen Jiao stands above the rubble on the side of the temple, ready to deal another blow, when—

A hand shoots out.

Smaller, elegant—almost delicate.

“No,” the god replies, his voice suddenly steady. “You won’t.”

He’s gripping Wen Jiao by his hair, fingers knotted tight.

Xie Lian lifts his face out of the rubble, dust and gravel falling from his hair.

Part of losing your wealth, power, and status, is learning what you’re good at naturally.

Xie Lian is clever. He’s strong. He’s determined.

But one of his strengths rises above the rest.

There is no pain that he can’t learn to live with. Nothing that he can’t endure. Even when he thought it was impossible, that his mind or his body would break down, he carries on.

And now, as his free hand wraps around the cursed shackle around his throat, he realizes:

It’s not dark anymore. Not completely.

He can’t see Wen Jiao’s face, the city streets around them—or even his own hand in front of his face.

But he can see clouds of light and dark, in varying shapes and colors.

And before him is a dark, hateful abyss—

Shaped like a serpent.

The cursed shackles on Xie Lian's body are ancient and powerful, yes—but they're also of heavenly make.

The cursed iron around Xie Lian's throat now is so vile, so filled with toxic death energy, that...

It must have damaged the shackle in Xie Lian's eyes.

That's probably why his eyes have been hurting with increasing frequency in the last year. The curse of Gusu has been breaking the shackle down. Not shattering it—that would take more power than Xie Lian can currently conceive of—

But there's a crack.

Just enough to allow a little bit of light through.

Enough to allow the god to see one thing, after eight centuries in the dark:

Spiritual Power.

"...Why are you smiling?!" Wen Jiao glares, thrashing in Xie Lian's hold, baring his fangs, snarling.

"DON'T YOU REALIZE WHAT SITUATION YOU'RE IN?!"

But his expression falters when he watches Xie Lian's fingers tighten around the cursed iron, twisting, until—

Until it crumbles.

A year ago, that caused him so much pain—he couldn't move. But Xie Lian can bear with itnow.

He balls his good hand up into a fist, cocking it back.

I'm going to hit you," the god explains calmly. "As hard as I can."

Wen Jiao's brow knits together, not understanding what a threat that truly is. After all, he's received quite a few blows from the god in the last hour—

BOOM!

The impact that Xie Lian's fist makes when it crashes into the demon's chest—for the first time now, with accuracy—

It sounds like thunder.

Wen Jiao is sent flying back, hundreds of feet—until he crashes into a structure.

A hundred foot tall divine statue.

One that he covered with an exterior shell, a century ago—to make it shine with his own likeness.

Now, that glamor shatters, and there are no masks left to cover what he truly is.

The Grand Temple stands free of guise now, it's name bright and clear across the entrance.

The statue behind him is not that of a red robed cultivator, but of a general, a broken sword in his hands.

And all around Gusu, the citizens rise to their feet, watching him with hateful eyes, realizing.

That the god they have prayed to for over a century has been a fraud.

That he is a liar, and a monster, and his words are hollow.

Now, a century later, Wen Jiao is back where he started.

Looked down on, detested—by the people of the great city of Gusu.

Not walled anymore, he supposes—it seems that insane little brat did away with that.

From the ground, Xie Lian kneels down next to a fallen soldier, and for the first time in nearly two centuries—

He rises with a blade in his hand.

"Ruoye," he murmurs, his shackle scorching as he takes in Wen Jiao's shape, tracking it's movements.

The bandage rushes to his side, nuzzling against his chin.

For the first time in eight centuries, Xie Lian isn't fighting blind. Not completely.

And now, he gives the spiritual tool a new order—one that he's never uttered, until now:

"Kill."

The spiritual tool goes still.

Most of the time, Ruoye has a gentle, relatively non-threatening aura. Much like it's master.

But there are moments—brief, terrifying moments—when it's true origins peak through.

Like it does now, shooting through the air, forming a noose as he wraps around Wen Jiao's neck.

Almost like a cruel imitation of the shackles he forced the people of Gusu to live with for generations.

The demon howls, forced down onto the ground, eyes bulging as he claws at the spiritual tool, but—

Suddenly, his hands can't move at all. Or—no, it isn't that.

It's that he doesn't have hands.

He has bloody stumps.

A boot presses down against his chest, forcing him back down as the noose around his neck tightens—and cursed shackles burn down upon him.

"You..." The demon stammers. "You...!" For the first time, Wen Jiao sounds afraid.

"You really don't know what to do in a fair fight," Xie Lian muses, the demon's blood dripping from the tip of his blade, "Do you?"

"...It...doesn't matter!" He snarls, thrashing under Xie Lian's boot, trying to throw him off, but Ruoye keeps him in place. “I-I WON’T DIE!”

His tail whips around, knocking an entire building down to rubble. “NO MORTAL CAN KILL ME—!”

He’s cut off with a bloody gurgle as the sword pierces his throat, helpless to do anything else but stare up into haunting, burning shackles.

“I told you before,” Xie Lian murmurs.

The blade twists slightly, and Wen Jiao’s eyes widen.

“There are no mortals here.”

With one last swipe of the sword, not even a magical one, just a normal, slightly dull piece of steel—

Xie Lian takes the demon Wen Jiao’s head, sending it tumbling down the street.

The god plunges the blade into Wen Jiao’s body, right through his heart, for good measure.

A great shriek rises through the streets of Gusu, dark energy swirling like toxic clouds in the air, swirling higher and higher, like a maelstrom, until…

They disperse.

Xie Lian takes a step back from the demon’s crumbling, fading body, catching his hand on a nearby structure—

And he smiles at the irony.

He can see spiritual and cursed energy now, yes. But he didn’t realize…

They were fighting on a bridge, this entire time.

Life is cyclical sometimes, in the ways that you never expect.

Xie Lian presses one bloodstained palm against his face as the people of Gusu begin to roar and cheer, their screams of joy and gratitude filling the sky.

And he whispers—

“Body in the abyss, heart in paradise.”

The earth almost seems to rumble in response, and he can’t stop himself from smiling.

How long has it been, since he said those words, not understanding the weight of them?

How far removed is the arrogant child he was then, from the broken man he is now?

For the first time in a century, the stars shine clearly on the city of Gusu, the moon turns clear.

After all—eclipses, no matter how powerful they might seem, always pass. A little boy sits by the city gates, and while the rest of the city is cheering— Liao Yong weeps.

Because he might be free, but...His friends are—

“Hey, hey...” A voice calls over, walking through the smoke. “You’re really gonna be the only one crying at a celebration?”

Liao Yong’s eyes widen, tear stricken.

“Girls don’t like that, y’know. You won’t be popular...”

His head whips around, voice trembling.

“X-Xiong Li?!”

The young man steps into the market square, hands clasped behind his back.

He wears clean, dark robes now—not a speck of blood on them.

And the sight of him makes all the children in the square cry out with joy.

“Gege!” They scream, running to him—but Liao Yong makes it there first, leaping into the young cultivator’s arms, clinging to his neck. “Gege! We thought you were gone!”

“Nah...” Xiong Li grins, holding Liao Yong close while the other kids cling to his legs. “Who wants to be a stuffy old god, anyways?” He huffs, pressing his cheek against Liao Yong's. "Not my style."

After all—in watching Xie Lian in the last year—Xiong Li learned one thing about being a god:

You're forced to watch people suffer more often than you can help them.

And Xiong Li—even if it means giving up something like Immortality —

That's okay.

He'd rather die, trying to help people, than live a thousand years up in the heavens.

That would feel like running away.

Besides—he grew up without a family. Without a past.

But this city, Gusu—it's his heritage.

His ancestors guarded the gates for a thousand years.

And these people—

Xiong Li wants to protect them, as best as he can—for as long as he can.

Liao Yong hugs him tight, still recovering from his tears.

"What about An-Xiong?!"

Xiong Li's smile dims slightly as he glances up at the stars, but it doesn't fade completely.

"...He's gonna make an amazing god," the cultivator mutters, shaking his head. That was his dream, to ascend. It would be a waste for Lan An to live a mortal life.

He's always been so special, and Xiong Li—he's never once, not in all his life, wanted to hold him back.

He just—

Sometimes, he wishes that they could go together, that's all.

"But we can pray to him every day, okay?"

Xiong Li for his part, plans on getting on his knees and saying the most embarrassing things he can think of.

"Even if he doesn't answer, that'll be just like normal, right?" That draws a reluctant, tearful laugh from Liao Yong.

Xie Lian returns to the square, quietly acknowledging the tears and gratitude of the city dwellers.

And, near the front gates of Gusu, he sees a small, bright pocket of Spiritual Power— that of Xiong Li.

But no other cultivator in sight.

He isn't surprised that the two of them would ascend.

Lan An is the most powerful cultivator of his generation—likely of the last five hundred years. And Xiong Li is greatly talented himself, but also...

His heart is a rare, special thing—that of a hero, and it's aura is strong.

He is surprised, however, by the fact that' Xiong Li willingly cast himself back down —and deeply impressed.

He's never encountered someone selfless enough to do something like that before. Or to see the shortcomings of godhood so quickly and so clearly.

Part of Xie Lian can't help but wonder how different his life might have been, if he had done that. If he still would have met...

BOOM!

There's another flash over Gusu, and a resounding crash as...

Xie Lian watches a light fall down from the sky, crashing back to earth.

So many times in his life, he's seen tragedy. To the point where he's learned to expect sad endings for the mortals he's come across.

His own story has so often been like a twisted fairy tale, filled with lessons he never wanted to learn.

Xiong Li turns his head, trembling.

Standing among the rubble, robes swirling around him, is a familiar face—one with eyes that have always felt like home.

The people of Gusu watch, stunned, and one of the children starts to speak, “An—?”

Xiong Li drops Liao Yong to the ground, heart pounding, and he runs.

As fast as his legs will take him, and it almost feels like flying, as he leaps into his arms.

And, like always, his friend catches him—pulling him close.

“LAN AN!” He cries.

No longer the boy lingering behind in the square, seated in a windowsill, pretending not to care.

They meet underneath the gates of Gusu, just as they have so many times before—this time, holding each other close, tears stinging at the corners of Xiong Li’s eyes.

“You...” He whispers, looking up into the cultivator’s eyes, “You came back.”

Lan An’s arms hold him tight, and his gaze is so warm, so heavy, it’s—It’s suffocating. A set of tears rolling down Xiong Li’s cheeks.

It’s annoying. It’s really, really so annoying.

“But...” He blinks the rest of his tears back, clearing his throat. “What about…?”

“About what?”

“Your...you...” Xiong Li sputters, trying to understand. “Your cultivation? You worked...so hard—how could you just give that all up?” He glances at the headband on Lan An’s forehead, “Your masters are going to—”

Lan An reaches up, pulling the white ribbon off without a word.

Xiong Li watches, his jaw slack as Lan An...

He places the headband in Xiong Li’s palm, folding his fingers around

it.

“I don’t care how long I live,” he explains softly.

Xiong Li’s eyes snap up to his, stricken.

Lan An has rarely been one for smiling—but he smiles at him now, so softly, like a man who already has everything in the world.

“As long as I live with you.”

Xiong Li makes a small choking sound, his fingers clutching the headband a little tighter, tears pouring down.

Xie Lian has seen so many stories in his life, none of them with happy endings. But now, for the first time…

Lan An’s brow creases slightly when he sees how hard Xiong Li is crying, “Did I say something—?”

He’s cut off when the raven haired teenager lunges up on his toes.

Kissing him with everyone he has, for the entire town square to see, arms flung around Lan An’s neck.

The taller youth barely has a chance to breathe, and when he does, Xiong Li is blubbering, fingers in his hair.

“I love you,” he mumbles, making Lan An’s eyes widen sharply.

“I love you so much!”

For the first time in Xie Lian’s long, often painful life, he witnesses a love story.

Lan An doesn’t say it back, not exactly—but he doesn’t need to, not when he groans under his breath, letting out the word—

“Finally.”

Xiong Li’s brow furrows.

“Hey!” He whines, “Don’t complain, I’m the one that kissed you first—!”

But before he can say another word, he’s being kissed. Kissed so fiercely, his eyes slip shut, and his toes curl inside his shoots as he melts into it, hugging Lan An close.

Liao Yong gags. “Get a room!”

Lan An pulls back, giving the child an annoyed glare, but Xiong Li just laughs, hugging him tight, his face pressed into Lan An’s neck. Radiating a happiness so sincere, Xie Lan almost feels the warmth of it.

Gusu is an ancient place, one of powerful magic and old blood.

A place of curses, perseverance, and miracles.

And now, not a single citizen within the city gates wears chains.

Well—just one.

Wen Sicong, who is sentenced to banishment, along with his young son, Wen Mao.

For the first time in a century, the Grand Palace of Ming Guang stands tall, it’s doors open to believers once more.

And the hope Xie Lian feels in the air when the people of Gusu rush forward to offer their prayers…

It almost brings tears to his eyes.

On the steps of the temple—the ones that aren’t demolished—sits a young cultivator, wearing simple blue robes, his hair flowing loose in the breeze.

And in his lap, arms hugging his neck, silk headband knotted between his fingers, is the Prince of Gusu, smiling up at him.

“Hey, Lan An…” He leans forward, their noses bumping together, “I’ve been thinking.”

“Oh, joy.”

He gets a swat on the head for that one.

“Wanna be cultivation partners?”

Lan An’s eyes widen, then soften as Xiong Li smirks at him.

“Or are you still waiting for your fated—?”

He's silenced with another kiss. His mouth is almost sore, from how much he's kissed the teenager in one night.

Xiong Li's had his first, second, third, add a few dozen more kisses—in just a few hours.

"Yes, I would."

Xiong Li smiles against him. "I've got some ideas."

"Like?"

"Well…We're probably gonna be pretty busy in the city during the day, so," he leans back, "why don't we cultivate at night? That's when the demons come out anyway."

Honestly—it's not a terrible idea.

"Oh—We could even call them night hunts!"

"Alright," Lan An agrees—finding the name a little silly, but…

It seems to make Xiong Li happy.

"You both did well out there." The teenagers glance up, only to see a white robed cultivator standing a few steps below them.

One they both recognize, now, as a God.

"…Well, we definitely would've died if you weren't handling the giant terrifying demon the entire time," Xiong Li shrugs, "So, thank you."

Xie Lian opens his mouth to say he's dealt with worse, but…opts not to, because that probably isn't the best thing to say.

"And I wouldn't have been able to free all of these people." Xie Lian shrugs, looking back and forth between the two young men. "Both of you did that."

It's interesting.

He's starting to get a grip on it, seeing spiritual energy, but…

Lan An's and Xiong Li's looks the same.

So much so, that with them sitting together like this—they look like one person instead of two.

“...What are the two of you going to do now?” He murmurs. They look at each other, and Xiong Li smiles.

“Rebuild the city. Maybe teach some disciples here and there.” He pushes some of Lan An’s hair behind his ears, grinning when he sees how red they are. “We’ll figure out the rest as we go.”

Xie Lian nods, and...he can’t walk away in good conscience without pointing it out, so..

“If you stay like this, without worshippers...you’ll fade away.”

They’ll likely live longer than most mortals, having ascended, but...eventually, they’ll pass on.

The cultivators look at one another—neither one seeming bothered by the aspect.

And then Xiong Li says something—words that will stick with Xie Lian for centuries to come.

“It’s not about how long your life is,” Xiong Li murmurs, never looking away from Lan An’s face. “It’s about how you live it.”

Xie Lian pauses a little startled by the sentiment, and...Moved.

He bows his head, clasping his hands in front of him.

“I wish you both the best.”

He turns to leave, and Xiong Li frowns, raising an eyebrow. “...You’re leaving already? You can stay, we—”

He stops when the god looks back at him with a gentle smile.

“I finished what I came here to do—and it’s best if I don’t stay in one place for too long.”

Xiong Li nods, watching him go, sitting contentedly in Lan An’s arms, and resolving to himself...

That he’s going to say a prayer to the Flower Crowned Martial God. Everyone says he’s a god of misfortune, but the teenager knows the truth.

That the Blind Weaver of Gusu is a god of human kindness.

Of justice.

And suffering, yes—but part of suffering is overcoming it.

The sun begins to rise over Gusu, and for the first time in a century, it looks down upon a free city.

Lan An's lips press against his hair.

Xiong Li relaxes against him, closing his eyes, not knowing what path they'll take from here. But he knows that it will be theirs.

And there is no one else he would rather walk beside.

Xie Lian steps back out onto the central plains, the wind in his hair. Sunlight on his face.

He's tired, but...

He reaches into the front of his robes, tugging on a silver chain—lifting the ashes to his lips.

"Good morning, Hong-er," he whispers.

He's said this two hundred and fifty five thousand, six hundred and fifty two times.

"Today is going to be a good day."

He's said that all those times, not always believing it, but always repeating the words anyway.

And now...

In the space of one moment, the entire sky flashes with light.

CRASH!

Gusu is a city of magic, miracles, and tragedy. Known for so many different tales, but now...

Now, it will be known for one tale of all others.

That on the night that the Great Walls of Gusu came crashing down, three gods were born again.

No longer the Great Walled City of the North—but the City of Three Ascensions.

When Xie Lian lands…it’s quiet.

Warm, even.

Only the gentlest breeze. And the road beneath his feet—it feels like marble, inlaid with gold.

For a moment, there’s only disbelief, his eyes wide, staring at the golden, blinding light all around him. Formless, but…

He knows where he is.

“Wait,” a voice calls out. “Is that him AGAIN?!”

Oh.

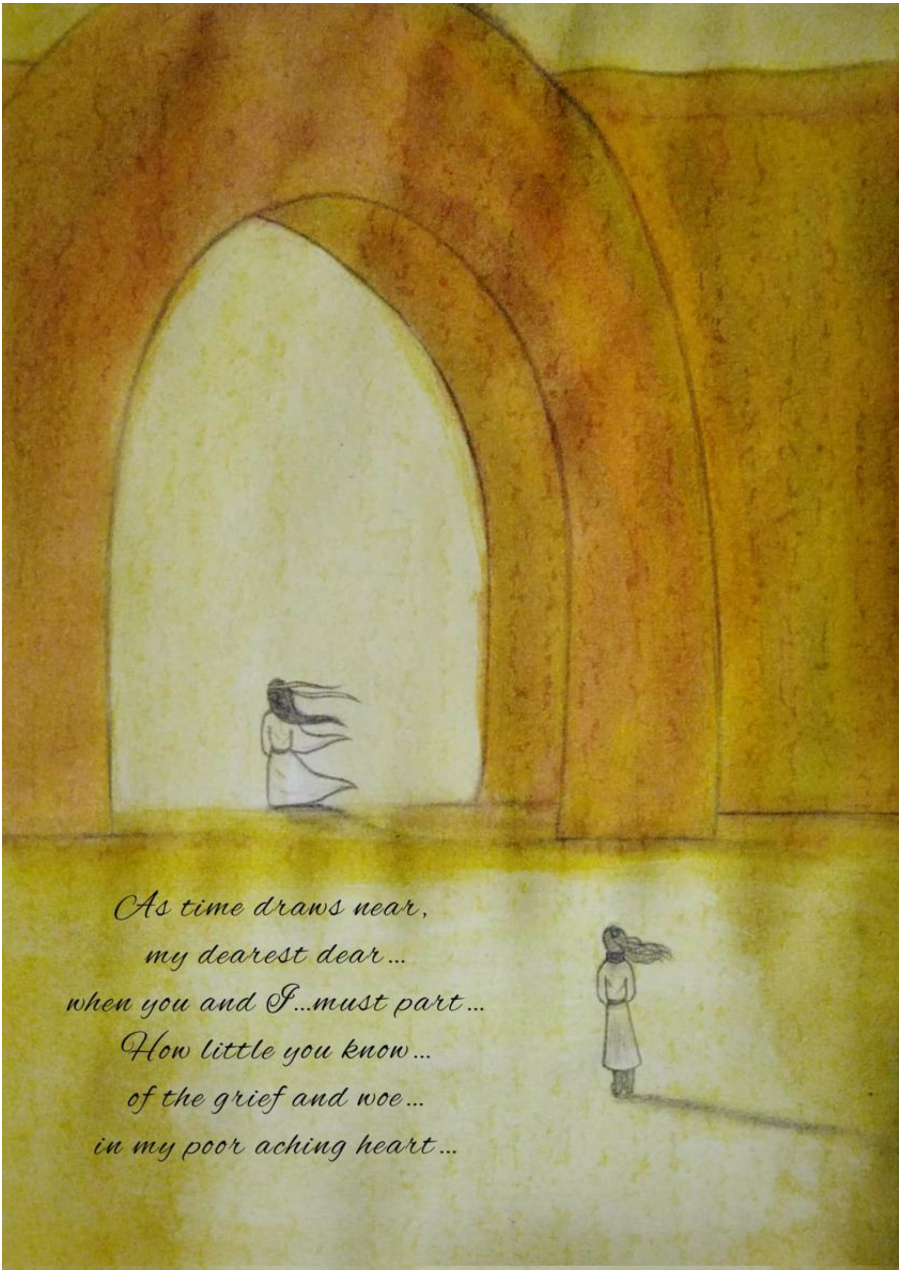
Xie Lian cracks a sheepish smile, rubbing the back of his head with an awkward laugh as the officials in the streets of the Heavenly Capital groan.

Oh boy.

“Um…Hello everyone!”

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

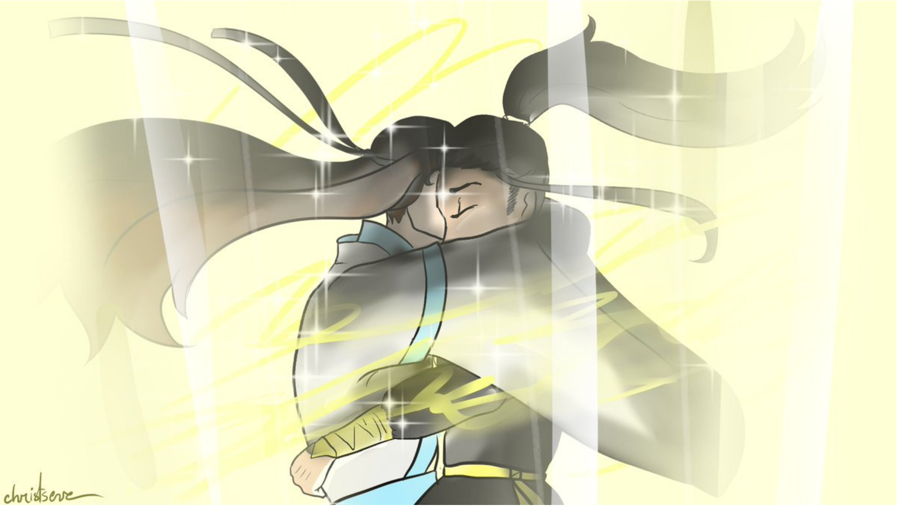
all included work has permission from the artist, do not reproduce or use for any reason.



As time draws near,
my dearest dear...
when you and I...must part...
How little you know...
of the grief and woe...
in my poor aching heart...

CREDIT: ESME

Lan An and Xiong Li after their Ascension



CREDIT: EVE

Mei Nianqing and Tonglu Hudie: "I know you are not mine, but I have always been yours."

[image]

CREDIT: SEONG

FOR THOSE WHO WANT TO CONTINUE ON TWITTER, YOU CAN DO SO HERE

Chapter End Notes

> Thank you to Seong, Eve, and Esme for their beautiful work, and allowing me to sharer it! I appreciate it so much!

And CONGRATULATIONS! 270k words and 39 chapters later, and...We've made it to Book One! ha. haha. Thank you so much to everyone who has been along for the ride, leaving kudos, comments, and supporting the story in so many ways! i'm really proud of it, and I couldn't do it without the encouragement I've gotten from all of you!

xoxo, Evie

Old Friends, Familiar Problems

Chapter Summary

> “Good luck, your highness—I wish you all of heaven's blessings.”
>
> Xie Lian stops in the middle of walking down the steps. It’s been a while since someone used that phrase with him. It takes him back to...Such a different time in his life.
>
> But still, there’s a nostalgia to giving her the traditional response.
>
> “And by Heaven Official’s Blessing...” He murmurs, glancing back at Ling Wen over his shoulder—and there’s such a warmth in his smile, lacking any guile—it leaves Ling Wen a little shell shocked by its honesty.
>
> “No Paths Are Bound.”

Chapter Notes

> You can find me on twitter and keep up with current updates of the story HERE

Yin Yu isn’t the type to move quickly. See—

His boss is sort of like a cat. Or, well—a jaguar that lives in a house, so everyone just pretends he’s a house cat, when in reality, he’s a terrifying creature that could rip you limb from limb on a whim.

The point is...

If you run too fast, he’s going to think you’re running from him, and he’s going to chase you down and play with you like you’re a small rodent.

It’s just—

Best not to show any sign of distress or weakness. Not in Paradise Manor. But today? Yin Yu is sprinting down the hall.

So fast, he nearly skids into a higher ranking ghost when he rounds the corner, only to get set on his feet by a firm grip on his shoulders.

“Where are you going in such a hurry, grunt?”

“...” The Ghost Officer sends Shuo an annoyed look. “Is he in his office?”

“Did you fuck up?”

“No?” Yin Yu glares, his white mask hanging off of the side of his head, slightly askew in his distress. “Actually, today is a pretty big deal for me—”

Shuo bumps his shoulder against Yin Yu’s as he walks past. “If it doesn’t involve you getting your ass kicked, it’s boring.”

“...” The former official glares after him, unmoved by the slightly flirtatious wink that the Savage Ghost throws back at him.

Normally, he puts up with Shuo’s constant teasing, but today?

Today is the biggest day in Yin Yu’s career.

Well. His post-heavenly career, anyway.

When he bursts in through the doors of the Ghost King’s office, the first words he hears are—

“Have you suffered a head injury?”

Yin Yu stops in the doorway, a little awkward. “...No, sir.” Hua Cheng is facing away from him, leaning against his desk.

There’s some scribblings on the blackboard propped against the wall. Illegible, but something that he and Blackwater were fussing over, the last time the water demon was in Ghost City.

The one benefit of having Crimson Rain’s handwriting? No need to classify your notes.

“I’m trying to find out if there’s some reason that you’ve forgotten how to knock.”

Yin Yu stops, clearing his throat. “Apologies sir, but I have an urgent update.”

“That being?”

“Well,” he takes a deep breath, “first, I’d like to remind you that the holidays are coming.”

Hua Cheng turns his head to look back at him over his shoulder, raising one slender eyebrow.

“And?”

Yin Yu swallows dryly. “And...you said we could discuss my pay after the mid-autumn festival, which isn’t that far away.”

“But it isn’t today.”

“No,” the Ghost Officer agrees. “I just—hope you’ll keep this in mind, when we discuss it.”

“Keep what in mind?”

Yin Yu takes a deep breath, setting a scroll down on Hua Cheng’s desk:

“I found the Crown Prince of Xianle.”

In the hundred and fifty years that he’s been working for Hua Cheng, Yin Yu has never seen his focus sharpen with such swiftness or such intensity.

“Are you sure?”

He’s cautious about getting his hope up after so many missed calls, but Yin Yu nods vehemently.

“I know where he was as of—” He glances at the hourglass on Hua Cheng’s desk, “Four hours ago. Even if he left, assuming he’s traveling on foot, the search radius would only be three hundred miles.”

It’s closer than they’ve ever gotten. “How?”

“Well...”

It’s been an operation eighty five years in the making. But that’s fine—Yin Yu thrives on small details. Working in the trenches is his specialty.

He opens the scroll he carried in with him, unrolling it across Hua Cheng’s desk.

Inside, four different swatches of fabric are pinned against the paper. “See—each of these are attempted knock offs of one pattern.”

Hua Cheng examines them closely.

Each one has an interlocking gold chain pattern, overlaid with pink lotus blossoms.

“But look at this one?” Yin Yu rolls the scroll open a little further, and Hua Cheng takes in the fifth swatch.

All of the options were lovely, but this one—it’s much more detailed, to the point where it almost looks like the flowers in the pattern are living.

“Human hands can’t achieve that level of detail,” Yin Yu explains, “I’ve had four different masters try, and they can’t. This pattern—it’s used in Bridal Brocades for royalty all over, but it’s impossibly rare.”

“And the prince made it?”

Yin Yu nods quickly.

“So I stopped tracking him, and I started tracking the silk.”

It’s clever, Hua Cheng won’t lie. After all—the silk itself isn’t impacted by Xie Lian’s luck once it leaves his possession.

“The last known sale was in a village in the North, a little over a century ago.”

“That’s not particularly helpful.”

“No, but then, there was word that someone was making perfect replicas—in Gusu.”

The mention of that makes Hua Cheng stiffen.

He and He Xuan have both been monitoring the situation with Wen Jiao for the last sixty years, debating.

Mount Tonglu has been overdue, and the thought that he might be a potential candidate is somewhat concerning.

Zhao Beitong would never accept him, that isn’t the concern. It’s more that he might get in the way of other candidates Hua Cheng or He Xuan might have in mind.

The ghost realm might be independent and disorganized compared to the heavens— but it isn’t free from politics.

And Wen Jiao is especially distasteful in Hua Cheng's eyes.

"And just last night, during the Lunar Eclipse—the walls of Gusu came down. It's highly unlikely that it was a coincidence—and one of the scouts said they saw a blind Taoist fighting Wen Jiao in the city center."

Hua Cheng already has E-Ming at his belt. "Is he in danger?"

"No, Wen Jiao is dead—but it's a confirmed sighting of him, and it was only a few hours ago, so the odds are..."

Yin Yu trails off, finally feeling satisfaction in the knowledge that, after eighty long, hard years of investigation, his hard work has finally come to fruition.

Finally, he'll get a raise. Maybe some respect around here. His long term goal is for Hua Cheng to put him over Shuo, just so Yin Yu can see the look on that smug bastard's face when—

While Yin Yu is lost in thought, a voice pipes up in Hua Cheng's head.

'You know, instead of making your password that fucking unpleasant, you could just only give it out to people you actually want to talk to.'

The Ghost King rolls his eyes.

'Too late, I already gave it to you.'

'Charming.'

'Fuck off, I'm busy—'

'He's here.'

Hua Cheng holds up a hand, making Yin Yu fall silent as he turns around, pressing his fingertips to his temples.

'He's what?'

'The Crown Prince of Xianle,'

Hua Cheng's eyes widen sharply.

'He's ascended again. Keep the array open, and I'll tell you where he goes next.'

Unfortunately for Yin Yu, he was four hours too late for his tip to be useful. And therefore—

Eighty years of hard work were essentially wasted, in one fell swoop.

He'll have to find another way to get that raise, and Hua Cheng…

Well, he's already disappeared.

The Grand Martial Hall is a common meeting place in the upper court of the heavens, but the Heavenly Imperial Residence?

It's a rather exclusive location, one that few ever have the honor of visiting on purpose, and even fewer are allowed to frequent regularly.

The Water Master doesn't seem particularly honored, draped across the back of a chaise lounge, rolling over when the Heavenly Emperor's gaze drifts in his direction.

Jun Wu sets down his report with a raised eyebrow. "Have I offended you?"

"I should be asking you that."

Shi Wudu is proud. Like a pet that knows it's expensive, from a good breeder. He won't actually say what's bothering him, he'll just suffer in silence.

Loud silence.

But Jun Wu has some idea of what the issue is.

"You never told me to stop."

It isn't fair.

Jun Wu is the one that's in a mood, not him. He was fine, when the Emperor summoned him this morning. Now, he aches. And he feels…

Shi Wudu doesn't want to examine what he's feeling, so he labels it as annoyance, and nothing more.

Annoyance isn't painful.

"You never asked me if I was alright."

That statement is a little more pointed than what he might usually make in protest— but when Jun Wu tries to examine the young god's expression, Shi Wudu snaps his fan open in front of his face, obscuring himself from view.

"Forget it."

Before the Emperor can ask more, the doors to the residence open.

Only one person can enter without being summoned, you see—and that would be the head Civil God, Ling Wen.

Her shoes click softly against the tile, scrolls clutched in her arms. "Your majesty," she murmurs.

She politely keeps her gaze straight ahead, sparing her friend some dignity as he rises from his seat, adjusting his outer robes as he makes his way out of the room.

He never needs to be told to leave—actually, if Ling Wen was being honest...

He always seems eager to go.

Almost like he's escaping from something.

The doors shut behind him, and, without making much more of it, she continues.

"We've had a rather eventful morning. Three ascensions. Two cast themselves back down, and the third—"

"Was Xianle," Jun Wu mutters dryly. "I know."

"..." Ling Wen nods, slightly...surprised by his mood. He's always been fond of the Crown Prince. She thought he would be happy to hear of his return. "Unfortunately, his ascension was rather destructive. The palace of Nan Yang was severely damaged, and Xuan Zhen was nearly —"

"Get to the point."

Normally, he's a bit more...polite than this, but Ling Wen knows better to comment, dipping her chin.

“The total damage is close to eight hundred thousand merits. It’s unlikely he’ll have a means of paying back the debt, given his…”

Jun Wu arches an eyebrow

“You’re trying to clean up the mess for him?” He muses, leaning his chin on his hand. “That’s surprisingly kind of you, Ling Wen.”

The Civil Goddess doesn’t reply, simply waiting for him to offer up a response. That’s the best thing to do, when his mood is like this.

Jun Wu is quiet for a moment, watching the door through which Wudu just disappeared, thinking. And then the idea comes to him. Something that has the guise of being helpful—but really, it’s somewhat vindictive.

“…Let him handle the Mount Yu Jun case.”

Ling Wen’s eyes widen.

“Sir—you mean the Ghost Groom? That’s a high level case, and he’s only just faced a calamity. He might need more time to recover—”

“It’ll be up to him,” Jun Wu shrugs. “But I doubt he’ll decline if you make him the offer. He’s always been willing to face a challenge.”

“…” Ling Wen bows her head in agreement, “If that’s what you desire, your highness —then I’ll pass it on.”

“Good,” Jun Wu sighs. “And we’ll have to organize a meeting of the grand deities relatively soon. There’s been quite a bit of discord recently that we need to discuss.”

“Yes, your grace.”

“And make sure Ming Guang receives his assignments for his next deployment. That way he doesn’t have to bother returning to the Heavens unnecessarily. We don’t want to waste his time.”

“We do have other Martial Gods available who could take on the work.” It’s rare for her to make such a statement, but…

The workload that the emperor has placed on Ming Guang in the last few decades has been blatantly overbearing. Pei never complains, that isn’t in his nature, but…

It’s inefficient, when there are other options.

Xuan Zhen, Nan Yang, and Quan Yizhen are all powerful martial gods with the time and ability to take on the workload. And it—

"I believe I just deferred one of his cases to Xianle, didn't I?" Jun Wu reminds her. His tone is calm. She knows better than to push it.

"There are responsibilities that come with being the second most powerful Martial God. Pei Ming understands that."

Ling Wen bows her head once again in acknowledgement, but says little more on the matter.

She doesn't believe it's anything to do with that. Not for one moment.

Pei Ming has been in his position for a thousand years now. His relationship with Jun Wu is longer than even that of the Crown Prince of Xianle.

But only in the last century or so did his workload change so significantly, and Ling Wen, well—t's not her business, but...

Something about this feels distinctly personal.

In any case—she has work to do, and vocalizing sympathy for Pei Ming any further won't further the cause.

"Thank you for your time, your highness."

"Of course."

Ling Wen descends from the Imperial Residence—and she gets to work.

Xie Lian finds himself feeling...

Somewhat lost.

It's been so long since he was in the Heavenly Capital—he would be lying if he said that he knew what to do with himself.

How did he spend his time up here, before? Shouldn't he be...

"Your highness?"

He glances up, unaccustomed to being called by that title now, and he can't exactly see who it is—but he can see the calm, gray aura of a civil god.

“You might not remember me. I’m the head civil god, Ling Wen?”
“Oh,” Xie Lian blinks, then smiles politely.

“I remember—but back when I was here last, you were a deputy I believe…” He trails off, trying not to date himself too much—he already feels sharply out of place. “Congratulations on the promotion.”

“It was centuries ago, but thank you,” Ling Wen replies calmly.

“I came to congratulate you as well.”

Xie Lian smiles again, “Well, I certainly wasn’t expecting this to happen today, but—”

“You’ve won this year’s contest of ‘God most likely to be kicked out of heaven,” She explains, and Xie Lian’s smile freezes.

“I…did?”

“Yes,” Ling Wen murmurs, “And you won one hundred merit credits. Congratulations.”

Xie Lian knew that the Heavens weren’t exactly busy these days, but this contest does seem…admittedly silly. In any case, he forces himself to keep smiling.

“I suppose it’s my lucky day.”

“Do you know why you won?”

Xie Lian shakes his head, and Ling Wen points in the direction of the central heavenly avenue, “Take a look at that bell, over there.”

The god pauses with a somewhat awkward smile, “I…um…I can’t do that.”

Ling Wen pauses, her eyebrows raising.

“…You still have your shackles, your highness?”

Even Xie Lian is surprised—after all, the second time he ascended, his original shackles disappeared, but…

“I’m sure there’s a reason for it. In any case—no, I can’t see the bell.”

“…I suppose it’s all the same,” Ling Wen mutters, “Because there is no bell. It was toppled by your ascension, as well as several palaces."

"...Oh," the crown prince winces. "I'm sorry, property damage has been a consistent issue of mine."

Ling Wen doesn't seem particularly surprised to hear it. "The bell almost crushed an official passing underneath when it fell."

"...were they alright?!"

"Yes, he was a martial god—so he simply sliced it in half. But your entrance did not endear you to the Heavenly Court."

Xie Lian didn't expect they would be endeared to begin with, so! Good news! He isn't disappointed.

"Whatever the cost of repairs is—I can pay them back, I just need time—"

"To pull together 800,000 merit credits?"

The martial god pales, and Ling Wen sighs.

Jun Wu's mood, for whatever reason, is putting everyone in a bind today.

"Don't worry, your highness," she mutters. She didn't have much of an opinion of the martial god over the years, but Pei has always spoken of him highly.

And, in spite of his shortcomings...

Ling Wen trusts Pei's judgement of a man.

"I have a plan."

Which is what leads them directly to the Heavenly Communication Array. It's been a long time since Xie Lian used one and...

He finds the experience distinctly unpleasant.

Everyone is too loud—there's too much at once.

And most of them—pretty much all of them, actually—are complaining about him.

"What was the Emperor thinking, letting him ascend again?!"

"It's not up to him, if he had a choice, I'm sure he—"

"Are you kidding?! He practically lets that child get away with everything."

It's odd, to be eight centuries old, and still have people calling him a child.

Ling Wen clears her throat, stepping forward. "Everyone, could I have your attention? I have a request from the emperor."

That is enough to draw the yelling down to a hush, and Xie Lian is relieved.

"There's a disturbance on Mount Yu Jun that the Heavenly Emperor and General Ming Guang have been too preoccupied to deal with. Could anyone spare a pair of martial deities to assist?"

A voice cuts through the array, sharp and quick to see through her.

"The emperor has made no such request before regarding the Yu Jun case. Are you really just trying to cover for someone else?"

"..." Ling Wen remains silent for a moment, and the voice continues. "This is about the Crown Prince, isn't it?"

The one who answer's isn't Ling Wen.

"It is." Xie Lian's voice rings out through the communication array, and everyone grows even more silent, like you couldn't even hear a pin drop. "In any case, it's alright. The fault here is mine, I don't mind handling it by myself."

After all, he's always by himself. It really isn't such a big deal.

"...If you can," the voice replies flatly. "I think we're all a little skeptical after that entrance."

Ling Wen reaches over, tugging Xie Lian's sleeve in a gentle reminder. "Your highness—the bell."

Oh.

Xie Lian winces.

"...I'm sorry the bell almost hit you," he mutters. "I swear—it wasn't on purpose. Could I ask your name?"

There’s an awkward, immediate rumble through the communication array. Xie Lian pauses, unsure of what he said wrong, until…

“Your highness—that’s General Xuan Zhen.”

Well. That explains why the voice was a little familiar.

Oh boy.

Xie Lian winces again, knowing better than anyone just how personally Mu Qing is going to take Xie Lian not recognizing him, but also knowing that saying anything more would only make matters worse.

But before there’s an opportunity for him to dig an even deeper hole, he hears— “WHO DESTROYED MY PALACE?!”

Xie Lian bites back the urge to cover his face with his hands.

“WAS IT YOU?!”

Mu Qing’s voice is far more snide now, than it was before.

“Unlike your thoughts, the world doesn’t revolve around me. I had very little to do with it.”

Xie Lian’s eyebrows shoot up, and Feng Xin sputters.

“Watch your mouth before I—!”

“Before you what?!”

“It was me, actually.” Xie Lian speaks up. “Apologies, General Nan Yang.”

Nan Yang and Xuan Zhen stop arguing instantly—but Xie Lian can’t see the sharp look that the two share, before immediately looking away.

Rather than respond to his question directly—Feng Xin remains as gruff as ever. “…I have business to attend to. I’m going, now.”

Xie Lian’s smile turns a little sad.

Honestly, given the way that he and Feng Xin parted ways—the fact that he isn’t cursing the prince’s name is already more than Xie Lian deserves.

"...Thank you for trying, Ling Wen," the god murmurs, exiting the communication array. "I can handle this."

The Civil Goddess grimaces, thinking back on what Jun Wu said just before—and... she's a little shocked.

No one ever thanks her for her work. Not really. It's just expected. "I'm...only doing my job, your highness." She replies.

"Do you need any heavenly arms?"

Xie Lian thinks on it for a moment. In honesty—he's still recovering from the battle in Gusu.

He bears with pain now, but the bandages sound his throat now are more than usual —

The iron shackle did significant damage.

Even so...

The last true spiritual weapon he used was Fangxin, and...

Xie Lian can't remember, in the years from when Bai Wuxiang first gave him that weapon, or all the centuries after, if it did him any good.

Just the memory of it makes one of his hands start to tremble slightly. "No."

Ling Wen sends him a surprised look, and Xie Lian grips his hand silently in an effort to stop the shaking, then smiles.

"They don't do me much good, I'm afraid."

Ling Wen glances him over, then nods.

Right, the shackles.

"Very well, I suppose a scroll wouldn't be helpful—"

"I can still use those quite well, actually." Xie Lian murmurs, taking it from her. "This has all the information I need?"

Ling Wen nods, demurring when the crown prince tries to thank her again, bowing her head. "Good luck, your highness—I wish you all of heaven's blessings."

Xie Lian stops in the middle of walking down the steps. It's been a while since someone used that phrase with him. It takes him back to...

Such a different time in his life.

But still, there's a nostalgia to giving her the traditional response.

"And by Heaven Official's Blessing..." He murmurs, glancing back at Ling Wen over his shoulder—and there's such a warmth in his smile, lacking any guile—it leaves Ling Wen a little shell shocked by its honesty.

"No Paths Are Bound."

There was one thing Xie Lian underestimated about the difficulty of this matter, however.

He knows the path out of Heaven, he took it plenty of times in his youth, but...

He didn't remember how...nimble you had to be, on the path back down. That not having your sight...

It can actually be quite a hindrance when dropping that far through the air.

He smacks into not one, not two, but three clouds on the way down—leaving himself rather scraped and bruised by the time he lands, but...Xie Lian sighs, picking the leaves out of his hair as he sits up.

"You've had worse," he mutters, sitting up—rubbing his lower back slightly when he does. It doesn't hurt, but with his body's slowed rate of recovery—

(He's still healing from Gusu) —it'll be slightly inconvenient. But that doesn't slow him down.

He's quick to make his way to a local tea house, ordering himself a drink before he goes about trying to collect information from the locals. After all—his task is to hunt a ghost. The best way to find it is to do preliminary research, but...

Something makes him pause.

Clink!

It's this gentle chiming, almost like a bell, but not like any that Xie

Lian has ever head before.

There's something so gentle and clear about it—almost musical.

Clink!

The world went dark again, when he descended from the heavens—there isn't much spiritual energy around to light the way, but...

Now, from the corner of his eye, there's this gentle, silvery light.

Xie Lian turns his head to follow it, and his breath catches.

A...butterfly?

Xie Lian's first instinct is to reach out for it, curious—expecting the creature to flutter away, but...

It doesn't.

It lands delicately on his fingertips, crawling up and over his knuckles before sitting there—almost like it's looking up at him, wings flapping delicately.

All he can think of, in that moment—is that's beautiful.

Can't stop the small smile that crosses his lips, remembering how his mother used to scold him as a child—always chasing butterflies,

It's pleasantly against his skin, almost tingling, like a little... There's a sharp pang in Xie Lian's heart.

It's just a little cool to the touch, almost like a ghost fire.

'Your highness...'

Xie Lian bites his lip, closing his eyes as he forces those thoughts down.

And what kind of butterfly is made from pure spiritual energy, anyway? He—

But as soon as he opens his eyes, the butterfly is already gone, and he's just...

Alone, in the dark.

The god lets out a heavy sigh, closing his eyes once more. It's better not to have them open in a place anyway, in case a mortal sees—

'Your highness?'

The sound of Ling Wen's voice in his private array startles him—most people don't work their way out around the password—

(Poor Feng Xin really does say it a thousand times every time.)

(Xie Lian misses him.)

'Yes?'

'I have good news—two deputies have come to your aid.'

Xie Lian is a little surprised to hear it, since no one was particularly forthcoming during the meeting, but...

When he looks back across the table, two figures are already there.

One has a hard, firm aura—almost earthen in color, though not in an unpleasant way.

The other is spiky, a little inconsistent around the edges—and with an icy shade that looks frigid, but warmer shades of magenta towards the core.

Well. These must be the officials in question, then.

Xie Lian sips his tea a little awkwardly, then smiles. "Have we met before?"

There's a long beat of silence—and from the sounds of their movements, Xie Lian can only assume that they're shaking their heads. "Well, could I ask your—?"

"Nan Feng," the hard aura'd man on the right mutters, his voice deep and warm.

"...Fu Yao," says the other.

"And the generals you work for—?"

"Nan Yang."

"Xuan Zhen."

Xie Lian pales slightly, startled.

Neither of the martial gods seemed particularly happy to see him in the communication array before. And Xie Lian understood that, but…why help him now?

“They…sent you?”

Nan Feng is quiet, but Fu Yao replies rather quickly, “Neither of them know that we’re here, actually.”

That makes Xie Lian relax a little. “And you know who I am?”

“The Crown Prince of Xianle,” Nan Feng replies easily.

“The Heart of Humanity,” Fu Yao mutters, his tone flat.

“…It kinda sounds like you’re rolling your eyes right now,” Xie Lian admits, laughing a little awkwardly.

“That’s because he is,” Nan Feng glares. “Just go away if you’re gonna have a shit attitude, alright? We don’t need you.”

“Ha. Why don’t you go? You’re the useless one!”

“Now, now…” Xie Lian starts, finding this whole thing vaguely familiar, but…

In the Private Communication array between Feng Xin and Mu Qing, a very different conversation is unfolding.

‘Nan Feng?! How stupid are you?!’

‘Wh—?!’ He blanches, glancing at Xie Lian. ‘What?!’

‘Oh,’ Fu Yao rolls his eyes, crossing his arms, ‘I’m gonna pose as my own Deputy God so the Crown Prince doesn’t know I’m helping him. I know the best Alias! I’m gonna pick my first name as a mortal, and my surname as a god, he’ll never put it together!’

Nan Feng gets redder and redder, all the way up to his ears, ‘It could be a coincidence!’

‘At best, it makes you look like some creepy fanboy that’s obsessed with Nan Yang.’

‘Then I’ll tell him that’s my god name and make up a mortal name!’

‘As much as I’d enjoy watching you try…you’re better off just sticking with it,’ Fu Yao shrugs, only to jump when Nan Feng pointedly (and silently) shoves a finger in his face.

‘And what’s with that skin?’

The ‘Deputy’ God smiles slyly, tilting his head, ‘What do you mean?’

‘It looks a lot like me!’ Nan Feng snaps, looking him over. Well, a smaller, prettier version of him, but still—

Fu Yao’s smile widens as he twirls a lock of hair around his finger, crossing his legs under the table.

‘Hate to break it to you—but I just picked the ugliest skin I could think of.’

A vein pops in Nan Feng’s shoulder as he goes to launch himself at the other god, and Xie Lian—who has been listening to their mostly silent exchange, is absolutely baffled, but also concerned.

“Hey! Can you two work together to help me, or is this going to be a problem?” Nan Feng is already gripping Fu Yao by the throat, irritated.

Even in this form, he just has to wear a choker, doesn’t he?

They glare at one another before backing off with a huff.

“Of course!”

Xie Lian is quick to explain the terms of their case, offering the details he knows.

About the brides who have been stolen from the Mountain over the last century. Sixteen of them—until recently, when an officer’s daughter was taken.

All by the Ghost Groom of Mount Yu Jun.

“So,” Fu Yao sighs, walking out of the tea house with his arms crossed, lingering behind the Crown Prince and Nan Feng, watching them walk side by side, “How do we find hi—oh, you’ve got to be kidding me.”

Xie Lian blinks, confused. “…What?”

“Can’t you see it?” Nan Feng frowns

“...No,” Xie Lian shakes his head. “I still have the shackles.”

Nan Feng and Fu Yao glance at one another, visibly concerned—but neither says a word.

“It’s a bridal sedan,” Fu Yao mutters. “Someone’s really having a wedding now of all times.”

Xie Lian frowns.

That’s just too dangerous, they can’t possibly allow— “You can’t!” A voice, that of a young girl cries out.

Nan Feng and Fu Yao watches as the young woman rushes over to the bridal sedan, struggling with the escorts.

“Miss!” She cries. “They’re just using you!”

“Would you just shut up!” One of the young men near the front of the group grumbles. “Stop getting in the way, you stupid little brat!”

“Honestly, it’s a good thing an ugly dog like you refused to dress up for us anyway! We would’ve been screwed!”

Xie Lian’s frown deepens.

“She is kind of plain,” Fu Yao comments, looking her over—and Xie Lian sends him a disapproving look.

“You shouldn’t say that about a young lady, no matter what she looks like.” The god mutters.

Nan Feng watches the other deputy get scolded—infinitely satisfied.

Well—until the young woman struggling with the group stumbles forward, and there’s a distinctly wooden sound from inside the bridal sedan, and the clunk of something falling out.

From the sound of it they were using a mannequin instead of an actual bride. “...Look what you did!”

One of them snaps. “The ghost groom might have already seen it! Now we’ll have to come up with something completely different!”

“You shouldn’t go there anyway!” The girl—Xiao Ying, from the way the others are shouting their grievances—cries out. “It’s too dangerous!”

“Mind your own damn business!” The gang leader of the group snarls, giving her a shove.

Xie Lian stiffens when he hears a rip—likely the girl’s skirt—and the sound of her falling to the ground.

“I’ll teach you not to stick that ugly nose where it doesn’t belong!”

Xiao Ying stiffens, her eyes widening with fear as she throws her arms around her face, cringing when the man pulls his foot back to kick her, but…

It never lands.

There’s a grip on the gang leader’s wrist, his eyes widening slightly before that grip twists and shoves.

He’s sent stumbling back, flipping head over heels before landing on the ground with a violent—

THUD!

The group of criminals stops, looking at one another nervously as a white robed cultivator stands before them, tipping back his bamboo hat as he stands over the young woman.

Still, in spite of the violence, he smiles pleasantly. “I think that’s enough, don’t you?”

Their leader sits up, rubbing his wrist with annoyance. “What kind of witch are you?!” He hisses, rising to his feet. “And why don’t you mind your own business?!”

The cultivator’s smile never fades. “I could ask you why you lay your hands on defenseless young women, but life is full of mysteries, huh?”

“…” He glares, looking over to his men, “GET—!”

BOOM!

Nan Feng’s fist slams into the side of the tea house as a warning.

Which is very impressive, obviously—given the fact that the front entrance shatters along with a nearby tree.

But rather costly.

It only takes a moment before the group is sent scrambling away with terror, and Xie Lian can kneel down to offer the young lady a hand.

“Are you alright? Oh…” He trails off, remembering the sound of something ripping. That was her skirt, right?

She glances up shakily, just in time to see the handsome young man smiling down at her, and—

That he’s removing his outer robe. Quickly, her expression shifts.

CRACK!

Both Nan Feng and Fu Yao gawks as they watch the prince get slapped —quite hard, actually.

(Xie Lian couldn’t see the change in her expression, so he obviously didn’t know to try to dodge it.)

“P-PERVERT!” She shouts, leaping to her feet and scrambling away. “Ah…”

Xie Lian sighs, dropping his robes back around his shoulders. “I suppose I should have realized how that was going to come off…”

“I’m surprised she thinks anyone could be interested at all…”

“Fu Yao.” Xie Lian sends him a stern look. “Enough.”

He can’t see the tense shift in the deputy god’s expression. The way he crosses his arms over his chest and looks away, his gaze…conflicted.

“Well,” Xie Lian sighs, patting himself off. “We should probably find a place to stay…” He glances over at the Tea House Owner.

Nan Feng is in the middle of settling the terms of his property damage (which was extensive, Xie Lian can relate), but it doesn’t hurt to ask—

“Is there a temple of Ming Guang nearby?”

After all, they’re in the heart of his territory.

“Oh—no, not for many miles.”

“…” Xie Lian’s expression becomes a little troubled. “How odd.”

“There used to be,” the owner explains, finishing out Nan Feng’s tab.

“But they kept on burning down—so people stopped rebuilding them.”

And Pei Ming hasn’t interceded? That’s even more odd.

Between that and Gusu, it would have been a significant undermining of his strength. But—then again, he’s grown so significant as a martial god now, his renown is only beaten by Jun Wu. People worship him the entire continent over. Maybe he really didn’t notice…?

“But,” the merchant speaks up, dragging Xie Lian from his thoughts. “A Nan Yang temple is actually rather close.”

Nan Feng makes a face, opening his mouth to say something about getting an inn, but Fu Yao grins, taking the prince by the elbow and steering him off.

“Perfect!”

“Why are you so excited?” Nan Feng grumbles, trying to catch up with him, and Fu Yao shrugs, his steps light.

“Why aren’t you? It’s gonna feel like home sweet home for you.”

“You’re smirking about something—!”

They grumble back and forth, with Xie Lian in the middle, and…

Part of him can’t help but smile, leaning into Fu Yao’s hold on his arm a little bit, remembering different days.

He didn’t ever think he could feel nostalgic about that bickering, but… He tilts his hat down slightly in order to hide the way his eyes soften. It’s…nice.

His lips tighten slightly at the corners, trembling a little.

Life has taken a lot from Xie Lian, over the years. It’s rare that it ever gives something back—even if only briefly, in a moment like this.

He’s learned to be grateful for it.

And when they arrive in the temple…

The bickering intensifies.

“Stop giggling!”

“I didn’t giggle!”

“You did a little,” Xie Lian points out, eyebrows knitting together. “When we walked under the entrance sign.”

“Oh, well…” Fu Yao smirks, “Wanna know why?”

Nan Feng has turned absolutely purple. “Shut it—!”

“You see,” he carries on, leading Xie Lian through the temple by the arm, “back in the day—very, very far back, there was a king that was incredibly dedicated to Nan Yang, so dedicated, he built more temples than any other had for the god before!”

“Is that true?”

Xie Lian looks at Nan Feng, who squirms with discomfort, arms crossed. “Yes,” he replies stiffly. “The king was very generous, but—!”

“But,” Fu Yao cuts him off, “apparently not the best with clerical work, because there was a significant typo.”

“…Typo?”

“IT’S BEEN FIXED!”

“See, instead of the brave, honorable, fierce General Nan Yang, it was the huge, thick…pulsing, some might say—!”

“WOULD YOU SHUT UP?!” Nan Feng snarls, fists trembling, and Xie Lian hasn’t been quite this baffled in a long time.

Those are really odd adjectives for Feng Xin.

He’s a pretty big person, and as a result somewhat thick in the limbs and chest Xie Lian supposes, but pulsing? Who calls a man pulsing?

“—General DICK Yang.”

Xie Lian’s jaw drops slightly, and Nan Feng’s face falls in his hands.

“…Oh my…that’s…quite an error…”

“Yeah,” Fu Yao sighs, “He even blamed General Xuan Zhen for it, even though he had nothing to do with it. Almost bit his tongue off over the whole thing.”

Xie Lian rubs his chin.

Wasn't the phrase…biting someone's head off?

"It's been CORRECTED, and no one CARES!"

"It sounds like you care, actually." It takes a moment of horrified staring and squawking from Nan Feng for Xie Lian to realize he just said that out loud, and he blanches. "Oh, I'm sorry—"

"And most of the worshippers in Nan Yang's temples are women…" Fu Yao muses with a grin. "Most of them blush when they say their prayers, I hear…"

Nan Feng is trembling with rage at this point, and Xie Lian almost feels bad for him.

"Come on, it's not that funny…Feng Xin isn't like that when it comes to women—"

"Oh, don't worry Dianxia," Fu Yao crosses his arms. "He probably wouldn't mind. He's very experienced." He stares down Nan Feng, eyes slightly narrowed. "Different cultivation methods and all that."

Xie Lian looks like you could knock him over with a feather, and Nan Feng looks like he's in the middle of a stroke.

"YOU—!"

He cuts himself off, mouthing the words, 'WOULD YOU LET THAT GO?!'

Fu Yao seems utterly fascinated with his cuticles. "He's not as flashy as Ming Guang, but he's actually a pretty terrible heartbreaker from what I hear."

"I swear, I'll—"

"Why so offended, Nan Feng?" Fu Yao's gaze cuts up to meet his. "Your general isn't around. Why does it matter?"

The Deputy God grits his teeth. "Because the prince doesn't need to hear this filth. Why don't you go sweep the floor or something?!"

There's a beat of silence, and Xie Lian sighs.

Oh dear.

"Excuse me?" Fu Yao questions flatly.

"Your general isn't around," Nan Feng counters snidely. "Why so offended, Fu Yao?"

"..." He takes a step closer, letting go of Xie Lian's arm. "Then I'd tell you to start guarding the prince, but you'd just end up ditching halfway through."

This is usually when it spirals out of control.

"I wouldn't tell you to do anything for the prince, because no one could trust you to stick around even for a second! If—you were like your general!"

Something about that statement seems to strike deeper than Nan Feng meant it to. Trust.

Because he mentioned trust.

Fu Yao opens his mouth, ready to snarl something even worse in response, when— He notices Xie Lian wiping at something in his hand, about to put it in his mouth.

"Don't EAT THAT!" He snaps, swatting it out of the god's hands. "It's dirty!"

Xie Lian stares down at the discarded mantou mournfully. "It looked fine..."

"Don't LIE, you can't even SEE IT!"

"Don't YELL AT HIM—!" Nan Feng snaps, taking a step forward, and finally—

"ENOUGH!"

Both young men fall completely silent. It's almost like hearing a ghost.

Because it's been so, so long since they've heard Xie Lian's voice, but...even longer since they've heard him speak like that.

It's a side of him that both men just...assumed was gone.

"You're both talking about who is more like you're general—well you're both just like them!" Xie Lian crosses his arms. "Yelling at each other over me, putting me in the middle— it's unfair!"

They both open their mouths, and before either can say another word, the prince holds up a finger, stopping them.

“And I don’t want either of you speaking badly about Nan Yang or Xuan Zhen in front of me.”

They look even more shocked now, but…especially Fu Yao, whose eyes are the size of dinner plates. “Both were good friends who served me well, and I won’t hear either one of them insulted.”

There’s quiet for a moment, before Nan Feng, a little childishly, mutters—

“He always starts it.”

Fu Yao doesn’t even have a response for that one, because it’s true—but Xie Lian…

“Then maybe you should think about why.”

The deputy god stares, eyes wide and stinging

Mu Qing knows that Xie Lian doesn’t know that he’s there to hear it, but…still.

No one’s ever…defended him before.

Ever.

He’s so busy watching the martial god with wide eyes, he doesn’t see the way that Feng Xin is watching him.

With a new, unreadable sort of expression.

(But, to be fair—Mu Qing never really does notice the way that Feng Xin looks at him. Especially not in moments like this.)

After a long moment, Xie Lian jumps when he feels fingertips brush against his chin. Normally, he doesn’t really like it when people touch his face, but…

He sits still, letting Fu Yao examine the small welt on his cheek from getting slapped. “…People bite the hands that feed them,” the deputy deity grumbles. “You should know that by now.”

Xie Lian offers a tired smile as Fu Yao rummages around for something to dress it. “It’s really fine. I should have thought about how it might startle her...”

Fu Yao pauses in the middle of examining his cheek, noticing Xie Lian’s neck. “...Your highness, you’re pretty scratched up. Did you get in a fight before we arrived? Who did it?”

“...No, no,” Xie Lian shakes his head with an awkward smile. “I just got a little scratched up on the way down, I...hit a few obstacles. And before that, I was wounded during my ascension—”

“Wounded?” Nan Feng frowns. “Why didn’t you say anything?”

“The injuries are minor.”

Xie Lian shrugs, but...well...

It actually would be a good idea to re-dress the bandages anyway. He wears too much white to risk them bleeding through.

Both deputy gods move aside as Xie Lian strips down to his trousers, using the extra bandages in his bag to replace the old ones

“...Minor?” Fu Yao questions softly. He’s sitting back against the altar, watching Xie Lian with his knees pulled up to his chest, arms wrapped around them.

In Xie Lian’s defense, he can’t see how bad it looks.

“I forgot about them until you mentioned the bleeding—it’s fine!”

But without spiritual power—his body heals slower than that of a normal god, and it bruises far more easily.

His back...is a mess of cuts, scrapes, and bruises. There are several healing lacerations on his ribs, one on his upper arm. And his neck...

Even where the cursed shackle sits, there’s a deep burn mark beneath it, like someone wrapped a burning noose around him.

Nan Feng and Fu Yao look at one another.

It’s not as if the prince was a weakling before—he never was. But he also grew up in a life of luxury.

He would push through the pain if he needed to—but his pain tolerance was average. Not to the point where he could have walked around with wounds like that without saying anything.

And now, looking at one another—they're thinking of the same question:

What could have happened to make his tolerance change that drastically? Just... What happened to him, in all those years?

Xie Lian glances around, re-administering his bandages, assuming the silence is for an entirely different reason.

"...First time seeing a cursed shackle?"

Nan Feng and Fu Yao glance away from one another, with the former clearing his throat awkwardly, and the latter picking the dirt out from underneath his nails.

"Yes. Is it painful?" Nan Feng mutters, trying to sound casual, and... God, it's hard for Fu Yao not to punch him.

Xie Lian's smile doesn't change as he shakes his head, moving the new bandages back over his skin—leaving his neck bare, until Ruoye slides back into place.

"No, not at all."

The shackle in his eyes was paining him, yes—but that stopped after leaving Gusu.

Nan Feng seems slightly relieved to hear it, but Fu Yao just sighs, trying to change the subject to something that makes him feel a little less...

Responsible.

"What's our plan for tackling the Ghost Groom, anyway?" He mutters. "It's not like we're going to hear much more from the locals about it."

Xie Lian thinks it over. "I'm not sure. It's difficult when there aren't any living witnesses, so we don't even know anything about the ghost's appearance, strengths, or lair. It's risky."

Fu Yao huffs, trying not to look in Nan Feng's direction, because if he looks at that intent, worried expression on his face while he watches the crown prince one more time, he's going to throw up.

"We should just dress up a girl like those guys were going to, then."

"No," Xie Lian frowns, shaking his head. "If we used an actual girl for that, and something went wrong—she'd end up getting killed."

The entire point of this mission is to protect more young women from facing that fate. Xie Lian isn't willing to risk another.

"Yeah, I agree..." Nan Feng speaks up, rubbing the side of his neck. "But I also don't know of another way to draw out the ghost. Those creatures—they're motivated by desire, and focused. It could lay dormant for months until another bride comes across it's path."

Xie Lian pauses, tilting his head. "...Are ghosts really like that?"

He hasn't known very many. The Ghost Fire and Wu Ming—who in the end, turned out to be one in the same—he was the only Ghost Xie Lian really spent any time with in a meaningful way.

And he seemed so...selfless.

Nan Feng nods—and for once, Fu Yao doesn't argue or make any snide comments. Other than Ming Guang, General Nan Yang has dealt with more cases in the Mortal Realm than anyone—

And seen the damage that the undead can do to humans more than most.

"Many ghosts linger on for harmless reasons, but the powerful ones? Their desires... are what dominate their every thought, action, and motivation. That's all they are." Fu Yao shrugs. "Once you know that, you can handle most of them."

"...Not every powerful ghost," Xie Lian murmurs.

Nan Feng raises an eyebrow, and the prince explains—

"I met one once, many years ago—and all he wanted to do was protect someone he loved." Xie Lian's fingers twitch towards his chest, but if there was a reason for it, he can't remember why.

"...Then he'd be the one exception."

Nan Feng shrugs.

Xie Lian nods, his smile a little...glum, thinking back on that.

He hopes, when Wu Ming dispersed—

Xie Lian hopes that his precious person finally found their way back to him again.

“In any case—what this ghost wants—it’s to kill brides, and it’s intelligent.”

Nan Feng sighs. “It wouldn’t have come out for that mannequin those men were going to try to pass off, and it won’t risk exposure unless it has prey within it’s sights.”

Xie Lian sighs, rubbing his chin. “That’s...a conundrum. Since we can’t risk a mortal’s life—”

“Okay,” Fu Yao speaks up once more. “Then why don’t we use something that isn’t mortal?”

Xie Lian pauses, surprised. “...Is that an option?”

Nan Feng doesn’t get it at first—not until he looks over at Fu Yao, who is pointing in... the prince’s direction.

It’s rare, that the two of them are ever willingly on an inside joke together, but...

“You have the slightest frame of the three of us,” Fu Yao comments, “you’d be a little tall, for a bride, but...”

Xie Lian’s eyes widen slightly, shackle gleaming in the candlelight. “...Me?”

The Bridal Sedan

Chapter Summary

> "Are you alright?"
>
> "Does…" Xie Lian trails off, "Does anyone hear that?"
>
> "Hear what?!"
>
> Giggling. Soft, high pitched—like that of a small child. "Something is out there."
>
> "New Bride…" The sound of that voice, playful, almost impish, makes the hairs on the back of his neck stand straight up. "New Bride…"
>
> Nan Feng's voice echoes outside the sedan, "What is it?!"
>
> "New Bride in the Red Bridal Sedan…"
>
> Xie Lian swallows dryly. "Singing."

Chapter Notes

> You can find me on twitter and keep up with current updates of the story HERE

Xie Lian hasn't exactly seen his own frame in…nearly a millennia, but he's never thought of himself as 'slight,' before. His body has always done everything that he needed it to do, and no man has ever bested him in strength, but…

He squeezes his own forearm with a frown.

Then, he reaches over to squeeze F—Nan Feng's forearm with a frown, eyebrows pinching more and more as he checks Fu Yao's in turn, and he realizes…

Well, he is far more thin than either of them. He doesn't remember being that much smaller than they were when they were young.

But…well…

Xie Lian also hasn't been what one would consider 'well fed' in eight centuries, and a divine body only makes up for so much.

In a rare moment of perception, Nan Feng comments, “He didn’t mean that you were small, your highness. Just smaller than either of us.”

“I wasn’t offended,” Xie Lian mutters. And in truth, he isn’t. His size isn’t particularly relevant—

(Not when he can still throw a thirty meter tall demon by the tail like a stuffed animal, anyway.)

—it’s just unnerving sometimes, to realize...

He doesn’t actually know what his own body looks like. Not anymore.

“But could I really pass as someone’s beautiful bride to be?”

The other two look at one another yet again, this time—equally exasperated.

“It’ll be cutting it close,” Fu Yao replies dryly. “But we’ll manage.”

“...Well,” Xie Lian sighs, tapping his chin. “What time is it?”

“It’s too late for us to go tonight,” Fu Yao sighs. “We’ll have to hire some proper escorts—and find a dress somewhere, for you,” he mutters, waggling his eyebrows.

“There’s no need for that.”

“We can’t just have you wear what you have on now,” Fu Yao frowns. “No one would buy it!”

“I know,” Xie Lian rises back up to his feet, re-fastening his outer robe, his body covered once more. “But I can make one on my own.”

“...uh...” The Deputy Gods glance at one another again.

Certainly Xie Lian must have gained some worldly skills in the last eight hundred years, they both understand that—but...For someone who never even mended his own clothes as a child....

(Really, his clothes were never mended to begin with—just donated after a single tear.)

And when you consider how plain the clothes he’s wearing now are, it’s hard to believe that he’s...particularly skilled in that area.

“Really, money isn’t an object,” Nan Feng speaks up. “And for how quickly we’ll need it done—”

“I just need thread, the rest I can handle.” Xie Lian shrugs, “Fu Yao—why don’t you handle that, I’ll tell you what colors and lengths I need—and Nan Feng, you can arrange the escort.” He glances over at the two, “Does that sound like a plan?”

Both stare up at him, feeling surprisingly... Nostalgic.

It’s not so different from how he used to talk, back when they were teenagers, planning missions with far higher stakes.

“...Yeah,” Fu Yao mutters, looking away. “Fine.”

They both set out that morning with their tasks in mind—but Fu Yao tells Nan Feng to get an extra dress.

After all, who asks for just...thread?

Silk thread, to be specific—and for someone that’s been blind for eight centuries, he’s perfectly familiar with the shades he wants—he even asks for a specific type of dye.

It’s baffling, and when Fu Yao returns to the temple—he gawks.

“Is that a loom? ”

“Oh,” Xie Lian glances up with a smile, “I didn’t think I was going to need it before— but Ling Wen was kind enough to have someone bring it down for me. Did you bring the thread?”

“You’re...” Fu Yao sputters. “Going to weave your own silk?!”

Xie Lian nods, taking the box of thread from him—each spool has a label that he can tell them apart by feel, making it easy for him to pick out the proper colors. “I’m fast, time won’t be an issue.”

Fu Yao doubts that he—even with godly speed—could manage that in only a few hours.

Or that whatever result he could manage would be better than what they could get in a shop, for that matter.

“There’s no need to be so thrifty, money isn’t an object—”

“I’m not,” Xie Lian shakes his head. “I just really wanted to.”

Fu Yao watches him get started—and he wasn't exaggerating about one thing— He does move fast.

"Why would you want the extra work?"

The prince shrugs, fingers tiny blurs as they fly over the loom.

But when he looks at Fu Yao, his smile is genuine.

"They're my favorite."

"...Your favorite?" Fu Yao mutters, struggling to understand.

"Wedding gowns," Xie Lian explains, the smile never fading from his lips. "They're my favorite thing to make."

"...Have you made a lot of them?"

The prince hums in agreement. "I've lost count by now."

Fu Yao drops down to sit on the floor beside him, watching curiously. "...What's so special about them?"

"Most of the time, when I would make clothes for people—it was just selling it at a stall. But wedding robes—they're special, they have to be fitted."

Even his voice sounds a little bit more alive now, talking about it—like the topic genuinely does make him happy.

"So, I'd always get to talk to the brides—and they were usually so excited..."

And when they weren't, the weaver would help them make the match...fall through.

But they usually were happy.

So, so happy, the kind that you can hear in a person's voice, even if you can't see them smiling.

"Listening to them—it made me feel happy too."

Fu Yao picks at the laces on his boots. "I didn't know you were so passionate about weddings."

Finally, that smile on Xie Lian's face dims just a bit—then turns teasing. “I don’t see how you would—we met yesterday.”

“...” Fu Yao’s fingers go still over his boots, and his cheeks flush. “General Xuan Zhen never mentioned it.”

“Does he say much about me?”

The Deputy God doesn’t reply, his posture tense from where he’s curled up on the floor, knees against his chest—and Xie Lian shakes his head with a soft laugh, letting the after drop.

“I always knew that I was never going to get married,” He murmurs. “But I like marriage.”

The prince leans back from his work for a moment, his gaze a little far away. “It’s like...promising to keep one thing in your life with you—no matter what.”

Fu Yao makes a face, “That sounds awful.”

Xie Lian snorts, not surprised that he would feel that way.

“...I don’t know,” his fingers go still for a moment, and his eyes soften. “There’s nothing quite like being loved by someone that would never leave you.”

Everything else feels so cold, after that. So empty. Even if it’s not that kind of love, there’s...

There’s nothing like it. “...Your highness—?”

“Wedding dresses just bring up good memories for me, I guess.” He mutters, focusing once again on his work.

After all—the point of weddings is to make a partner feel loved. Wanted. Cherished. What could be more beautiful than that? He really can’t imagine.

Xie Lian’s been loved many times before. He’s been wanted by countless men and women. But rarely has he been cherished—and when he was, it was so brief.

But when he thinks of happiness—he remembers the brides he helped over the years. The excited laughter, and breathless smiles.

When he thinks back on the way Xiong Li sounded, rushing into Lan An’s arms, crying out, ‘I love you—I love you so much!’

He can't help but wonder what kind of bridal robes they might wear, and how happy the two will be if and when that day comes.

And he thinks...

Xie Lian tries not to think about it often, but sometimes—he thinks about the fact that, the last night Hong-er was alive, they had an argument.

Over Xie Lian thinking that the teenager should go, and Hong-er refusing. Because he never would have left. Not ever.

He would have spent the rest of his life following Xie Lian. And it makes sense, that he...he was buried in...

"Do you have a favorite?"

He's started out of his thoughts by the sound of Fu Yao's voice. Begrudging. "Hmm?"

"A favorite wedding dress," the deputy god mumbles.

Xie Lian's heart aches slightly.

He's not so oblivious that he can't tell when someone is trying to distract him as a kindness.

"...I did one for the wife of a student," he explains.

"You had a student?"

"Once or twice, over the centuries." Xie Lian shrugs.

"He was my first. And he...wasn't so sure about settling down and getting married." (Not unless it was to him.)

"So, I worked extra hard to sell him on the idea."

Fu Yao scoffs, shaking his head, "The poor bride..."

"She never really minded, and..." The god smiles, remembering. "When he saw her in that dress for the first time, he gasped—and you just knew, that was the moment when he fell in love with her."

"I never knew you were such a romantic." Fu Yao's voice sounds so dry. They're alone in the temple, and Xie Lian can't see, but...

He's smiling.

Sitting there like that, watching the god work, his knees pulled up against his chest. They've never gotten to speak to one another like this before—not in ages.

Even if it's under a guise like this…it's nice. "What's with the pattern?"

"Hmm?" Xie Ian hums.

Ah, right.

Flowers are traditional for bridal gowns. And this one does have those—down where the spine is going to be, trailing over the shoulders, golden petals trailing down, but…

"You mean the butterflies?"

Those aren't quite as traditional.

"I just…had them on my mind, I guess."

He would have made them silver, if that wouldn't have looked so out of place in a wedding gown.

He doesn't get to see shapes or forms that clearly—not ever. And that…that butterfly…

It was beautiful.

The process of this dress is slightly different from what he's used to. Normally, he'd fit it exactly to the bride's measurements, but, well—

You can't just make a woman's dress, and expect it to look correct on someone with a man's shape. The waist has to be cut differently, along with the shoulders—all too create an illusion of curve. Soft edges.

He creates long, draping sleeves to hide any sign of muscle. Adds a little give in the neckline, to create the illusion of a swell in the chest.

Xie Lian has no way of knowing if his face could pass for that of a bride, but with this —his body certainly won't give him away.

For the veil, the silk is woven much finer, leaving it almost translucent—with the same matching butterfly detailing around the edges.

Maybe Xie Lian couldn't use silver—but the thread he used is a reflective shade—the sort that glows like liquid gold under the light.

When he's finished, he slips behind a changing screen to try it on, pleased to find that he got the proportions correct, and it seems to sit on his body the way it should.

Just then, Nan Feng enters the main hall. "I've got our escorts, do we need the extra —?"

He starts, then falls silent. They both do, as the crown prince comes out from behind the screen, robes swishing around him gently as he walks.

"...No," Fu Yao replies, his voice somewhat hoarse. "I don't think we need it."

"Right," Nan Feng agrees faintly, "You're right."

Xie Lian lifts up his veil, glancing back and forth between the two swirling shapes of spiritual energy, raising an eyebrow. "What do you mean?"

"Nothing," Fu Yao mutters. "I can handle his hair. We don't want it up anyway, that would make him look too tall."

After all—for a man, Xie Lian isn't particularly big, but for a woman, he's taller than most.

The one problem they do run into, however, is the makeup.

Xie Lian sits perfectly still, and he's assuming the process is going well, but...

Nan Feng frowns.

"I thought makeup was supposed to make him look better? He looks worse than he did when you started."

"Would you shut up?" Fu Yao glares. "It's not like I've done this before."

"You wear eyeliner every damn day."

That makes the deputy god raise an eyebrow sharply.

"And you notice?"

Nan Feng's cheeks darken immediately, and Xie Lian sits there awkwardly, clearing his throat.

"..." Fu Yao turns back to him with a huff. "His eyeliner's fine, it's just..." He looks Xie Lian over with a grimace.

The God smiles kindly. "I'm sure it's fine."

It's not. It really, really not. Honestly, he looked fine without it, but now? He looks clownish. And Fu Yao is too proud to admit that in front of Nan Feng, but if they send him to the Ghost Groom like this...

It'll take one look under the veil and disperse from the shock.

"...Okay, maybe we can just wipe it—"

"Excuse me, sir?"

All three of them fall silent at the sound of a young girl's voice, echoing from the front of the temple.

"I...came to say I was sorry about yesterday," Xiao Ying mutters. "I realized after that you were trying to help."

Xie Lian peeks out from around Fu Yao's arm with a smile, his eyes carefully pressed shut. "It's alright—most young ladies aren't so assertive about enforcing their boundaries. It's a good thing, really."

Fu Yao wipes a hand down his face. "Stop saying 'young ladies.'"

"Why?"

"It makes you sound so old." The Deputy God grumbles.

Well. Xie Lian is old. Maybe not physically—or even mentally, he's finding the mind matures slower when immortality comes into question—but literally.

"...You're going after the groom aren't you?" Xiao Ying questions.

At first, Xie Lian is about to ask how she knows that—and then, his cheeks are going slightly pink under whatever awful pasty material Fu Yao plastered over his cheeks. "I...um, this isn't for fun or anything," he agrees. "Definitely work related!"

Fu Yao rubs his temples.

"You made that sound so suspicious…" He mutters, but…

Xiao Ying doesn't seem to think so, smiling a little awkwardly. "Well—your dress is pretty much perfect, but…I'm good with make up. I could probably make you look a little more bride like—"

"Anything is better than Fu Yao's makeup," Nan Feng agrees, ushering her forward, receiving a nasty little glare from his partner, who crosses his arms over his chest with a huff.

And to be fair—the results must be better, because when she's finished—no one complains.

Actually, Nan Feng and Fu Yao are pretty quiet for the rest of the walk outside. It's Nan Feng who steps in to lead him this time, taking the prince by the elbow, gently helping him up into the bridal sedan.

"Ready?"

Xie Lian settles back in the chair, feeling a little…odd.

"Yes, thank you."

It's not as if he's never ridden in a sedan before—he did that often when he was a little boy, sitting beside his mother during royal processions.

But as an adult man? Never. And…

Xie Lian can't remember the last time he experienced anything remotely close to being 'pampered.'

Actually, that was probably the Beauty Pageant. But he's long since repressed that memory.

"Do we know anything about how the Ghost Groom fights?" Nan Feng mumbles.

He walks close to the bridal sedan, his eyes closely surveying the forest, and Xie Lian shakes his head.

"Ling Wen didn't say much on the matter. Heaven hasn't been able to do much besides survey it's ranking."

"Ranking?" Fu Yao pipes up sharply. "You failed to mention that."

"Well, I didn't think it mattered," Xie Lian frowns, almost rubbing his cheek—then remembering that it would mess up his makeup. “Ghosts are either powerful or they’re not, right? I assumed we were dealing with the former.”

“...No,” Nan Feng groans. “That’s not how it works.”

“What were you doing all this time in the mortal realm, not to know something as basic as that?!” Fu Yao grumbles, crossing his arms.

“...Making...wedding dresses?” Xie Lian supplies awkwardly—and to his surprise, it actually does draw a snort out of the deputy god.

Nan Feng, however, seems focused on delivering the relevant information. “There are four ranks of ghost. Malice, menace, savage, and Calamities. Do you remember which one Ling Wen said?”

“...Savage,” Xie Lian replies, sending it when the deputies wince. “...Is that bad?”

“...One step short of the worst case scenario,” Fu Yao mutters.

“True, but there’s also three of us,” Nan Feng shrugs, “It should be alright...”

“You say three, but one of us is blind and doesn’t have any spiritual power.”

“Okay, two and a half—!”

Xie Lian really doesn’t imagine that this creature could be more powerful than Wen Jiao, and he was able to handle that with just himself and two human cultivators.

“You know,” he cuts them both off to end the bickering. “This bridal procession is missing something.”

“...What?”

“Two maids for the bride,” Xie Lian comments wryly.

Nan Feng practically recoils, as he typically does from all mention of “womanly” things, activities, or individuals in relation to himself—

(It’s probably a phobia at this point.)

But Fu Yao seems unbothered by it.

"Your family is too poor for maids, what a pity."

"But I thought money was no object?"

Nan Feng seems a little surprised—and almost uneasy—by how easily the two are conversing, but...

When Fu Yao replies, his tone is...mysteriously, inexplicably bitter. "Unfortunately, I don't come cheap."

Nan Feng sends him a sharp look, irritated with what comes off as unnecessary, arrogant condescension, but...

To Xie Lian, he sounds sarcastic. Maybe even...pained. HIs lips turn down into a small frown. "M—!"

Then, he falls silent.

So suddenly, that it makes Nan Feng turn his head in the prince's direction with concern. "Are you alright?"

"Does..." Xie Lian trails off, "Does anyone hear that?"

"Hear what?!"

Giggling.

Soft, high pitched—like that of a small child. "Something is out there."

"New Bride..."

The sound of that voice, playful, almost impish, makes the hairs on the back of his neck stand straight up.

"New Bride..."

Nan Feng's voice echoes outside the sedan, "What is it?!"

"New Bride in the Red Bridal Sedan..."

Xie Lian swallows dryly. "Singing."

It drifts eerily through the night, casting an uneasy tone across the scene, but...

From the reactions of everyone else, it would seem like Xie Lian is the only one meant to hear it.

“Brimming tears…past the hills…”

“Singing what?!”

“Keep your voice down!” Fu Yao snaps. “Smile not…under the veil…”

Xie Lian’s eyes narrow slightly as the voice dissolves into maniacal giggling, “…It’s telling all passing brides to cry—and never smile.”

“It could be a trick,” Fu Yao huffs, looking around him as they walk further up the mountain.

“Just don’t do either.”

Xie Lian leans his chin on his hand, thinking. It really doesn’t matter if he laughs or cries, none have ever done him much good anyway, but…

“I’ve been smiling since I heard it,” He murmurs, to which Fu Yao squawks. “Why?!”

“…Isn’t that what bait is supposed to do?” Xie Lian questions, surprised by the god’s sudden horror. “Are you alright?”

“Not when I’m surrounded by you two idiots…” Fu Yao grumbles, not seeing the way Xie Lian grimaces inside the sedan.

“There’s something else.”

“…What?”

The surrounding area—which, for Xie Lian, should have remained a consistent void—

It just got darker.

A lot darker.

“We just entered some sort of demonic array,” the god mutters. “Powerful, too.”

In fact—Xie Lian is almost startled by its strength.

It covers a much smaller area than what he saw in Gusu—but likely with greater intensity, which means…

Something is probably coming.

Xie Lian is about to warn the others, but...by then, the howling has already started.

“Wolves?! All the way out here?!”

“Not ordinary ones!”

The sedan comes to a halt before being set down abruptly, forcing Xie Lian to grip the side to steady himself on the landing.

“Just stay inside your highness!” Nan Feng snaps, his sword drawn. “We’ve got it out here!”

Xie Lian’s smile isn’t quite so fake after hearing that.

He sounds just like he used to, back when...

There’s fighting outside now, the clash of blades against beasts, snarling as the escorts that F—

Nan Feng, hired to fight them off.

It’s almost reminiscent of a different time, one that’s long since passed.

“Alright out there?”

Fu Yao snaps something in the affirmative, only to cut himself off with a groan. “Oh, hell—this is why knowing we were dealing with a Savage would have been nice!”

Xie Lian blinks owlishly, the glow of his shackles eerily visible through the curtain of the sedan. “What?”

“There are Binu incoming,” Nan Feng explains with a grunt, and Xie Lian’s lips press into a firm frown.

Well, that is rather serious.

They aren’t particularly powerful, but they’re nearly impossible to kill. “How many?”

“A...close to a hundred, maybe more!”

Xie Lian’s frown turns into a grimace.

That could mean most of the men Nan Feng hired ending up slaughtered. After all— Binu don’t kill you, they just tire you out until whatever's hunting you dives in for it's meal.

Still, the two deputy gods fight fiercely, the battle raging.

And for a moment, listening to it—Xie Lian can pretend that things haven't changed.

That he's still the spoiled child that Feng Xin needed to protect. The arrogant teenager that thought Mu Qing's pride was silly.

And in that moment, it's achingly pleasant.

To feel looked after. Protected. If only for the space of a few minutes, but...

He can see the points of darker energy squirming around in the dark, watches one as it grows closer, closer—probably a sight that has terrified many brides before him, hand reaching—

But this time, the figure waiting within the bridal sedan isn't a helpless teenage girl.

Xie Lian catches the Binu with a firm grip by the wrist, shrinking back slightly as it shoves it's way forward, his arms aching under the strain.

He took that much of a hit in Gusu?

The prince grits his teeth for a moment, closing his eyes.

It's nice sometimes, when life gives you the chance to relive memories. But that's all they are—and it's time to stop playing pretend.

He's too old for that now.

"Ruoye," he whispers gently, feeling an attentive nuzzle.

"Strangle them."

He couldn't explain it to anyone if he tried, but...he felt reluctant before, about using the tool in front of Nan Feng and Fu Yao, particularly the former.

The silk band slips out of the bridal sedan, then attacks with the ferocity of a whip.

CRACK!

Xie Lian sits back on the cushion of the sedan, listening as the spiritual weapon beats the horde back—at least enough to allow the mortals traveling with them to regroup.

“I thought—I thought you couldn’t use heavenly arms!” Fu Yao sputters, and Xie Lian smiles half heartedly.

“There are always exceptions.”

After all, Ruoye isn’t a heavenly device at all—and Xie Lian doesn’t need spiritual power to use it, because...

He closes his eyes, the inside of the bridal sedan going dark once more. “You two should take the escorts and go.”

Nan Feng recoils.

“Are you kidding?! You think we’re just going to leave you alone out here?!”

“...They can’t hurt me,” Xie Lian mumbles under his breath, his tone far away. “What?” Fu Yao questions sharply, and the prince sighs.

“If you stay with the bridal sedan, they’ll just keep coming.”

Xie Lian mutters, listening as Ruoye continues to beat the creatures back. “If you take the others now, we can regroup.”

Fu Yao doesn’t seem willing to protest, but Nan Feng is silent, eyes wide as he watches Ruoye move through the dark, because it looks so much like...

The silk bandage the prince used to wear over his eyes, back when... “Xie Lian.”

The sound of his name being spoken—something he hasn’t heard in centuries—and with such familiarity, makes the God’s heart squeeze in response.

“What is that thing?” He doesn’t answer.

The silence is what worries the deputy god the most, his head whipping around to face the sedan as he raises his voice, “WHAT IS —?”

A palm presses against his chest. For once, not in an aggressive shove. Just resting there.

When he looks down, Fu Yao is staring up at him.

“Leave it.” No snide tone. Definitely not mocking him. “He has protection. It’ll be easier to help him if we take the mortals back first.”

Nan Feng grits his teeth, glancing back at the sedan, his eyes pained. “...He’ll be by himself.”

Oh.

Xie Lian’s chest aches with remorse.

Back then...he really had been so certain that sending his friend away was the best thing, but now...

How many years of guilt has he been forced to live with? “...It’s okay,” Xie Lian reassures him softly, “I’ll be fine.”

‘I’m always by myself.’

“I’ll just wait for the groom.”

Fu Yao doesn’t wait for much more encouragement than that, walking away without another word, and Nan Feng, after a long, reluctant moment...

He huffs out a groan, balling his hands up into fists, “Men—follow me!”

And then, Xie Lian really is alone again, sitting in the dark.

The clearing grows quiet, only the wind moving through the trees in a quiet hush, Ruoye slinking back to him now that the enemy has been dealt with, wrapping back around his throat.

Xie Lian winces, and the bandage trembles apologetically.

“Oh, no...” He shushes it. “It’s not you,” he murmurs, stroking the side of his neck until the bandage relaxes, snuggling up to him more comfortably. “Just sore.”

It’s understandable that Ruoye might think it was it’s own fault—after all, Xie Lian’s rarely ever in pain. Physically, anyway.

But right now...

Xie Lian’s been struggling today. And at first, he couldn’t have told you why.

Maybe it was because he wasn't expecting to ascend again, particularly not when he did. He hadn't been braced for it, and...

This time, standing in the streets of Heaven... Xie Lian felt so lost, exposed, and...alone.

He knows what to expect from humans now. Even at it's very worst, he knows he can handle the mortal realm.

But being in the Heavenly Capital—all it did was remind him of what he doesn't have anymore.

Being around Nan Feng and Fu Yao—it feels good, reminds him of what it's like, not being alone. Reminds him of how happy he was, back then.

Back when he thought he had it all, but that wasn't true.

Because it was before he met Hong-er, so he couldn't have had everything.

Being with them, feeling that friendship again, it made him happy—because sometimes life gives things back. Lets you relive things. Gives you second chances, but...

Xie Lian's fingers drift up to the chain around his neck, his lips trembling. Some things don't come back to you.

"..." He takes a deep breath. Now isn't the time to start feeling sorry for himself, he's just...tired. He—

There's a rush of wind through the clearing, ruffling the curtains of the bridal sedan— and with it, Xie Lian can hear the leaves and grass stirring in response.

Clink!

It's that sound from before, Xie Lian still remembers it so clearly, but...

He leans back slightly, curling his legs closer inside the sedan, trying to catch sight of it again, and—

When he does, his breath halts in his throat.

A silver butterfly, coming through the darkness.

Xie Lian follows it’s path with his eyes, watching as it’s wings flap in an easy, lazy pattern—but instead of landing on him, this time it drifts right past, the tips of it’s wings stirring the air next to his cheek.

But—

Clink!

That noise—

Clink!

It isn’t the butterfly.

It’s—

Footsteps.

Slow, easy footsteps, almost mimicking the butterfly’s pace, but…

Xie Lian swallows hard, fighting the urge to breathe too quickly, or indicate some sort of reaction.

There’s no other heartbeat in the clearing with him. No one else breathing at all.

His hands ball up into nervous fists in his lap, and he whispers into the dark—

“Who’s there?”

His tone is a little breathier than he meant for it to be, wavering slightly, and—

There’s a chuckle in response. Soft, low in a way that rumbles in the pit of the god’s stomach.

And…bittersweet somehow, even if Xie Lian has no idea why.

There’s a stir in front of him, like someone reaching underneath the curtain, but… unlike before, when Xie Lian looks up—he doesn’t see this ugly point of darkness in the night. No menacing cloud of resentment.

When Xie Lian looks in front of him, he sees—a sea of crimson aura, one that stretches as far as his eyes can see, drifting around him in a soft, ambient glow, and, for the first time in eight centuries…

Xie Lian doesn’t see any darkness at all. Just crimson.

And in the center of all of that, directly in front of him, is this shimmering silver light, not so different from the shade of the butterfly that came before it, but this…it’s…

Almost reminiscent of a ghost fire.

The Ghost Takes a Bride

Chapter Summary

Someone catches him.

Xie Lian finds himself clinging to that hand, his face...It's pressed into the front of someone's robe's against their chest—solid, but no heartbeat underneath his cheek to indicate some sign of life, but—

There's another hand, feather light as it cups the back of his head—stroking his hair. Xie Lian sucks in a shuddering breath, and when he does—he's hit with the smell of the forest.

Fresh, clean, but with a slight wildness to it that makes his heart age with memory, like a glass on the edge of shattering—

'You're in a forest,' the god scolds himself silently. 'Of course it smells like him.'

Chapter Notes

You can find me on twitter and keep up with current updates of the story HERE

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The prince's heart slams against his ribs uncertainly. This...

Something in Xie Lian's heart tells him with ringing certainty—this isn't the ghost groom. And that should frighten him, given the daunting amount of power swirling around him, but...

Xie Lian isn't afraid. The pounding of his heart—it isn't from fear.

He doesn't know what this feeling is, when he reaches out—jumping slightly when he feels a palm underneath his. Larger fingers gently enveloping his own, skin ice cold.

There's something wrapped around the stranger's ring finger, Xie Lian can feel that—

A silk string.

Reminiscent of the threads he's worked with countless times.

His palm is rougher than Xie Lian's—somewhat calloused around the thumb and the inside of his index finger—

A sword wielder then. Likely sabers.

Xie Lian couldn't tell you why he can barely breathe.

He couldn't explain the sudden rush of goosebumps, starting at the back of his neck, then rushing all the way down his arms, creeping over his scalp as he lets out a full body shiver.

But it isn't fear.

Even as that hand starts to gently pull him from the sedan…there's no fear

He doesn't even make an attempt to resist, allowing himself to be guided forward— until his foot catches against the lip of the step down, making him stumble forward, bracing himself, but—

Someone catches him.

Xie Lian finds himself clinging to that hand, his face…

It's pressed into the front of someone's robe's against their chest—solid, but no heartbeat underneath his cheek to indicate some sign of life, but—

There's another hand, feather light as it cups the back of his head—stroking his hair.

Xie Lian sucks in a shuddering breath, and when he does—

He's hit with the smell of the forest.

Fresh, clean, but with a slight wildness to it that makes his heart age with memory, like a glass on the edge of shattering—

'You're in a forest,' the god scolds himself silently. 'Of course it smells like him.'

Finally, he has the sense to straighten to his feet once more, and…

Xie Lian can't remember the last time someone guided him with such care. One hand on his elbow, the other on the small of his back.

The grip on him is gentle—but there's never even a possibility of him falling. And even if there was—

The forest floor is surprisingly smooth, devoid of any rocks or tree roots to stumble upon.

(He doesn't see the way the very earth itself shrinks under a crimson tinted gaze.)

Whatever this figure might want, whatever it's intentions are—Xie Lian finds himself too shaken, almost spellbound at the moment to give the mater deeper thought—

He simply guides Xie Lian down the forest path, silver bells gently marking out their pace in the night.

Clink!

Something about the sound of silver bells makes his heart ache, like a muscle left pleasantly sore.

Reminds him of a parent ringing a chime near the front gate, calling a child home.

His pace is slow, but certain—and instinctively, Xie Lian knows this creature is ancient.

Maybe as old as him. But—

There's a boyish lilt to his gait, a lightness that makes him seem younger than that.

Xie Lian's fingers tighten almost imperceptibly, and he shivers when he feels that ice- like hand grip him closer in response.

'Who are you?'

Could he be the groom? Xie Lian doesn't think so.

If he was, he wouldn't need a horde of wolves or Binu to steal a bride away. His aura is so potent, he makes Wen Jiao look like a gnat. Even the light of the heavens seems dull now, compared to this sea of ruby-tinged light.

Butterflies occasionally slip past their ankles, lighting the way ahead.

Xie Lian's veil rustles slightly when he twists his head around to watch them, a soft smile on his lips.

He doesn't feel the gaze that's watching him. Too swept up to feel the overwhelming weight of it.

And even if he wasn't so powerful—Xie Lian has the sense that any bride would go with this young man willingly.

He may not be able to see his face, but....he doesn't need to, to know that whatever mask this figure wears must be rather attractive.

So no, this isn't the groom.

But then...why did he come for the bride?

Xie Lian jumps a little when he senses movement to his left, only to hear the soft rustling of something being opened up and lifted over his head, the quiet patter of drops falling down.

Is it...raining?

It doesn't smell like rain.

Near him, it does. When he turns his head into the arm of the stranger beside him, he smells forest and rain and the end of summer—

But ahead of him, in that crimson haze, he smells iron.

Still—not a single drop of it touches him. Doesn't even brush against his slippers.

The wolves from before seem to cringe away as they approach—and when Xie Lian feels the array intensify, as if they're reaching the center of it—

There's a sharp crunch underneath the young man's boot, and any darkness that remains dissipates.

Xie Lian's breath catches.

That array wasn't as powerful as the one in Gusu—but clearly made from some form of bone remains.

Old, powerful magic—not easily broken. And...

He could really do that with just the weight of his foot?

Xie Lian never thought of himself as someone that was drawn to power before.

He never needed to be. From the moment Xie Lian was born, he was strong. It wasn't until he was older that he learned what it felt like to be weak.

But he's always been attracted to strength. At first, because he craved an equal. And later, when he became weak…

There were quiet, shameful moments when Xie Lian would pray for someone to save him.

Never once did he ever receive an answer.

It feels like they're descending the mountainside now, and Xie Lian knows he should be thinking about where the ghost might be taking him, but…

All he can remember now, with an amused little smile, is something that he used to say, because when he was someone else.

The easiest way to segment memories is to put them behind you, and pretend they happened to someone else.

It isn't sad, remembering things that way.

There was a general once, who used to tell stories to a little girl in front of a campfire. Whispering tales and singing songs until she fell asleep, safe, if only for another night.

But one story was always her favorite—

That of the Bridegroom.

A tale of wishful thinking on Xie Lian's part. Desperately wishing to pretend that something wasn't lost forever. That something he loved so dearly wasn't truly lost. That it could come back, one day.

But that was just wishful pretending, and now…Xie Lian feels… Hope.

The most stubborn emotion there is. The one that has caused him the most pain, over such a long life.

He smells like him. He—the way he's guiding him. The way Xie Lian's heart is beating, in a way he never thought it would again—

There's a desperate, irrational spark of hope.

They come to a stop at the foot of the mountain, the umbrella being pulled just once more, and…

Xie Lian's fingers are trembling.

The hand holding them tightens reassuringly, and that hope only builds. Smoldering, like a long forgotten ember flickering back to life.

The young man turns, as if to face him—and when Xie Lian feels another hand lifting up his bridal veil, he makes no move to stop it.

Anyone else, in any other moment—and he may have. But not now.

Ice cold fingertips brush against his cheek, then his jaw. Xie Lian can't breathe. He's forgotten how.

The only thing he can do now, is the only thing that he's ever done.

Whisper that word, that question, that prayer—into the swirling unknown all around him. Just one word—and yet somehow, saying it feels like begging.

"…Hong-er?"

Fate is cruel.

Fairytales are often sadistic by nature.

Because if Xie Lian could have seen the young man's face, he would have known.

In a moment, without him having to say another word, the prince would have known. Because his expression is one of utter agony.

Fighting. Fighting so hard, that Xie Lian can see that aura around him tremble and twist, but he doesn't understand why. It's not a ghost fire. It has a body.

Xie Lian heard him laugh before.

He can speak, he just—

He just won't.

That's what he thinks, anyway.

He doesn't know that the ghost before him is straining until blood bubbles up in the back of his throat, nearly ripping his entire spirit apart, just trying to say one word. Just one .

‘Yes.’

And he’s forced to watch now, as the hope in Xie Lian’s eyes slowly dies.

Hong-er would answer him. Xie Lian knows that.

He’s gone through every method to contact him in this life and the next—and if Hong-er was here, if he was really, physically here—

He would answer. Xie Lian knows that he would.

And after going so long feeling hopeless—feeling it again, that rising rush of euphoria, only to come crashing back down—

Xie Lian has tears in his eyes.

He feels raw, open, and vulnerable.

So lost, and—and—

The hand that pushed up his veil drifts down now, reaching for…

The chain around Xie Lian’s neck.

The god’s eyes narrow sharply, and his reaction is instant.

First, he bats that hand out of the way, and without even needing to say a word, Ruoye lashes out.

But it never actually lands on anything solid.

In that moment, the sea of crimson around him explodes in a flash of light, making Xie Lian cringe with surprise, wrapping his arms around his head for cover, but—

There’s no pain. No violent force. Just a soft rush of wind, and the fluttering of… He peeks one eye open.

There isn’t just one or two butterflies now—

Xie Lian is surrounded by them.

Their wings gently brushing against his skin as they swoop up into the air, floating high up into the sky before disappearing in a rush.

Tears slip down his cheeks, his face illuminated in a silver glow as he tips his head back, the veil slipping the rest of the way off of his head.

His breaths are shaky and deep, gulping in the cool night air. It’s been eight centuries since Xie Lian saw the stars.

This is the closest that he’s come to seeing them again since. If only it didn’t feel so…so…

(It hurts.)

He clutches the ring around his neck, fighting to steady his breath, but then Xie Lian notices something:

The aching in his throat is gone.

Even when he reaches under the sleeves of his dress, probing at the bandages on his arms…

Those cuts have disappeared.

But how on earth…?

Clink!

He whips his head around, all too familiar with the sound now, and once again— A butterfly leads the way through the dark.

Whatever that person was—he wasn’t the ghost groom. And he—

Xie Lian gulps, forcing himself to calm down, clutching the chain around his neck even tighter.

He wasn’t Hong-er either.

But he led Xie Lian down the mountain safely, and now…

It’s like he’s trying to guide him.

Slowly, the prince starts to follow it down the path, and when he reaches the destination…

Xie Lian presses his hand against the temple door, making a face when he feels the name on the entrance plaque.

“If I ever see another Ming Guang temple after this…” He mutters. It’ll be too soon.

He probably should feel bad for the general at this point, but he can't seem to bring himself to.

The first thing that hits him is the heavy, dark aura—toxic to mortals, and...

Now this—this is the lair of a savage ghost.

Xie Lian finds the missing brides.

There's a private room in Ghost City, far within the depths of Paradise Manor, that only two ghosts are allowed to enter.

The first, being the Ghost King, Crimson Rain Sought Flower.

And the second being the one who, by now, has known him longer than almost anyone.

Autumn Twilight Shrouding Forests, the savage ghost Ren Song.

But that was a name mortals gave him only recently, after the death of his elder brother.

To Hua Cheng, he's still barely more than the child he found eight centuries ago, crying on the mountainside—

Shuo.

He stands outside of that door now, listening.

Ghost Kings don't weep. That comes before. Shuo knows.

They howl.

That's what he hears on the other side of that door now.

Anguished howling. The sounds of crashing and breaking. Rage, grief, and sadness.

A trapped animal.

Shuo has stood before this door many times. Often as a small child, a stuffed animal dangling from one hand, the other clutching his older brother’s hand.

Yanlin on the other side of them, staring at the lock resentfully.

Keeping them outside, rarely letting them in.

Now, Shuo is the only one left standing, a lonely figure at the end of a long hallway.

This was the room where Yanlin explained her little habit of spreading rumors, the one that led to Hua Cheng earning the title of Crimson Rain Sought Flower.

This was the place where the ghost king brought Shuo and his siblings, when Xiang and Fai died.

Bao never cried, only sat to the side and leaned against the Ghost King’s arm. Yanlin wept the loudest, and Shuo…

He cried silently, for the first time struck by…

Real loss.

Shuo and his brother died on the same day. Bao was beside him, when he woke up on the fields of Mount Tonglu.

Even when Lang Ying took them, and they were separated—when Shuo cried out for help—

A god brought his brother back to him.

It was only then, when that same god was saying that there was nothing that he could do to save the men who helped raise him, that Shuo realized what grief felt like.

He stayed awake the longest that night, longer than even Hua Cheng, watching the naked sadness on his face.

And it was that night, when Shuo heard something that he never told anyone. Not Yanlin, not Bao, not in the centuries that followed.

He never even asked Hua Cheng what it meant. Knew better than to do that. The ghost king never sleeps in front of anyone else for a reason.

Shuo heard him whisper a name with a softness that he had never heard from Hua Cheng before, and has never heard from him since.

An aching longing that ran so deep, it frightened the boy. He couldn't understand it.

"Xie Lian."

And now, the ghost knows why.

He thinks he does.

He stands there quietly, waiting until the crashing and the snarling reaches a more manageable volume.

Everyone else has fled paradise manor in a quiet hush. Even Yin Yu has taken to patrolling the city, rather than seeing this.

It takes time, but the roar dulls to a growl.

Shuo isn't afraid of Hua Cheng, and he never has been.

He owes the spirit his life, and if he ever decides to take it—Shuo will accept it.

He lifts his hand, and he knocks, hearing an angry, almost animalistic snarl in response.

The ghost sighs.

"Gege, it's me."

The menacing aura doesn't exactly lesson, but…

Shuo opens the door nonetheless, not surprised to find that the lock has been broken.

What waits inside is a swirling disaster of magic. So potent, it would stop the heart of any mortal that stepped inside.

Hua Cheng glances back over his shoulder, eyes burning red in the candlelight, looking Shuo over with barely coherent annoyance.

He's half-mad with grief, Shuo can see it.

Violent bursts of energy shatter the items and furniture in the room, only to bind them back together.

Angry red sparks fill the air as the space around him shatters then rebuilds, over and over, in a bitter, self-destructive cycle.

"Why are you wearing that form?"

Most ghosts can't change their appearances—not effectively.

Only Hua Cheng and He Xuan can do so flawlessly.

But Ren Song has been practicing, and while he isn't flawless, he's gotten rather good at it.

Now, he looks like a boy of only eight years old, with dark hair and grey eyes, watching Hua Cheng with a solemn expression.

Not so different from the child he found on Mount Tonglu.

"I thought it made you less likely to incinerate me," the boy replies easily, rocking on his heels.

He knows how to deal with Hua Cheng by now. Know that the ghost king won't allow comfort—will lash out with ferocity at any attempt.

"If you were that concerned, why knock?"

Shuo doesn't offer him kind words, he knows that they mean nothing to Hua Cheng. Instead, he gives him something else, something that he craves.

Knowledge, a sense of control over the situation.

That's how you comfort Hua Cheng.

"You were right—Qi Rong was behind the scheme." His eyes flash slightly in the dark, and Shuo continues, "It was his array. I'm sure you realized that when you saw the trees."

Of course he did, and the fact that Xie Lian almost saw that... Hua Cheng grits his teeth, turning away once more.

"Was he dealt with?"

"Mostly," Shuo murmurs. He speaks with such calm confidence, even in a child's form, clasping his hands behind his back—as he's seen Hua Cheng do many times before. "After you destroyed the array, I went to his location—I seriously damaged him, but he fled to escape capture."

That makes sense.

Aside from Hua Cheng, Qi Rong has little reason to fear the other ghosts of the underworld. He's ancient and powerful in his own right—and Blackwater is hardly involved enough in ghostly matters to be a threat.

But he does fear Ren Song, as he should.

After he dispersed Bao, Shuo's resentment increased suddenly, with a burning level of power—and when it did, it was with one intent—

Vengeance.

But Shuo has never killed Qi Rong, even though he's had the opportunity to do so many times, and Hua Cheng has given his permission.

Shuo plays with him. Like a cat that relishes in taunting it's meal, batting an angry rat between it's paws.

And his magic was developed with one thing in mind:

Torturing a ghost that desperately wants to escape his own inferiority.

Naturally, Qi Rong flees on sight.

Shuo bows his head in apology. "My array wasn't as effective as usual. It won't happen again."

Hua Cheng doesn't respond to that immediately, wrapping his arms around himself.

He knows it was his own fault. That he was too distracted by Xie Lian to focus on surprising his aura.

It was overpowering the entire area. The fact that Ren Song could even cast the spell was impressive, but it had no chance of working effectively, even when Hua Cheng crushed Qi Rong's magic on the way down the mountain.

"Do you know his level of involvement?"

"He increased the power level of the ghost in question," Shuo shrugs. "Apparently she's been relatively irrelevant up until now."

Hua Cheng's arms tighten around himself, and he still doesn't look back at the boy. "You don't sound like a fan."

"I'm not," the boy admits.

Instead of explaining any further, he simply asks, “Would you like me or Yin Yu to monitor the prince?”

“...No,” Hua Cheng mutters, fiddling with something in his hair. “That won’t be necessary.”

There’s a butterfly tailing him now, Hua Cheng knows exactly where he is.

“Focus on finding Qi Rong again,” the ghost king orders, “Yin Yu has his own assignments.”

Shuo bows his head quietly in agreement, and...there’s so much he wants to ask, so much that’s gnawing at him, but...

He knows his place. “Yes, Hua Chengzhu.”

He leaves the room, shutting the door without another word. There’s no more snarling and howling now—just the quiet out of Hua Cheng quietly self destructing then reconstructing, over and over again, in the confines of that room.

Now, Shuo switches into a new skin.

His body grows as he walks down the halls of Paradise Manor, stretching with each step until he’s the size of a teenager, hair pulled up in a high ponytail, with a slide curl to it’s texture.

His robes are black, trimmed with emerald thread. He carries no sword—he never has.

There are two leather holsters on each of his thighs, each holding a dagger, but no one has ever seen them drawn.

Only two ghosts in the underworld wear armor—their Kings, Hua Cheng and He Xuan. One with silver vambraces, the other with golden scaled mail.

Qi Rong pretends.

He has this ridiculous breastplate cobbled together from the finest mortal metals that he covers in paint, and calls it a spiritual device.

Shuo has taken great delight in breaking it several times over, watching the ghost have a new set made and insist, this time, that it’s real.

But very few things in the Ghost Realm ever are.

In all honesty—Shuo was raised by a Ghost King, but he couldn't tell you if he had ever actually seen Hua Cheng's face.

Even now, the mask Shuo wears isn't his own—it's that of Autumn Twilight Shrouding Forests.

The savage ghost Ren Song is known for many things. Androgyny, illusion, and fear— but two features always remain the same.

The first, being his eyes. One a deep, pine green—the other burning like a forest set aflame.

And the second, being the choker that sits around his neck.

The metal is black, with an emerald set in the face—made from hell-burned steel and gemstone, and...the ashes are his own.

He asked Hua Cheng that once. If his ashes were somewhere safe. His answer always baffled Shuo.

That if the place where he hid them was destroyed... He wouldn't need to exist anymore.

Ren Song can't imagine that. He's never felt safer than he does with his ashes against his own skin.

When he steps into the streets—he catches ghosts stopping and staring, like they want to ask.

Everyone heard the initial roar, after all.

But there's a distance between the protégé of Crimson Rain Sought Flower and the citizens of Ghost City. A barrier they know better than to cross.

"What are you staring at?" He questions coldly, raising one eyebrow.

No one can keep eye contact for long.

Shuo keeps walking.

Only Yin Yu stops him before he reaches the city gates, resting a hand against the ghost's arm. "Did he say much to you?"

Ren Song stares at him quietly, slightly less hostile—but he shakes his head. “I would leave him alone. Actually—I’d expect him to be gone again soon.”

Because now, he knows who Xie Lian is. And the reason for Hua Cheng searching for this long—it seems somewhat obvious now.

So, he won’t stay away for long.

Yin Yu seems exhausted by the prospect. “…With the ghost festival coming up?”

Ren Song is almost sympathetic.

“I’m off on assignment now, so you’ll be doing all of that by yourself.”

Yin Yu presses his face into his hands, and he probably won’t lift his head again until he finds a pillow to scream into, knowing him.

He definitely isn’t getting the raise this year, that’s obvious.

Shuo slips out of the gates to the city, making his way to the closest forest. Hua Cheng has his domain, Blackwater has his.

Ren Song’s is the smallest, not comparable to a calamity—but quite substantial, for a ghost of his rank.

He presses a palm against a nearby evergreen, eyes burning unnaturally bright in the dark.

The forest trembles, ancient wood groaning and creaking until, eventually, it forms a path.

Eventually, if Ren Song follows long enough, he’ll find his target.

The trees swallow the path behind him as he walks forward, and the track is set.

Back in Paradise Manor, Hua Cheng hasn’t moved since the boy left.

His eyes staring at one thing.

The mirror.

Constantly cracking and reforming, over and over again.

Each time it does, there’s a new face looking back at him.

His true form. The skin he wore for Qin Meirong. The face of Hua Bolin, the one that the Shi brothers knew.

The Bestial Form he took on while fighting in Mount Tonglu.

The middle aged face he once showed Jiang Chi.

He gave himself the name Zhang Wei, back then.

When he sees the white mask of Wu Ming, the mirror shatters a little more violently as the ghost curls in on himself, hands in his hair.

Eight hundred years.

After eight hundred years, Hua Cheng thought...

He had some delusional hope that, with how vast his strength had become, he could break through. That he'd be able to answer.

But he was a fool. An arrogant, hopeful fool. And he made his love cry again.

Hua Cheng trembles, tearing at his hair. Useless. He's so fucking—!

He screams again, rage erupting from him as he throws his head back, feeling as though he could breathe fire.

And he actually does, leaving a burning hole in the ceiling, one that quickly disappears under his glare, only small swirls of smoke remaining.

When he looks back to the mirror again, a familiar face stares back at him.

Small, filthy, and hateful.

Hong-er.

His arms tighten around his knees as he glares at the glass, spiritual power crackling angrily around him.

"I hate you," he growls, nails clawing at his shins.

He never realized that it was possible to be jealous of yourself. Of a past version of you, one that had the things you crave so badly now.

Because that's the face Xie Lian misses. That's the name he calls out to.

And Hua Cheng has been robbed of his name for so long…

It almost feels like someone else. Like the person Xie Lian is mourning for isn't him.

Hua Cheng knows his past, aches from it, but it's also been stripped away from him, leaving him incapable of taking it back.

What is he supposed to do, now?

Before, he always knew.

It was always about getting back to his god. Protecting him. Hua Cheng knows he's more than capable of doing that now, but…

He presses his face against his knees, and he hears Zhao Beitong's voice, from all those years ago:

'You're still mourning the life you could have had.'

Maybe that's true, because now, Hua Cheng is realizing—

He can return to Xie Lian's side now, but…at least for the time being, he can't do so as Hong-er.

He managed that before, as Wu Ming. But Xie Lian's needs were different then. The ghost fit into his revenge plans easily.

But how could he justify showing up as Hua Cheng?

He always assumed that, if Xie Lian knew who he was—he would accept him as he is now.

But he doesn't know, and—

And that means that he'll have to find another way to get close. To fit himself back into Xie Lian's life.

To make the prince care for him again, if that's even possible. Eventually, he'll find a way to break the curse, but until then…

The ghost clenches his teeth, forcing himself to sharpen his emotions—to stop feeling sorry for himself, making them into something useful.

His gaze drifts back to the mirror once more.

He picks a new face for himself. Flickering through countless options. Different ages, genders, varying degrees of beauty.

Not that Xie Lian can see them for now, but—he will, one day.

Hua Cheng presses his palm against the glass.

His breathing steadies, and his gaze slowly becomes determined.

He knows what he's going to do next. The goal hasn't changed, just the method.

He's going to make his way back to Xie Lian's side. Even if the prince doesn't know that Hua Cheng is protecting him.

When did he become so weak?

He settles on a new face, his eyes narrowed as he stares at himself, palms pressed against the mirror.

Hua Cheng has never expected anything from his god. Has never prayed with the expectation or need that someone would answer.

That was never why he worshipped before. And that hasn't changed now.

Even if he can't have everything he wants from his god, even if he only manages to find a way to stand beside him, or even just close to him—

That's enough of a reason to linger on in this world. Always.

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

All art is included with permission from the artists, do not reproduce or use for any reason.

Autumn Twilight Shrouding Forests / Ren Song / Shuo (Spotify Playlist HERE)

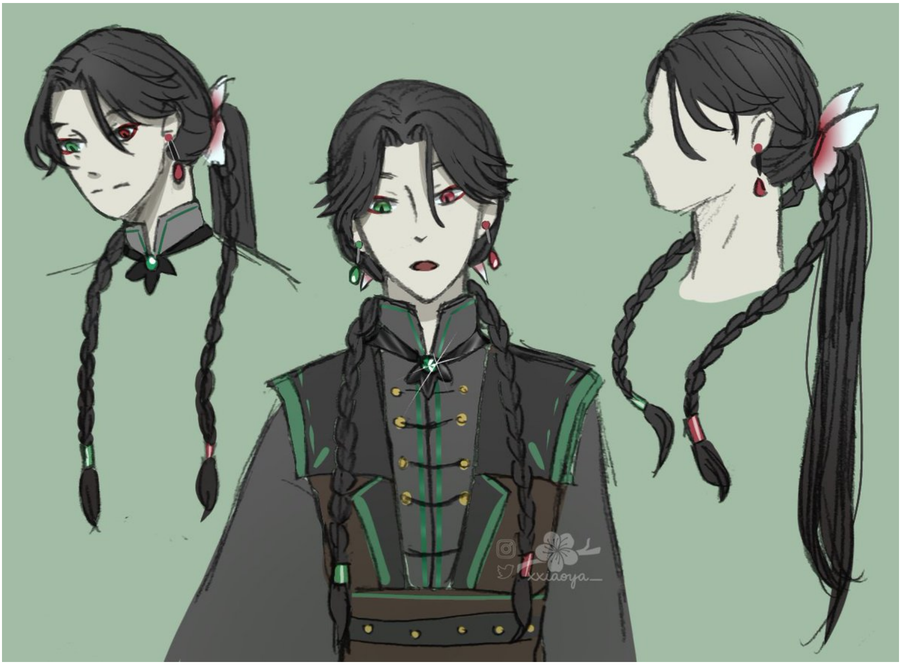
[image]

CREDIT: LACE



CREDIT: PRI

Chapter End Notes

Thank you so much to Lace and Pri for their amazing artwork, and allowing me to share it! I'm so grateful!

And a happy new year to all of you, I thought it best to ring it in with a hualian reunion nearly 300k words in the making! Thank you all so much for hanging in there this long!

xoxo, Evie

Look At Me

Chapter Summary

> "Does this have something to do with what you said about knowing more about the groom's identity?" Nan Feng questions, and the god nods.
>
> "I already told Fu Yao about this before, but...I've spent a lot of time around weddings in the past," he explains.
>
> "And this is all so targeted towards Ming Guang...after all, we heard before—all of his temples in the area have been burned down besides this one, which was sitting behind a magical barrier, and the ghost's behavior...jealous, vindictive, possessive... it's much more like..."
>
> Shrieking echoes down the hill, and it's clear—the fighting has already begun. "...A bride."

Chapter Notes

> You can find me on twitter and keep up with current updates of the story HERE

On Mount Yu Jun, Xie Lian is experiencing growing exasperation, his arms crossed over his chest as he deals with a crowd of conflicted, angry men.

"Wh—What do you MEAN you're a man?!" One of them moans, kneeling down and clutching his head.

"I'm sorry," Xie Lian replies dryly.

"I can see that this experience has clearly been a revelation for you."

"I-It hasn't!" The man sputters, leaping to his feet. "I'm fine! I-I was just confused, that's all! You look just like a—"

"Delicate featured man in a dress?"

"NO!"

He wails, "No, you're clearly in disguise, it wasn't my fault!"

That might be the case, but Xie Lian isn't in the mood to comfort someone that is horrified and disgusted over being attracted to him. "In any case, all of you need to leave."

He steps in front of Xiao Ying protectively, crossing his arms.

The young woman followed them to the shrine to make sure they were alright—only to catch the ire of the men who were after the bounty on the ghost groom to begin with.

"This place isn't safe for any of you."

"You're just trying to scare us off so you can get the bounty for yourself!" One of the men snaps. "You expect us to believe a word you say?!"

"Besides, that brat is working with the ghost groom—everyone knows it! That's why she always gets in the way!"

"I'm not!"

Xiao Ying clings to the back of Xie Lian's dress pleadingly, "I swear I'm not!"

"She's always helping that little FREAK that lives on the mountain! He's probably the groom!"

Xie Lian highly doubts that. Just from what Nan Feng said—the Ghost Groom wouldn't leave a witness.

"I doubt a ghost with such blood thirst has any plan on socializing with humans," Xie Lian shakes his head, his voice firm. "In any case, I already encountered the ghost, and it's a black fog. Nothing like you described."

"How would you even know?" One of them sneers. "It's not like you can see it!"

"I'm a Taoist," Xie Lian shrugs. "I can sense demonic energy, and there isn't any coming from her, and what attacked me before didn't take a form that matches your description. Now, please—"

"You really think we're just gonna!"

BOOM!

There's the sound of a nearby tree cracking by the trunk, and Xie Lian smiles.

Ah, Nan Feng and Fu Yao have caught up.

“Are you serious?” Fu Yao sighs, staring at the now deceased cedar, rubbing the side of his neck. “Do you always have to do that?”

Nan Feng frowns. “What?”

“Every time,” Fu Yao grumbles, and Xie Lian raises an eyebrow, “Every time we go on assignment, you always have to find an excuse to smash a tree to show everyone what a big strong man you are.”

Do the work together often?

Xie Lian’s glad to hear that, actually. “I do not!”

“Yes, you do!” Fu Yao throws his hands up, rounding on him. “And it’s always a tree! At LEAST up the ante and smash a wall or something? You’re like a guy that only knows how to do missionary!”

Missionary? Is that a martial art style? Xie Lian hasn’t heard of it.

“Trees are just usually available?!” Nan Feng glares, defensive, “Why do you care so much?!”

“Because,” Fu Yao half yells, half whispers, clutching his temples with frustration. “You literally crushed a tree in front of the same group of guys yesterday !”

Well—he has a point.

“They already know you can crush a tree!” Fu Yao huffs, “Leave the local flora alone!”

“ Fine! ” Nan Feng grits his teeth, leaning over him with a huff, “I’ll just split YOU in half next time!”

Xie Lian is just waiting for them to get it all out, twiddling his thumbs.

He notices they get oddly quiet for a moment, but he can’t see the way Nan Feng’s anger fades into clear embarrassment, his face going red all the way up to his ears, and Fu Yao goes from blinking with astonishment to...

Looking like the cat that’s caught the canary.

"I'd probably handle it better than the tree," he comments airily, and the color of Nan Feng's cheeks darkens even further.

He's literally been begging him to shut up inside the private communication array for the last thirty seconds, at least. Well.

Demanding more than begging

But after a few seconds of Fu Yao snickering at his expense, he's had enough. To the men watching, it looks like they're just glaring at each other.

Xie Lian presumes they might be having a stare down, they used to do that often. And arm wrestling.

Feng Xin always won, so Mu Qing got irritated and suggested seeing who could hold their breath the longest—but Xie Lian had to put a stop to that when the servant cheated by breathing through his nose, cackling when the prince's bodyguard fainted during a feast.

So, he assumes it's probably just something like that, and it's better just to let them get it out instead of getting in the middle. If he does, they'll just snap and yell all night —and at the moment, they aren't saying anything too hurtful.

What he does not know, is that Fu Yao's smirk is slowly fading, turning into a horrified, scandalized blush, while Nan Feng makes strong eye contact with him.

But even if he did, it wouldn't make sense, because, y'know— Private Communication Arrays and all that.

And it's while the two of them are thoroughly distracted that one of the men in the crowd cries out,

"Hey, look! I see the little monster! He's hiding in the bushes!"

"Leave him alone!" Xiao Ying cries out, trying to grab their leader by the arm—only to get shoved aside.

Xie Lian manages to catch her before she hits the ground, and he hears the sound of footsteps—probably the young man they've been referring to—fleeing back into the woods, and the men from the village charging after him.

And then he remembers...that's where they...

The man who pretended to be the ghost groom...when they were walking...the smell of blood, and the array, it—

“Wait!” Xie Lian cries out, “Don’t go in there!”

But...it’s already too late.

Nan Feng clears his throat, “Is something wrong, your highness? Didn’t you come that way?”

Xie Lian opens his mouth to explain, but—then he hears the men who just took off start shrieking, and what they’re saying—

“Oh god, get back! There are bodies!”

“Hanging in the trees!”

—it makes his blood run cold.

“All the blood is coming down!”

Oh.

A violent shiver runs down Xie Lian’s spine as he fumbles for his hand, grasping it tightly to stop it from shaking.

He—

Hanging bodies—

A heavy, warm hand lands on his shoulder, steadying him, and Xie Lian lets out a shaky breath.

“I’m alright, Nan Feng,” he mutters. “Thank you.”

The Deputy god nods, looking over Xie Lian’s shoulder and into the forest. “...The Night Touring Green Lantern,” he mutters, shaking his head. “Is he allied to the ghost groom, you think? That could be a problem.”

Xie Lian tilts his head curiously. “What are you talking about?”

“He’s a powerful ghost,” Fu Yao finally speaks up, his voice a little higher pitched than before—and sulking in it’s tone. “Nearly a Calamity. His trademark is hanging dead bodies from trees to make blood rain down.”

Xie Lian finds himself wracked with nausea.

Does that mean…he was walking under them, the entire time?

He claps one hand over his mouth, his face growing pale.

And he didn't know?

Nan Feng watches him with growing concern. "Is there more than what you're telling us?"

He can see the prince's distress—but he misinterprets the reason. "You came that way, did you see anything?"

Slowly, Xie Lian lowers his hand from his mouth.

"…I did see someone," he admits, somewhat hesitantly. "He was…strange."

And likely an extremely powerful ghost.

"He was able to smash the magical array shrouding the mountain with just his foot," Xie Lian remembers the crunch of it, it still echoes in his ears now. "And none of the other defenses seemed to phase him. But…he didn't try to hurt me in any way."

Actually…in retrospect…Xie Lian is actually pretty sure that the ghost healed some of his injuries, which…leaves the prince slightly mortified at the way he behaved. He would apologize if he could, but…

"Do you think that could have been the Night Touring Green Lantern?"

If he did something that gruesome, Xie Lian doesn't think he actually wants to apologize. Not if he…he was walking under—

"It's hard to say, walking a blind man down the mountain isn't exactly his style," Fu Yao glances up into the forest, frowning at the corpses. "Did he say anything?"

"…No," Xie Lian shakes his head. "But…there butterflies. Silver butterflies. They must have been made from spiritual power, because I was able to see them—"

He stops when he feels the other two go stiff with fear. "…What?"

"This…is bad."

Xie Lian blinks with confusion. What's so bad about butterflies? "Why?"

"Wraith Butterflies..." Fu Yao trails off, looking at Nan Feng. "They mean this is way beyond anything we can deal with. We need to go back to Heaven now and get reinforcements."

Wraith Butterflies?

Is that what they're called? Xie Lian thinks the name is kind of nice, actually. Eerie, but...pretty.

"I can't leave these people here if that's the case," Xie Lian mutters, shaking his head, "But if it really is that much of a problem—you go on and bring back help for us."

Fu Yao seems to hesitate—and for a moment, Nan Feng looks almost sympathetic, but Xie Lian is firm.

"If it's that serious, then more people could get hurt. We don't have any more time to waste. Meet us back at the Ming Guang temple."

He glances over to Nan Feng.

"Lend me some spiritual power?"

The god offers his hand without hesitation, but he's clearly a little confused. "Why?"

Xie Lian shrugs, glancing down at himself.

He can see the outline of his hand now, filled with that same earthy aura from before.

His hands look like that?

He shakes his head with a sigh, walking back towards the temple, Nan Feng walking close beside him. "You'll see."

Xiao Ying—who has snuck the bandaged young man (who crept out of the woods during the screaming) with her, follows after them, explaining that the child is harmless.

Maimed and unable to communicate—but he's never hurt anyone from the village, and it's unlikely that he ever would.

The prince nods, indicating for them to stay back once they get closer to the temple, and Nan Feng takes him by the elbow. “What is it that you aren’t telling me?”

“...” the Prince stares up at him, his shackle glowing dimly. “What do you mean?”

“Back there, in the forest—” Nan Feng’s voice is so tense with worry, “Something frightened you, and it wasn’t the butterflies.”

Xie Lian’s jaw tightens. “Now isn’t the time to discuss it.”

It requires explaining so much that...requires far more mental energy than what Xie Lian possesses at the moment. Not only that, but..

Xie Lian would tell Feng Xin those things, not Nan Feng—and as long as they’re pretending like this, he...

“...I just want to keep you safe, your highness,” Nan Feng’s voice isn’t harsh now, and neither is the grip on his arm, it’s—

He’s always been so rough with everyone else—but with him, only with him—there’s a gentleness.

Even—

Even after this long.

Xie Lian’s lips tremble.

“...I just had a bad experience once,” he explains carefully.

Well. Multiple times. But he doesn’t need to explain that right now.

“Hanging bodies...upset me.”

Nan Feng grimaces. If he had known that, he would have tried to keep the prince from finding out about them.

“...Before we go on,” the deputy god continues, maintaining that gentle but firm grip on the prince’s arm. “Can I ask you something else?”

Normally, Xie Lian would say it could wait, but...

Nan Feng intentionally waited until they were alone to bring it up, so he nods.

"What is it?"

They're still walking now, slowly growing closer to the temple, and Nan Feng clears his throat.

"...Centuries ago, a god ascended and came to my general for...help, adjusting to the heavens."

Xie Lian smiles faintly. He actually did it, then. That makes him happy. "And did he help?'

Nan Feng nods quickly, "Of course—but the new god...told my general something only you would have known. And he was wondering...or, I mean...he mentioned..." He struggles, stumbling over his words—but Xie Lian's tone is gentle.

"Mentioned what?"

"...He wondered why you sent the new god to him," Nan Feng mumbles, his ears a little hot.

Oh. Well—the answer to that is simple enough.

"Because I knew Feng Xin would be a good influence on him," Xie Lian explains. "And that he would keep him out of trouble."

That makes Nan Feng grow quiet for a few moments, fighting up the nerve to ask, "He also said that you—"

"Something's wrong," Xie Lian cuts him off, holding up a hand to silence him. They're standing in the middle of the courtyard leading into the temple, but...

Oh no.

He can already sense that the inside is empty.

"They moved them," Xie Lian mutters, his brow furrowed with irritation.

"Moved who?"

"The brides, probably to get payment from their families," the prince rubs his temples. "And the minute those veils come off, we're in trouble."

"Does this have something to do with what you said about knowing more about the groom's identity?" Nan Feng questions, and the god nods.

"I already told Fu Yao about this before, but…I've spent a lot of time around weddings in the past," he explains.

"And this is all so targeted towards Ming Guang…after all, we heard before—all of his temples in the area have been burned down besides this one, which was sitting behind a magical barrier, and the ghost's behavior…jealous, vindictive, possessive… it's much more like…"

Shrieking echoes down the hill, and it's clear—the fighting has already begun. "…A bride."

Nan Feng grimaces from beside him. "And there are seventeen of them."

"Eighteen," the prince corrects his friend. "If you count the one behind all of this."

Xie Lian is tired.

That's the only thing he can think of, darting around the temple, barely managing to dodge attacks from the possessed bodies of the diseased brides, throwing veils over their heads.

He hasn't actually slept since Gusu, and with his powers sealed… It creates strain and wear.

Taking some spiritual powers from Nan Feng did help, to some extent—he's able to use Ruoye more effectively, casting the weapon out over a wider area, and he can actually use the communication array, a rare luxury.

'Ling Wen? Can you hear me?'

'Yes, your highness?'

'I have a question that's going to sound oddly specific, but…'

Xie Lian backflips off of the temple roof, throwing a veil onto yet another bride.

'Has Ming Guang ever been in a romantic relationship with a jealous partner?'

There's a long pause.

'I don't mean to pry, but—'

'Past or present?'

Xie Lian is so confused by the question, he nearly misses his landing. 'Pardon?'

'In Ming Guang's case, you're going to have to be rather specific, your highness,' Ling Wen explains flatly. 'There are many possibilities.'

Xie Lian flushes slightly. Oh.

'It would be a woman from at least a few centuries ago,' he explains. 'She would have to be willful, violent—and extremely jealous and possessive. Obsessed with General Pei.'

'That actually does narrow it down,' Ling Wen muses with a sigh. 'With only two exceptions that I'm aware of, Pei usually goes for weak willed partners, and only one of them could fit your description.'

Xie Lian covers two more brides, rushing down into the courtyard, using Ruoye to make a protective barrier for Xiao Ying and the other villagers.

'And who would that be?'

'Did the ghost show signs of a limp?'

Xie Lian hesitates, thinking back on the noises he heard, when fighting that black cloud in Ming Guang's temple.

'...yes, it did.'

'I thought so. ' Ling Wen's voice turns grim. 'Then it could only be Xuan Ji.'

Xuan Ji?

'She was a general from an enemy nation that Pei captured, then released. But they met so frequently in battle—eventually, they became lovers.'

'...That's actually rather romantic,' Xie Lian admits. Nine brides are down now, eight more to go.

The idea of admiring an opponent's strength on the battlefield, and then eventually becoming intimate with them...it's undoubtedly appealing. Xie Lian can see the temptation of it.

'I suppose,' Ling Wen agrees. 'But eventually, Xuan Ji became attached, and wanted commitment.'

Xie Lian frowns, veiling yet another bride, barely dodging an attack from another as he listens to Nan Feng dealing with the enemies outside the temple grounds. 'Is that a bad thing?'

Isn't commitment the point of being in that sort of relationship?

'For Pei? Yes, it is.'

Ling Wen seems emphatic on that point.

'He's an infamous philanderer. He's never been one to become attached to his partners, and despises the idea of marriage.'

Well. That explains the bitterness surrounding brides.

'From what I understand, their separation turned ugly.'

Of course—Ling Wen suspects there might be an exception to Pei Ming's beliefs about commitment, but they're only suspicions, and not relevant, so she keeps them to herself.

'How ugly?'

'Ugly enough for her to do something like this,' The civil god murmurs.

Before Xie Lian can say much more, however—there's a crash, just outside the temple doors.

The god stiffens, throwing himself in front of the villagers, the other brides now neutralized, and he hears…laughter.

Pained, almost crazed.

Followed by the heavy thuds—limping.

And then, Xie Lian sees the aura. A violent, angry shade of black, crackling with resentment.

"…My darling…" A voice croons, "Have you finally come? Was this finally enough?"

The prince glances around at first, wondering if Pei ming had actually arrived without his knowing—

But there's no other godly force in the courtyard besides him. Even Nan Feng is still dealing with the issues outside.

After a moment, the god realizes with a start—

'Oh. She means me.'

"Will you..." Xuan Ji's voice shifts into a snarl as she charges at him. "...LOOK AT ME?!"

Oh dear.

She really is quicker than Xie Lian expected, because in one fell swoop, she manages to launch herself forward, grabbing him around the neck and tossing him to the ground—then holding him there.

"LOOK AT ME!" She shrieks. "I did all of this for YOU! LOOK AT MY LEG!"

Xie Lian really is grateful that the ghost he encountered before healed his throat injury—if he ever encounters him again, he'll have to thank him. Otherwise, this would have been very painful.

"YOU USED TO CROSS AN ENTIRE COUNTRY OVERNIGHT JUST TO SEE ME!" She howls.

"AND NOW YOU WON'T EVEN LOOK?!"

"I can't," Xie Lian offers, feeling almost a little bad for her. He can't imagine how horrible it feels to be discarded like that by someone you hold so dear. "I really can't —"

"CAN'T LIVE WITH THE GUILT OF WHAT YOU DID?!" Xuan Ji snarls.

Xie Lian hopes the situation might calm down a little if he can explain that he's not Pei Ming—then there's a chance to talk her down enough to let the humans go, but—

"Leave him alone!" He hears a frantic cry, then footsteps charging, and his heart sinks.

Xiao Ying. "Don't—!"

Xuan Ji's head snaps up, her eyes narrowing into slits when she sees the village girl approaching with nothing more than a stick.

Brave.

What a brave little fool.

Just as she lifts her hands to strike out, Xie Lian does the same with Ruoye, but…

Not in time to stop the blow.

Xuan Ji isn't able to sink her claws in the way she intended—not like she did with the other humans, before—but the shove is hard and violent.

Enough so to send Xiao Ying to the ground, her skull hitting the cobblestones with a violent crack.

The boy in the bandages sobs.

Xie Lian doesn't have to see the wound to know—Xiao Ying lets out a strangled whimper, enough to tell him that the wound was fatal.

"You don't DESERVE HIM!" Xuan Ji snarls, even as Ruoye tightens, dragging her to the ground.

Xie Lian ignores her, rushing to Xiao Ying's side.

The young woman breathes raggedly, staring up at the sky as blood pools underneath her head. "Sir…" she shivers, "I tried to help, but I…"

Xie Lian reaches for her hand, squeezing. "You were very helpful," He reassures her. "I was able to capture her because of you."

That seems to bring Xiao Ying some small measure of relief, her lips twitching up into a smile as he looks towards the boy weeping by her side, "D…Don't steal food anymore, alright? People…they won't be kind to you…"

Xie Lian's chest sinks, because the girl is right.

With Xiao Ying gone, he doubts anyone in the area of Mount Yu Jun would look after the boy. They already fear and resent him for being a 'monster.'

"I'll look over him," Xie Lian assures her. "If he ever needs anything, he can come to me."

Xiao Ying's lips tremble with relief.

After a moment, he brings his other hand up to Xiao Ying's cheek—stroking over the shape of her nose, her eyebrows, and her chin, and Xie Lian smiles, squeezing her hand gently.

"I don't see why everyone was making such a fuss," He murmurs, "You're very pretty, Xiao Ying."

From the ragged gasp the girl lets out, her eyes flooding with tears—Xie Lian can surmise that no one has ever said that to her.

Oh, what a horrible thing beauty is. Whether you have it or you don't—the world torments you for it in one way or another.

"T…thank you, sir…"

He hears it when her heartbeat stops, and the boy's weeping only gets louder. With one final grimace, Xie Lian gently presses Xiao Ying's eyes shut before rising to his feet.

Xuan Ji is even more distressed than she was before, wrestling out of Ruoye's grip.

"You DARE call another woman beautiful in front of me?!" The savage ghost snarls. "Have you NO SHAME?!"

"I'm not Pei," Xie Lian replies flatly, far less sympathetic to her now as he turns around, opening his eyes to allow Xuan Ji to see his shackle. "I can't look at you, and even if I could—I have no such interests in women."

Honestly, Xuan Ji's behavior has only reinforced that preference.

The Ghost Bride hisses, taking a step back. "Then…he really…wouldn't come to see me?! AFTER EVERYTHING I'VE DONE?!"

She turns to the statue of Ming Guang, her eyes filled with rage, "I BURNED DOWN ALL OF YOUR TEMPLES! MURDERED YOUR FOLLOWERS! AND YOU WON'T EVEN SPARE ME A GLANCE?!"

She stops, her breathing ragged, and turns back to Xie Lian with a glare. "If I…"

She takes a step in his direction, her eyes flaring. "If I kill one of your PRECIOUS COMRADES, will I warrant your attention THEN?!"

Xie Lian sighs, watching as the wrath's aura explodes outward, releasing her full power.

He's tired.

Any humans in the surrounding area will be crushed at this rate.

If he had his spiritual powers, this never would have been a problem to begin with. No one would have gotten hurt at all, but...

He grits his teeth, launching himself forward. There's no choice, is there?

BOOM!

The sound of a gong fills the air, rattling so loudly that it makes Xie Lian stumble, clutching his ears. Then, the sky fills with bright, blinding light—and for Xie Lian to actually be able to see it—

It must be that of heaven.

But something's wrong.

Xie Lian's knees buckle.

Nan Feng, now finished with dealing with the other brides outside the temple, appears by his side—taking the prince by the elbow to steady him.

"Are you alright?" He murmurs, "Reinforcements are here."

Xie Lian claps a hand over his mouth, fighting a sudden wave of nausea.

His neck, eyes, and ankle throb with agony in one continuous rhythm, scorching under the glow of heaven's light.

It feels like it did in Gusu, but worse—and didn't that ghost heal him? Why does it—? But the light fades to a more manageable glow, and so does the pain.

Xie Lian's eyelashes flutter slightly as he shakes his head, holding onto Nan Fang's arm a little more firmly as he pulls himself up.

"I'm alright," he murmurs. "I'm just more sensitive to light and sound than I used to be. I was overwhelmed."

Nan Feng frowns, concerned, but...

There's the sound of multiple people descending the temple steps, and once voice calls out, “Fu Yao and Ling Wen explained the situation. It seems this falls under the responsibility of Ming Guang palace. We’ll take it from here.”

Xie Lian frowns.

That voice...

It’s deep, resounding, and...

Oddly familiar, though he can’t place why.

“...General Pei?” He questions. Of course—he vaguely remembers the god’s voice. Between his first ascension and banishment, Pei and Jun Wu were the gods he works with the most, but...

Xuan Ji shudders.

“FINALLY!” She cries, stumbling in his direction. “You came for me, my love, I—!”

Nan Feng watches as she stumbles, then frowns, “You...” She snarls. “You’re NOT PEI!”

Xie Lian looks to his friend with a frown, “He isn’t?”

“He’s Pei Xiu, a descendant of Ming Guang.”

Nan Feng explains, still keeping a watchful eye over the god, “We usually call him Pei Junior.”

Xie Lian nods, taking that in as the guards from the palace of Ming Guang place Xuan Ji into custody, placing her in spirit binding chains.

“...What will be done with her?”

“Likely sealed under a mountain,” Pei Xiu shrugs, looking Xie Lian over. “It’s an honor to meet your highness, my general mentioned the two of you used to work together.”

Xie Lian pauses, pleasantly surprised that there’s no negative undertone to that statement. “We did, but...”

He glances in Xuan Ji’s direction, his expression one of concern. “Her grudge against Pei is strong...she blames him for her deformity, as well as her current predicament —”

Pei Xiu turns his gaze on Xuan ji, his expression cold. “Is that what she said?”

The ice in his tone gives Xie Lian pause.

“Is that not true?”

The younger General stares Xuan Ji down, watching as the wrath writhes and hisses at him in response.

“Xuan Ji is a strong woman,” Pei Xiu murmurs, folding his arms behind his back. “Her choices were her own.”

“He USED me!” The ghost snarls, thrashing against her bonds. “And then he THREW ME AWAY!”

Instead of addressing her again directly, Pei Xiu looks to Xie Lian. “She offered to betray her country for Ming Guang, that much is true—but the rest of it is a lie.”

“...A lie?”

“NO!” Xuan Ji’s hair falls into her face, her eyes burning red, “He made me think—! He made me believe—!”

“If you truly loved the man,” Pei Xiu glares, his eyes narrowed, “you wouldn’t sully his honor so shamelessly.”

That’s interesting, Xie Lian thinks.

If Pei is such an infamous philanderer, Xie Lian is surprised to find that his subordinate is so concerned with his honor.

“Ming Guang never used the plans that General Xuan Ji gave him against the Kingdom of Yushi. He doesn’t believe in winning through dishonest means.” Pei Xiu shakes his head. “Xuan Ji was very aware of the General’s personal situation when he returned from the war, and when he proceeded to cut ties with her—she mutilated herself so he would keep her by his side.”

Pei’s...personal situation? Xie Lian tilts his head curiously.

“Pei took care of her—generously too, she was kept in comfort—but he wouldn’t marry her. When she realized that she wasn’t going to get her way...Xuan Ji took her own life in an effort to hurt him.”

Nan Feng watches with surprise as Xie Lian’s entire expression changes.

Xie Lian knows what it feels like, to feel the bitter ache of losing someone you love. He can understand the heartbreak and anger that comes with that suffering.

But he also knows what it feels like, to find that someone you care for has taken their own life.

The idea that Xuan Ji would do that as a punishment, inflicted to hurt someone— It fills him with such utter repulsion, Xie Lian is almost startled by it.

“I can’t say that Pei Ming bears no responsibility for the situation, but...” Pei Xiu shakes his head.

“If Xuan Ji had let go, no one else would have gotten hurt.”

Seeming tired of listening to them by now, Xuan Ji wrenches away from the guards, throwing her head back to howl at the moon, so loudly that it makes Xie Lian wince, covering his ears.

“CURSE YOU, PEI!” She shrieks. “IS YOUR HEART TRULY MADE OF STONE?!”

Xie Lian doubts that could be true, if he was still willing to take care of Xuan Ji up until her death, but...

Admittedly, refusing to address her after this long, it seems... Like a pointedly cold gesture.

“COUNT YOURSELF LUCKY THAT YOU HAVE NEVER TRULY LOVED SOMEONE!” She screams, with this bone deep knowledge that, somewhere, Pei can hear her.

She knows he can. Knows that for a man who smiles, teases, spends his whole life pretending that everything is a sport—

Pei Ming cares deeply about his failures. His losses.

He views Xuan Ji as the greatest among them. She knows. That’s why he isn’t here. That’s why he won’t ever look at her.

She knows .

“BECAUSE IT WOULD BURN YOU!” Xuan Ji’s nails claw at the sky. “JUST AS IT HAS BURNED ME EVERY MOMENT SINCE YOU CAST

ME ASIDE!”

Xie Lian almost wants to pity her, but when he thinks of the dead girl, just a few feet away from them—and all seventeen of the brides who came before her…

He can’t bring himself to.

“I HOPE THAT FIRE RAGES ON!” Tears of blood stream down Xuan Ji’s face now, her voice breaking between howls of rage and broken sobs, “UNTIL YOUR HEART IS REDUCED TO ASH!”

Pei Xiu watches her coldly, pressing his fingers to his temple as he receives a message.

“…That will never happen,” the deputy replies calmly. “That is Pei’s final message to you.”

Xie Lian’s eyebrows raise.

So, Xuan Ji wasn’t wrong.

Even if Pei Ming refused to deal with her personally…he was listening.

What a complicated situation.

“CURSE YOU PEI!”

Xuan Ji doesn’t stop shrieking the entire time, even as Pei Xiu bids his goodbyes to the other gods in the temple, ordering his men to carry her back to heaven.

Xie Lian’s head pulses and aches with every single shriek.

“CURSE YOU!”

“CURSE YOU!”

“CURSE YOU!”

The prince doesn’t get a chance to sleep that night, either.

Instead, there’s the bodies of the discovered brides to be seen to, and helping the men from the palace of Xuan Zhen clear the bodies from the forest.

Fu Yao and Nan Feng bicker all the while, but not as viciously.

As a matter of fact—both stop to glance at him with concern every now and then, only to return to griping back and forth over who should have to clean the rest of the bodies away, or which one of their generals is more trustworthy.

In any case…

There's only one task left.

The three of them stand with the boy from the mountain, before a freshly erected gravestone.

Nan Feng cut the stone, while Fu Yao did the lettering—and Xie Lian handled the grave itself.

The characters read, 'Hear lies Xiao Ying, believed friend.'

Burials have become nearly routine over the centuries in Xie Lian's case—as it would be for any immortal who has spent so much time in the human realm.

They fade away, he remains.

Still, he kneels—laying a hand on the boy's shoulder, "I know you miss her," his voice is soft.

"But she would want you to look after yourself."

They'll have to figure out a new situation for him soon—after all, Xie Lian is barely in a state where he can look out for himself. It wouldn't be fair to force a child to live the way he does for too long.

"Hey…is he injured?"

Nan Feng's voice makes Xie Lian frown, glancing up, "What do you mean?"

"There's blood on his bandages," the deputy god shrugs, stepping closer. "Maybe he hit his head last night?"

Given how violent the events of the battle against Xuan Ji were—that's worrisome.

"…Best to take a look at it," Xie Lian sighs, turning back to the child. "Go ahead and take the bandages off so we can take a look. Don't be afraid—we won't hurt you."

There’s a moment of hesitation, but slowly—the child complies, unwrapping the bandages around his head.

Xie Lian reaches into his sleeve, where he always keeps a fresh set, reaching up to probe at his head for any injuries, but—

To his shock, someone smacks his hands away—sharply.

“Your highness!” Fu Yao’s voice rings out, “Don’t touch him!”

Nan Feng whips around to glare.

“What do you think you’re—?!”

But then he sees the issue, and his eyes widen.

Xie Lian glances around, trying to understand, “What’s going on here?”

“It’s—!”

“He has Human Face Disease, that’s why he was wearing the bandages!”

Xie Lian's breath leaves him in a panicked rush.

His skin feels cold, and his heart—it’s suddenly pounding in his chest.

Reminding him of the last time he was sitting in the dark, listening to people scream and panic, claiming someone among them had those lesions.

Reminding him what came after. The pain.

Endless terror.

Help me.

Xie Lian’s hands begin to shake.

“...Your highness?”

Help me.

Help me, help me, help me.

Help me, help me, help, help, help, help, help, help, help, help, help, help, help, help, help, help me!

He must have said it out loud at least once, because someone grabs him by the shoulders, giving him a hard shake.

“We’re both right here, what’s wrong?!”

The Deputy Gods give each other looks of panic, because—

Neither of them have ever seen Xie Lian like this.

Not once.

Pale, trembling, eyes open wide. It’s hard to read his emotions, through the shackle pattern—but this one speaks loud and clear.

Pure, unadulterated terror.

Fu Yao kneels beside both of them now, placing a hand on Xie Lian’s back while Nan Feng grips his shoulders.

“Dianxia,” it’s probably the first time the deputy god has addressed him so quietly, “You’re safe. Nothing is going to get you. It’s just us here.”

Xie Lian trembles violently, and—

Normally, he can keep it together better than this. But he’s tired. And he aches. And—

And he thought he saw Hong-ear last night, but he didn’t. And—

He chokes out two words, like he can’t even see or hear either one of them, his voice cracking—

“I-It hurts...”

His eyes roll back into his head and he goes limp in Nan Feng’s hold.

“XIE LIAN?!”

True Love Would Burn You

Chapter Summary

> There are many martial gods in the heavens. Most of them from many different walks of life—all united by skills in combat.
>
> However, among all of them—Pei Ming is the one who is always treated as one thing above all else—
>
> A soldier.
>
> Xie Lian was a soldier himself for a time. And many more, over the course of his godhood, but in his experience…it was the unhappiest thing to be.
>
> And Xie Lian can't help but wonder, now, if he's not dealing with Xuan Ji… What other personal matters does Pei Ming have?

Chapter Notes

> You can find me on twitter and keep up with current updates of the story HERE
>
> CONTENT WARNING: this chapter contains heavily implied sexual content

It's all black after that. Swirling images and voices that Xie Lian can barely recognize, eyes heavy with exhaustion.

He knows he's being taken somewhere, hears voices arguing, and—

Someone holding him tight, mumbling something that he can't hear.

When he wakes again…

His head is against silk sheets, a pillow underneath his head, and for a moment, when he blinks—he sees something on the mattress next to him, wings flapping gently.

A silver butterfly.

Xie Lian blinks blearily, reaching for it as he sits up, but— It's gone.

"You're awake."

The voice is familiar, but he's still a little bit groggy, reaching up to rub at his eyes, "Where...am I?" He mumbles, feeling around a little to get a grip for his surroundings, but all he finds are sheets and pillows. Comfortable, but not informative.

"The Palace of Xuan Zhen."

Now THAT is surprising enough to make Xie Lian wake up the rest of the way, his eyebrows raising. "...Mu Qing?" He questions, then realizes who he must be speaking to now. "...Fu Yao?"

The deputy god nods awkwardly from where he's sitting at the foot of the bed, his arms crossed.

"Nan Yang's palace is holding Xuan Ji, so no it wouldn't have been a good idea to take you there. Ling Wen offered to house you in the civil palace, but..." Fu Yao examines his nails, crossing his legs. "They wanted someone to give you a medical examination, so..."

Xie Lian raises an eyebrow, "What would My King's palace have to do with that?"

Fu Yao's tone is light, unbothered. "Xuan Zhen is a martial god, but he's also a patron of doctors and other medical practitioners. He was the best qualified, so he checked you for injuries."

Xie Lian didn't know that, but...he supposes he wouldn't, since he's been avoiding the temples of his friends for centuries now.

"When did that come about?"

"There was a plague several centuries ago." Fu Yao shrugs. "Mu Qing was the god who helped manage the mortal response."

"Oh, I think I caught that one..." Xie Lian frowns, remembering how uncomfortable it had been—and just how many people all throughout the continent had died, until the kingdoms of Xuli and Yong'an banded together to create a unified response, saving countless more lives.

"You'll have to thank him for me—the treatment I got back then, I would have been pretty uncomfortable without it..."

There's a long silence, and when Fu Yao replies—his tone is a little tense. "I'll tell him."

Xie Lian smiles, a little awkward. “Thank you, Fu Yao.”

He sits up, holding his head—not out of pain, just a little dizzy.

“It was extreme exhaustion, by the way,” the deputy god mutters. “As well as dehydration and malnourishment.”

“...I see,” Xie Lian sighs, not particularly surprised. “How long was I asleep?”

“Sixteen hours.” Fu Yao reaches over, tapping the table next to the bed with his fingertip—allowing Xie Lian to get a sense of where it is. “My orders are to make sure you eat and drink before you leave, so don’t bother being annoying about it, I don’t care.”

Xie Lian pauses. “...Alright.”

He reaches for a glass of water, as well as what seems to be a plate of fruit, and...

Xie Lian was such a picky eater as a boy, he was usually thin because he hardly ever ate what was placed in front of him.

But—these are all of the fruits he was actually willing to eat.

His heart swells slightly as he rolls a slice of dried plum between his fingertips, his gaze hidden by his hair, but fond.

Mu Qing remembered. That isn’t surprising—he’s always had an excellent memory, better than anyone else Xie Lian has ever met.

Sometimes it’s a downfall.

“...You’ll have to tell him that I’m sorry for being such an inconvenience,” Xie Lian sighs, taking a bite.

He still does love plums, actually. He almost forgot what they tasted like.

Fu Yao is quiet for such a long time, that Xie Lian thinks silence is his actual answer, but...

“He isn’t heartless, you know.”

Fu Yao’s voice is small when he says that. Like he half expects someone to laugh at him.

Vulnerable.

Xie Lian finishes chewing, and when he replies, his voice is gentle enough that it makes Fu Yao flinch.

“I’ve always known that.”

Xie Lian doesn’t have a relationship more confusing or complicated than the one that he does with Mu Qing. Of everyone in his old life, aside from Hong’er...

He probably thought about Mu Qing the most. More than even Feng Xin, who he was ostensibly closer to.

Xie Lian can’t say that he’s never been angry with him. Or that he understands Mu Qing completely, because he doesn’t.

And sometimes, when he remembers the last times they really spoke... It hurts, remembering what Mu Qing did.

But that doesn’t mean Xie Lian didn’t miss him.

“...I think,” Xie Lian offers carefully, taking another bite of the food laid out before him, “that sometimes, he’s so careful about guarding his emotions from other people, that...people misunderstand him.”

Fu Yao is rigid, holding himself tightly, his lips trembling.

“...But that isn’t the same as being heartless,” Xie Lian finishes, cramming more food in his mouth to shut himself up, chewing awkwardly, feeling a little anxious, hoping he didn’t say the wrong thing—

“Chew more carefully. Or you’ll choke, and I’m not going to help you.”

The martial god swallows thickly, taking a gulp of water before speaking again, “... Okay!”

He finishes the plate, along with two cups of water—as ordered—before rising to his feet, feeling around for his boots.

“Thank you for looking after me, Fu Yao.”

But, as the one who was in charge of the Mount Yu Jun case—he’ll be expected to report back now.

“I was just doing my job,” the deputy god shrugs, setting Xie Lian’s outer robe down on the bed next to him before slipping out of the room without another word.

Xie Lian sighs.

He doesn’t expect that either of his friends feel any desire to rekindle the kind of relationship that they had before—and Xie Lian doesn’t begrudge them that, but…

Ah. Well. Better not to dwell on it, now.

His first stop is the Palace of Ling Wen, who is pleased to see him.

“Your highness,” she smiles—if only a little. But for a stoic figure like her, it’s quite an expressive move. “I’m glad to see that you have recovered well.”

“Ah, yes,” Xie Lian smiles awkwardly. “It was pretty embarrassing, but…just a case of exhaustion.”

The civil god frowns. “It was likely too soon for you to be assigned a serious case like Mount Yu Jun, apologies.”

Xie Lian waves her off, “No, no—you were only trying to help me clear my debt Ling Wen, I’m grateful to you.”

He doesn’t see the awkward slant of her gaze.

Even so—he has no way of knowing that she spoke out against the assignment to begin with, and wouldn’t understand the guilt she feels now, even if he could recognize it.

“Still, I hope you take this time to rest and recover properly.”

Xie Lian nods obediently. “I will, but…” He sighs. “There’s something else I need to report about Mount Yu Jun.”

Ling Wen raises an eyebrow, listening as he recounts his story about Lang Ying, her gaze quite concerned.

“…That’s troubling,” she admits. “We’ll start searching for him immediately. But, given his age…”

“He’s likely supernatural, I know,” Xie Lian nods. He assumes that the child must be some sort of ghost, but… “Still, I feel…”

He can't help but feel responsible.

Ling Wen's expression is one of sympathy. "We'll look for him, your highness, don't worry."

"There was also..."

Ling Wen rises to her feet, tapping the prince's arm to indicate that he should follow. "Better to follow me to the communication array—I'm sure everyone else will want to know more of this as well."

In general, most enter the communication array telepathically.

But, when in the heavens, there is a private chamber within the hall of the head civil god where one can enter physically, viewing the gods and goddesses visages through golden curtains as they come and go.

For Xie Lian, it's useless—but Ling Wen often prefers the visual aid.

And the moment they step inside—there's already arguing. And—heavens, poor Feng Xin sounds absolutely incensed.

"I have had ENOUGH of this! Xuan ji won't say a word about the Night Touring Green Lantern, she only wants PEI MING!" He shouts. "I'm not a damn PRISON GUARD!"

"Look," one of the other martial gods sighs, "you're the only one with the man power to hold her, and sealing a ghost as powerful as Xuan Ji takes time..."

"And?! Pei has plenty of resources, and this is HIS mess! Let him deal with her!" There's disgruntled murmuring all around.

After all—just about everyone agrees on that front. Xuan Ji is Pei Ming's mistake, and it seems irresponsible that he's left General Nan Yang to deal with her...

"If those two interact, it will only make things worse," Pei Xiu speaks up, his tone even—but firm.

"Xuan Ji is violent and obsessed with the man. If she sees him and doesn't get the reaction she wants—she'll become even more difficult to deal with."

Xie Lian almost pities Pei. Philanderer or not—he isn't responsible for Xuan Ji's crimes. And this situation must be upsetting.

“Still, Xuan Ji wasn’t such a menace before…” One of the other civil gods grumbles. “Qi Rong’s involvement makes everything more complicated.

Xie Lian stiffens slightly at the mention of that name. “…Qi Rong?”

“The Night Touring Green Lantern,” Pei Xiu clarifies.

“That’s his name.”

Logically, Xie Lian knows—it has to be a coincidence. It’s been eight centuries, and undoubtedly there have been countless others with that name. But…

“Was he found on the mountain?” Xie Lian questions, slightly wary now.

“No, but he likely was, not long before you arrived,” Mu Qing is the one who speaks up now, his tone slightly fatigued. “One of my subordinates caught a glimpse of the forest demon, which means he couldn’t have been far behind.”

“Forest…demon?”

“Ren Song,” Another god answers.

“He’s rarely ever seen in the mortal realm unless hunting Qi Rong, the two have some sort of feud.”

“…Oh,” Xie Lian murmurs, his brow creasing. Even ghosts have their politics then, don’t they? “Is it normal for ghosts to hunt one another?”

“No,” Feng Xin manages to calm down enough to answer that question at the very least. “Not on that scale. But Qi Rong is despised even among his own kind, so it doesn’t come as a surprise.”

“And without his meddling, there never would have been a massacre on Mount Yu Jun…”

“Speaking of Mount Yu Jun,” Ling Wen speaks up at last, lifting her chin, “none of this would have been brought to our attention without the leadership of the Crown Prince of Xianle, we all owe him a debt.”

Xie Lian squirms with discomfort, no longer used to praise.

“If there’s anything you’d like to add to the matter, your highness, now is the time."

Right.

"...There was an incident on Mount Yu Jun, when I was in the bridal sedan," Xie Lian explains. "I heard a child singing—but neither of the deputy gods could hear it."

He tilts his head, "Does...something like that sound familiar to anyone?" "Doesn't ring a bell," Mu Qing replies dryly.

"It must be related to Xuan Ji in some way," one civil gods under Ling Wen speaks up. "Better to let Nan Yang—"

"Stop dumping MORE WORK ON ME!" Feng Xin snaps "I didn't even agree to take on Xuan Ji in the first place!"

"...I'll make sure I look into it, your highness." Ling Wen sighs. "Was there anything else you wanted to ask?"

"Yes," Xie Lian agrees—and really—

He wasn't expecting the question to cause such a stir at first.

"Has anyone ever encountered a young man who could control silver butterflies?"

Really, Xie Lian thought it wasn't such a strange thing to ask, but the response? It's an immediate uproar.

"Why? Did you see any?"

"Oh hell, HE'S involved?!"

"He didn't send another challenge?!"

"Hua Cheng..." Mu Qing groans, wiping a hand down his face. "He's speaking about Hua Cheng!"

"...Hua Cheng?" Xie Lian questions, a slight smile on his face. "Is that his name? It suits him."

A City of Flowers. That's rather poetic. A beautiful image, actually.

And now that Xie Lian is further removed of the emotions of that night...There was an easy sort of elegance to the man. Like everything he did was an act of living poetry.

“…Your highness,” Mu Qing questions softly, “Have you ever heard of the Four Great Calamities?”

Calamities, calamities…

“Ah,” Xie Lian claps his hands together. It’s been centuries since he was a student, but he’s never stopped relishing in knowing the answer to a question. “Nan Feng explained that on Mount Yu Jun…they’re the most powerful among ghosts, yes?”

Everyone glances over to one of the higher ranked gods present—a sharply dressed young man in simple black robes, adorned with gold earrings, his dark hair pulled up into a high, neat ponytail.

He looks tired, and rather bored—but he sighs.

“Calamity is the name of their rank, not their title,” he explains in a low, even voice— almost scholarly in the way he speaks, like he might be given a lecture. “They are known as Ghost Kings.”

“Ghost Kings…” Xie Lian repeats slowly. “The Ghost Realm has royalty?”

“Not in the way that humans or gods think of it,” the young man explains. “Each Ghost King is born after facing the most fierce trials available in the ghost realm— only three in history have ever attained such a rank.”

“But…” Xie Lian frowns. “I thought there were four?”

“Qi Rong is included on the list—but only to round them out in equal measure with the Four Famous tales,” Mu Qing explains. “Balance between the Heavens and the Ghost Realm is rather crucial.”

Xie Lian doesn’t need the Four Famous tales explained to him. After all, he’s one of them.

The Crown Prince Who Pleased the Gods.

The Young Lord Who Poured Wine.

The General Who Broke His Sword.

The Princess Who Slit Her Throat.

“And who are the four calamities, exactly?”

"As the only one who hasn't risen as a Ghost King, Qi Rong is the weakest among them," the dark haired god from before replies. "He's called the Night Touring Green Lantern—and known for his violent, garish tastes. His followers hang dead bodies in forests as offerings to him."

Xie Lian swallows hard, trying to remind himself that—while that's a startling, uncomfortable coincidence—

That's likely all it is.

"After him," the god continues, twisting his earring between his fingers, "Is Black Water Sinking Ships. He's the most reclusive of the four."

"Is he a water demon?"

"Very astute, your highness." The scholarly god replies dryly, making Xie Lian flush. "Little is known about him besides that very fact. The eldest Ghost King was by far the most powerful in his time—The White Clothed Calamity."

"Bai Wuxiang," Ling Wen supplies, not missing the way Xie Lian immediately pales in response, "but he's long since been slain by the Heavenly Emperor."

Xie Lian knows that. But...he...

Just remembering what he did yesterday was enough to make him faint.

The scars left by that time—they still exist on his soul, even if his flesh will always heal over time.

Just the mention of that name leaves him feeling mangled. Like an open wound.

"And finally, there's the most powerful one still living," the dark haired god seems to be a little reluctant to admit that fact for some reason, "Crimson Rain Sought Flower —Hua Cheng."

"He's known for his wraith butterflies," Ling Wen explains softly. "Those must have been what you saw."

"...Is he really that much more powerful than the others?" Xie Lian questions, remembering the aura he saw that night. It was undoubtedly strong, yes—but he felt no ill will from it.

“He makes Qi Rong look like an insect by comparison.”

Feng Xin explains. “And if the Night Wandering Green Lantern doesn’t manage to survive the trials to become a Ghost King, many believe it will be Hua Cheng’s subordinate who takes that spot.”

“Subordinate?” Xie Lian questions softly.

“He’s already been mentioned,” Ling Wen explains, leaning one hand on her hip. “Ren Song, a forest demon—Autumn Twilight Shrouding Forests.”

“He rarely involves himself in conflicts with heavenly officials,” the god who was explaining the tales before speaks up once more. “But he does occasionally hunt humans, and his magic is known to cause madness.”

Hua Cheng is so powerful, that a ghost strong enough to nearly be a calamity himself is his subordinate?

“Some even say Hua Cheng is more powerful than Bai Wuxiang was,” Feng Xin comments warily. “It’s hard to know, since the two never walked the earth at the same time—but Hua Cheng has been far more of a threat to the Heavens.”

That leaves Xie Lian slightly startled. “...Really?”

“Well, Bai Wuxiang destroyed many mortal kingdoms,” Mu Qing murmurs, crossing his arms.

“But he only ever targeted Heavenly Officials that were in exile. He never mounted direct confrontation with the Heavens himself. He picked weaker targets—and it was easy for Jun Wu to slaughter him. But Hua Cheng...” Mu Qing trails off, his eyes narrowing slightly from the memory “He destroyed thirty three gods at once—and single-handed.”

Xie Lian’s jaw goes slightly slack, trying to conceive of such a thing. “...He did?”

Mu Qing nods. “He challenged thirty five heavenly officials who offended him somehow—and bet his soul as collateral.”

That takes...quite a bit of confidence.

"If they won—the gods could disperse his spirit as they wished. But if Hua Cheng won, he demanded that they all descend as mortals once more."

"Thirty three accepted," Mu Qing recalls. "Idiots."

"And lost shamefully," Feng Xin mutters.

Mu Qing nods in agreement, remembering the entire affair with little joy. "They were so humiliated—they refused to fulfill their end of the bargain. But Hua Cheng wouldn't let them get away with it—so he burned all of their temples to the ground in a single night."

For a god, that's essentially a death sentence.

"...but I thought you said he challenged thirty five officials, not thirty three." Xie Lian raises an eyebrow. "Who were the other two?"

For a moment, no one answers—until Ling Wen replies delicately—

"That would be Generals Nan Yang and Xuan Zhen."

Oh. Them? How did they offend the ghost king?

Xie Lian's eyes flicker in the directions where he heard Mu Qing and Feng Xin speak before, questioning, "...And you two declined?"

The silence is tense.

"We were busy," Feng Xin replies tersely. "By the time either of us realized a challenge had been made, the fight was already over."

"Yes," Mu Qing's voice is a little faint—and a man with such a sharp memory is suddenly vague with the details.

"If I recall correctly, there was some sort of conflict over a temple."

Feng Xin clears his throat, nodding in agreement. "Yeah—it was something to do with that."

"In any case," Ling Wen shrugs, "his butterflies still haunt the dreams of many heavenly officials."

Xie Lian finds that hard to believe. There wasn't anything frightening at all about them, really...if anything, they were...

Comforting in their beauty. But never frightening.

"Did he...do anything strange to you, your highness?"

"No," Xie Lian answers honestly. "He was actually very courteous. He guided me down the mountain—and even healed one of my injuries before disappearing."

Feng Xin and Mu Qing stiffen—because the god never mentioned that before, and a confused murmur spreads throughout the array.

"What on earth is he up to?"

"Could it be some sort of trick? Having Hua Cheng, Qi Rong, and Ren Song on the same mountain in one night—that's very foreboding. What if the calamities are planning something?"

The God who explained the tales of the Calamities to Xie Lian smiles faintly, canines flashing.

"If the calamities are planning something," he murmurs. "That could spell disaster for the heavens. We should tread carefully."

Ling Wen sighs heavily. "Ming Yi is right. In any case—I'll speak to the emperor about these developments. That concludes our meeting."

Most of the gods take that as an excuse to leave, but Xie Lian is quick to speak up.

"Nan Yang—Xuan Zhen." He blinks, hoping that they heard him—and it feels like they're listening, so he continues, "Thank you for the junior officials. They were quite a help."

Both martial gods are quiet for a moment, with Nan Yang shifting awkwardly until he mutters, "...It's nothing."

"Really," Xuan Zhen agrees, listening as Nan Yan slips out of the array without another word. "Just focus on paying off your debt with the offerings you earned."

Xie Lian nods, "And...Mu Qing," he glances in his friend's direction, a little awkward. "I already told Fu Yao, but since we're here I might as well—" He bows once more, "Thank you for your assistance—and for allowing me to rest in your palace. It was very kind of you."

The martial god pauses, not accustomed to being called 'kind,' not under any circumstance, and eventually offers the gruff reply—

"It was the most practical solution. Don't think much of it. Ling Wen," he turns his attention to the civil god, his tone dry.

“You should speak to that friend of yours about Xuan Ji. I doubt Feng Xin is an optimal solution for the problem.”

“I was just in a meeting with Pei Ming and the Heavenly Emperor this morning,” Ling Wen replies calmly. “He’s aware of the situation.”

Xie Lian pauses, surprised.

A sentiment Mu Qing seems to share. “Pei is in the heavens right now? And he didn’t attend the meeting?”

“Even he has to report back to Jun Wu every once in a while,” Ling Wen shrugs. “But he’ll be gone by the end of the day on another assignment.”

Xie Lian frowns with sympathy. “That really is a rather unforgiving workload.”

“Indeed.” Ling Wen agrees. “And what little time he has left before his next deployment—I’m sure he’ll want to spend it attending to personal matters.”

Deployment.

That’s an interesting choice of words.

There are many martial gods in the heavens. Most of them from many different walks of life—all united by skills in combat.

However, among all of them—Pei Ming is the one who is always treated as one thing above all else—

A soldier.

Xie Lian was a soldier himself for a time. And many more, over the course of his godhood, but in his experience…it was the unhappiest thing to be.

And Xie Lian can’t help but wonder, now, if he’s not dealing with Xuan Ji… What other personal matters does Pei Ming have?

"E…enou—!"

A slightly overstimulated gasp pierces the air, toes curling, fingers wrapping tightly around a bed post.

"Enough…!" the god pants raggedly, his chest flushed and heaving, covered in bruises and teeth marks. "I thought you'd be tired…"

The older martial god collapses on top of him, his weight heavy but pleasant between his thighs, breathing heavily against his lover's neck.

"I am…" Pei grumbles, mouthing at his pulse, taking satisfaction in the way it throbs under his teeth. "But it's been months."

And this is a pleasant sort of tired. One where the muscles in his abdomen ache pleasantly from exertion, and the scratches down his back ring with a victorious kind of sting.

He doesn't have to think. He can just enjoy the warmth of a body underneath him.

Well. For as long as his partner is willing to tolerate being smothered by his frame.

Which the other god does allow for a few moments, stroking his fingers through Pei's hair, waiting for his breathing to slow—but eventually he gives a pointed push, and Pei rolls over with a groan

"Oh, stop being such a baby," Shi Wudu rolls his eyes, rolling over onto his stomach as he reaches for the wine pitcher on the nightstand, casting Pei an annoyed look when he starts kissing his bare shoulder. "I said enough."

Pei grumbles, pitiful. "I only have a few hours."

"And then you can fuck any mortal you like to your heart's content," The Water Master grumbles, pouring himself a glass. "I'm already going to have to spend a week's worth of spiritual energy to make sure I'm not limping out of here."

"Or," Pei offers, eyeing the rapidly healing bite marks and finger shaped bruises on Shi Wudu's hips, thighs, and torso with irritation, "You could just limp."

The raven haired man snorts, taking a long sip of wine, "Sometimes it's like you don't even know me at all."

"Proud," Pei grumbles, sitting back against the headboard. "Are you ashamed of me?"

Shi Wudu's eyes cut to the side, flashing at him slightly as he reaches for a silk robe, pulling it around his shoulders, "Oh, very."

But there's a playful edge to his tone, and Pei grins.

"I might cry, if you keep talking to me like that..." He hums, reaching one arm around the god's waist, dragging him in.

Shi Wudu could stop him, but seems content to be pulled into the martial god's lap, bare thighs straddling Pei Ming's hips.

"My cruel, proud little water tyrant..." General Ming Guang muses, nosing underneath his lover's jaw, mouthing at his sensitive places until Shi Wudu shivers, one arm wrapping around the martial god's neck. "Always making me cry..."

"I hate that nickname," Shi Wudu grumbles. "Why do you always have to bring it up?"

"Well," Pei smiles, one playful nip softening into a lingering kiss against the hollow of the water god's ear, "because you're a very different kind of tyrant with me."

"You mean I set boundaries with you."

"Cruel, vindictive..."

Shi Wudu is quiet for a moment, taking another sip from his wine, and he comments —

"I'm surprised you let them push that woman off on Nan Yang. That's not like you."

After all—the reason Pei Ming and Shi Wudu have always gotten on so well is because they both have great pride.

Pei Ming doesn't speak—but the water god feels the grip around his waist tighten sharply, and then—

"If she was here, then I couldn't have you here." He mutters, resting his chin against Shi Wudu's shoulder. It's sharp, digging in slightly—but the younger man doesn't complain. "And it's been months."

Shi Wudu sighs, lowering himself down until he's sitting in Pei's lap more comfortably. "My palace is just as suitable."

Now, Pei sulks. "Your brother is there."

"It's your own fault that he doesn't like you."

"You would say that no matter what I did."

"He's cuter than you," Shi Wudu shrugs. "And he doesn't annoy me as much."

"And you wonder why I call you a water tyrant..." Pei whines. "It's been months, and you still talk to me like this..."

Dark hair flows freely over the water god's shoulders as he snickers. Shi Wudu doesn't laugh often, and he smiles even less.

Those moments are all for Pei, locked behind bedroom doors, hidden beneath sheets and layers of secrecy. He clings onto them greedily, calls them his own.

"You say that like you actually missed me..."

Pei's reply startles him.

"Of course I did."

His arms are still firm around Shi Wudu's waist, face buried in his neck.

It takes the younger god a moment to respond, but when he does—he pushes against Pei's chest, making him lean back so Shi Wudu can look at him more clearly.

"..." Shi Wudu sets his wine glass down, gripping Pei's chin between his thumb and his index finger.

He's as handsome as he's always been. All sharp features, a square jaw, strong eyebrows—magenta irises glimmering up at him with hazed desire.

But there's a darkness there.

Pei is a man of contradictions. He's competitive, but he's fair. Ruthless, but often kind. Playful, but one who carries a heavy burden.

Few people realize how haunted those eyes can be. The countless years of pain that lurk behind an arrogant shell.

"...That woman," Shi Wudu repeats.

"Xuan Ji," Pei supplies helpfully, but the water god still refuses to address her by her actual name.

"That woman," he continues, watching Pei's expression, "did a number on you back then, didn't she?"

The martial god doesn't reply immediately

Instead, he pulls Shi Wudu closer in, dipping his chin down, pressing his mouth over the curve of his shoulder, his collarbones, relishing in the warmth of their skin sliding together.

"She reminds me of a time in my life that I'm not proud of."

"Your greatest victory?"

"No," Pei snorts, "Yushi wasn't my greatest victory."

He says that so bitterly, that the water master is left rather surprised. "Forgive me," he muses, "my tutors always used to teach me that."

"Stop making me feel old," the general sighs. "Especially when we're in my bed."

"I thought you got off on having a younger lover," Shi Wudu muses, "silly me...what was your greatest victory then?"

Pei Ming pretends to think that over very seriously, one broad palm sliding up the water god's spine, making him shiver—the other wrapping firmly around his hip.

"Any time you say my name."

Pei Ming always has this talent for finding the one phrase that could make even the coldest hearted—Shi Wudu being among them—fill with butterflies.

"Those would be the greatest victories I've had."

It isn't difficult to see how he's managed to seduce so many, and leave even more broken hearted.

And for once—the water master doesn't have much of a response. No sly comeback or harsh criticism.

He just tips forward, resting his forehead against Pei's chest, silent.

It's an unusual reaction. Enough so to make the general frown. "…Are you alright?"

Shi Wudu doesn't answer, both arms wrapped around Pei's neck. Breathing him in. Allowing himself one small moment of comfort and weakness.

'Maybe I missed you, too.'

But he can't say that.

Because missing someone for him means something very different than what it means for Pei.

"Hey," Pei's fingers stroke the back of his neck, his voice taking on that warm, gentle tone, full of the pseudo-intimacy that breaks Shi Wudu a little bit, every single time. "You know you can talk to me."

With the way Shi Wudu's head is pressed against his chest, Pei Ming can't see the way his lips tremble.

'I can't.'

It's rare that the Water Master gets to feel safe. To find moments that feel close to freedom—or defiance.

Every time, he's always found those moments in Pei's embrace. Filthy little secrets that he carries with a vindictive sort of satisfaction.

But if Pei knew the truth—Shi Wudu would have nothing. And he needs this. Besides—

'He's already using you to hurt me.'

Instead of answering, when Shi Wudu lifts his head—he surges up, capturing Pei's lips once more with his own, sinking closer into his embrace, all moans and scraping teeth as the general's hands slide lower, bruising him in the most pleasant way.

"I thought you'd had enough," Pei rasps, hips rising up until Shi Wudu's breath hitches, relishing in the shudder that wracks the younger man's body.

“…I lied,” the water master breathes, pulling him closer, closer, until Pei rolls them over, pinning him down.

Shi Wudu is always lying, after all. One way or another.

Pei is slower this time, in the process of taking him apart. After all—he leaves in a few hours, and this is what will have to last him until his next homecoming.

He’s tired.

The water master is limp after, curled against his chest, his breaths slow and deep.

Pei doesn’t speak, allowing his lover to sleep, watching the peaceful set of his face as he strokes his hair.

‘You’re lucky you’ve never truly loved someone.’

That was what Xuan Ji said.

‘Because it would burn you.’

Burn his heart to ash.

That was what she said.

And Pei’s response had been that such a thing wouldn’t be possible.

He meant that—but only because he knew that love, the sort of love that means something—it doesn’t feel like burning.

Pei has been burned by desire many times throughout his life. He’s made countless mistakes as a result. All of them a result of his arrogance and his youth.

But falling in love, needing someone—it feels like drowning.

An anchor in his chest, dragging down until he chokes.

The current of it is impossible to resist, because he never actually wants to.

He wants to sink. To be dragged underneath the surface until it crushes him, pinned to the ocean floor by the cruelest of tyrants.

But it also means that he cannot resurface.

Even if staying submerged might spell doom for them both.

Still—he's tired, and he missed his bed, and the body beside him is warm.

Pei rests, and like always—he relishes in each moment like it might be his last.

Their last.

Ling Wen presses her forehead against her hands, letting out a tired breath.

Her next meeting with Jun Wu, she knows, will not be particularly pleasant. He's never in a pleasant mood when Pei returns, but—

"Ling Wen?"

She glances up, forcing a polite smile, "Your highness?"

Xie Lian smiles back at her warmly, his gaze focused a little too high on her forehead to be actual eye contact, but she appreciates the effort. "I wanted to thank you again for helping me so much with this incident, I appreciate it."

Once again, Ling Wen seems uncomfortable with accepting gratitude, but she nods.

"Just doing my job, your highness–and I think you'll be pleased to know that, with the offerings made from Mount Yu Jun...your debt has been completely cleared."

Xie Lian's eyes widen.

"...All of it?" He questions, clearly struggling to believe it.

After all, Xuan Ji was a difficult case–but 800,000 merits, just for that? It's a little difficult for him to grasp, and yet...

"Some very wealthy mortals called for our help, remember? Take it as good luck."

Xie Lian stares at her, wary to explain why he's so doubtful of it being a matter of 'good' luck–

(Given that his has always been rather bad)

--but he eventually forces another smile, nodding stiffly.

"I wanted to tell you that–and that I don't want to have to come begging to you for help every time I have a problem, so..." Xie Lian beams, lifting his chin, "I'm going to try and become self-sufficient!"

Ling Wen blinks, her eyebrows raising. "Like raising your profile?"

There are ways they can go about that, certainly. If Jun Wu intended to release his shackles soon, that certainly wouldn't take any time at all, but in the meantime...

Well, Pei is certainly overloaded. Maybe she could convince him to allow the prince to assist?

It seems mutually beneficial–Pei would be foolish to deny the help, so–

"I decided–since I don't have any worshippers at the moment, I'll just build my own shrine and bring them in myself!"

He explains this in a rush, as though he knows how it's going to be received.

Ling Wen knows he can't see her expression (which is staring at him like he's grown a second head), so she makes a low sound of disapproval, "Your highness–!"

After all, is such a thing not beneath him, a god of his age?

"I'll see you again soon!"

And with that, he's off.

Despite his rather rushed delivery and exit of the heavens (this time, descending far more gingerly--though he still smacked into a cloud or two), this idea wasn't one that Xie Lian came up with on the spur of the moment.

Actually, he had been thinking about it on Mount Yu Jun.

During his first banishment, Xie Lian had been desperate to ascend once again. For his parents sake, and that of Feng Xin and Mu Qing. That became more complicated after meeting Hong-er, but...

Going back to the Heavens was always the plan.

Then, during his second banishment, at some point...it felt less like ascension was the ultimate goal. More like he was simply enduring one day to the next. And when he was finally in the Heavens again–

Xie Lian found himself unhappy, confused, and overwhelmed.

In the end, it's probably something defective with him. He's been living this way for so long–he just...doesn't know how to...and, well...

He deserves to be alone.

But regardless of the reasoning behind his decision to return to the mortal realm–Xie Lian did make a plan.

Back when he was working on his dress in Nan Yang's temple, Xie Lian had asked himself–if he could go anywhere, and start over again, where would he go?

And the answer that came to him was simple–but comforting. There's a small village, sitting in the foot of the mountains.

Xie Lian stops on the path, leaning one palm against the trunk of a maple tree, the wind stirring in his hair.

It smells fresh, clean–like the forests surrounding. A river running at the foot of the mountain. And from the slightly wet smell–

They have rice paddy fields now.

Xie Lian smiles faintly, fingers digging into the bark.

It's changed in many ways. There are slightly more people now than there were back then--though this is still far too small to be called a town.

But the air feels the same, and the road bed is ancient, but familiar.

And the people–tens of generations removed from the ancestors that Xie Lian once knew–are still kind, directing him towards what has long since been an abandoned shrine, informing him of the village's new (three centuries old) name–

Puqi.

Honestly, Xie Lian hadn't expected the former shrine to still be standing–and to be fair, it's rather different from what it used to be.

It's burned down to the stone foundations several times. Been rebuilt as a shop, an inn–and now, a half built and abandoned family home.

And now, with it long since unoccupied, the locals see no harm in allowing a blind taoist take up residence, particularly if he wants to build a shrine.

None of them can remember the last time there was a real shrine in the village–most of them have to walk to the next town over to pray.

One of the farmers sends his sons to help Xie Lian settle in, even though he insists it's unnecessary–and they express their curiosity.

"Sir, which god are you going to be worshipping here?" One of them questions, holding the parts up for Xie Lian while he sets up his loom in the corner.

Right. Introductions. First impressions are important!

Xie Lian clears his throat, "For the Crown Prince of Xianle."

"Who?"

Well. He should have seen that one coming.

"Well...he's...a prince," Xie Lian explains awkwardly.

"We...kinda figured."

Right.

"What sort of stuff does he do?" One of the boys questions, fiddling with Xie Lian's hat before setting it back down carefully.

"Protects his believers I think," Xie Lian mutters, wishing he sounded more confident. Shouldn't he, of all people, know the answer to that? "Oh! And weaving, he's a patron of weavers."

That doesn't really get much of an inspiring stir from the group of villagers.

"...What about wealth, or good luck? Can he offer anything like that?"

"No," Xie Lian shakes his head. "He's not that sort of god, I'm afraid."

"Oh..." The boy frowns. "Maybe you should build a shrine for the Water Master instead! He's totally amazing, we'll all be rich!"

"Or what about Ling Wen?" Another speaks up. "Maybe we'd have a scholar then!"

"Or..." The last in the group seems to be the most shy about his suggestion, but it doesn't stop him from making it–

"What about General Dick Yang?"

Oh boy.

"Thanks for the suggestions!"

Xie Lian bows his head, smiling pleasantly. "But I think I'll be sticking with the Crown Prince of Xianle just the same."

Though worshipping the Water Master is just a little tempting, if only from a financial perspective, but...

Doing so just to make money for his own shrine seems more than a little dishonest, so...

Xie Lian sighs.

He doesn't have much at the moment–he really didn't leave Gusu with anything but his loom. So, for now, until he can start making money off of his weaving again...

He's really back to square one–and since busking really isn't that popular in the countryside, there's only one way for him to make money–

Scrap Collecting.

Which isn't so bad–Xie Lian has actually developed a knack for picking out worthwhile junk.

Most people would find that to be a pretty useless skill–and most people don't have absolutely nothing to their name, so they would be right.

But in Xie Lian's case–it works. Not to mention the fact that people are always so generous, he never struggles with finding donations!

(In truth, it's because of his good looks–but the Crown Prince has no way of knowing that.)

In any case, he manages to get his hands on some fortune shakers, an incense burner–the sort of things you need for a proper shrine, along with a few scrolls that seem interesting.

The villagers felt a little bad about donating such things to a blind man at first–but relaxed when Xie Lian assured them he could put them to good use.

His feet are pleasantly sore on the walk back–a feeling that he's never minded, but... An Ox cart draws near.

"Ah, Mr. Priest?" A kind faced farmer leans over, pulling the cart to a halt. "You heading back? Why don't you hop on, rest your feet for a while."

"Oh..." Xie Lian smiles, a little unsure. "I couldn't impose–"

"It's no imposition at all, please!"

Xie Lian's smile softens.

The people of this mountain have always been so kind. Clearly, that was something they passed down to their descendants.

"Alright, thank you," he murmurs, climbing up and into the back of the wagon, leaning against a pile of hay.

What he can't see now, is that a pair of long, shapely legs are visible from the other side of that same very bale of hay. Clad in black leather boots, trimmed with fur.

For now, the prince focuses on examining one of the scrolls he was given–running his fingers over the ink.

This scroll seems to be an informational text about the gods–perfect for his temple, and when he opens it, the first line–it's actually about him!

Prince of Xianle...ascended three times... God of Misfortune.

Xie Lian grimaces.

A Rubbish God.

And finally, in parenthesis–

(A martial god as well.)

Well. At least they remembered that much.

The prince lets out a low sigh, setting the scroll down in his lap–trying to be positive. It's his main method for self soothing at this point.

"Well...a god is a god," he mutters. "They're all equal."

"Just like all living things."

"Is that so?"

Beside You Again

Chapter Summary

> “...Well,” the prince sits forward slightly, “you know a bit about gods. What about ghosts?”
>
> The way he talks now—
>
> It sounds like he’s smiling.
>
> “I’ll tell you anything I can. Which Ghost do you want to know about?”
>
> “...Hua Cheng,” Xie Lian offers delicately, paying close attention to the young man’s reaction.
>
> His heartbeat and breathing are easy, undisturbed.
>
> “Hmmm...” The boy muses. “What about him?”

Chapter Notes

> You can find me on twitter and keep up with current updates of the story HERE

Xie Lian stops, jumping a little at the sound of a voice that isn't his own. A deep, smooth...warm voice, one with an almost playful edge to it, and—

Surprisingly nearby.

"I had an argument with a teacher about that once."

Xie Lian turns his head in the appropriate direction, peeking around the hay, but...for the most part, the air around him is just as dim and blank as ever.

Quickly, realizing the person must be mortal—he shuts his eyes. "You did? What sort of argument?

Xie Lian can hear the young man hum in response—but he can't see the youth's relaxed posture. The way he folds his arms behind his head—the lazy way his eyes glance over Xie Lian's face.

"She said that all things are equal too—but once we ascend as gods, we're infallible."

"Ah, well," Xie Lian laughs softly, shaking his head. "That's obviously not true. If it was, why would some of them fall?"

"That's exactly what I said," the youth smiles, eyes never leaving Xie Lian's face. "Plus...a little extra."

The prince raises an eyebrow. "Like what?"

"Oh..." He trails off for a moment, then admits, "That if gods were fallible, they had little authority to dictate right and wrong to mortals."

Xie Lian lets out a startled laugh, covering his mouth with one hand, "My, that's...quite a statement."

"You don't agree?"

"...Not with the premise of your assumption," Xie Lian replies, his tone mild. "I don't think it's about authority."

The youth raises an eyebrow, eyes as bright as starlight. "Then what do you think?" "Humans choose who they worship," he murmurs, fiddling with the scroll.

"If gods are wrong, or they fail to meet their obligations—people stop following them. If they don't live up to the beliefs they preach, then they don't last for very long."

He certainly didn't.

"So, in that sense...all gods are equal." He finishes.

Then he realizes how rude he must sound, talking over the young man like that, and he tacks on—

"Or, well—that's just what I think, anyway."

"Quite the philosopher," the youth muses. It sounds like a phrase that would be mocking, but...

From him, it sounds sincere.

After a moment, Xie Lian glances back down at his scroll—trying to regain some air of casualness, brushing his fingertips over more information about the gods. This time, speaking of the Water Master.

"...You know," Xie Lian frowns. "I never understood how a water god ended up being the god of wealth. I don't see how the two are connected."

"Ah," this time, when the young man speaks—he sounds a little cocky. "That has little to do with him being a water god."

"Oh?" Xie Lian lowers the scroll once more. "It doesn't?"

He shakes his head. "It's everything to do with him being a Water Tyrant. No ship leaves the harbor without an offering. If it does, they sink. As such, he controls trade—so naturally, he's the wealthiest of the gods."

"...You certainly do know quite a bit about gods," Xie Lian comments, setting the scroll back in his bag. "Particularly for someone so young."

"Oh?" The young man sits forward. "How old do you think I am?"
"Ah..." Xie Lian pauses, turning his head away, slightly unsure.

Which would be the least offensive thing to do–over estimating, or underestimating? And can he really judge that accurately based on only his voice?

"...Eighteen?" The god guesses awkwardly–and he hears a soft chuckle in response, un-offended.

"Give or take."

Xie Lian hears soft rustling, like the young man has kicked back against the hay once more, and there's such an ease to him, it...

“Either way, you know more than I would have expected for someone that age. Are you studying cultivation?”

He hears a snort in response.

“No—I just like reading whenever I get the chance, I pick up a lot that way.”

Xie Lian finds himself in the odd position where he’s struggling to keep his eyes closed.

He doesn’t normally struggle with that. After all—there’s not much temptation when there’s nothing to see.

Besides—this is a mortal, so he can't risk looking at him anyway. And yet...

There's something strikingly familiar about him, one that makes Xie Lian feel like, if he could just look at the young man properly—he would recognize him from somewhere.

But even when he peeks under his eyelashes—there's only darkness.

"...Well," the prince sits forward slightly, "you know a bit about gods. What about ghosts?"

The way he talks now—

It sounds like he's smiling.

"I'll tell you anything I can. Which Ghost do you want to know about?"

"...Hua Cheng," Xie Lian offers delicately, paying close attention to the young man's reaction.

His heartbeat and breathing are easy, undisturbed.

"Hmmm..." The boy muses. "What about him?"

"...Crimson Rain Sought Flower," Xie Lian pulls one leg underneath him. "How did he get that name?"

"Well, the stories are vague and contradictory..." The teenager mumbles, "But the most common tale is that—when he loses control—the sky rains blood."

"Oh my," Xie Lian murmurs.

"I suppose it's a good thing he's always wearing red."

He can't see the surprised look the young man gives him, but he hears an amused grunt, "What do you mean?"

"Well..." Xie Lian pauses. "...The stains won't show up on his clothes?" There's a long pause.

Then, laughter, but—not the sort that makes Xie Lian feel embarrassed, or like he's the butt of a joke.

Delighted little peals of laughter, the sort that make Xie Lian's heart wobble uncertainly against his ribs.

“I never thought of that, but yes, you’re right!”

He clutches a hand over his stomach, letting out a few more amused chuckles, “And that’s not so far off from how he got the name.”

Xie Lian tilts his head, for some reason—he’s smiling, just a little—without even meaning to.

“It is?”

The young man nods, “He lost his temper while clearing out another ghost’s lair—and when he saw a white flower getting stained by the bloody downpour, he tilted his umbrella to protect it.”

He says the story a little sheepishly—almost like he thinks it’s silly, but... Xie Lian’s smile softens.

“...What a lovely way to get a name,” he shakes his head, unaware of how closely he’s being watched.

For the most part, anyway.

“Is he violent?”

“...” The smile on the young man’s face isn’t quite as bright now. “That depends.”

“On?”

He fiddles with the end of his sleeve, glancing away from Xie Lian’s face for the first time. “If he’s been provoked.”

Well—there are certainly worse things to be.

“Do you know what kind of person he was, before he died?”

Now, the teenager’s smile fades completely.

“A bad one.”

He doesn’t offer much more explanation than that, and with how quiet his voice becomes, Xie Lian...doesn’t pry.

Instead, he opts for what must sound like the silliest line of questioning ever, coming from him, but...

“Do you know what he looks like?”

The young man doesn’t make fun of him for asking. Instead, he sits up, scooting closer to Xie Lian until they’re truly sitting side by side, his legs crossed in front of him as he leans close, and—

The tips of the God’s ears are a little warm.

“What do you think he looks like?”

“...” Xie Lian turns his face away, his throat a little dry.

He—isn’t used to having people sit close to him anymore, that’s all.

“...Probably a young man, like...you.”

“What makes you say that?”

His eyes bare down on Xie Lian’s cheek, and the god keeps his chin turned away.

“Just a hunch,” he murmurs, “And he can probably take whichever form he likes, so...”

“But his true form,” The boy presses. “You think that would be a young man too?”

“Well,” Xie Lian hums, thinking. “...I think so, yes.”

And then, remembering Mount Yu Jun, he adds—

“And tall.”

From the way Xie Lian’s face easily fell into his chest when falling from an elevated sedan—he’s likely quite tall.

The young man doesn’t debate that point, despite having questioning every other statement Xie Lian has made so far.

“I do know one thing about his true form.”

That catches Xie Lian’s attention. “Really? What is it?”

“His eye,” He explains, leaning his chin on his head. “His right one.”

“Oh,” The prince crowns with sympathy. As someone with a complicated relationship with his own eyes—that would be a horrifying thing to go through.

“I wonder how that happened…”

“Something stupid,” is muttered half under someone’s breath, and Xie Lian smiles.

“What was that?”

“People say he gauged it out himself,” the young man explains, not acknowledging the outburst. “That he went mad.”

“…I see,” The god replies.

“Does he have any weaknesses?”

He’s surprised by how quickly the teenager replies now, “His ashes.”

His ashes.

Xie Lian’s fingers drift to his throat absentmindedly, unaware of the way the young man’s eyes follow him. “Because if he lost those, he…”

“Would be gone forever,” the young man agrees. “That’s right.”

What a frightening thought.

“But rumor is—Hua Cheng’s ashes have been hidden for a long time.”

“Hidden?”

“The love of his life carries them for him,” the boy explains softly. “That’s the story I know.”

Oh. That—

That’s horribly romantic, but…

“That’s a lot of trust to put in someone,” Xie Lian murmurs, “what if he ended up betrayed?”

He can’t imagine a more heartbreaking thought—but the youth doesn’t seem bothered.

“Even if he was—I don’t think he’d care about that.”

The teenager explains firmly. “If it were me—even if the person I chose to give my ashes to destroyed them, I’d be fine with it. I wouldn't have any regrets."

That's...an unparalleled level of commitment that Xie Lian struggles to comprehend, but...

It's oddly comforting, too.

"...I just realized," he murmurs, lifting his chin, "I'm sorry for not asking earlier, my friend—but what's your name?"

Xie Lian wasn't the only one, making plans after Mount Yu Jun.

Hua Cheng had worn countless faces over the years. Dozens of aliases.

But never once did he feel like himself. It was never his true face, and he—

He was never Hong'er.

Hua Cheng suspects—even if his name hadn't been stolen, he would have taken a different one eventually anyway.

Because the name Hong'er—it was the one his mother gave him.

It's a name that belongs to his humanity, and—

Xie Lian is the only one left who knows the part of him.

It belongs to him, and Hua Cheng wouldn't have wanted anyone else using that name either.

The silence stretches for so long, Xie Lian begins to wonder. "...H..."

The god sits there patiently, unable to see the way that the teenager grits his teeth, wiping blood from the corner of his mouth with a glare.

It was worth one more try.

But...

He glances around them.

The road is framed by a sea of maples, turning red with the end of summer.

He lets out a slow, shaky sigh, taking in the beauty of it—almost like a sea of fire, swallowing up the entire valley.

Hong'er is dead, and Hua Cheng isn't human anymore. But dead isn't gone.

And there's another name that a mother gave him.

"...Me?" He questions softly.

Xie Lian can't imagine why the teenager is so hesitant, but—the question seems to genuinely vex him, and it really isn't worth that.

He's about to tell him that it's alright, he doesn't have to answer, when—

"I'm the third in my family," the teenager replies in an easy drawl. "So, they call me San Lang."

He folds his hands behind his head on the cart, maple red robes gleaming in the twilight.

Dark, wild hair pulled over his shoulder in a loose ponytail. Eyes like falling stars, staring up at the setting sun.

And when he looks down...

The Crown Prince is smiling, the setting sun hitting his hair just right, highlighting the lighter strands of brown in a sea of chestnut waves, his face filled with warmth.

And the youth can't do anything but stare back at him, eyes wide and helpless. "It's nice to meet you, San Lang," he murmurs.

San Lang.

Xie Lian—he really likes that name.

"My name is Xie Lian."

The younger man swallows dryly, clinging to some semblance of composure. "It's...nice to meet you too," he murmurs, swallowing down heartbreak. "...Xie Lian."

There's a pause, with Xie Lian left unsure of what to say. He isn't sure what about such a subject could leave the young man sounding...

Sad. Quietly so, but still—the last thing the prince wants is to upset him. “So…are you traveling somewhere in particular?”

San Lang shrugs, blowing a maple leaf off of his shoulder. “My mother and I got into a disagreement, so I got kicked out for a little while. I’m just wandering around and killing time for now.”

Xie Lian cracks a small smile. What a carefree way of thinking. “Is it alright to ask what the fight was about?”

San Lang’s smile is lopsided, eyes flashing—and any sadness in his tone is replaced by a calm air of playfulness. “Fighting with my teachers.”

Xie Lian covers his mouth, laughing softly. “I hope you’re welcome back soon…”

“Don’t worry about me,” the youth shakes his head. “I’m her favorite. A little disagreement in the family every now and then keeps things interesting, don’t you think?”

Xie Lian knows he should probably scold him—it’s a rather misbehaved way of thinking, but…endearing.

“You said you have two older brothers?”

San Lang hums in agreement. “Zhang Wei and Bolin.”

Xie Lian nods, noticing that the young man never did mention his family name—but he doesn’t protest. They’re lovely names, actually. “Do they miss you, with your mother kicking you out?”

“Ah, no, they’re both out of the house by now,” San Lang shakes his head. “With lives of their own. Besides—they’re much older than I am.”

Xie Lian nods—such things are rare, but not heard of. It also explains the cocky, slightly childish attitude.

Any family would be delighted to have another son later on in life. Particularly such a clever, charming young man. It’s easy to imagine that San Lang likely grew up a little spoiled, but…Xie Lian isn’t one to judge on that front.

“It must have been a little lonely growing up.”

After all—Xie Lian was an only child himself, and he often longed for company. But his mother’s health was never such where they felt it was safe for her to try for another child. That was why he worked so hard to make friends his own age, even…if it didn't work out.

"They were gone before I could really be used to having them around," the youth explains, then adds with a small smile, "My mother—she actually used to tell me that my older brothers were dragons, and they just flew away for a little while."

Xie Lian smiles softly.

"That's a sweet story. Does that make you a little dragon too?"

"Sometimes," he almost doesn't sound like he's playing along when he says that—like he's actually being completely serious. "But usually not."

Xie Lian tilts his head, but now, San Lang has his own questions. "What about you, gege? where are you traveling?"

Xie Lian's expression freezes for a moment—and all thoughts of dragons, brothers, and indecent behavior are forgotten.

Gege.

It's been…so long since…

His heart swells with something bittersweet. "Is everything alright?"

"…Yes," Xie Lian smiles apologetically. "Sorry, I was in my own head for a moment. I'm returning to my shrine—in the Puqi Village, though you're probably not familiar —"

"I am, actually." San Lang states firmly. "I visited when I was much younger."

The prince can't remember the last time he sat down and had such a pleasant, easy conversation with a mortal. Normally—people don't spare much time for a blind man, and Xie Lian…

Isn't used to having company.

But this—

This is rather lovely, actually. "You did?"

San Lang nods.

Xie Lian can't see the nostalgia in his gaze, when he watches him. Can't know how much he longed to tell the god such things about himself, before—and always regretted that he never did.

"I was born further north, in Qinghe." Xie Lian is familiar with the port city.

Ancient—formerly a stronghold of the Kingdom of Xuli, even though the once mighty empire of the north has declined and broken up into smaller territories now.

"But there were better opportunities for my family in the central plains. So, when we traveled south..."

San Lang shrugs, his eyes sliding over to the maple trees once more, watching as the sun slips underneath the horizon, the valley slowly falling into shadow.

"We took this road. The leaves looked just like this—even back then."

Xie Lian glances around them, having to continuously remind himself to shut his eyes around San Lang—that's the problem with getting so comfortable. "Have the leaves already started changing?"

"Mhmm," San Lang agrees, plucking one falling maple leaf from the air.

He drops it in the god's lap, giving Xie Lian the chance to feel for himself that it's dried and fallen, making way for autumn. "See?"

Xie Lian smiles faintly. He always liked that time of year—it brings back the fond memories he has from his youth.

"So, gege—" San Lang tilts his head, "Which god is your shrine for?" Ah.

Xie Lian smiles over at him, prepared for the same reaction he's gotten so far. "The Crown Prince of Xianle," he explains. "But it's okay if you haven't heard of him."

The younger man frowns. "I—"

The wagon jolts slightly, coming to a sudden stop—and Xie Lian, unbraced for such a movement, is sent toppling forward, half expecting to go tumbling out of the cart.

'Oh well,' he thinks to himself grimly, bracing himself for landing, 'the robes aren't new anyway.'

But he doesn't fall.

Someone catches him—easily, but with an immediacy that makes it seem like he started moving as soon as Xie Lian did.

And for a moment, he finds himself cradled against the young man's chest, the soft fabric of his tunic underneath his cheek.

The god forces himself not to feel excitement this time, when he catches the scent of the forest and rain. Not after what happened last time.

An arm is wrapped around the small of his back, holding him steady.

"Are you alright, gege?"

For a moment, he doesn't lift his head.

But when he does, he offers a small smile. "Yes—thank you, San Lang."

The young man smiles, patting Xie Lian's back gently in response before letting him go.

At the front of the carriage, the farmer struggles.

"Blasted beast!" He cries. "I'm sorry, boys—she won't go further!"

Xie Lian frowns slightly, reaching over to use San Lang's shoulder to brace himself as he stands up in the cart, his head poking out from behind the hay, peeking his eyelids open in order to look for a disturbance.

(He doesn't see it, but San Lang's eyes flash pleasantly when Xie Lian initiates contact, even for something so small.)

And there, maybe a few dozen yards down the path...he sees a group of dark auras. Weak. Not a threat to Xie Lian, but with two mortals to look after...

It could be troublesome.

"Is there some sort of event going on?" He mutters, half under his breath, only to hear San Lang reply—

"A Ghost Festival."

A time when the Ghost and Mortal realms are impossibly close together, and…it's easy to lose your way without even meaning to.

Xie Lian frowns, walking towards the front of the cart. "…It'll be alright," he murmurs, allowing Ruoye to sneakily slide down his sleeve and slip around the cart, forming a protective barrier. "We just have to keep quiet."

San Lang manages it just fine—but the poor farmer is in such distress, Xie Lian isn't given a choice other than knocking him out with two gentle strikes to his pressure points, easing him back against the hay.

The group of ghosts approach, yellow lanterns swinging in the night

They stop when they run into the barrier created by Ruoye, clearly a little baffled, but after a moment they shrug it off, circling around and continuing on their way.

Xie Lian lets out a shaky breath of relief, "Are you alright?" "No," San Lang mumbles, his tone sullen.

Before Xie Lian can ask what's wrong, he drops down onto the driving bench at the front of the cart next to him, sliding closer until Xie Lian can feel the heat of his body against his side. "I'm pretty scared, actually."

Funny—he doesn't sound very convincing, saying that.

In any case, Xie Lian offers him a comforting smile, resting a hand against his knee. "Don't be," he reassures him. "I'm a priest, remember? I can handle a few ghosts—I'll keep you safe."

Those eyes are watching closely again, fixing on the hand resting against his knee.

He's quiet, long enough that Xie Lian is about to ask him if he's alright, when voices start crying out again in the distance.

"The Ghost Fires!" Someone cries out, "Someone's been out here scattering them!"

"How cruel!" Another Ghost whimpers.

His head isn't actually attached to his body, so he uses his hands to shake it with dismay. "Who would do such a thing?"

“Hey…” One of them trails off, “That magical barrier back there, you don’t think…” Xie Lian winces, praying his rotten luck won’t—

“…it’s a Taoist?”

Yeah, who was he kidding?

They need to get moving, which is why Xie Lian starts to reach for the reins—quickly realizing just what a horrendous idea that would be, when…

San Lang, seeming to understand his intention, leans back, sweeping one arm and leg around, taking the reins for himself, using them to gently flick the oxen to life.

It’s very helpful, but it also…

He tilts his face down, and even with the breeze—his face is hot.

The action leaves the god sitting between San Lang’s spread thighs, the young man’s chest pressed against Xie Lian’s back—warm and solid.

It’s—not inappropriate, exactly—but Xie Lian isn’t used to having people so close. Not —

Not ever, really.

“Gege, did you hear me?”

He jumps, startled out of his thoughts, slightly embarrassed by the slightly higher pitch to his voice when he replies, “I’m sorry, but I didn’t.”

San Lang shrugs, leaning closer so he can whisper next to Xie Lian’s ear, “There’s a fork in the path. Which way should we go?”

That doesn’t help at all with the confusing rush of warmth down the back of Xie Lian’s neck, but he clears his throat. “I…it’s easy to get lost in the Ghost Realm once you’re in it,” he explains. “It has to be a lucky guess, and—”

“That’s why I asked you,” San Lang blinks.

“…Lucky guesses aren’t my specialty, San Lang,” Xie Lian protests weakly, fighting the urge to shrink between his eyes with shyness, feeling so horribly silly.

"Don't worry, gege," San Lang's voice is warm and reassuring. "Just pick, and everything will be fine."

Xie Lian squirms silently, and for the first time in years—he feels like a child.

"...Left," he mutters, clearing his throat, then trying to say it again with more confidence, "That was the original path, anyway."

San Lan smiles faintly, flicking the reins. "Then left it is."

At first, when they veer in that direction—Xie Lian thinks he's made a mistake, hearing the ghosts come their way, but...just as he and San Lang both turn their heads back to look, all trace of the ghost procession seems to disappear.

Xie Lian frowns, raising an eyebrow.

"Did they just...leave?"

San Lang shrugs, his eyes returning to their original color, fangs shrinking back as he leans away to an appropriate distance. "That protection spell you cast was amazing— you probably scared them off."

It sure didn't seem like it, but...

Xie Lian smiles, "...I supposed I did! I really didn't realize it was so intimidating..."

The night is cool and calm. There's an occasional breeze, the temperature dropping slightly—but San Lang is warm against his back, and they almost sit in comfortable silence.

Xie Lian says almost, because, well...

He spends most of it with a nearly rigid posture. Never spreading his knees even a little bit, less his legs brush against San Lang's. Sitting at just the right angle, shoulders hunched in, so they brush one another as minimally as possible.

And yet...

The journey back takes at least an hour, and San Lang's posture is so easy, so relaxed —he even pulls one leg up to rest his foot against the bench. A lazy stance, but it makes Xie Lian feel comfortable enough to spread his knees—if only a little bit.

That calm is contagious, enough so for Xie Lian to slowly—cautiously, hoping the young man doesn't find it rude, but he was the one who placed them so close together in the first place—ease back until he's leaning against San Lang's chest, fingers fidgeting in his lap.

But there is one thing that keeps nagging at him.

After seeing that many ghosts—and watching Xie Lian cast a spell like that—shouldn't San Lang be a little less relaxed?

Honestly, while he does have a playful demeanor that can be easily mistaken as youth…he feels older.

Much older.

As a matter of fact—there are moments when Xie Lian feels as though he's talking with someone—or something—far closer to himself in terms of years, but…

"San Lang?" he questions softly.

The chest against his back rumbles slightly as San Lang hums in response.

"Yes, gege?"

"Do you…" He starts, then stops, his fingers fidgeting a little more quickly, then stopping. "…Have you ever had your palm read?" He blurts out.

In all honesty, it isn't much of a ruse—but if he's mortal, it won't matter, right?

San Lang is smiling down at him, eyes shining with affection he doesn't have to hide, not when there's no one around to witness it.

His voice, however, is casual as ever. "Nope! Why?"

"…Do you mind if I take a look?" Xie Lian questions, holding his own hands up in offering.

"Not at all," the young man replies, gathering the reins in one hand, before placing the other in Xie Lian's.

It's bigger than he expected it to be—a little more sturdy with his own than he was expecting.

And when he feels a few callouses—on the underside of his palm mostly, and he blurts out—

“Have you ever used sabers?”

San Lang doesn’t look surprised that he figured that out, his gaze warm, but he still speaks with awe, “You can tell just from holding my hand? How amazing!”

Xie Lian’s touch is featherlight, running over the details of his palms. After all— ghosts can fake many things in their human skins, but very few could manage to capture the details flawlessly.

And yet...

His palm lines are perfectly normal. “Well?”

Right.

Xie Lian clears his throat, trying very hard not to sound terribly distracted. “You’re a determined, loyal person with a strong sense of self. You’re capable of turning negative circumstances into blessings. My friend—your future is very blessed.”

Of course—he’s making all of that up. Xie Lian never bothered to learn actual fortune telling from Mei Nianqing, always so sure in his own path that he never felt the need to look ahead.

(As one might imagine, he has some regrets.)

But in general, he’s found that no one ever complains when he offers some vague, overall positive obfuscations about their future.

He lets go of San Lang’s palm with a smile, but the youth doesn’t draw it back immediately. “You don’t see anything else?”

“Um...”

Xie Lian trails off, trying to think if there was something more that one needed to include in something like palm reading—and San Lang leans closer, his smile turning sly.

“Like my love life, for example? Anything about marriage?” Xie Lian pauses, slightly flustered.

“...I’m sure you won’t have any trouble on that front, no need for a fortune teller there!” He laughs nervously, rubbing the side of his head.

“Oh?”

Now, Xie Lian feels somewhat aware of the fact that he’s being watched closely. “What makes you say that?”

“Well…”

Xie Lian leans away, only to end up leaning into San Lang’s arm on the other side of him, and his cheeks are slightly hot once more. Actually—he’s been blushing on and off ever since they got into this position.

How pitiful, at his age.

“Well—you’re clever, and handsome.” Xie Lian shrugs. “I have no doubt that girls spend a lot of time throwing themselves at you. So, you’ll have no trouble finding a wife. I-If that’s what you’re interested in, anyway—”

“Husband or wife,” San Lang replies with a confident drawl, “if they’re the right person, it makes no difference to me.”

That answer is vaguely familiar—in a way that makes the prince’s stomach lurch, but San Lang doesn’t give him very much time to think about it.

“But gege—how do you know that I’m handsome?”

Xie Lian pauses, swallowing dryly. San Lang’s arm is warm and firm against his back, and his torso is pressed comfortably against Xie Lian’s side, and he just…

“You…have a nice voice?” He mumbles, hands balling up nervously.

“Plenty of people with nice voices have horrible faces,” San Lang muses, clicking his tongue with dismay. “Maybe I should invest in a proper mask—”

“I highly doubt you need to do that,” Xie Lian mumbles, only to jump when San Lang leans even closer.

“Why not see for yourself?”

“I, oh…” Xie Lian’s eyebrows crease slightly, “I wouldn’t want to intrude…”

San Lang's laugh is soft and easy, just like the night breeze itself. "If gege is shy, that's perfectly fine—but I wouldn't think of it as intruding at all."

...He's really shameless, isn't he?

Xie Lian has never considered himself shy before, but....

He reaches up, awkwardly patting his palm against San Lang's cheek, finding the skin there soft and smooth, without a hint of stubble that one might expect from an older man.

His jaw is squared, though not quite out of the softness that comes with youth. And—

Xie Lian was right, he is smiling—and there's a soft, endearing dimple in the right corner of his mouth that makes the god's heart flutter.

His examination isn't as thorough as what he might have done normally—he just traces his fingertip down the line of San Lang's nose before he retreats, not wanting the young man to notice how unsteady Xie Lian's hands have become.

"Well, I was right."

The youth smirks, "Oh?"

Xie Lian smiles up at him awkwardly before looking away, scratching the side of his cheek. "You're very good looking, San Lang."

He can't see the way the youth's expression shifts into a sulking pout, because that wasn't the exact word he had been looking for.

"Very good looking?" He questions softly, carefully fishing for the exact reaction he wants, but...

Xie Lian turns his chin slightly, his eyebrow raising with endeared amusement. "San Lang...are you just trying to get me to compliment you?"

Instead of a polite denial, Xie Lian gets an impish laugh in response, and his lips turn up into an endeared smile.

Yes—definitely shameless.

"Ah, gege—it looks like we've arrived at your shrine."

The wagon is gently pulled to a halt as San lang climbs down first, offering Xie Lian a hand to help him down in turn—his grip gentle, but firm as he bears the god's weight with ease. And Xie Lian...

He really can't remember the last time someone looked after him so considerately "Thank you, San Lang..." he murmurs.

It's a brief matter, waking the farmer up, politely requesting that he not repeat the events he had witnessed, and once that's finished—he looks back to the young man.

"Where will you go now?"

"Oh..." San Lang trails off with a shrug.

"I'm not sure—I'll probably just find a cave or something to sleep in. Thank you for the company and the conversation, I rather enjoyed it."

Really, Xie Lian enjoyed it as much as he did, but...he frowns.

"Why don't you just sleep here?"

He hears San Lang's footsteps stop.

"In your shrine? Can I?" The young man questions, turning around. "I wouldn't want to intrude..."

Xie Lian smiles softly, nodding up at him, "It's probably not as nice as what you're used to, but it gets cold here during the nights, so it's better than some...cave..."

He trails off when he feels San Lang lean close—so close, his hair brushes against Xie Lian's cheek as he—leans over to pick up the god's back of scraps, pulling them over his shoulder.

Right.

"As long as you don't mind," he smiles, following Xie Lian down the stone path.

Crickets sing gently in the night, and Xie Lian doesn't need help walking up the front steps—they're far too familiar to him now.

"San Lang? Are you alright?"

The young man has paused in the doorframe, staring down at those very steps.

"…Yes," he murmurs, stepping over the threshold. "Where should I sleep?"

After all—it's already quite late into the night, and Xie Lian…

Seems more fatigued, than the young man would have expected.

"Oh, there's only one bed, so…" The prince laughs, a little awkward. "We'll have to share. Unless that makes you uncomfortable! I can—"

"It's fine," San Lang replies with ease, setting the bag of scraps down by the door, so that Xie Lian can look through them later. "I don't mind."

There was a time when he absolutely did mind.

When he would insist on sleeping on those shrine steps, even when the snow started to come down. Only tempted inside by Xie Lian calling to him, pleading that he was cold.

Hua Cheng is old enough to understand now that the prince was pretending for his sake.

He drops down onto the bamboo mat, watching as his god goes about getting ready to rest. Slipping his bamboo hat down onto the counter, coming over to sit down beside him as he fiddles with his boots, carefully slipping them off of his feet.

He's too trusting.

Xie Lian can defend himself against many things. Mortal and god alike—but there are still things in this world that can harm him.

Hua Cheng could harm him, if his intentions were different.

'You need to guard yourself more, ' he thinks—but doesn't dare say. 'What if I wasn't here?'

But—he hasn't been here.

For eight centuries, through hell only knows what sort of pain, he hasn't been there.

"I'm sorry, the place is a little rundown," Xie Lian murmurs, sitting up and reaching for the pin holding his hair up into a small half-bun.

It's only when he feels the slight breeze of exposed air against his ankle that he stiffens, clapping his hand over the shackle there.

Knowing that he has to be careful—because no matter how comfortable San Lang's presence might be—he's still mortal, as far as Xie Lian knows.

But if San Lang saw—he doesn't say a word about it, simply replying —

"I think it's perfect—just missing a thing or two, but then you'll be up and running."

Xie Lian thinks that over, rubbing his chin. "I think I got pretty much everything I needed today..."

San Lang raises an eyebrow, watching as the prince combs his fingers through his hair—too tired to bother with a comb for one evening.

"What about a divine statue?"

Xie Lian pauses, his cheeks a little warm.

He'd...forgotten the most important part, hadn't he?

"...I have paper and paint somewhere," Xie Lian smiles, "I'll try and put something together tomorrow."

If not—he could always make a tapestry. Not exactly the normal medium for such a thing, but he could certainly manage that.

"I'm somewhat artistic," San Lang offers. "I could give it a try."

"Ah, that's very kind, but..." Xie Lian waves that idea off gently, "You would have to know what the prince looks like."

San Lang's answer comes so easily—it startles him.

"I do."

The god pauses, slowly turning his chin in San Lang's direction.

"Weren't we speaking of him earlier on the cart?" San Lang reminds him gently. "I know the Flower Crowned Martial God."

Xie Lian's throat tightens, not having heard someone use that title in who knows how long.

“...you really know of him?” The prince murmurs.

“I do,” the young man replies, watching the glimpse of happiness he sees in Xie Lian’s gaze. Cautiously hopeful.

“And what do you think of him?”

Telling Xie Lian exactly what he thought, at this stage—it seems like too much too soon. So, San Lang opts for something less intimate.

He rolls onto his back, folding his arms behind his head. “That the Heavenly Emperor must really hate him,” he murmurs, glaring at the ceiling of the shrine.

Xie Lian raises an eyebrow, shrugging out of his outer robe. What an...interesting sentiment.

“Why do you think that?”

“Why else would he banish him twice?”

“...” Xie Lian slips the robe the rest of the way from his shoulders, shaking his head. What a childish way of thinking—but then again, San Lang is rather young.

“When people are wrong, they have to be punished,” the prince murmurs.

“They don’t learn otherwise.”

And heavens, did the Crown Prince of Xianle have so much to learn. It mortifies him at times, to remember how naive and carefree he was back then. How arrogant he must have seemed.

“The Heavenly Emperor was only doing his duty,” Xie Lian shrugs.

“I’m sure that the crown prince doesn’t blame him.” He reaches over, handing San Lang a blanket, “Here—it’s already late, we should rest.”

The young man nods obediently, watching as the god lays down, pulling his outer robe over himself as a blanket, slowly drifting off.

‘Maybe he should.’

That’s what Hua Cheng wants to say, but doesn’t dare now. Not so soon.

He sighs, closing his eyes for a moment, entering the password to Yin Yu's communication array—just to ensure that the festival went off without incident, which it did.

Next, he enters another private array—one that used to include others, but now only two remain.

'Progress?'

'He's trying to build a new lair in Quan Yizhen's territory,' Shuo replies calmly. From the creaking Hua Cheng can hear in the background—he's in one of his forests.

'But I'm probably going to push him East.'

Understandable. The martial god of the west is rather unpredictable, and while Hua Cheng doesn't feel wariness in dealing with him, Shuo hasn't developed to that point.

'Have you already begun?'

'He should be falling into the trap in three...two...'

There's a loud, wailing shriek in the background, and Shuo lets out a surprised chuckle.

'Ah, he was a little early this time.'

'How is his demeanor?'

Hua Cheng doesn't consider Qi Rong worth dealing with directly anymore.

He's weak enough where it's a struggle for the Ghost King not to kill him accidentally, if he's too irritated, and, well...

Shuo's version of handling him is far more amusing.

But the younger ghost doesn't sound smug when he replies.

'Unstable.' Then, after a pause—

'Xuan Ji was completely out of control herself, even under his orders. Something's happening, gege. Everyone's unsettled.'

Hua Cheng lets out a low sigh, watching the ceiling of the shrine with a cold, impassive gaze.

'It might be that time.'

There's a tense silence.

Hua Cheng effectively selected the last Ghost King, through his actions with He Xuan on Mount Tonglu. Most aren't aware of that, but if the Kiln does open again soon—

They've already discussed the possibility of what they would do, if Qi Rong tries to become a calamity.

But those plans aren't for anyone else's ears. Not at the moment.

'Keep pushing him east. If anything else noteworthy happens, contact me.'

There's a pause, more screams from Qi Rong, and then—

'Yes, gege.'

The array goes silent, and the Ghost King is left to his thoughts.

Xie Lian's breathing is gentle and even, only broken by the occasional shiver as the wind blows through the gaps in the wooden siding on the side of the shrine.

He wasn't wrong—it does get cold at night. Hua Cheng will have to deal with that tomorrow.

Still—he hasn't needed to keep warm from the cold in centuries, and as such, he's quick to take the blanket that Xie Lian gave him before, carefully spreading it over the god's sleeping form.

Still, when the youth's fingertips brush against Xie Lian's cheek—his skin is cold.

He's reminded of the first time Xie Lian left Puqi, after his death—collapsing in a ditch, shivering from the cold, and no matter how hard Hong'er tried to help—

A ghost fire burns cold.

At first, his intentions really were completely pure.

Because it's a simple matter, increasing the temperature of his own body, turning it into the equivalent of a small furnace, allowing that warmth to radiate towards the prince, making him more comfortable.

And watching those shivers slow and stop—it makes him smile.

Because even if there are plenty of things that Hua Cheng can't do, can't be for his god right now—he can keep him warm. And that—that's more than he could do before.

That was all he was thinking of, in the beginning. Before Xie Lian rolled over in his sleep with a soft sigh.

Hua Cheng watches, eyes slightly wide, as the god unconsciously squirms towards that source of warmth, until he—

Until he's face first against Hua Cheng's chest, their legs bumping against one another, breaths coming out soft and slow against the ghost king's tunic.

Oh.

Hua Cheng has dreamt of this so many times, he's lost count of the nights. Wondering if that was really how it would feel, to have his god in his arms. If the weight of him would really be so intoxicating. Or if his breath would really sound that musical against the air.

And—

Xie Lian sighs, turning his head until his cheek presses closer against Hua Cheng's chest, legs curling in slightly.

—it does.

The Ghost King was never living under the impression that he was a good person. He always knew that he was selfish.

A shameless child, a reckless teenager—and now, a selfish man.

'I'm a horrible person,' he thinks to himself, wrapping one arm around the prince's back, encouraging him to press as close as he wants.

In doing so, Hua Cheng allows the warmth emanating from him to flare, which only draws Xie Lian in like a moth to a flame.

Until their legs are intertwined, and his face is pressed into the Ghost King's shoulder, sighing contentedly.

Slowly, Hua Cheng presses his face into his God's hair, taking a slow, contented breath.

A horrible fucking person. And Xie Lian—he's too trusting.

His other arm comes around the prince now, cradling him close.

But that's fine.

He's here now, and he'll—

He'll keep him safe.

His fingertips slip up the god's back, rubbing slow, meaningless patterns—gently pushing his hair to the side, finding the chain at the nape of his neck.

'You would be happy, if you knew Hong-er was holding you, right? '

Maybe not for the reasons Hua Cheng would like, but...

He takes that weak justification, and he clings onto it. Uses it to soothe him as he rapidly oscillates between guilt and euphoria, holding Xie Lian close.

And in the end—all the prince knows is that it's been years—decades, even—since he slept so well.

Then, he wakes up alone.

The Puppet Master

Chapter Summary

“Hey, gege…” one of them calls over to him, stopping to pick up the ball they’ve been kicking back and forth when it rolls close to the shrine. “Have you been praying in the shrine too?”

San Lang doesn’t open his eyes, arms propped behind his head as he lays back in the grass.

“That’s right,” he murmurs, legs crossed as he enjoys the sun—like a cat stretched out beneath a window.

“And it’s for the…flower god,” One of the boys mumbles, scrunching his face up as he tries to remember.

Honestly, Xie Lian is pleased that he remembered the flower part.

“The Flower Crowned Martial God,” San Lang corrects him softly.

“What kind of Martial God wears flowers?” Another child pipes up, baffled by the thought. “Shouldn’t he have armor or something?”

San Lang’s reply makes Xie Lian’s fingers go still, his face flushing.

“The beautiful ones,” he answers smoothly, “and he doesn’t need any armor.”

Chapter Notes

You can find me on twitter and keep up with current updates of the story HERE

CONTENT WARNINGS: this chapter contains a scene that depicts an abusive relationship, including physical, emotional, and (implied) sexual violence. Discretion is advised!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The God sits up, somewhat groggy, reaching up to rub at his eyes—and he notices two things:

First, his hair is completely smooth, despite the fact that he really didn't brush it properly the night before—and two, the mat beside him is empty.

And it's not odd for him to wake up alone. if anything—that's the norm. It's that he didn't fall asleep that way, and he—

Xie Lian shuts his eyes, squeezing down bad memories, his hands balling up on either side of him.

But when he listens closely, he realizes he isn't alone.

"...San Lang?" He questions cautiously, fighting to keep his voice even—and the reply that comes back to him is swift, calling from outside.

"Out here, gege!"

Xie Lian swallows dryly, taking in the sound of the young man's heartbeat, his breathing.

It's fine. He's fine.

And—from the sounds of it—he's chopping wood.

Xie Lian lets out a shaky sigh, forcing himself to calm down as he goes about the process of getting dressed for the day, pulling his hair up once more.

He's fine.

But when the prince makes his way towards the door, he stops.

When he places his hand upon the altar as he walks by—he notices that there's something that wasn't there the night before, hewn from smooth stone.

Actually—to Xie Lian's surprise—it feels like something close to marble, delicately worked—

Into a statue.

At first, the god doesn't know what to think—wondering if maybe he had picked one up yesterday during his scrap collecting and simply forgotten about it, but...

The robes the figure is wearing—they feel familiar, and...

In one hand, it clutches a flower—and in the other, a sword.

By the time Xie Lian's fingers reach the top of the statue's head—he already half expects to find the crown of flowers sitting there, but still —

His breath catches when he does.

"...San Lang," he mumbles, walking out through the curtains hung in place of a door. "Did you carve that statue?"

Xie Lian imagines he must have—after all, there are few divine statues of the Crown Prince of Xianle left intact, and this one felt completely new, devoid of weathering.

The teenager stops, leaning an ax against the log he was using to split wood.

"Do you like it?" He questions, watching him closely—and Xie Lian feels a big, warm smile spread across his face.

"Yes—but how did you do that so fast? You never told me that you were an artist—"

"I'm really not," San Lang waves him off with a smile. "It's just a hobby, really."

Xie Lian would beg to differ. It's not as though he's been around many divine statues recently—but he knows the work of a skilled artisan when he sees one.

"Surely, someone must have taught you..."

"No," San Lang murmurs, stretching his arms over his head with a yawn. "I just practiced a lot when I was growing up," he shrugs, "I got in trouble fairly often, and when I was punished—there wasn't much else to do besides practice."

Confirming Xie Lian's earlier suspicion that he was a poorly behaved child, but...it's endearing.

But it's also just...yet another thing that San Lang is good at, nearly inexplicably so. And...he can't help but wonder...

The god walks over, making a point of standing just close enough that his arm brushes against the young man's hair.

"San Lang?"

“Hmm?”

“Your hair—it’s a little messy,” Xie Lian murmurs, knowing it’s a little clumsy, but, well—

It’s the only pretext he could think of, to be honest with you.

“You’ve been so helpful this morning—why don’t you let me brush it for you?”

There’s just a moment of hesitation, but...

“If gege insists,” the young man shrugs, dropping down onto the log he was just using to chop wood, pushing his hair behind his shoulders. “But it’s not necessary.”

“Ah,” Xie Lian smiles, fumbling in his sleeve for a comb, “even if it’s just a small thing, it’s nice to...”

The prince is just beginning to gather San Lang’s hair under his fingers, when he stops, his face suddenly hot.

Eyes wide with mock innocence, the young man glances back over his shoulder. “Is everything alright, gege?”

“Yes, I...just...um...” Xie Lian swallows hard. “I didn’t realize that you were...ah...”

When he had gone to reach for San Lang’s hair, he hadn’t expected to feel...bare skin underneath his fingertips.

“Oh,” San Lang murmurs, glancing down at his bare torso, “It was rather warm this morning. Have I offended you?”

“Oh, I—no!”

Xie Lian laughs awkwardly, “Why—why would I be offended? I just—I was just surprised, that’s all!”

He fumbles with the comb twice, almost dropping it, trying very hard not to touch the young man’s skin more than he has to—but there’s one detail that can’t be avoided.

San Lang has broad, rather toned shoulders, and Xie Lian’s mouth is very try as he struggles to focus on the task at hand.

Palm lines would be exceedingly hard for a savage ghost to fake, yes—but human hair is such an intimate, intricate detail—it's nearly impossible to imitate.

After all—it would require the ghost to change every individual hair—and doing that effectively would require an incredible amount of power.

And given how sensitive his fingertips are, he should be able to detect the smallest flaw in the disguise, but...

He doesn't find any.

"Gege?" San Lang questions, his feet stretched out in front of him—leaning back until the god jumps, allowing the young man to lean back against his chest rather than fall over, face tilted back to smirk up at him. "Are you really just brushing my hair?"

"I—Of course!" Xie Lian sputters, eyes squeezing a little more tightly shut as he fumbles around, working San Lang's hair into a loose, slightly messy braid before letting it go once more. "See? That's—ah, that's better, isn't it? Now, I, um...are you hungry? Of course you are, you must be..."

He mumbles, briefly putting his hands on Hua Cheng's shoulders—if only to help him sit up properly before he flees a few steps back, his mind frantically trying to think of something he could put together for breakfast, when it occurs to him—

"Oh—and why were you chopping wood?"

San Lang rises to his feet with an easy going smile, "Oh—I thought your talismans might work a little better with something like this."

Xie Lian doesn't know what he means at first—just hears the sound of something wide and heavy being moved into place.

Then, after a few strikes from what sounds like a hammer, San lang leads him over, and Xie Lian is guided to press his palm against...

"You made me a door?" The prince questions, somewhat incredulous.

He carved a divine statue and built what feels like a very high quality door—all in the time before Xie Lian woke up?

"You took me in," the teenager shrugs, clasping his hands behind his back. "I wanted to make myself useful." Then, after a moment of watching Xie Lian's expression, he adds, "...Do you like it?"

It's not a matter of like or dislike, it's the fact that...

Xie Lian genuinely forgot what it was like to have someone be so generous with him— simply for the sake of it.

There was a time in his life when he might have distrusted it—or simply waited for his bad luck to take the moment away from him, but now...

Xie Lian turns his head to look up at San Lang with a wide, happy smile. "It was so thoughtful of you, San Lang—I love it, thank you!"

It's the beginning of a different time in one god's life. Exchanging loneliness for companionship. Sadness for a hopeful sort of happiness.

But, in the Heavenly Realm above—other gods are also going through changes. Some of them far less pleasant.

"Shi Qingxuan," the elder brother's vocal is tinged with disapproval, "You're being ridiculous."

"..." The Wind Master huffs, crossing his arms as he leans against the balcony overlooking the edges of the heavens, staring down at the world below. "You didn't even invite me."

A far cry from the small, frightened child that he used to be—the younger of the Shi Brothers has grown into a handsome, charming young man. Long, perfectly styled waves falling down his back, eyes always bright with laughter.

Except for times like this—when he's sulking.

Shi Wudu rolls his eyes, fiddling with one of his earrings, twisting the sapphire between his thumb and forefinger. "You have never once expressed interest in coming along to the mortal realm with me before."

"Maybe not," The Wind Master admits. "But you always ask me."

Between the two of them, Shi Qingxuan has always been down in the mortal realm far more frequently. Chasing adventure, or simply dragging that simple little friend of his on wild goose chases.

Shi Wudu rarely descends, and when he does—it's usually to deal with mundane matters.

"I assumed you wouldn't want to go," the elder brother shrugs. "I was assisting in one of Pei's patrols, and you can't stand the man anyway."

Shi Qingxuan's eyes narrow at the mere mention of him. "You've never helped someone with a patrol before," he mumbles, "Why now?"

The Water Master looks away from his brother for a moment, eyeing the other gods and goddesses walking down the central avenue of the heavens. "It never hurts to have powerful people owing you favors. Maybe you should learn that, and start playing nice."

It's a little bit hypocritical for Shi Wudu of all people to be saying that —after all, between the two of them, Shi Qingxuan is beloved by the heavens all over—

The only one he really has a problem with is Ming Guang.

"Would you have gone, if I asked?"

"...Probably not," Shi Qingxuan admits, crossing his arms.

"Then there's isn't an issue," Shi Wudu shrugs. "Honestly, I don't have time to indulge whatever petty grudge you hold against the man."

"You're not even a martial god," his little brother's frown deepens. "What could he need you on a patrol for?"

Shi Wudu arches an eyebrow, lifting his fan from his sleeve.

There are six elemental masters, by rule: Earth, Water, Wind, Fire, and Lightning and Rain.

But with one flick of his wrist, Shi Wudu easily displays a well known fact—Raising a rogue wave, the height of several palaces, and sending it towards a small fleet of ships in the mortal realm, swallowing them in an instant.

(Pirates, for the most part.)

Of all of the Elemental Masters in the heavens, The Water Master is by far the strongest.

As a matter of fact, even among martial gods, he's respected for his strength.

"Not all of us use our gifts to throw parties and toss around merit credits as charity," he glares. "And as far as I can recall, General Pei has never actually done something to warrant your behavior."

"He's practically forced Pei Xiu over all of the other deputy gods in the middle court, even though he hasn't ascended himself," Shi Qingxuan points out, clicking his tongue. "And this whole Xuan Ji business—"

"You were also a member of the middle court once, with a higher god as your benefactor," Shi Wudu reminds him coldly. "Hypocrisy isn't a good look on you."

Shi Qingxuan huffs. "I know that! But I actually ascended, and Pei Xiu hasn't!" Shi Wudu falls silent, his gaze...complicated.

After all, there's no way of actually knowing whether or not Shi Qingxuan's ascension was natural, or a result of the...

But Shi Wudu won't bother justifying Pei's every act to his little brother, he isn't the man's keeper.

In any case—he's somewhat aware of the actual reason for Shi Qingxuan's resentment: jealousy.

And acknowledging and addressing that would mean, in turn, acknowledging why the Water Master's friendship with Pei would make Shi Qingxuan feel that way.

He isn't willing to do that.

"...I don't need you to like the people I associate with," Shi Wudu mutters, wiping a hand down his face. "But someday you might be glad that Pei counts me as a friend."

The Wind Master scoffs, looking away. "As if I'd ever—!"

"If something ever happened to me, he would feel obligated to look after you." Shi Wudu cuts him off flatly. "And you would be left with a powerful ally in the Heavenly Court. Ling Wen too. So, you can turn your nose up at it for now—but you might be grateful one day."

Shi Qingxuan stops, giving his brother an odd look, eyes pinched with worry.

“... Happened to you?” He questions. His older brother has never said anything like that before. “Are you worried about something?”

“Other than you irritating me to death?” The water master mutters. “Not particularly.”

But the next words out of Shi Qingxuan’s mouth make him stop.

“Besides, if something ever happened to you—I have Ming-Xiong. And even if I didn’t —the Emperor would look after me. You’re basically his favorite, everyone knows that.”

The Wind Master rattles the words off thoughtlessly—then stops, when he sees the look on his brother’s face.

How pale he’s gotten.

“...Gege?” He questions, raising an eyebrow. “What’s wrong?”

The Water Master doesn’t answer immediately, his expression tense.

And before he even begins to try—a familiar voice echoes from over Shi Qingxuan’s shoulder.

“Shi Wudu, there you are,” Ling Wen murmurs, dark circles ever present beneath her eyes. “I trust your trip to the mortal realm went well?”

The Water Master reluctantly lifts his gaze from his brother to offer her a stiff nod. “Yes, I was able to examine several of my more recently built temples while I was down there.”

“I’m sure General Ming Guang was glad for the help,” the Civil Goddess smiles politely.

“In any case, I’m glad I ran into you—you’ve been summoned to the Imperial residence. I’m already headed in that direction myself—walk with me?”

Shi Qingxuan spreads his hands, like Ling Wen just proved his point. A personal summons from Jun Wu—to his “favorite.”

Without looking at him, Shi Wudu nods, pushing away from the balcony, turning his back on the human realm once more. “Very well.”

They start to walk off, side by side, and the Water Master calls over his shoulder, “Shi Qingxuan.”

The younger glances up, eyes curious, “Yes?”

His brother gives a firm look, his eyes stern, “Don’t cause any trouble while I’m busy, understood?”

“...” Shi Qingxuan huffs, crossing his arms, whisk flicking casually between his fingers. “I never do!”

The walk towards the imperial residence is mostly silent.

That in itself isn’t odd—Ling Wen isn’t the type for initialing conversations, and he isn’t one for small talk, but...

Eventually, quietly, she murmurs, “Are you sure you know what you’re doing?”

The Water Master stares straight ahead, the set of his shoulders suddenly tense.

“If you want a proper answer, you’re going to have to be more specific.”

The Civil Goddess waits until they’ve passed a crowd of wandering junior officials, her voice low. “As things stand, you enjoy the emperor’s favor...”

Ah, yes—Jun Wu’s precious ‘favoritism.’

“...whatever is going on between Jun Wu and Pei Ming,” Ling Wen reasons carefully, “you don’t want to be in the middle. It won’t end well.”

For as long as Shi Wudu has been a god, Ling Wen and Pei Ming have been his closest friends in the Heavenly Court. His only friends, really.

Even in the beginning, there was a flirtatious edge to his relationship with Pei Ming— but nothing came of it. Not for several centuries. In part, because Shi Wudu knew it wasn’t something he could take back, if he started it.

And because he knew he wouldn’t want to.

But Ling Wen—she always seemed keenly aware of something about Shi Wudu— something that no one else ever seemed to notice, or take into account. Something that he himself often forgot—

Just how young he was.

And while she's never condescended, occasionally, she can be....

Protective.

But in this case, she's wrong.

Shi Wudu isn't the one caught in the middle.

"...You know," the younger god muses, watching as the approach the imperial residence, "of everyone in the Heavenly Court, your position is probably the most secure."

After all, she's capable—and Jun Wu will never dispose of someone that does the work he isn't inclined to do.

Ling Wen doesn't answer, but she doesn't need to.

They both know Shi Wudu is correct.

"I've always envied you for that," he mutters, shaking his head.

Shi Wudu is all too aware of how much work Ling Wen does. How thankless and grueling it is.

He would still take all of that, over the things he's done to maintain his own position. The Civil Goddess frowns, concerned. "I—"

"I'm assuming he asked for a private audience?"

"...He did," she agrees reluctantly, hiking her scrolls underneath her arms.

The Water Master's expression is smooth, bored—almost as though he's been summoned by a school teacher, rather than the leader of the heavens.

"Then I suppose we can't afford to keep him waiting, hmm?"

She watches, her lips pursed, as Shi Wudu ascends the steps to the imperial palace, shutting the doors behind him.

The first time the Water Master came here, he was a newly ascended god. A young man of twenty years old—and the sight of it used to leave him awestruck.

Golden floors and ceilings, heavy curtains of silk, windows that show visions of the mortal world below. They'll show you anything you want to see, if you only give them the proper incantation.

But now, those windows are blank—and the air is tense. "...You summoned me?"

"How was your little trip to the mortal realm?" He can see the shape of Jun Wu, sitting behind one of the silk curtains that partitions the entrance of his residence from one of the sitting areas.

"Not particularly special."

(The nights, however, were spectacular.) "You didn't ask me before leaving."

From Shi Qingxuan, it was a childish, petulant complaint. One stemming from insecurity and jealousy—worried at the idea of sharing his elder brother's attention with someone else.

From Jun Wu, it isn't so harmless.

"Do I need your permission to leave the heavens now?" Shi Wudu questions flatly, "That would be a rather startling development."

"And you're defensive," the emperor muses. The Water Master watches the shape of his head turn slightly beyond the curtain. "How disappointing."

Shi Wudu doesn't respond at first, his eyes slightly narrowed.

"Of all of the people to be swayed by that man's platitudes," Jun Wu sighs, lifting a wine glass to his lips. "I really thought you were too intelligent for that."

"Clearly not," the younger man replies flatly. "I was swayed by you, wasn't I?"

Silence follows, and Shi Wudu is more than aware of the fact that it wasn't the correct thing to say, silently berating himself for not holding his tongue—

"Come here."

His tone is soft—but not out of gentleness.

There’s an underlying threat, like a snake in the grass.

He makes his way over, and doesn’t say a word when the emperor catches him by the wrist, dragging him down.

“Sometimes, it’s like you think I enjoy this.”

Shi Wudu doesn’t reply, glaring at the ceilings above.

Jun Wu doesn’t pin him down. He doesn’t need to. Just the grip on his twist is enough to keep the Water Master locked in place on the chaise lounge, unable to move an inch.

“I go through all of this effort, raising you so high…” The emperor trails off with an irritated sigh.

“And you won’t even listen.” It’s all a lie, of course.

Other than teaching the Water Master how to switch fates—Jun Wu hasn’t done much more than publicly show him favor.

Shi Wudu cultivated on his own. Ascended on his own. Faced two heavenly calamities on his own.

And yet.

Every accomplishment has felt tainted. Claimed by someone else, like they don’t even belong to him anymore.

“You saw what became of Xuan Ji,” Jun Wu muses, “Do you really think he won’t discard you, the moment he realizes what you actually are?”

Shi Wudu knows as much.

He was forced to reconcile himself to it long before now. And to the fact that, as miserable as it is, there’s only one person on heaven and earth who knows the truth of his character—and accepts it.

Jun Wu.

“You say that like you won’t do the same thing,” he mutters. “I’m honestly surprised you even remember I exist, after the Crown Prince of Xianle came back. Oh—or maybe that’s it?” He muses. “He jumped back down to earth, so now you’re back to—”

CRACK!

The slap is violent, but Jun Wu's tone is gentle.

"Oh, poor, poor Water Master..." He trails off, stroking his thumb over the space where Shi Wudu's lip is now split, blood trailing down.

There won't be a mark, by the time he leaves here. There never is.

But words leave deeper scars than that.

"Do you really think I would ever treat Xianle like this?" Jun Wu muses, his eyes glancing him over.

"Do you think he ever would have placed himself in such a position?" No, no, he—

Shi Wudu turns his face away, glaring at the back of the couch, his posture screaming that of wounded pride, but...

His eyes sting, and his lips tremble.

He wouldn't have.

And Jun Wu isn't wrong. That's exactly why he treats Shi Wudu differently.

Because they're accomplices. And if Shi Wudu ever said a word, tried to explain to anyone what they had done—

No one would believe him.

He knew that, when they made their deal.

Jun Wu warned him of as much.

Has constantly reminded the Water God over the years, of how many opportunities he's had to say, 'no.'

And yet, in moments like this—the word 'no' is robbed from his vocabulary. Locked behind layers of intimidation and shame.

Even so, Shi Wudu couldn't say that it's unfair, or that he doesn't deserve it.

That these private moments of hell aren't the price he pays for his own pride—and the crimes he committed to pull himself—and his brother—up this far.

Even when it feels like he wants to crawl out of his own skin, Shi Wudu can't manage to think that he hasn't earned it.

That he doesn't deserve to feel this way.

Jun Wu stares down at him, his gaze cold—brimming with annoyance.

It wasn't always so difficult.

The Water Master is as beautiful now as he ever was. Silky dark hair, hateful eyes that burn an enchanting shade of cerulean.

But he's changed in the last century or so. Turned soft and spoiled by the attentions of a frivolous, vapid man.

Jun Wu never particularly disliked Pei Ming. Always found that the martial god served his purposes well, and never saw reason to lash out at him. The General knew his place—and his ambitions were never above his station.

But no one is perfect, and Pei has his own fatal flaw:

He has a penchant for touching things that do not belong to him.

And now, even after his energies are spent, and the Water Master is firmly back under his thumb—resentment remains.

So, naturally—it only seems fair that Jun Wu should take something of Pei's, next.

If there's one thing that Xie Lian had forgotten in the last eight centuries—it's how much faster work goes by when you have help.

He had expected to need a month—maybe two in order to renovate his shrine completely.

But with San Lang?

It's done in a matter of days.

Sure, it's not the looming temples of gold and marble that Xie Lian used to have dedicated to him when he was a child, but—

Somehow, he thinks he likes this better.

And San Lang is the most pleasant company he's had in some time.

He's playful, and often a tease—but also rather attentive. Far more so than what Xie Lian is used to. And there are moments when...

When he'll stumble on the path back to the shrine, only to be caught with ease—or when he hears San Lang calling 'Gege!' From out front...

And he's reminded, over and over, of the boy who looked after him just when he'd lost everything. The smile it draws to his face each time is bittersweet, but he's grateful for the ache of it.

Xie Lian knows he'll have to go home eventually—but this is nice, while it lasts.

It's the beginning of autumn—with warm afternoons and cooler evenings. And yet Xie Lian always wakes up pleasantly warm, his body relaxed.

San Lang has noticed how tense the god gets in the mornings when he isn't nearby— and he's questioned it, but Xie Lian has never explained.

He always smiles calmly when the young man asks, and says something along the lines of:

'I'm just being silly, San Lang—don't worry about it.'

But now—he always makes sure to be in earshot whenever Xie Lian wakes up, and the god is sheepish, but...silently grateful.

And on days like this, Xie Lian will sit by his loom, working out a new pattern, listening as a few worshippers from the village come filtering in to give their offerings.

(The farmer did not keep silent about what happened that night, despite Xie Lian's request.)

San Lang is just outside, leaning against the temple steps, taking a rest from mending the roof. Young women from the village often stop by to bring him a drink of water, or an extra bit of lunch from their own tables.

He always smiles politely in thanks—but usually passes the food on to Xie Lian before they've even left, which leaves the god feeling a little sorry for them.

Several of the farmers have already asked Xie Lian if San Lang happens to be looking for a wife, as a matter of fact.

Usually with their daughters in mind—and the mention always leaves Xie Lian slightly startled. He tells them that, as far as he knows—San Lang isn't, but they're welcome to ask him for themselves.

But the youth rarely shows any interest in such things what-so-ever.

He spends his time trailing after Xie Lian, telling him fascinating stories—laughing with him, splitting buns of Mantou on the temple steps as they enjoy the breeze.

And right now, while Xie Lian works at his loom, San Lang reclines out front as local children play nearby.

"Hey, gege..." one of them calls over to him, stopping to pick up the ball they've been kicking back and forth when it rolls close to the shrine. "Have you been praying in the shrine too?"

San Lang doesn't open his eyes, arms propped behind his head as he lays back in the grass.

"That's right," he murmurs, legs crossed as he enjoys the sun—like a cat stretched out beneath a window.

"And it's for the...flower god," One of the boys mumbles, scrunching his face up as he tries to remember.

Honestly, Xie Lian is pleased that he remembered the flower part. "The Flower Crowned Martial God," San Lang corrects him softly.

"What kind of Martial God wears flowers?" Another child pipes up, baffled by the thought. "Shouldn't he have armor or something?"

San Lang's reply makes Xie Lian's fingers go still, his face flushing.

"The beautiful ones," he answers smoothly, "and he doesn't need any armor."

"Cause he's just that strong?" A little boy questions, eyes wide, and San Lang hums in agreement.

The beautiful ones.

Xie Lian has been called beautiful many times in his life, but rarely… Rarely has it ever made his heart skip a beat.

And it wouldn't be entirely accurate to say that Xie Lian has never worn armor. He did, during the war against Yong'an—but only at Feng Xin's insistence. In the end, it only ever seemed to slow him down.

"Was he from Yong'an?"

"Nope," San Lang shakes his head, plucking a long blade of grass from the ground, placing it between his teeth.

"Xuli, then?"

It's a sweet conversation, to be sure, but…bittersweet for Xie Lian to listen to. After all—no one wants their home to be completely forgotten.

"If you'll sit still and be quiet for a moment, I'll tell you."

That seems to make all of the children nearby snap to attention, their eyes wide with curiosity. Xie Lian finds himself listening closely—curious to see how accurate it will be.

No one ever gets it right anymore.

But when San Lang actually begins to speak…

"Long ago, in the central plains," he murmurs, his voice carrying easily through the open yard before the temple, "there was a kingdom known as Xianle."

The god stops weaving once more, his fingers growing still.

"Xianle was vast and powerful—but known for having four great treasures; beautiful women, prized music and literature—gold and gems beyond compare. But, above all else was their Crown Prince."

Xie Lian's lips press together tightly, listening to him speak, hands suddenly wobbly. "He cherished his people, and in return—he was beloved by all."

The way San Lang tells it—there's such a fondness to his voice, one that Xie Lian struggles to comprehend.

San Lang doesn't open his eyes, but the corner of his mouth quirks up, one dimple making an appearance.

"Tale of his valor were often told."

The group of children lean closer now, some of them sitting down to listen, their attention rapt.

"He once saved a falling child on Martial Deity Avenue."

Xie Lian's hand flies up to the chain around his neck instantly, his throat tight.

The only part of Hong-er's story that is well known—and often, he was blamed for falling off of that city wall. Like his interrupting the parade somehow brought misfortune on the kingdom.

The prince is happy that he's remembered, yes—but not like that. "And vanquished a demon with dazzling skill on Yi Nian bridge."

That tale is a little better known, but the way San Lang says the words 'dazzling skill,' he...there's a breathless tone of admiration to it, and...

Xie Lian can't remember the last time someone spoke of him that way

"The Heavenly Emperor saw great potential in this crown prince. And thus, he ascended at a very young age."

He speaks with emphasis on the word 'very,' and Xie Lian pauses, leaning back from his loom with a pensive expression.

He really was young back then, wasn't he?

Actually, it's startling, because Xie Lian has made a point, over and over, of the fact that San Lang is still rather young, but...

Xie Lian was younger than him, when he ascended. Actually—by the standards of Xianle, he hadn't even been of age.

A child, and a god.

Back then, he'd been baffled by his parents' sadness in the beginning. Of course, they would miss him. He missed them—but wasn't ascension always the goal? Hadn't they been prepared for it?

But later, Xie Lian understood.

They had been prepared to say goodbye to a grown man, one who had already had the chance to live his life with them.

They hadn't been prepared to say goodbye to their child.

A seventeen year old, who, in the end...knew very little of the world—and it's cruelty.

The thing that seems so strange about it now, is that Xie Lian doesn't recall being eager to grow up. Eager to become a god, yes, but...

It wasn't until Jun Wu singled him out, raising him so high above the other martial gods, that Xie Lian felt so desperate to seem grown up.

Now, he wishes he had been kinder to himself. A little gentler with his own expectations.

Maybe if he had, he wouldn't have made so many mistakes.

The children still sit eagerly around San Lang now, asking more and more questions about the Flower Crowned Martial God.

Asking about his strength, his beauty, and Xie Lian is left listening to San Lang humming words of affirmation until his ears have gone completely red, when—

"MR. PRIEST!"

The god stiffens as he hears several villagers crying out—and the sound of someone being dragged.

When Xie Lian rises to his feet, he listens as several men from the village drag a limp figure inside, his feet dragging across the floor, sand pouring from his boots, his robes, all over.

"Please help him, Mr. Priest! He's dying!" Dying?

Xie Lian frowns, making room so that they can lay him down on the floor inside the shrine. "What happened, sir? Can you hear me?"

He smells like travel—carrying scents of foreign soil, his shirt gritty from the sand.

"It's...the...the pass!" The stranger rasps, eyes wide.

Xie Lian raises an eyebrow, kneeling down beside him, "Pass? What pass?"

From what he can tell, the man seems like a cultivator himself—one of moderate level. Now, he reaches up, grasping Xie Lian's wrist tightly, clinging as he whimpers—

"The Crescent Moon Pass!"

BANG!

The cultivator jumps, slightly startled by the sound—only to see a young man in maple robes sitting by the table, having slammed his palm onto the wooden surface with some force, eyes flashing menacingly until he lets the blind Taoist go.

If Xie Lian notices the exchange, he doesn't comment on it, focused far more intently on what the man is saying.

"What about the Crescent Moon Pass? What happened to you there?"

"I..." The cultivator swallows hard, coughing up more sand. "I-It's a dangerous route for most..."

"A group of merchants hired me and a few others to escort them through safely...t... there were sixty of us, originally, but..." The cultivator sinks back down, wheezing. "I- I'm the only one who survived..."

One out of sixty?

That's enough to raise Xie Lian's brow with concern.

But before he can ask more, San Lan speaks up, his tone slightly sharp.

"You traveled all the way here from Crescent Pass by yourself?" The teenager questions, flipping a chopstick between his fingers. "In that state?"

The cultivator nods vehemently, "To get help! I almost didn't make it!"

San Lang raises a cup of tea to his lips with a shrug, his eyes never leaving the traveler, watching him rather closely. "I see."

"..." Xie Lian raises to his feet, moving to the basin by the corner, pouring a cup of water for their guest.

"You must be thirsty after traveling all that way," the god smiles kindly, kneeling down beside him once more as he offers the cup.

“Here, drink.”

The cultivator stares, somewhat hesitant—and from behind him, San Lang twirls his chopsticks with a little bit more aggression.

“There’s no need to be shy,” the teenager intones flatly, watching him with a sharp gaze.

Of course—the fact that a man who supposedly just ran for his life all the way from the desert would hesitate when being offered water is suspicious enough, but...

Xie Lian listens closely.

He noticed fairly early on that there was something not quite right with the man— after all, for being as psychically and mentally distressed as he claimed to be, his breathing and heart rate were completely unaffected.

At first, he suspected a ghost wearing a human skin.

After all, any savage rank ghost could probably manage something like that—and after the Xuan Ji incident, Ling Wen did warn him to be on his guard.

But now, listening to the hollow sound the water makes inside the cultivator’s chest, it becomes clear that this is no such thing.

He seems to be trying to make a show out of it, thirstily gulping down several swallows—until a hand wraps around his wrist in an iron grip, and he looks up to see the white robed god smiling down at him.

“There’s no need to pretend if you can’t drink it, is there?”

Instantly, the situation shifts as the cultivator glares, coiling in Xie Lian’s grip, pulling a sword from its sheath, but...

Before he can even lift it in attack, the prince gives the blonde one sharp flick, sending it spiraling out of the cultivator’s grip with a clatter.

The blade buries itself deep into the ground, and the grip the god has on the cultivator’s wrist is still like iron.

“Now,” Xie Lian muses, “who on earth is sending a puppet all the way out here?” Rather than responding, the creature’s arm goes elastic in Xie Lian’s grip.

Stretching out like a worm as it flees out the shrine doors, clearly trying to make a break for it—

THWAP!

There's a distinct popping sound, like someone popping a balloon, then the sound of it deflating as the puppet collapses to the ground, turning into a mass of clay.

It takes Xie Lian a moment to realize it—but San Lang must have thrown one of the chopsticks he was holding at the creature, piercing it's form and forcing it to deflate.

The young man strolls over, poking at the remains with his remaining chopstick, tilting his head.

"What an interesting little shell," he muses, "it would take someone with a high level of magical skill to create something like this."

Xie Lian nods, making a face when he notices that his hand is now a little sticky, shaking it out and away from his body with disgust.

"You're pretty informed about magic, aren't you San Lang?" He muses, only stopping when he feels larger hands grip his own gently, using a wet cloth to wipe the mud from the god's fingertips.

San Lang shrugs, his touch feather light, "I dabble."

Xie Lian pauses, his heart a little unsteady, struggling to keep his fingers still under the young man's touch.

'…What's so different about you?'

It's a thought that's been going through his head for days now. "Gege? You alright?"

'How do you get to me so easily?'

Xie Lian swallows dryly, unintentionally squeezing San Lang's fingers in response before shaking his head, pulling out of his grip. "Yes, I'm fine—I just need a minute," he mumbles, turning around to walk back inside.

For something like this—he needs to consult the Heavens.

And—at that very moment—the Heavens are going through a bit of a reckoning.

Not of an unusual sort, this happens about once a month—they were actually slightly overdue for this, so it's more like nature reasserting itself.

The door to the room swings open with a thud—and when Mu Qing turns around, he's initially pleased to see that Feng Xin actually answered his summons without needing to be blackmailed, but—

Then he sees the bag in his hand, and his eyes narrow. "What the fuck is that?"

The Martial God pauses in the doorway to Mu Qing's library, looking like a deer caught on unawares. "...Isn't that why you called me here?"

Mu Qing sets down the scroll in his hand, staring at Feng Xin like he's grown a second head. "What the hell did you think I wanted?!"

"I just..." Feng Xin can admit, it's wishful thinking. Well. Probably delusional thinking.

And when Mu Qing takes in the dark circles under his eyes and his unusually pale pallor, it's not hard to believe that the martial god is hallucinating.

"You just? Just what?!"

"The last time we saw each other, I was asking for someone to help out with Xuan Ji, and then...you've never asked me to come to your palace...ever, so—"

"You thought I was going to let you STAY here?" Mu Qing sputters incredulously, sure that couldn't be it, but—

Clearly, Feng Xin really did think that. "No! Obviously not!"

"Mu Qing," the former guard actually takes on a pleading tone, "I haven't slept in four days—"

"And? We don't actually NEED to sleep! Besides, your bizarre phobia of women isn't my problem!"

"I would do it FOR YOU!"

"No you WOULDN'T!" The martial god rolls his eyes. "And I would never ASK!"

"C'mon, look—" Normally, Feng Xin really is too proud to ask Mu Qing for help for any reason at all—even if they have been in a slightly less combative state lately.

"I've tried everything, she only wants Pei Ming. Pei Xiu is NO help at all, Ling Wen isn't answering my messages—I even got desperate enough to ask the Water Master to take her on, and he laughed me out the door!"

"What did you expect?!"

"I don't know," Feng Xin moans, wiping his hands down his face. "Look, Mu Qing— I'll sleep on the FLOOR—"

"The number of beds isn't an issue," the martial god replies flatly, crossing his arms over his chest. "You wouldn't help me out if she was my problem."

"I just told you I would!" Feng Xin snaps. "It's not my fault that you're a paranoid bastard who doesn't believe me!"

"Name one time you've helped me out before!"

"You've never asked! And if this is about the other thing—I can sleep on the opposite side of the palace!"

The mention of the 'other thing' was obviously a mistake. It makes Mu Qing's eyes flash at him menacingly, narrowing into a glare, and Feng Xin...

He lets out a sigh, wiping a hand down his face.

"Alright Mu Qing, fine. Why did you send for me?"

"...It's about his highness."

That seems to sharpen Feng Xin's attention immediately, his bag dropping to the floor with a thud as he looks at Mu Qing intently. "What about him?"

Mu Qing hops up on the edge of one of his reading tables, crossing his legs, “I checked in on him.”

When Feng Xin raises an eyebrow—he’s quick to make the statement seem slightly less out of character, “I thought it would be amusing, watching him try and build his own temple. But when I did…there was a young man with him. An odd one.”

The other god frowns. “What do you mean, ‘odd?’”

Mu Qing shrugs, bouncing one foot as he tilts his head to the side, examining his fingernails—the act only serves to highlight the choker around his throat.

God, Feng Xin hates that stupid little accessory.

“His intentions seem suspect to me.”

“…Suspect?” Feng Xin questions, and Mu Qing sighs, throwing up his hands with a shrug.

“He’s an oddly intelligent, skilled young man who seems to need very little motivation to take his shirt off around the prince.”

That last little tidbit makes Feng Xin’s eyes widen sharply.

“Oh,” Mu Qing adds dryly. “Did I mention he has a preference for red?”

They both stare at each other now, eyes filled with suspicion and concern for their prince, and Feng Xin starts to ask, “You don’t think—?”

Then, the sound of a new voice in the general communication array makes them both stop, their eyes widening.

‘Excuse me,’ Xie Lian’s voice echoes clearly through both of their minds, along with that of many others. ‘Have any of you heard anything about the Half Moon Pass?’

Xie Lian listens closely, his fingertips pressed to his temple—but he never hears much in the way of a response, only excited cries, “Ten thousand! I got ten thousand! How many did you get?!”

And a subsequent groan—

“Only a hundred! How is that fair!”

Xie Lian frowns, confused, but willing to speak up again in case someone didn’t hear him, ‘Has—?’

“THE WIND MASTER GAVE OUT ANOTHER HUNDRED THOUSAND MERIT CREDITS!”

By that point, the fervor of the gods scrambling to snatch up a share of the prize is so loud, Xie Lian winces.

He doesn’t have much of a choice other than signing out of the general communication array to get away from it, rubbing his head, when he hears one voice —this time much calmer, speaking out in his private array.

‘Your highness, were you asking about the Crescent Moon Pass?’

Xie Lian lets out a low sigh of relief, ‘Ah, yes, Ling Wen—someone sent a puppet to my shrine today mentioning killings that have been going on in that area. I found it rather concerning.’

There’s a pause as he waits for her response—and somehow, it’s even more flat than usual.

‘Your highness, I would leave this matter alone if I were you.’

And then—Xie Lian notices something odd.

There’s a magical aura around any communication array, that which seals the password and keeps spies out. Xie Lian’s, without spiritual powers, has always been weak.

But now, he feels a rush of power forming a barrier, reinforcing his defenses—and he realizes it must be Ling Wen.

“…I heard only half of the travelers who enter the pass survive,” Xie Lian murmurs, “Is that true?”

‘It’s better if we don’t discuss it any further.’

She doesn’t want them to be overheard.

Could the Crescent Moon Pass really be such a sensitive subject in the Heavens?

'...I understand,' Xie Lian replies quietly. 'I won't say any more.'

'But if your highness insists on investigating...' Ling Wen trails off, reluctant. 'It would be best to do so independently of the Heavens.'

Well, for any other official that might pose a real challenge—but Xie Lian is used to working rather independently with this sort of thing.

"Understood," he murmurs, severing the connection. How strange.

In any case—he can't justify ignoring it. Not when so many have been harmed already —and the Heavens are clearly turning their gaze away from it.

Like they did in Gusu.

"...San Lang?" He calls, listening as the young man returns to his side, "I'll be going away for a while."

The young man raises an eyebrow, reaching into his trouser pocket and pulling out a long length of white bandage, casually wrapping it around his left forearm. "If that's the case—do you mind bringing me along?"

Xie Lian pauses, unsure.

"...It could be very dangerous, San Lang," he murmurs, his expression tinged with worry. He's mortal, after all—and while Xie Lian would protect him, there's always a risk... "Are you sure?"

The teenager hums in confirmation. "If it's that dangerous, you shouldn't go alone, gege."

Xie Lian cracks a small smile, endeared by the young man's care as he reaches over, placing a hand on San Lang's shoulder. "You're very kind to worry, San Lang—but I can look after myself."

He wasn't expecting a broad, warm hand to cover his own. "You shouldn't have to."

The god pauses, a little startled—and suddenly hyper aware of how close they are, the warmth of San Lang's body emanating invitingly.

And it seems a little silly that, after everything he only just now noticed, but— Has San Lang been taller than him this entire time?

Xie Lian tilts his chin back slightly—and even if he can't open his eyes and look at San Lang (it would be pointless to try, anyway)—he's aware of the fact that the teenager must be watching him rather intently.

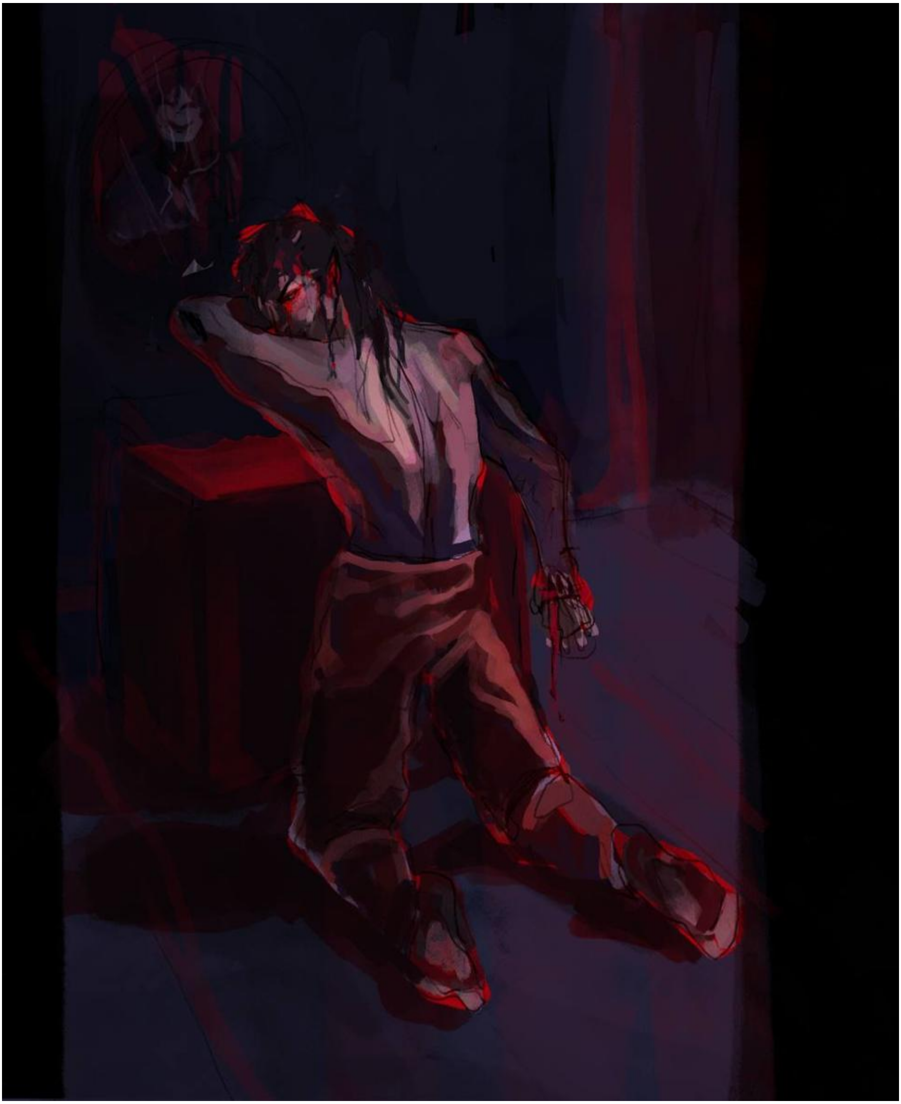
He swallows hard. “I…ah…”

Knock, knock, knock!

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

Included with permission from artists, do not reproduce or reuse without permission.

(Hua Cheng following the Bridal Sedan scene)



CREDIT: Kageherhin

[image]

CREDIT: SEONG

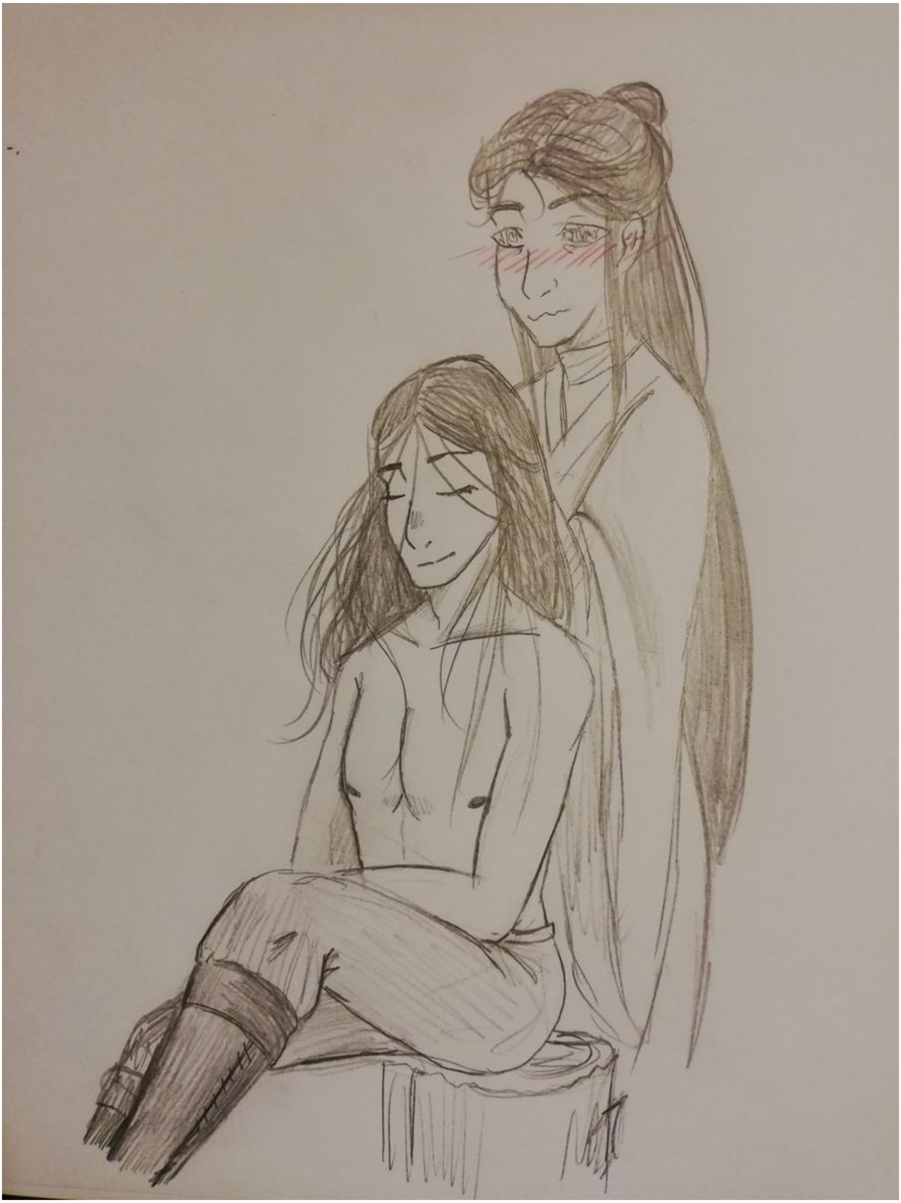
CREDIT: ESME



CREDIT: EVE

Long ago,
in the central plains,
there was a kingdom known as Xianle...

CREDIT: ESME

Chapter End Notes

thank you to Esme, Eve, Seong, and Kageherhin for their beautiful artwork, and allowing me to share it! I'm very grateful!

xoxo, Evie

Tales of the Half Moon Pass

Chapter Summary

> Nan Feng, however, breaks him from his worrying by asking—"Your highness, you really trust him?"
>
> "…" Xie Lian nods, fiddling with the chain around his neck absentmindedly. "He hasn't given me a reason not to."
>
> "You don't find anything about him suspicious?" Fu Yao interjects, frustrated, and the god shrugs.
>
> "Of course I do—but I've already tested him several times."
>
> "And…he passed?"
>
> Xie Lian nods, crossing his arms. "So, that only leaves two possibilities: he's a normal mortal, or…"
>
> He trails off, but Nan Feng finishes the statement for him grimly: "A Calamity."

Chapter Notes

> You can find me on twitter and keep up with current updates of the story HERE

The sound of the knock at the door makes him jump, awkwardly slipping his hand out from underneath San Lang's, then giving his shoulder a few frantic pats, laughing nervously.

"I should get that!" He mutters, hurrying over to open the door, his heart flopping unsteadily.

And the moment he does, peeking through his eyelashes—he's met with the familiar sight of two different auras: one earth toned, the other ice blue, one squared out and the other slightly spiked in shape.

"…Nan Feng?" He blinks, surprised, "Fu Yao?"

"We're here to—" Nan Fang starts, then stops, sputtering as the wind catches in Fu Yao's hair, blowing his ponytail into his face, "Because we heard—" He chokes a little, trying to bat the hair out of his face, only to get punched in the arm.

"Stop messing with my hair, creep!"

"It's in my MOUTH, what do you expect me to do?! You should tie it up properly!"

"It's already tied up, maybe you shouldn't be standing so close to me!" Fu Yao grouses, adjusting his ponytail with a glare, while Xie Lian stands in the background, a bit awkward.

"The two of you...came here because...?"

Suddenly reminded of their primary purpose, they stop fighting, turning back to the prince.

Nan Feng rubs the back of his neck, tamping down his irritation, "We heard you talking about the Crescent Moon Pass—?"

Then, he stops.

"What's—?"

Nan Feng's hand grips Xie Lian's wrist suddenly, yanking the god behind his body— an action that makes the blind cultivator's guest glare, his eyes flashing with annoyance as the deputy gods leap into action.

"STAY BACK!"

"Your highness, who is this?!"

"Guys..." Xie Lian speaks up, pressing one palm against Nan Feng's back, "It's really fine—"

For a mortal teenager being faced down by two deputy gods holding crackling balls of energy in each hand, San Lang seems fairly calm—setting down his incense sticks before responding.

"Wow," he muses, his eyes slightly narrowed as he takes the two newcomers in, a sly smile on his face—but his tone is that of someone completely awestruck, "Such amazing magic—gege, you know these two?"

Fu Yao's glare intensifies. "You—!"

Xie Lian quickly throws himself between them, holding his hands up, "There's nothing to be nervous about San Lang, they're just—"

“Don’t talk to him!” Nan Feng glares, “Besides, he doesn’t seem nervous at all!”

Xie Lian arches an eyebrow, “Do you two know him?”

“...No, we don’t,” Fu Yao glares, crossing his arms.

“Then why are you both overreacting?” Xie Lian smiles, trying to placate them. “He’s my guest, he really isn’t—”

“What’s his full name?” Nan Feng barks, his eyes narrowed. “How did you meet, where is he from, and why is he here?!”

“San Lang, we ran into each other while I was scrap collecting a few days ago, he got kicked out of his home for the time being, and I invited him to stay with me!” Xie Lian replies quickly. “Could you please calm down?”

Nan Feng doesn’t seem particularly comforted by that, “If you don’t know where he comes from, why would you let him in like that?!”

Fu Yao speaks up now, glancing around. “And if he’s been staying with you, where has he been sleeping?”

“Um...”

After a moment, the deputy god’s eyes widen sharply, “Have you been sleeping TOGETHER?!”

Xie Lian winces, holding his hands up, “Is there a problem with that?”

“OBVIOUSLY!”

Now, San Lang pipes up from behind him—his tone light and casual. “Gege, are these two your servants?”

Mu Qing balls his hands up into fists, glaring, and Xie Lian laughs awkwardly, rubbing the side of his head. “No, no, if anything they’re more like...assistants!”

“Oh, I see...” San Lang nods, his eyes zeroed in on Mu Qing. “If that’s the case, then you might as well help out.”

Xie Lian hears the sound of something being tossed over, and then, wincing sharply when he hears Fu Yao catch it, he realizes—

It’s a broom.

“No, Fu Yao…” The god smiles awkwardly, “Let’s not overreact—”

BOOM!

Aaand there goes the newly renovated shrine wall.

San Lang is fine, Xie Lian can hear as much from the way he moves behind him, his heart rate never increasing.

Xie Lian, however, while a very patient person, is not infinitely so.

“You guys…” He trails off, and there’s a tone that makes Nan Feng stiffen. “I didn’t—HGNH—!”

Fu Yao is in the middle of shrieking at San Lang like a cat that’s been doused in cold water when a hand grips him by the back of the neck, reducing him to more of an angry kitten.

Nan Feng isn’t as lucky, because he’s caught by the front of the neck in more of a stranglehold.

Fu Yao’s arms flail in San Lang’s direction, infuriated by the delighted, smug look on the teenager's face as he gets dragged away.

“LET ME AT THAT LITTLE—!”

While Nan Feng chokes, clinging to Xie LIan’s wrist, “I WASN’T EVEN THE ONE WHO BROKE IT, I—!”

Both of them collapse to the ground in a heap when Xie Lian deposits them by the shrine gates, pointing to the sign posted by the entrance. “What does this say?”

His tone is as lighthearted and easygoing as ever, but there’s a layer of iron underneath.

“…”

Fu Yao sits up, his hair slightly askew, “…Currently looking for donations to renovate this shrine…seriously, your highness? Where’s your dignity as a Heavenly Official?”

“If you keep fighting in there, you’ll knock the entire shrine down. Understand?”

Nan Feng sits up, immediately catching a face full of Fu Yao's hair, only to get shoved back down when he spits it out, batting it away.

"STOP TOUCHING MY HAIR!"

"THAT WASN'T MY—!"

There's a pointed poke against the sign, loud enough to make them both stop, mildly sheepish.

"Did you two come here because you wanted to help me with the Crescent Moon Pass issue?" Xie Lian questions, his tone still light, and Nan Feng looks away from Fu Yao with a huff, rubbing his throat.

"Yes."

"Then you're both welcome to help—but San Lang is my guest."

Xie Lian emphasizes, crossing his arms. "And a friend. So I won't let either of you bully him."

"..." Nan Feng glances from Xie Lian, back towards the shrine—where San Lang is leaning against the doorframe and watching with a satisfied smirk. "I'm not sure if we even could..."

Now that the issue has been addressed, Xie Lian turns back walking back towards the shrine. "I'm sorry about that, San Lang—there was just a bit of a misunderstanding. We cleared it up."

When responding to Xie Lian—the teenager's tone is perfectly charming.

"If you say so, gege—there's no problem. After all—maybe I just remind them of someone."

Fu Yao steps inside behind Xie Lian, his hands balling up into fists. "Yeah," he mutters, watching San Lang with narrowed eyes. "You do look pretty familiar."

The teenager smiles.

"Both of you look pretty familiar to me too, actually."

That makes both of the deputy gods stiffen, with Fu Yao looking like he might gear up to throw another ball of lightning—and Nan Feng clears his throat.

“Move away from the door—I need space to draw the array.”

Xie Lian is pleasantly surprised to observe that, despite his often pretending not to know better—Nan Feng actually does know how to manage Fu Yao’s temper.

(When he wants to—and when it isn’t directed at him.)

“That’s very helpful of you, Nan Feng—that will save so much time.”

While Nan Feng closes the door behind them, working to draw the appropriate symbols on the back of the wooden planks—Fu Yao glances around, his arms crossed over his chest.

“To think that you’re living in such a place…” He mutters under his breath, disapproving.

Xie Lian doesn’t seem to pay him any mind, grabbing his bamboo hat from where it’s sitting in the corner, slipping it back over his shoulders.

“I’ve always lived in such places,” he murmurs with a cheerful shrug. “So, it’s perfect for me!”

The deputy gods grow slightly tense.

Nan Feng doesn’t find that as shocking. After all, back when they were living with his parents after the fall of Xianle, well…

“It’s finished,” he mutters, straightening up.

“And messy,” Fu Yao drawls, always critical.

“Do I look like the earth master to you?!” He snaps.

Xie Lian tilts his head curiously. “Is the Earth Master particularly good with arrays?”

“Ming Yi was known as an engineer in his mortal life,” Fu Yao mutters. “He runs most of the connections for the arrays that Heaven uses now.”

“And this one is perfectly functional.” Nan Feng grumbles, stepping back.

“I’m sure that it is,” Xie Lian agrees, smiling politely as he moves forward to take the door handle.

Most travel arrays with simple activation chants—and this one is no different.

He grips the handle, taking a deep breath:

“By Heaven Official’s Blessing, No Paths are Bound.”

When he pulls the handle back—the first thing he’s hit with is the smell of smoke and sand, the dry desert air blowing through his hair as he steps forward.

San Lang is just behind him, clapping his hands in polite applause.

“Wow, such impressive magic…” He muses, sticking close to Xie Lian’s side. “You have such amazing assistants, gege.”

Fu Yao’s eye twitches as he steps out behind them, followed by Nan Feng as they start walking down the sand dunes. “At least we’re useful, and not freeloaders.”

Xie Lian shakes his head, allowing San Lang to take his elbow as he guides him over a dip in the sand. “San Lang is very helpful—he’s incredibly well informed about things.”

“Is that so?” Fu Yao grumbles, watching the teenager closely. San Lang shrugs, “I’m somewhat well-read.”

“And I’m sure that’s very helpful in this situation,” he sneers, making the teenager raise an eyebrow.

“Well—I have read a bit about the Crescent Moon Kingdom in the past,” he muses. “I know a thing or two.”

That makes Xie Lian perk up eagerly, “You do?”

San Lang nods, keeping his hand on Xie Lian’s elbow for good measure. “The Crescent Moon Kingdom reached its height around two centuries ago—known as a culture of warriors who ruled the desert Oases. However, the Kingdom of Yong’an wanted control over the trade routes.”

Xie Lian listens carefully, lining it up with what he already remembers—and most of it seems to check out.

“This led to border skirmishes with increasing violence—and eventually all out war between the two nations,” San Lang explains. “It was during this time when the Imperial Preceptor of the Crescent Moon Kingdom rose to prominence—and later became known as one of the two infamous demonic cultivators.”

“Demonic Cultivators?” Xie Lian murmurs, tapping his chin thoughtfully. He’s never heard of such a thing.

“The Imperial Preceptor of the Crescent Moon kingdom earned the name after she opened the gates of the city to the soldiers of Yong’an, leading to the slaughter of her people,” San Lang explains. “It’s said the sacrifice allowed her to rise as a powerful Savage Ghost.”

Xie Lian tilts his head, considering the idea. Such a sacrifice could lead to a powerful release of resentful energy—but it isn’t possible to harness such things in a stable or controlled manner.

Even in Gusu, Wen Jiao was drawing power from living humans—not blood sacrifice.

“There are rumors that the ones who go missing in the desert now are being fed to the souls of those slaughtered soldiers—in order to appease their hatred of her,” San Lang concludes. “But there haven’t been any survivors to confirm it.”

Xie Lian nods, taking it in.

“Is there a possibility that she and the other imperial preceptor are working together?”

San Lang shakes his head. “It’s highly unlikely,” He murmurs. “They’re often referenced in tandem—but the other lived a century before her. He was known as the Guoshi Fangxin of Yong’an.”

Xie Lian stops walking for a moment, his entire expression changing.

San Lang watches as it shifts from something like remorse, to pain, then—terror, even if it’s only a brief flash of trembling in his lips, his body tensing in a frightened shudder.

Then, blank numbness.

“...Gege?” He questions, watching the god closely, his eyes slightly narrowed. “Are you alright?”

Xie Lian lifts his chin, lips turning up into a tired smile, but before he can respond, Fu Yao speaks up.

“You certainly are well-read,” he comments dryly. “How peculiar.”

San Lang glances back at the deputy god over his shoulder, eyes flashing—one sharpened canine peeking out slightly from the corner of his mouth. “Hardly,” he smiles, “you’re just ignorant.”

“Would you WATCH YOUR MOUTH?!” Fu Yao snarls, sending another crackling projectile.

In the temple before, the teenager made a show of jumping behind Xie Lian to avoid the attack. But this time, he does no such thing, making eye contact with Fu Yao as he tips his head ever so slightly to the side, the ball of energy missing him by less than an inch.

“My, my...” He smirks, watching as Fu Yao’s expression darkens with sheepish fury, “How terrifying.”

The deputy god glares, his eyes raging with fury, but before he can act further, Xie Lian looks back, his smile pleasant—but with an underlying warning.

“Fu Yao, be nice.”

“I—!” He sputters, looking over at Nan Feng, gesturing wildly in San Lang’s direction, as if silently asking if he’s the crazy one—to which the other deputy god simply shrugs, throwing his hands up helplessly.

Of course, it’s odd—but Xie Lian seems determined to indulge him.

They walk through the entire night without issue—even if San Lang does occasionally whine about why they couldn’t have taken a traveling array all the way to their destination.

Xie Lian patiently explains that doing so would have used too much energy, and the teenager grumbles.

“That one has enough energy to throw fireballs at me every hour or so, couldn’t he have helped?”

“Fu Yao isn’t going to do that again,” Xie Lian replies cheerfully, “he’s saving his energy now—in case we end up needing it.”

But when the sun gets high enough, he does start to worry—enough so to lift his own hat from his head, reaching over to place it on top of San Lang’s.

“Here,” he murmurs, reaching to fasten it under the teenager’s chin, “the sun gets rather intense this time of day—”

But before he can finish explaining, a set of hands covers his own, gently placing them back down before placing the hat back on Xie Lian's head. "It's alright, gege," the teenager reassures him—and despite his earlier whining, he sounds perfectly fine now. "I don't need it."

"..." Xie Lian can't help smiling a little, "Let me know if you change your mind, alright?"

Instead of responding, the teenager tilts his gaze away sheepishly, muttering, "I think I see a structure ahead where we can take a rest. I'll go take a look."

Xie Lian isn't particularly fond of that idea.

The sand and wind around them dampens sound, leaving him unusually out of sorts. And of everyone present, San Lang doesn't have an aura of spiritual power for Xie Lian to keep track of, the way he can with Nan Feng and Fu Yao.

Letting the teenager get more than a few feet away means letting him out of Xie Lian's perception entirely—which leaves the god...inexplicably stressed, his posture suddenly tense.

Nan Feng, however, breaks him from his worrying by asking— "Your highness, you really trust him?"

"..." Xie Lian nods, fiddling with the chain around his neck absentmindedly. "He hasn't given me a reason not to."

"You don't find anything about him suspicious?" Fu Yao interjects, frustrated, and the god shrugs.

"Of course I do—but I've already tested him several times."

"And...he passed?"

Xie Lian nods, crossing his arms. "So, that only leaves two possibilities: he's a normal mortal, or..."

He trails off, but Nan Feng finishes the statement for him grimly: "A Calamity."

"Shouldn't that be more concerning?!" Fu Yao glares.

"Not particularly."

Xie Lian shrugs, “I mean—think about it: what would a Ghost King be doing following me around? He would have nothing to gain from that. Besides—I would think he would be a little too busy for things like squabbling with the two of you over sleeping arrangements.”

Neither of them have a strong argument for that, except…

“…He could be trying to take advantage of you, your highness.” Nan Feng points out carefully, his tone gentle. “A sick creature like that—he might get satisfaction out of doing that to a god.”

Xie Lian raises an eyebrow.

“Nan Feng—I don’t have anything of worth for him to want to take.”

He doesn’t even have enough pride to be humiliated for being tricked—so what is there to worry about?

Nan Feng pauses, hesitant—but Fu Yao—

He seems genuinely distressed, watching Xie Lian with frustration.

“There is always something left for men like that to take,” he hisses, his expression slightly pale. “You of all people should understand that!”

Nan Feng stiffens, sending Fu Yao an unreadable look, and Xie Lian… Just stares back at him with confusion.

Men like that?

San Lang has never been anything but considerate towards him—and even with plenty of chances to harm him (if he were such a powerful ghost, that is) he hasn’t taken a single one.

“…Fu Yao,” the prince frowns, “I really don’t understand what you’re talking about.”

The deputy god stands there, his hands balled into fists, his expression roiling with a dozen different emotions when San Lang calls over the wind—

“Gege! I found something over here!”

Xie Lian turns, following the sound of his voice in that direction, and Nan Feng…

Reaches out to place his hand on Fu Yao's arm, his tone uncharacteristically neutral as he says, "We can test him ourselves," he points out, "We came prepared for that."

The deputy god doesn't respond, glaring at the sand beneath their feet, and Nan Feng frowns.

When he speaks again, his voice is even quieter, like he's speaking to an animal that is likely to bolt, "Is there something—?"

Which Fu Yao promptly does, stomping towards the abandoned house after Xie Lian without another word, leaving Nan Feng to follow with a sigh.

Once inside, they find San Lang and Xie Lian sitting side by side at a table, sharing a cask of water.

The teenager watches as his god takes several long swallows from the flask, chin tilted back, throat bobbing with each gulp.

His gaze turns dark and shrouded as he watches one drop of water escape the god's lips, slipping from the corner of his mouth and down his chin as he asks—

"Is there any left?"

Xie Lian lowers the cask from his lips with a nod, moving to hand it over, when Fu Yao speaks up.

"Why don't you take mine?" He offers, reaching into his sleeve for his own flask. "I haven't had any yet."

San Lang casts his gaze in the deputy god's direction, bored and disinterested. "Is that so? Why haven't you?"

Xie Lian sniffs, then stiffens, smelling the enchantment.

It's been laced with a spell that would reveal the true shape of anyone who drinks it— and, given that San Lang would have to be a Calamity if he truly was a ghost—it must be powerful.

"You're the guest," Fu Yao smiles thinly, sliding it over. "So you should go first."

San Lang smiles back at him, his eyes squinting with an obviously fake sort of friendliness. "You're the one offering—so by all means, you should go first."

Fu Yao grits his teeth, his tone turning strained with annoyance, “Why are you refusing? Do you have something to hide?”

“You’re the one that’s being weird,” San Lang muses, kicking back. “What if it’s poisoned?”

“Then you could just ask him about that,” Fu Yao sneers, pointing in Xie Lian’s direction.

When he feels San Lang look to him, the god squirms with discomfort. “It’s...not, but —”

The teenager promptly takes the bottle without any more need for reassurance, tilting his head back as he swallows down the entire thing in three gulps, his posture relaxed as he tosses the bottle aside, his form...

Completely unchanged, other than the smirk on his lips.

“That tasted awful...” He mutters, clicking his tongue. “You’re sure it wasn’t poisoned?”

Fu Yao’s eye twitches with annoyance. “It was just regular water, you little—!”

But before he can finish speaking, Nan Feng slams a sword scabbard onto the table, sliding it over.

“Here, friend,” he offers with a forced smile. “It might be dangerous where we’re going—and you’re the only one of us that isn’t armed. Take this for protection.”

Xie Lian frowns, reaching over to feel at the scabbard curiously, feeling the engraving on the pommel—

Red Mirror.

“...I thought this was pawned back when I was first banished.” Xie Lian mutters, his expression tinged with the unpleasantness of the memory.

He gave it to Feng Xin for that purpose, anyway.

The deputy god shrugs, “Nan Yang tracked it down again—and he allowed me to borrow it.”

The blade was originally a gift from Jun Wu—and known for the enchantment that, if held by someone inhuman, it would turn to the color of blood, revealing the true form of it's wielder in it's reflection.

San Lang lifts the sword, his expression…complicated.

Almost as though he's just as familiar with the blade as Xie Lian is—but that wouldn't be possible.

He lifts it, one hand on the scabbard, the other gripping the hilt.

"This is interesting metal work on the cross guard," he muses. "Do you know who forged this weapon?"

Feng Xin seems a little baffled by the question, his brow furrowed. "No? It's far too old for that."

San Lang shakes his head with a sigh. "Keeping track of the master who forged a weapon is key to maintaining them as they age. The method of construction impacts longevity."

Xie Lian turns his chin in San Lang's direction, genuinely impressed. It's rare that he encounters someone with a passion for blades comparable to his own—and even more rare to encounter anyone with such technical knowledge. "That's exactly right," he murmurs.

"…Well if you're so worried about maintenance," Nan Feng mutters, his tone slightly annoyed, "Why don't you take it out and see how you like it?"

San Lang shrugs, seeming to find that reasonable—and Xie Lian can't help but tense as he starts to draw the blade, when—

The teenager stops, glancing up at the deputy gods and raising an eyebrow. "…Gege, are your friends pranking me?"

Nan Feng stiffens, offended by the accusation. "We wouldn't do that!"

San Lang sets the scabbard down, pushing it over to him. "This sword is broken."

Nan Feng raises an eyebrow, sputtering, "It's not—!"

But, when he pulls out the handle of the weapon, the actual blade itself comes calling out of the scabbard in several pieces, landing on the table with a clatter.

San Lang leans back, rolling a shard of broken metal between his fingers expertly. “I suppose it must have been an accident, giving me a broken blade. Maybe something happened to it during your travels?”

“That’s—!” Nan Feng fumes, his eyes narrowing. “That’s not possible!”

“Relax,” the teenager drawls, kicking his feet up on the table. “I can re-forge it for you, when all of this is over with.”

“Reforge?!” Fu Yao snorts, shocked, “What are you on about?”

San Lang shrugs, tossing the metal shard into the air, catching it without ever getting cut.

“My mother is a master bladesmith,” he explains calmly, “she’s been training me to carry on the family craft. Re-forging a simple short sword like this wouldn’t be a challenge.”

The deputy gods sputter at the arrogance it takes for a mortal to call a Heavenly arm, ‘simple.’

Xie Lian, however, feels his chest warm up with curiosity, turning to San Lang with a delighted smile, “You never told me you were a smith, San Lang.”

The youth watches the look on Xie Lian’s face, clearly pleased.

“I’m not as good as my mother yet—but I’ve made quite a few weapons already. I’d be happy to show gege anytime.”

Xie Lian’s smile widens with a genuine eagerness, “I’d like that—and to meet you mother too, she sounds like an impressive woman.”

The warmth in San Lang’s expression fades significantly, but his tone remains fond as he replies—

“She certainly is.”

Xie Lian sits back, pleased with the idea of being able to see San Lang’s work up close. And it also explains quite a lot.

The tension between San Lang and his mother—it’s likely a young man bucking under the pressure of taking on a family business. It also explains the callouses on his palms, his knowledge of weapons, and, well…

Being a smith would explain how toned his arms and shoulders are.

Not that Xie Lian has been touching them all the time or anything, it's just—San Lang helps guide him around rather frequently, often while not wearing a shirt, and sometimes you can't help but notice—

Xie Lian glances away from the group, opening his eyes blearily.

Initially, just because he's kept them closed so often around San Lang, it's left them slightly itchy, but—

Then he notices something to the east, far enough to be outside of the shack, moving quickly.

An aura—no, two distinct shapes of spiritual power, moving quickly.

Both strong—one light green in color, swirling like a small tornado as it rockets across the dunes. The other is dark, shades of deep blue, black, and gold—and far more stagnant in shape, flowing behind it's companion like a wave.

San Lang is the first to notice the change in his posture, leaning over with concern. "Gege, are you alright?"

Xie Lian doesn't look away, a frown forming on his lips, "...Something else is here." The teenager glances over his shoulder—spying two women moving across the desert.

One with warm brown curls and vividly green eyes, wearing robes of white and emerald, a whisk clutched between her fingertips—and moving behind her, a woman dressed in black, dark tresses flowing behind her in the wind.

San Lang's eyes narrow slightly. She's somewhat familiar.

"...There are two female cultivators outside," he explains softly, speaking next to Xie Lian's ear. "One in black, the other in white. They're owing rather quickly."

Xie Lian doubts that's a coincidence, moving to follow them outside.

"Do you think one of them is the Imperial Preceptor?" The prince asks, having to raise his voice to be heard over the wind.

San Lang shrugs, sticking close beside him. "It's difficult to say from that distance." And now, they're far enough that Xie Lian can't see a trace at all

What he can feel, however, is the wind picking up violently, the noise level rising as the sand whips around them—and as the chaos around them increases, Xie Lian feels his senses becoming overstimulated, making his anxiety spike.

He fumbles over to grip San Lang once more, mainly looking to reassure himself that the young man is still there—and when he does, he feels that his outer robe has been slightly displaced by the wind, making the god reach to fix it with a frown.

The teenager stops, watching fondly as Xie Lian fusses over him, his expression softening. Just then, the wind gets strong enough to even knock the god's hat off of his head, but before it can fly away, San Lang reaches out to snatch it between his fingers.

"Here," he murmurs, bending over as he places the hat back on Xie Lian's head, reaching under the god's chin to pull the strap tight, keeping it there.

The prince shivers slightly, telling himself it's from the wind, and not the brush of San Lang's fingers over his skin.

"...Thank you, San Lang," he murmurs.

When he hears Fu Yao and Nan Feng catch up, he raises his sleeve to shield his face from the wind.

"I think we should go back inside," he calls to the others. "This storm looks like it's going to be pretty bad—we should just wait it out!"

"I don't think that's a good idea," Fu Yao calls back, "this storm almost seems like it's intended to keep us out of the pass—it'll probably just continue until we move past it!"

Xie Lian can admit that's probably true, but...

He's already so disoriented, he finds the idea of moving through the storm like this until the reach the Crescent Moon Pass completely daunting.

"Couldn't...we give waiting a try?" He offers, his tone somewhat meek. "And waste all of that time?! No way, I'm not doing that!"

Now, when San Lang speaks up—his tone is sly, but his expression is genuinely irritated, no—

There's a spark of protective anger behind those eyes.

"Do you enjoy being difficult on purpose?" He glares. "Or can you genuinely not help yourself?"

Fu Yao sputters, offended. "I—!"

But before he can really retort—or San Lang can throw anymore insults—the wind around them suddenly increases in force, swirling violently, and—

"Oh!" Xie Lian gasps, eyes widening as he's yanked off of the ground, sent flying up into the air, sucked into the whirlwind.

"Gege!"

San Lang cries out sharply, his voice slightly panicked—but before long it's far away as Xie Lian finds himself being flipped around over and over again, hair and clothes whipping around him, unsure which way is up or down.

It leaves him heavily disoriented, every breath sucked out of his chest as he tries to take it, his head spinning.

"R..." He grits his teeth, fumbling for something, anything to hold onto, "Ruoye! Grab onto something solid!"

The bandage surges forward in an effort to obey.

Xie Lian clings on, relieved when the other end of Ruoye wraps around something weighty enough to stop him from spinning—but instead of it dragging him back down to earth, it's dragging whatever it grabbed up towards the prince, making him frown.

"I said something solid, not—!"

SLAM!

Something warm and solid slams into him, very obviously not a rock or stone, but rather a living person—and when Xie Lian breathes in, he catches the scent of the forest, letting out a shaky sigh.

"Gege," San Lang murmurs, sounding perfectly calm, "there you are."

He wraps his arms around the god's waist from behind as Ruoye binds them together, and Xie Lian shouts in apology, "I'm sorry! I didn't mean for Ruoye to grab you!"

The teenager shrugs, chin resting against Xie Lian's shoulder as he surveys the storm around them, “It’s alright.”

Xie Lian finds himself a little baffled as to how the young man can be so relaxed in a situation like this—but for now, he’s too focused on getting them out of this to pay it much mind.

“Ruoye!” He cries, throwing his arm out, “Try again, but don’t grab a person this time!”

The prince can feel it now, when the white bandage once again latches onto something solid—but, once again, instead of dragging them back down, it drags the object back up, and when he hears voices, he groans.

“HOW MANY TIMES TO I HAVE TO TELL YOU TO STOP TOUCHING MY HAIR?!”

Nan Feng snarls, writhing to get away from him, “THIS TIME IT COULDN’T BE MORE OBVIOUS THAT IT ISN’T MY FAULT!”

“It’s got your spit ALL OVER IT NOW! SO FUCKING GROSS!”

“I ALREADY SAID I CAN’T HELP IT! MAYBE YOU SHOULDN’T HAVE IT SO LONG!”

“Why did it grab you two…”

“Like WE know!” Fu Yao glares, squirming uncomfortably as he ends up pinned with his front against Xie Lian, and his back against Nan Feng’s chest. “Ask that stupid bandage of yours!”

“Would you—!” Nan Feng grunts, his expression clearly uncomfortable, “Stop SQUIRMING?!”

Fu Yao turns his head to give him a nasty look, “WHAT DO YOU EXPECT ME TO DO?! I DON’T WANT TO CATCH YOUR FLEAS!”

“JUST STOP MOVING LIKE THAT WHEN YOU’RE ON TOP OF MY—”

“YOUR WHAT?!”

“Gege,” San Lang mumbles, not lifting his chin from Xie Lian’s shoulder, his tone petulant.

“Maybe you should just drop them.”

Fu Yao glares, trying to flail his arms in the direction of San Lang’s neck as though he wants to strangle him, all while Nan Feng lets out a pained groan, “YOU—!”

“Ruoye!” Xie Lian shouts, “please don’t grab the wrong thing this time!”

The bandage shoots back down once again—but this time, it does manage to latch onto something solid enough to drag them back down, slowly but surely—until they’re slammed down into the sand dunes once more.

/ BOOM! /

Fu Yao and Nan Feng are quick to scramble apart, but San Lang’s grip on Xie Lian’s waist remains firm, making sure the god doesn’t end up sucked back up into the storm once again.

“There’s a cave nearby, gege,” the young man murmurs, helping him to his feet. “Come with me.”

Xie Lian nods, allowing himself to be pulled along, listening as the two deputy gods follow close behind—and letting out a breath of relief when they slip into the cavern, leaving the furious winds outside.

The god coughs, spitting out sand as he questions—

“Why didn’t either of you use the thousand pound spell?”

Fu Yao shakes the sand out of his hair (most of it landing on Nan Feng’s face), “You think we didn’t try that? Something about this place is suppressing our powers, we couldn’t do anything.”

Xie Lian frowns, concerned. “How odd…”

Then again, everything about this incursion has been strange so far. It’s like something is trying very hard to pull them in—while an equal, opposing force is doing it’s best to keep them out…

“Gege?”

“Hmm?”

“It looks like you’re sitting on some sort of marker.”

Xie Lian jumps, straightening to his feet as Fu Yao lights a small fire in the palm of his hand, holding it out as San Lang kneels down to examine it.

“...It seems like some sort of grave marker,” he murmurs, tilting his head. “The language is certainly that of the Crescent Moon.”

The prince turns to kneel down beside him, reaching out to feel the characters for himself. “...They do feel familiar,” he murmurs in agreement, making Nan Feng raise an eyebrow.

“...Your highness can read the language of the Crescent Moon Kingdom?”

“Ah...” Xie Lian glances up with an awkward smile, “to be honest with you, I used to collect scraps in that area.”

“...” Fu Yao crosses his arms over his chest, raising an eyebrow. “Is there anywhere you haven’t collected scraps at this point?” He questions dryly.

Xie Lian thinks it over, scratching the side of his head. “You know, I’m not sure?” He admits, running his fingertips over the characters more carefully. “...I can see that one of the words here says General,” he murmurs. “But the rest of it is a mystery to—”

He stops.

Nan Feng sends him a curious look, but the first thing Xie Lian does is reach for San Lang, gripping his elbow as he whispers—

“We aren’t alone here.”

There are other people in the cave—and from how many heart beats he hears—there must be somewhere around twenty of them.

It’s in that moment when Nan Feng looks up and spies a young man peering at them from around the corner of one of the rock formations in the cavern—and upon seeing one another, both scream, jumping back.

Fu Yao glares, using his fireball to illuminate the entire space. “REVEAL YOURSELVES!”

What he ends up revealing, in the end, is a bunch of terrified merchants—and some of their companions are young enough to almost be considered children.

“What are you doing here?! Why were you hiding?!” “Taking shelter from the storm!” One of them cries.

“You were the ones who showed up and started using magic all of the sudden! What were we supposed to do?!”

Neither Fu Yao or Nan Feng respond, because, well… It’s a fair point.

Xie Lian smiles, rising to his feet, “It looks like we’re just a group of merchants and Taoists.”

One of the older merchants nods, eager for the opportunity to avoid quarreling with the newcomers. “Us ordinary folks have to stick together!”

“Are you really ordinary?” San Lang questions, eyeing them curiously. “After all—you came in spite of the rumors about this place.”

“Well, yes…” One of the merchants agrees, “But we have A’Zhao with us, so we have no reason to fear. He was the one who led us to this cave so we could take shelter from the storm!”

He points, and San Lang’s gaze drifts towards a dark haired young man seated in the corner.

“I’m just doing my job,” the youth murmurs, not seeming to take much pleasure in being praised.

“He’s the most reliable guide to get you through the desert pass,” the younger boy explains—known by the name Tian Sheng. “He’s the reason we made it this far!”

Xie Lian nods with an encouraging smile, but he makes a mental note to tell Fu Yao and Nan Feng that they’ll need to escort the mortals out of the desert when the storm clears out before continuing on, it’s too dangerous otherwise.

While he’s lost in thought, San Lang kneels in front of the grave marker once more. “…You were right, gege.” He muses. “It does say that this is the Tomb of the General.”

The sound of that makes Xie Lian perk up, turning back to him. “San Lang—you can read that language?”

The young man smiles over at him and offers a small shrug, “I must have picked it up in a book somewhere.”

“Aren’t you full of surprises,” Fu Yao mutters dryly, but San Lang elects to ignore him, reading more off of the tombstone.

“It says here that he was beloved by the people—constantly intervening when soldiers on either side of the war attempted to harm civilians,” the youth explains, hair slipping over his shoulder as he leans forward. “As a result, he was demoted.”

“So he wasn’t really a general?”

“Not towards the end of his life, no.” San Lang shakes his head. “He was promoted to the level of officer at one point—but as punishment for his interference, he was demoted all the way back down to the bottom.”

“Just for trying to help people?” Tian Sheng frowns. “That’s stupid!”

“And an oddly familiar tale,” Fu Yao comments, eyes narrowed. “Reminds me of a certain god I know.”

Xie Lian’s smile turns a little strained. “He broke the rules, and he was punished.”

“How did he die?” One of the merchants questions curiously.

“Um...” The god laughs a little nervously, running his fingertips over the rest of the stone, reading what he can. “...He was in the middle of trying to stop yet another conflict, and when that failed, he, ah...”

“What?”

“…Ended up trampled,” Xie Lian explains lamely.

That draws a few surprised laughs from the merchants standing around, and San Lang raises an eyebrow. “Is that supposed to be funny?”

“I didn’t mean anything by laughing!” Tian Sheng mumbles, rubbing at his neck. “That’s just...kind of a...silly way to go, is all.”

“There are sillier ways to go,” Xie Lian comments, his tone a little far away, like he’s remembering something. “I once saw a man choke to death on a piece of spun sugar in the middle of a circus act.”

Everyone sitting nearby stops to stare at him, and he adds—

“He was performing as a clown at the time, so everyone thought it was part of the show. But later on, everyone said he died doing what he loved, so…”

He trails off, realizing that no one else seems to find it as interesting as him. Well. Except for San Lang.

“…In any case,” the teenager shrugs, straightening up, “It says that anyone who bows before the grave of the general three times will pass through the desert unharmed.”

And that statement has all of the merchants scrambling to kneel before the tombstone, bowing their heads.

“…San Lang,” Xie Lian murmurs, biting back a smile. “Why are you playing with them?”

The teenager shrugs, his side pressing against Xie Lian’s lightly when he sits back down. “They were laughing at him,” he murmurs. “So it’s only fair if we laugh at them a little bit too.”

“…” Xie Lian’s lips twitch, and he finds himself leaning back against San Lang, just a little bit, when—

“SNAKE!”

One of the men towards the back of the cavern starts shrieking, running forward, joined by a few of his companions.

“THERE’S A SNAKE!”

Xie Lian listens closely—and he can hear it, slithering across the cave floor. The sounds made by it’s forked tongue when it slides out between it’s lips. The clicking noise of it’s tail.

His first instinct is to step in front of San Lang. “Everyone, be careful!” “Scorpion snakes are native to the area—they’re highly poisonous!”

In that moment, he can sense the creature launch itself in an attack—but before the god can respond, San Lang snatches it out of the air with ease.

“What an interesting little creature,” he muses.

He doesn’t sound particularly frightened, having caught the snake in a grip with his thumb pressed against its heart, ready to kill it at any moment.

Still, when Xie Lian hears it move, he tenses with worry. “Watch out for the tail—!"

San Lang moves faster than the god can speak, catching the stinger before it can pierce him with his other hand, stretching the snake out and examining it. "How curious, a scorpion snake you said?"

"Yes, and they're very dangerous…" Xie Lian mutters, fretful.

"You shouldn't go and grab them like that."

San Lang shrugs, twisting the snake by the neck until it goes limp. "You know, these animals were often controlled by the Imperial Preceptor of the Crescent Moon Kingdom? They used to be heavily associated with her."

Xie Lian frowns, listening all around them.

If the Imperial Preceptor is the one that could control the snakes—and theoretically, she's the one drawing travelers into the pass in order to feed them to the ghosts of Crescent Moon soldiers, then…

"There's more of them."

"…What?"

Xie Lian straightens quickly, raising his voice, "There's more snakes in the cavern!" He calls out to the others, "We should get out of here!"

At first, everyone is doubtful of the blind man—until they start to see the shadows for themselves.

Then, everyone is screaming and fleeing the cave as fast as they can, charging out the mouth and into the waiting desert outside.

Lucky for them, the sandstorm has passed—but when Xie Lian hears a pained groan, he knows not everyone made it out unscathed.

"Uncle Zheng!"

He listens with a grimace as one of the elderly merchants falls to the ground, and Tian Sheng clings to his arm, calling out, "I think he's been bitten!"

"Somebody help!"

Xie Lian rubs his temples before calling out to the others—

“Check yourselves for wounds!”

“If you find any, be sure that you tie them off before the poison can spread any further!”

Fu Yao elbows past the others, kneeling down beside Old Man Zheng, examining the wound on his hand before tying it off, looking back at Xie Lian and the others.

“This is bad...”

Tian Sheng sniffs, tugging at Fu Yao’s sleeve, his eyes filled with worry. “I-Is he gonna be okay?”

The deputy god stares down at him, reluctant to offer bad news—and that’s when their guide, A’Zhao, finally decides to speak.

“The venom is deadly to humans within ten hours.”

That causes panicked muttering within the group—and Fu Yao sighs, reaching into his sleeve. “I have medicine,” he mutters, opening a small pouch, lifting out a small bundle of herbs from inside, placing it in the old man’s mouth. “It won’t cure him— but it should buy him time.”

“Is...Is there no antidote for Scorpion Snake venom?” One of the merchants questions, his voice trembling. “Is the man doomed?”

After a moment of silence, San Lang replies, “There is one herb that is known to treat it. The Shan Yue fern—but it only grows in Crescent Moon lands.”

Tian Sheng beams hopefully, “A’Zhao, why didn’t you mention that? We can save Uncle Zheng!”

“He didn’t mention it because going there would be a death sentence for at least half of you,” San Lang shrugs. “It’s a risky option.”

Xie Lian rubs his chin, contemplating.

It’s actually a rather ingenious way for the Preceptor of the Crescent Moon Kingdom to lure humans in. Send her snakes out to bite travelers in the desert, then feed the humans who come looking to the cure to the resentful spirits of her former soldiers.

It makes the situation dangerous—and even though Ling Wen asked him not to bring the issue to the Heavens, with so many mortals at risk…Xie Lian doesn't feel like he has a choice.

But now, when he tries to enter the communication array—he only receives silence in answer.

"…Nan Feng, Fu Yao," he murmurs, his brow furrowing. "Can either one of you get into the communication array right now?"

Both deputy gods try, making efforts of their own—but both shake their heads. "Something here is suppressing our powers, your highness."

Xie Lian frowns.

Something in the area is sealing it off—suppressing the powers of heavenly officials, and stopping communication from going in and out.

Just like Gusu.

Which could mean, the closer Xie Lian gets to the Crescent Moon Kingdom, his shackles might start…

Just then, a rustle nearby snaps him out of his train of thought—followed by a rush of movement, lunging in San Lang's direction.

Xie Lian doesn't hesitate to react, whipping his hand out, grasping the snake briefly by the head before hurling it to the ground.

THUD!

"…Stay on guard," he mutters, shaking his head, "there are still snakes nearby—"

Xie Lian stops, however, when he feels someone grasping his wrist rather tightly, and —

He can't see the look on San Lang's face, but he feels the tense, dark cloud that seems to have shrouded him.

"…San Lang?" He questions.

The teenager doesn't speak at first, staring down the darkening wound on the god's hand, eyes smoldering with rage. But when he speaks, his tone is far calmer than he looks.

"You were stung, gege."

He was?

"Oh...I didn't even feel it," Xie Lian admits sheepishly, rubbing the side of his head with his free hand. To be fair —something like that would only be a pinprick to him, and it all happened so fast...

San Lang doesn't say a word, snatching Ruoye—who, despite being manhandled by a stranger, doesn't protest.

He wraps the bandage around Xie Lian's wrist tightly, binding off the wound before lifting a dagger from his hip, offering it to Nan Feng without a word.

Somehow understanding what the young man wants—the deputy god lights a small flame.

San Lang holds the knife there for a few seconds, allowing it to heat up before he brings it down on the sting on Xie Lian's hand.

The prince doesn't wince, not even when San Lang cuts a bloody x, allowing blood to flow. "San Lang, it's really—!"

He cuts himself off with a high pitched sound of surprise, his body going slightly rigid when he feels San Lang's lips against his skin, and —

A flash of the younger man's tongue as he begins to suck, drawing the venom out. "That's—!" Xie Lian starts, then stops. He waits until he can trust his voice before he starts, again, clearing his throat, "The venom is potent, you shouldn't risk yourself!"

San Lang pays him no mind, spitting a mouthful of contaminated blood onto the ground, while Fu Yao huffs, crossing his arms.

"You don't even know if he would have been bitten," he grumbles. "Why make such a fuss?"

"But what if he had been hurt—?" Xie Lian starts, but is forced to stop again, a shiver running through him when San Lang's mouth returns to his skin once more, and...

There's something familiar about this.

Something that stirs inside of him like a familiar ache.

Most of Xie Lian's memories are constructed from touch and sound alone, and now, he's remembering...so, so long ago...

A ghost kneeling before him, asking for one reward.

It was such a small thing, in comparison to everything he had done. When placed in line with everything Xie Lian had put him through, but…

The only reward Wu Ming asked for was to kiss Xie Lian's hand.

And now, with San Lang kneeling before him, his lips pressed against the god's skin, he can't help but remember…

"…San Lang," he murmurs, swallowing hard. "I'm alright now, really."

The teenager pulls back, however reluctantly, blood dripping from the corner of his mouth.

He grasps Xie Lian's hand tightly for one more moment—examining it before he lets him go.

Xie Lian shakes the limb out, squeezing his fingers. They're tingling now, but that doesn't have much to do with the snake venom.

"I'll be alright," he murmurs. "It can't kill me, but…"

There's some mention from Fu Yao about reporting back to the Heavens on the matter—but Xie Lian promptly decides, remembering Ling Wen's warning, and…

"Saving lives comes first," Xie Lian murmurs. "We'll go to the Crescent Moon and get the Shan Yue fern, but,,,"

He points in A'Zhao's direction, "We'll need him to take us there."

That earns a reluctant stir from the merchants, who seem wary of the idea of being left alone in the desert without a guide—after all, they may not come back.

But, the promise of leaving Fu Yao behind seems to soothe them enough to agree to the plan—which works out, because it just so happens to be the only plan.

They set off from there—just the four of them: Xie Lian, Nan Feng, San Lang, and A'Zhao.

It's a quiet journey.

Partly because Xie Lian is lost in thought, contemplating their situation—what A’Zhao’s role in this might be, and what their course of action will be when they arrive, but also…

San Lang has been incredibly quiet. Sticking very close to Xie Lian’s side, but not saying a word.

Xie Lian can’t help but wonder if something happened back there to make the young man upset—but he can’t put his finger on a single cause of what that might be.

Well—aside from the snake, but Xie Lian’s clearly alright, so it couldn’t be—

“We’re here.”

Leaps of Faith

Chapter Summary

> "…San Lang?" He whispers, his voice unsteady. "What are you—?"
>
> He stops, shivering when a second kiss is pressed against his hand, this time over his sting, long since healed.
>
> "Don't be afraid, gege."
>
> San Lang murmurs, his tone so gentle, it makes Xie Lian soften without meaning to, until—
>
> "I'll be gone for just a minute."

Chapter Notes

> You can find me on twitter and keep up with current updates of the story HERE
>
> CONTENT WARNING: this chapter contains NSFW language (aka: dirty talk)

The desert sand beneath their feet slowly transforms into streets of sandstone, worn and broken down buildings rising around them as day turns into night.

"This is an entire kingdom?" Feng Xin questions, slightly disbelieving. "It just looks like a small city to me."

"It might look that way," Xie Lian murmurs, "but the Crescent Moon Kingdom was a powerful adversary. Even with a smaller population—their warriors were fierce."

A'Zhao's gaze cuts back to him, an eyebrow raising. "You're quite knowledgeable." The god shrugs, "I've traveled."

Nan Feng stares into the distance, using his hand to shield his eyes from the harsh rays of the setting sun. "What's that wall in the distance? It almost looks like a tower of some sort…"

But with no proper roof, it would seem.

“...That would be the Sinner’s Pit,” Xie Lian sighs, picking through older memories. “Basically think of it as a prison.”

Feng Xin peers at it a little more closely, “Then why call it a pit?”

“Because the bottom is filled with vipers and deadly beasts,” San Lang supplies. “Once someone in the Crescent Moon Kingdom was convicted of a serious crime, they would be thrown down into the pit to suffer indefinitely until they perished.”

Feng Xin shudders at the notion, clearly finding it barbaric—but the next words out of his mouth make Xie Lian stop.

“Is that someone hanging over there? Over the pit?”

Feng Xin isn’t looking at him—so he doesn’t see the way Xie Lian suddenly goes still, his face becoming quite pale.

San Lang doesn’t say a word, but he steps slightly closer, his warmth a comforting presence against his back.

The prince doesn’t speak for a moment, his expression unreadable.

There’s something about the image of it—someone hanging there, alone—with him below, not even knowing it—

He tenses, his hands balling into fists.

“Someone’s coming,” he mutters. “Two people—fast.”

The immediate response is to scatter and hide, of course—with San Lang pulling Xie Lian into an adjacent building, both of them standing close together behind a half crumbling door frame.

In the street outside, a white and emerald robed figure comes to a halt with a sigh.

“They’re so fast,” she whines, flicking a whisk between her fingers as she looks around, hands on her hips. “What am I supposed to do, hunt them down one by one?”

Another woman, standing a head and a half taller and dressed in black, lands beside her—her tone far less amused.

“Why don’t you call one of your friends to help you?”

“Hmm...” The smaller woman turns around, clasping the whisk behind her back as she rocks back on her heels, eyes glinting up at her companion playfully. “I only like calling for you,” she murmurs, “don’t you like that?”

Dark blue eyes, almost black—flash down at her with an appealing sort of hunger, the sort that makes her stomach blossom with warmth.

“What’s there to be happy about when it’s always boring messes like this?” The dark haired woman replies, taking a step closer to her.

“Mmm...” The smaller woman smiles, not backing away as her companion steps fully into her space. “I have a theory,” she hums.

Hands settle on her waist, and an eyebrow raises. “What sort?”

Ming-Xiong is an expert on theories. She’s an expert on everything, actually.

Always knows the answers to Shi Qingxuan’s questions, no matter how far off and ridiculous they might seem. She rarely speaks at length, and the Wind Master isn’t known for her attention span, but...Sometimes, it feels like she could listen to Ming- Xiong forever and not get bored.

“...That you’re stronger than you want most people to realize,” Shi Qingxuan murmurs, her hands resting delicately against her companion’s biceps as she leans back to look up at her. “But you’re lazy, and you don’t want Jun Wu to give you extra work, so you lay low.”

Dark eyes flash once more—this time with a little more danger than there was before. “And what does your little theory have to do with the situation at hand?”

Shi Qingxuan grins, rocking up onto the balls of her feet, her arms sliding around her friend’s neck as she whispers—

“Because you have a soft spot for impressing pretty girls,” she murmurs, feeling those arms tighten around her waist just a little bit, tempted.

It’s like the cosmic version of tempting a man with a helpless damsel who can’t open a jar. Ming-Xiong is no exception to the rule.

Still, she knows what Shi Qingxuan is doing, so it’s all about whether or not she’s willing to play along. And the gambit isn’t as tempting when said damsel just so happens to be carrying a fan that can start a cyclone at a moment's notice, still…

The dark haired woman whips her head to the side, glaring in the direction of one of the city structures. "…Ming-Xiong? Are you listening?"

"You," she murmurs, ignoring her smaller companion, "back off." She lifts one palm, a massive explosion of flames firing out.

Before they actually impact the building they explode upward into a fiery column, the form only broken by a dark shadow, hovering in the middle.

Nan Feng hovers for a moment, taking the sight of the two women in, his face illuminated by the flames.

The woman in white watches him with naked curiosity—but her companion in black? Her eyes are narrowed, ready to attack.

The deputy god gathers the flames in the column within his own hands, throwing them back at her with a loud—

CRASH!

But she doesn't stumble back.

Not even a single step. The amount of strength that would take is startling—but not as much so as the way she catches the flames within her hands, intensifying them before they're sent flying back at her opponent.

BOOM!

Xie Lian breathes out a sigh of relief, thankful for Nan Feng's quick thinking, taking the attention onto himself and away from the mortals that are with them.

That's when he notices the way that San lang is leaning over him, his arms bracketing Xie Lian's head against the wall.

Likely to protect him from dust or any falling debris—and the moment Xie Lian seems to take notice of this, the human backs off, offering him a hand to help him to his feet.

"Thank you, San Lang."

He doesn't get a full blown response from the teenager—who still seems to be…

In a mood. Or sulking. The prince still doesn't understand why—or if maybe, perhaps, he's done something wrong…

Since he can't answer that question for the moment, he focuses on finding A'Zhao, listening for his heart beat, then clearing away some rubble to help him out.

"Whatever that woman is—she's strong," Xie Lian murmurs as A'Zhao brushes the dust off of his robes. "Nan Feng won't last against her indefinitely. We should go ahead and focus on finding the Shan Yue fern."

"…I'm sorry," A'Zhao murmurs, shaking his head. "I know how to get into the city—but I don't know where to find the fern."

Xie Lian sighs, not blaming him—but that does make the mission more complicated.

After a moment, with a reluctant sigh, San Lang speaks, almost like he's directly reciting something from a book:

"The Shan Yue fern is the size of a peach, has broad leaves and thin roots, and likes shade. It typically grows in the shadow of tall structures such as buildings, large trees and the like."

Xie Lian smiles gratefully, "And the tallest structure in the city would be…"

The palace, obviously.

As they start to make their way in that direction, across the city, Nan Feng is struggling against his adversaries.

Well—just the one, really. The woman in white seems far more content to watch as her companion bats the deputy god around like a cat toy.

"He's surprisingly durable," Shi Qingxuan muses, perched on a crumbling wall as she watches Nan Feng struggle to block another flaming projectile, slamming him into a nearby building. "Even if fire is your weakest form of magic. What sort of cultivator is he?”

Ming Yi takes a step back, wiping the soot from her hands. “A deputy god, I think. Sent to assist the crown prince.”

“No one sent him,” Shi Qingxuan shakes her head, kicking her foot out with a pout. “No one else in the Heavens cares about this place.”

“A volunteer, then.”

Interesting...particularly when one considers how little Heavenly officials help one another willingly. Not unless there’s a prior relationship in place—and the Prince of Xianle is infamous for having no friends in the Heavenly Court.

But, speaking of relationships...

“Ming-Xiong,” she murmurs, kicking her feet “When we’re done here, and I repay the favor—will you keep that form?”

“No.”

“Please?” Shi Qingxuan pouts. “I like it, you’re so pretty this way, and you almost never play along—”

“It’s something different for you than it is for me.” The Wind Master pouts, but...Ming Yi isn’t wrong.

She’s the only one that hasn’t ever given Shi Qingxuan much grief over enjoying her female form. She doesn’t always understand it, and sometimes she gets irritated with Shi Qingxuan’s silliness—but she doesn’t mock it.

And the Wind Master suspects, on some level, that’s because...

Ming Yi understands how comfortable she is like this. That sometimes, she prefers to be this way. For her, this skin is just as real as her male form, where as for Ming Yi, hers is...

More like dress up.

She’ll indulge in it, even enjoys it sometimes, given her own independent appreciation of the female form—

(And Shi Qingxuan can attest—Ming Yi really, really does appreciate a woman’s body, whether she’s wearing one or on top of one.)

But for Ming Yi, wearing this form—it is something different than it is for Shi Qingxuan.

"...But it's still fun, isn't it?" Shi Qingxuan pleads with a small pout. "You're so soft like this, and you smell nice..."

Her male form is all hard muscles and sharp edges.

Shi Qingxuan is always a little soft, no matter what skin she wears—but Ming Yi's real body is firm, almost unforgiving.

If she was being honest, she would admit that she loves it—but it also intimidates her at times.

"Do I smell bad, otherwise?" No. He's never unpleasant.

He smells like leather and iron—not soft or inviting smells, but there's an undeniable appeal to them, one that makes Shi Qingxuan want, want, want.

She's rarely ever denied anything. Any time she asks for something, her brother gives it to her—even if he grumbles at first.

As a result, Sh Qingxuan never grew out of being a somewhat spoiled child. Always sweet natured and generous, but a little impatient and greedy as well.

Until Ming Yi, she never experienced someone telling her no. A hard, firm denial. At first, it was surprising. Frustrating.

And gods, does she enjoy it when Ming Yi tells her no. When she makes things difficult—even when she makes her cry.

"No," she admits with a pout. "But I was looking forward to..."

She falls silent when Ming Yi's eyes flash, and glances over to see the deputy god starting to crawl out of the rubble.

"Spin him up for a minute," her companion murmurs. "Now."

Shi Qingxuan doesn't always follow orders—but when they're given in that tone? She usually does.

A fan snaps out of her sleeve, and with a quick flick of her wrist, a small cyclone appears, swirling high into the air, and taking the deputy god with it.

While he hovers, Ming Yi walks over, her pace slow and purposeful, until she's standing between the Wind Master's knees.

"I'm going to shed this form when we get back," She starts, and when Shi Qingxuan starts to pout and protest, she grabs her by the chin—long black nails digging in until the Wind Master goes pliant, "and you can keep whichever you like, it makes no difference to me."

The assurance isn't technically necessary, but it makes Shi Qingxuan smile, instantly comfortable, even as she's effectively being pinned down.

"Because when we get back," Ming Yi continues, her tone low, eyes never leaving the smaller woman's face, "I'm going to fuck you."

The Wind Master's eyes widen sharply, her cheeks flushing as the taller woman steps in, their faces close. "I've been thinking about it all day," she purrs, feeling it when Shi Qingxuan's thighs shiver in response, trying to close, but Ming Yi's hips are in the way. "And I'm not going to be satisfied until I'm inside you."

She has such a blunt, rough way of speaking—a tone she never uses when speaking to the other gods. One that her intelligent, often scholarly manner never portrays.

Shi Qingxuan shudders, her face suddenly rather hot.

Shi Qingxuan's brother would kill anyone who dared speak to her that way—if he knew. The thrill of him not knowing is half of the enjoyment.

"How does that sound?" Ming Yi murmurs, her lips maybe a breath above the Wind Masters, pulling back when she tries to lean forward.

She won't let Shi Qingxuan steal a kiss, and that makes her whine. But, as always— the choice to give in is always hers.

And she crumbles, as always, like a thin piece of paper.

"Yes," she breathes, thighs tightening around Ming Yi's hips. "It sounds so good, it—"

Ming Yi gives her a kiss then—deep, slightly messy and quick, leaving her a mess of flushed cheeks and smeared lip stain before the taller woman pulls back.

“Good girl,” she murmurs, squeezing Shi Qingxuan’s chin once more, drawing out a pleasured little moan. “Now, let him down.”

She steps back, and with a bored, half-assed flick of Shi Qingxuan’s fan, Nan Feng comes crashing back to earth, leaving a small crater beneath him.

CRASH!

The Palace of the Crescent Moon Kingdom is more like a tomb, left exactly as it was the day of the siege. Broken swords and bones still litter the ground in the courtyard, and Xie Lian has to scope the ground in front of him with his toes before moving forward.

At first, San Lang was insistent on staying by his side—but Xie Lian was firm on the fact that it would be ridiculous.

After all, he can do quite a bit without his sight, he isn’t helpless—but this is a situation where he would only slow San Lang down.

He doesn’t mind admitting that. Of his eight hundred years of life, he’s only had his sight for eighteen years or so of it. He’s more than learned how to accept his limitations.

And it’s because of those limitations that he’s able to hear the nervous breathing of someone hiding.

Xie Lian stops, peeking his eyes open in the dark, glancing around for any dangerous intruders—but other than the cursed energy that seems to cling to the city like a blanket, he finds nothing.

Shutting his eyes again, he reaches out, quick as a scorpion snake, grabbing a wrist.

It’s small, bony—that of a teenage boy, and the body attached to it jumps with fear as Xie Lian glares into the dark.

“Who are you?”

“Mr. Priest, it’s—it’s just me!” The boy cries.

Tian Sheng.

Normally, Xie Lian would suspect a trick—but he already checked for cursed aura.

“...What are you doing here?” The god sighs, his tone turning stern.

"It's very dangerous."

"We, ah…" Another one of the merchants from the cave speaks up from a few meters away. "We thought you'd have a better chance of success with more people, so we followed you."

"Your friend you left with us," Tian Sheng pipes up, "he's escorting the rest of us out of the desert right now. We thought this was the best way!"

Xie Lian sighs, pinching the bridge of his nose. Well, at least a few mortals are guaranteed safety.

"You'll have to stay close," he mutters, straightening up. "This place is incredibly dangerous for ordinary people."

"No need to tell us twice," Tian Sheng shivers, rubbing his arms. "This place gives me the creeps!"

"Gege?" Xie Lian glances over in the direction of San Lang's voice, visibly relieved as he listens to the youth approach. "I found some."

The others in the group hurry forward to take a look, but San Lang marches over to Xie Lian's side with a look of single minded focus.

He reaches for the god's hand wordlessly, crumbling the fern in his fingers into a powder simply by curling his hand into a fist before applying it to the sting, his eyes slightly narrowed.

Xie Lian is quiet, starting to wonder if San Lang really was upset over the snake.

Is he upset with Xie Lian for jumping in to protect him? He does seem rather proud, and he was able to handle the snake in the cave just fine on his own, but…

"Did it work?" One of the merchants asks cautiously, and Xie Lian lifts his head with a slightly pained smile.

But that has nothing to do with the sting at all.

"Oh, I can already feel it making a difference—it's definitely an effective antidote."

As he says this, he senses San Lang finally relaxing beside him, letting out a low, heavy sigh.

"Hey!" One of the merchants cries out from the other side of the courtyard. "I found more over here! There's tons of it!"

The others move towards him, and as Xie Lian starts to follow, San Lang holds onto his hand.

"Better not to go over there," he murmurs, shaking his head.

Xie Lian pauses, tilting his head with confusion as he hears—

"AHHHHHHH!"

At first he thinks it must be one of the merchants, that maybe one of them got bitten by another snake, but…

There's something wrong with this voice.

Something rasping and gnarled.

Inhuman.

"CAN'T YOU SEE YOU'RE STEPPING ON ME?!" The voice howls.

Xie Lian's fingers tighten around San Lang's without necessarily meaning to. He certainly could have dropped the young man's hand by now—that probably would have been more appropriate, but…

Instead, he holds on tight.

Even as they walk closer—at Xie Lian's insistence, San Lang seems to drag his heels a bit—he holds on, listening as that voice rasps,

"Who are you people? Why have you come here?"

Xie Lian's brow furrows as he looks around, trying to understand why the direction sounds odd…

"He's in the ground, gege," San Lang murmurs next to his ear. "He's been buried alive."

Xie Lian stiffens, gripping the young man's hand so tightly, he lets go soon after, mumbling an apology.

This place really is just full of grim reminders, isn't it?

"…We're from a traveling caravan," one of the merchants explains, "we came here looking for the Shan Yue fern."

“Ah, I ssssee,” the voice hisses, almost like there’s a lisp, something dragging down it’s tongue. “I was part of a caravan too once…ssssome sixty odd yearsss ago…”

Sixty years? He—

He can’t be human, but Xie Lian can’t open his eyes to check, not now, surrounded by mortals.

“It’s been ssssso long sssince I sssaw other humansss…” That voice purrs, and there’s something about it that sense an ugly, disgusted shiver down Xie Lian’s spine.

“Won’t you….come…clossser?”

There’s something about it that reminds him of some sort of vermin. Like a rat, but more sinister. Something that bears a cruelty borne from weakness.

“H…How did you get that way, mister?” Tian Sheng questions.

He shrinks a little closer to Xie Lian and San Lang—the former of the two reaching out to pull the young man behind him protectively.

“I wasss planted, here…assss fertilizer…for the Shan Yue fern…”

Xie Lian grimaces upon hearing that—and San Lang is quick to reassure him;

“The one used on you was fine, gege.”

The god exhales softly, relieved, when the creature presses on—

“Issss…no one going to come clossser? That’sss a…sssshame,” it lets out a wheezing cackle. “You ssssee, I thought I …recognized one of you…”

How could that be possible?

Xie Lian has already confirmed the mortality of the group that’s with them—and for what this creature is saying to be true…that would make one of them an elderly man —

But none of them are.

“Pleasssee, I’m jussst…another human…like you,” the creature pleads.

“Is that so?” San Lang speaks up, his voice cold. “You don’t look human at all to me.”

“I am! I am, I sssweaar! I—”

Just as it’s in the middle of pleading, one of them men kneels down to pick up his hat, fallen down into the grass, and Xie Lian’s heart drops.

“Get back—!”

But it’s already too late.

A long, snake-like tongue whips through the air in a flash, lodging itself deep in the merchant’s ear, before pulling a piece of flesh out with it, blood spattering across the grass.

The man is dead before he hits the ground.

“HAHAHAHAHAHAHAHA!” His laugh cackles sharply, piercing through the night. “YOU’LL HAVE TO FORGIVE ME, I WAS JUST SO HUNGRY!”

Xie Lian reaches up to rub at his own ear—overly sensitive, after so many years of relying upon sound—his stomach twisting with nausea.

“GENERAL!” The creature howls. “I STALLED THEM FOR YOU, SEE? WON’T YOU LET ME GO NOW?!”

Xie Lian pauses, his blood running cold. General. That would mean—

Someone is already watching them.

Just as the god realizes that much, San Lang grabs his wrist, yanking him to the side and behind him.

BOOM!

The moment Xie Lian is pulled out of the way, something heavy slams into the earth —from the sounds of it, some sort of metal club.

When he peeks through his lashes—he can see several swirls of resentful energy surrounding them. Likely the ‘general,’ and that of other soldiers.

“SSSEE?” The man in the ground cries, “I LURED THEM IN FOR YOU! CAN’T I GO NOW? CAN I GO HOME?”

The tallest of the group, a bearded man with dark eyes and sallow skin, looks the creature over with some small amount of disgust before plunging his weapon into the ground once more.

And in doing so—reveals that the creature in the ground is just a skeleton, with only a warped, mummified face remaining.

Xie Lian can't see that much—but he is startled by San Lang's sudden, cruel laughter. "The little freak doesn't even realize that he's dead, does he?"

Hearing that genuinely seems to vex the creature, who lets out a low whimper of denial. "I...I'm not..."

San Lang kneels down—clearly not frightened of that tongue, in spite of what they just saw. "After what you just did, you still think you're a human being?" He snorts.

The worst part is—he doesn't seem to realize that San Lang is speaking of the cannibalism, no—

He thinks the young man is mocking his tongue.

"My tongue is just—it's just a little longer than average, that's all! There's nothing inhuman about that, you—" The creature stops.

Then, he says something that would have normally given Xie Lian pause.

"You...you can help me, can't you?" He whimpers, eyes fixed on San Lang, filled with desperate hope. "W-Won't you?"

The young man tilts his head to the side, eyes flashing in the dark. "No," he murmurs.

But he doesn't say 'I can't'

"I won't."

Before Xie Lian can contemplate that, or ask San Lang what he means—he hears the ghosts talking to one another, and his expression turns grim.

"Listen everyone," he murmurs, trying to remain calm. "Don't try and fight them."

With so many, and not knowing their strength level—Xie Lian isn't sure he could fight them on his own, especially taking into account those two women running around the city.

And even if not for that—

His ankle and throat—they ache, just as he suspected they would.

“They’re discussing moving us somewhere to interrogate us, so I suggest going along with it for now.”

As if any of them really had the means to struggle, anyway.

San Lang straightens up, calm as ever as he takes Xie Lian’s elbow, guiding him along with the rest of the group.

“…San Lang,” Xie Lian mutters, leaning his head close as they walk, “When you were reading about the Crescent Moon Kingdom—did you ever hear about a general that this ghost might be?”

The teenager glances the figure ahead of them over.

“There was only one general when the nation fell.” He murmurs, keeping his voice low. “His name was Ke Mo. Nine feet tall, an infamously strong giant. And devoted to the Imperial Preceptor.”

Xie Lian stiffens with worry.

Does that mean he could be taking them to her right now?

A powerful savage ghosts, with this many soldiers assisting her…not to mention the number of mortals Xie Lian would need to protect…

This could get very bad, very quickly.

They already have the Shan Yue fern, and a limited time window to return…they have to escape—soon.

Preferably before dawn. But how is that even possible?

Even now, Xie Lian can sense the curving slope to the steps they;re being led up now, and he knows where they’re going:

The Sinner’s Pit.

And already, he can sense the array that covers this place.

Filled with powerful magic, likely cast with one intention: to keep anyone thrown to the bottom from escaping.

Which already seems sinister enough—but Xie Lian can't see the look on A'Zhao's face.

The darkness in his eyes as he surveys the top of the pit—and the figure hanging. But, if Xie Lian could see her—

Well, the situation would be very, very different.

When they reach the top of the pit, San Lang is still holding his elbow, one hand at the small of his back—attentive in a way that makes Xie Lian smile, enjoying the familiarity.

But that peace lasts only for a moment, before a voice pierces through the darkness:

"BROTHERS!" Ke Mo roars, lifting his club over his head.

There's a responding roar that rings so loud, Xie Lian claps his hands over his ears with discomfort.

It must be the souls of the dead soldiers, but what Xie Lian finds the most daunting is the sheer number of them. There must be hundreds—maybe even thousands.

Just how many humans would have to be lured here on a regular basis to feed them all?

And how have the heavens not noticed anything wrong?

Xie Lian feels Tian Sheng trembling with fear beside him, and he turns his head to reassure the boy—

"Don't worry," he murmurs. "If anything happens—I'll be the first to charge ahead, alright?"

Which may have sounded comforting, in just about any other scenario—if not for Ke Mo's orders to his men—

"Go ahead and toss two of them down—we'll save the rest for questioning."

Xie Lian stiffens, gritting his teeth.

Well. So much for avoiding a fight, then.

Xie Lian had wanted to avoid that for as long as possible, but if it can't be helped...

His train of thought is broken, however, when he feels a rush of movement past him, with one of their group letting out a frenzied cry as he throws himself at the General.

And, of all people—

Xie Lian finds himself frozen with surprised to find that it's A'Zhao.

The quiet, almost overly cautious guide. Making what could only be generously described as a suicide charge, because he doesn't have a chance.

Xie Lian lunges forward, reaching; "Wait, don't—!"

But A'Zhao's momentum never stops. Ke Mo simply catches the mortal's arm, using it to throw him out and over the pit—only to disappear into darkness.

Xie Lian stops, his hand frozen in midair with shock—then grits his teeth, lowering it. Another unnecessary loss.

And just like he did on Mount Yu Jun, Xie Lian finds himself frustrated with the shackles on his body. Never during his banishment did he resent them—but now, as a god once more, he can't—

Xie Lian can't even protect people properly. And it vexes him.

If he just had his spiritual powers, even one thousandth of them, he could—

"Quick, throw another one over so we can get on with this," Ke Mo grouses, and this time, his men reach for the boy standing next to Xie Lian, Tian Sheng.

"...General, wait!" He cries, stepping forward.

Finally, that seems to get Ke Mo's attention, making him pause.

"...You speak our tongue?" He questions, rounding on Xie Lian. "Where are you from?"

"The Central Plains," Xie Lian replies immediately, drawing angry hisses. "Listen, we mean you no harm—"

"You think I care?"

Ke Mo is sneering now, shaking his head. "How did a Central Plainer come to know our language? Our tongue has been dead for some two centuries now."

Xie Lian falls silent, unsure of how to explain that away easily.

Part of him considers the idea of just throwing the 'I'm a God' card down on the table. It might work as an intimidation tactic. After all, they don't know that he has the shackles, and Xie Lian could probably get Ruoye to do something intimidating, but...

It's unlikely to work.

And now, as he contemplates, the dead begin to moan in the pit once more.

"...Looks like that whelp has already been devoured," Ke Mo mutters, irritated. "Go ahead and throw the child down."

Xie Lian steps in front of Tian Sheng before they can. "Please!"

He cries, throwing his arms out. "If you need to throw someone else down, throw me instead, alright?"

After all—the fall might turn Xie Lian into a bit of a pancake—but that's happened many times before, and he knows he can survive.

Ke Mo, however, is less agreeable.

"No way—I have questions I want to ask you!"

Xie Lian grits his teeth, trying to think of a way to stall until he can think of a plan— until something makes him stop.

San Lang slips/ his hand from Xie Lian's elbow to his wrist, using his grip to lift the god's hand up.

At first, the god suspects it must be to examine the sting on his wrist once more, and just when he opens his mouth to explain to the teenager that now is not the time—

San Lang places a kiss there, just over his knuckles—and Xie Lian's heart goes still in his chest.

Aching with a memory, so painfully familiar, it's hard to breathe.

"…San Lang?" He whispers, his voice unsteady. "What are you—?"

He stops, shivering when a second kiss is pressed against his hand, this time over his sting, long since healed.

"Don't be afraid, gege."

San Lang murmurs, his tone so gentle, it makes Xie Lian soften without meaning to, until—

"I'll be gone for just a minute."

Those words turn his skin to ice as San Lang lets him go, walking forward. "W…"

No.

"What are you…?" Xie Lian questions, his chest tensing.

"I said not to be afraid," San Lang reminds him, his tone light.

The god shakes his head, taking a step forward, "I'll stop being afraid when you get back over here," he mumbles, heart pounding in his chest.

Xie Lian can't explain it, but—

He is afraid.

He's lost countless people over the years. Seen misfortune come down upon people no matter where he goes. Grief is something that he's become almost numb to. He makes friendships, but he doesn't form deep attachments. Not anymore.

But he wants San Lang to get away from the edge.

Xie Lian doesn't—

He fights to keep his breathing, and his hands tremble.

Xie Lian doesn't know what he's doing, but he doesn't want San Lang over there, he—

"Don't worry," San Lang murmurs, glancing back at him with a smile.

And since his god cannot see—he doesn't need to hide the affection in his gaze, the palpable softness in his expression when he looks upon

Xie Lian's face. The mortals nearby might see—but they could never possibly understand.

"I'll always come back."

Something about that phrasing makes Xie Lian stop, laden with confusion.

...Always? What—what does that even—?

But then, he hears the sound of San Lang's footsteps near the edge—then nothing but a quiet rush of air.

Like he—

Like he just walked right off. "S..."

Thud .

He stumbles forward, arms reaching out frantically, but only finding empty air as he flees towards the edge, but—

No one is there.

Thud .

No.

No, no, no. He—he's—

The god trembles, and for the first time in centuries—

He's absolutely terrified.

"SAN LANG?!"

He trembles, peering blindly into the darkness below, seeing nothing but swirling, daunting resentful energy, and he—

Xie Lian's shoulders square as his jaw locks.

No. Not—

Not him. Not today.

He starts to throw himself over the edge without a second thought—
But something stops him. A grip on his arm, trying to pull back up.

"I'm...not DONE WITH YOU YET!" Ke Mo snarls—

But the god is having none of it, bracing his feet against the side of the wall as Ruoye wraps itself around Ke Mo's arm and throat, yanking.

And now, Xie Lian opens his eyes, his shackles burning up at Ke Mo through the dark, startling him as the god grabs onto Ruoye, yanking with as much strength was he can without ripping the bandage as he snarls—

"THEN WE CAN GO TOGETHER!"

But Ke Mo isn't the only ghost who sees his shackles at that moment.

And the other, who has been hanging limply over the center of the pit for countless years now, opens her eyes, her body snapping to sharp attention.

Finally, she leaps into action.

There's a rush of air as she sweeps over to the wall, knocking several soldiers over the side in one swoop, attacking with a fury.

"HEY—!"

"IT'S THAT BITCH AGAIN!"

But the chaos is just enough to make Ke Mo lose his grip as Xie Lian yanks—And they both tumble into darkness.

They separate quickly, with Ke Mo falling further faster due to his greater weight. Xie Lian sends Ruoye up, assuming the magical tool can latch onto something up top to slow his fall, then bring them both back up when he finds San Lang, but—

Ruoye doesn't make it.

It slams against an invisible barrier, illuminating the spiritual energy upon contact—

BOOM!

But it has no effect, sending the spiritual tool fleeing back to Xie Lian's neck as he falls.

Unable to catch himself, now—which makes for a nasty fall.

A fall.

He’s always falling

He never used to. Xie Lian used to be the one that was catching people. Lifting them up. Be it his friends, or fierce little orphans that he hardly knew.

But then, he fell from Heaven.

He fell far, and he fell hard.

Since then, Xie Lian never stopped falling.

Small trips and falls. Other times off of bridges. Or cliffs.

There used to be someone that would catch him—but since then, Xie Lian has become an expert at taking a good fall. Learning how to brace for impact. Never panicking.

And he supposes, in the end, it might be fate. After all, he loved the boy who fell first.

And now, as he stares up at the dark mass of cursed energy overhead, he wonders how afraid that little boy must have been, falling from the sky like a star.

Wonders what Hong’er thought about, in that moment. If he had many regrets.

He thought those were his last moments. Xie Lian knows these won’t be his. He’s just bracing himself for the pain of the landing—and what he’ll find when he does.

Because he’s used to this. He’s done this before. He’ll survive it. He always does.

But then—

Clink!

Xie Lian isn’t falling.

He doesn’t hit the ground. His body doesn’t smash in on itself, every bone shattering while he waits for the long, arduous process of stitching himself back together.

It doesn’t hurt. It—he— Someone is holding him. Someone…

Someone caught him.

The Sinner's Pit

Chapter Summary

> "Are you alright?"
>
> "I'm fine," the figure replies—and—if he's answering to that name — It must be San Lang, but his voice is noticeably different.
>
> Deeper, with the sort of tone that rumbles in Xie Lian's bones, almost familiar., The god swallows, his throat dry.
>
> "Could you...put me down, please?"
>
> He might have phrased it like a polite request, but—
>
> "No."
>
> The prince didn't actually expect San Lang to refuse him.
>
> "...Why not?" He questions, contemplating protesting but—
>
> "It's dirty."

Chapter Notes

> You can find me on twitter and keep up with current updates of the story HERE
>
> CONTENT WARNING: this chapter contains discussions of discrimination, as well as a disassociation episode. Proceed with caution.

There's one arm hooked under his knees, the other wrapping around his back— cradling him against someone's chest, instantly arresting the incredible force with which Xie Lian was plunging to the earth.

The sudden stop leaves him slightly dizzy, his head spinning.

When they land, it's so light, like the strength of the arms around him have rendered Xie Lian utterly weightless, and—

Xie Lian can't actually remember the last time someone carried him like this, cradling him in their arms. Maybe when he was a child.

The closest he's come since was probably when someone was dragging him by his ankles to bury him after they ‘murdered’ him. Or maybe Lian Qianqiu carrying him to his grave, but—

This feels different—

Safe.

“…San Lang?” He whispers cautiously, reaching up for him.

He feels at the chest and shoulders of the one holding him with his palm, and—it doesn’t feel like San Lang.

The teenager is taller than him, but slender. This figure—

He dwarfs Xie Lian. No, when he’s holding him like this—his arms practically envelop the prince.

His fingertips trail up the ice cold column of the figure’s throat, finding the hard protrusion of an Adam’s apple, and—

Xie Lian flushes, pulling his hand back, realizing what he's doing.

“…” He swallows dryly, his cheeks warm. “Are you alright?”

“I’m fine,” the figure replies—and—if he’s answering to that name— It must be San Lang, but his voice is noticeably different.

Deeper, with the sort of tone that rumbles in Xie Lian’s bones, almost familiar., The god swallows, his throat dry.

“Could you…put me down, please?”

He might have phrased it like a polite request, but—

“No.”

The prince didn’t actually expect San Lang to refuse him.

“…Why not?” He questions, contemplating protesting but—

“It’s dirty.”

His responses are unusually short, clipped—but even stranger is the fact that…

Well, Xie Lian spent a significant portion of his eight centuries wandering sleeping in alleyways and ditches. The idea that any surface could be too ‘dirty’ for him feels almost ludicrous, and yet...

San Lang squeezes him tighter all of the sudden, bouncing the prince in his arms until he’s tipped closer, made to almost cling to San Lang’s chest in a way that makes his cheeks heat up with embarrassment.

Xie Lian decides not to protest for now.

Maybe it would be proper of him to do so, but...

There’s a voice in his head whispering to behave himself. Which is silly. He’s the older one, if anything, San Lang is the one being badly behaved, but—

“MY BROTHERS!” Ke Mo’s voice cuts through the darkness, raging. “WHO KILLED YOU?!”

Xie Lian stiffens in San Lang’s arms, his eyebrows raising.

It’s only been a few minutes since he first heard those voices— thousands of them— screaming from the bottom of the pit.

What could have killed them so quickly?

San Lang squeezes him tighter all of the sudden, and then, Xie Lian realizes—

He can’t hear San Lang’s heartbeat anymore. It was always calm and steady before, no matter the situation—but now? It’s silent.

His breathing, too.

“IT WAS YOU, WASN’T IT?!”

Xie Lian tenses when he feels Ke Mo running towards them, fingers tightening in the front of the man’s robes, “San Lang, careful—!”

But he only receives a soft chuckle in response, one hand rubbing the god’s arm soothingly.

“It’s nothing to worry about, trust me.”

The way he says it—it doesn’t even sound like bragging—it’s more like he’s almost bored, stating the obvious. Like Ke Mo is an irritating distraction, and the person holding him would much rather devote all of his attention to Xie Lian.

Just as Ke Mo gets close enough to land an attack, San Lang spins to the side, allowing the ghost to stumble past him, the bells on his boots jingling softly as he does so.

Clink!

"You..." Xie Lian tries again, embarrassed by the way he sounds almost shy.

"You could really let me down now, I..."

He feels San Lang shake his head, bending his chin to whisper next to Xie Lian's ear—

"I've got you."

His breath is cold, but that has nothing to do with the shiver that runs down the god's spine, goosebumps raising on his arms.

"Just sit back and relax," he murmurs, like he's offering to do some simple household chore like cleaning the dishes, sweeping the floor, or, well—

Taking out the trash.

He bounces Xie Lian in his arms again—and now, the god realizes it isn't because he can't keep him steady.

No—it's because he wants Xie Lian to cling onto him even tighter as a result.

"..." The prince allows his cheek to rest against his companion's shoulder, another shiver running through him.

Shameless.

Ke Mo fights somewhat like a raging bull, barreling forward with brute force.

San Lang—he seems to treat fighting like something similar to a dance. In this case, anyway.

He dodges most of the attacks with ease, never jostling Xie Lian in his arms when he does so—and when he does decide to attack Ke Mo, he doesn't even need to lift a finger.

In this case, he uses one foot, lifting it up to kick Ke Mo squarely in the chest—still not jostling Xie Lian as he does so—and when it makes contact, it sends the ghost flying until he violently slams against the opposite side of the Sinner's Pit, making the walls rumble.

BOOM!

Xie Lian jumps, whipping his head in the direction of the sound before mumbling—

"…You can't keep holding me forever, you know." He feels like he has to try, just a little bit—because if he doesn't—

Then, he'd have to focus on how pleasant it feels, being held.

San Lang's reply is characteristically cocky, except—

"Why not?"

He sounds completely serious about the question. Like, if the option was available to him, he would be willing and able to hold Xie Lian in his arms indefinitely.

It's not a terrible thought.

Before Xie Lian can say anything more, Ke Mo chooses that moment to pull himself out of the rubble, snarling—

"YOU SLAUGHTERED THEM ALL! I'LL—I'LL RIP YOU TO SHREDS!" This time, he doesn't even make it close.

CLANG!

San Lang doesn't move, but…

Xie Lian can hear the clash of blades.

One of them is simple mortal steel, not bad, but not particularly special either—Ke Mo's club.

But the other…

Xie Lian has never heard a kind of metal that makes that sound before.

CLANG!

CLANG!

CLANG!

At one point, when he hears Ke Mo get just a little bit too close, Ruoye strikes out as well—knocking the ghost down to the ground once more.

"...Two against one," he snarls, pounding his fists against the earth. "COWARDS!" San Lang snorts.

"One or two—it doesn't change the outcome for you," he sneers, and there's that clash of steel once more.

"C-CENTRAL PLAINER!" Ke Mo snarls, dropping to his hands and knees, "S-SHE'S THE ONE MAKING YOU DO THIS, RIGHT? THAT...EVIL FUCKING BITCH!"

Xie Lian raises an eyebrow.

That certainly does make him wonder—but there's something more pressing at the moment.

"...San Lang?" He questions, assuming now is as good of a time as any. They aren't moving, and San Lang seems to be taking a hands off fighting method at the moment.

"Yes?"

"Did you..." Xie Lian stops, trying to find a way to phrase the question delicately—but he can't. "Those soldiers—did you kill them all?"

San Lang only misses a beat before replying—and his answer is bone chilling in it's calmness.

"Yes."

The god grows still, taking that in.

It's one thing, to suspect that San Lang might be more than he lets on.

It's another, to process the scope of power it would take to wipe out so many ghosts instantly.

"..." Xie Lian takes a shaky breath, "Make sure you don't kill Ke Mo for now, I have questions to ask him."

The larger man hums in acknowledgement. "If I wanted him dead, he would have been by the first blow."

Normally, anyone would have been cowed enough by that statement, but Xie Lian— he's never been just anyone.

San Lang pauses, surprised when he feels Xie Lian tug repeatedly at the front of his robes, like he wants him to lean down—which he complies to, bending until they're eye level, and—

Xie Lian turns stern, letting him go and crossing his arms.

"Don't do that again!"

San Lang's eye widens slightly with shock as he listens, eyeing the god as he—

"You can't just jump down any hole you come across! It's dangerous! I couldn't even stop you, and I didn't know what to do..."

...Scolds him.

San Lang doesn't seem accustomed to being scolded.

He's silent for a moment, like he doesn't even know how to respond—and when he does, it doesn't even directly address the scolding itself—

"Aren't you going to ask me something else?"

Xie Lian pauses, his brow creased. "Like what?"

San Lang is slightly tense against him.

"If I'm human or not."

That makes the prince pause for just a moment, his lips parted, arms still crossed, and finally—

"Well, that doesn't really matter, does it? I don't need to ask."

San Lang stares down at him with wide eyed wonder, slowly tilting his head.

"...You don't?"

Xie Lian shakes his head. "Whether you have a heartbeat or not—that doesn't change your actions since we met."

Which have been undoubtedly kind, thoughtful, and generous.

"If I make a friend—I care about their actions, and if we get along." Xie Lian shrugs. "Whether or not they're living or dead is immaterial."

It certainly isn't to most of the world, particularly the living, but...

San Lang lets out a soft laugh, his embrace around Xie Lian perfectly firm.

"I suppose you're right, he murmurs."

The god nods firmly—like he knows.

"We can discuss the rest later, but for now—can you put me down?" This time, San Lang doesn't immediately deny him. "One moment."

He starts walking—and with him comes that gentle jingling sound of the bells on his boots.

CLINK!

CLINK!

CLINK!

Xie Lian couldn't tell you why, but...there's something about that sound that brings him the most pleasant form of heartache. Something familiar—something you feel so much affection or, that it hurts—but he has no idea why.

And now, leaning his cheek against San Lang's chest, he cracks his eyes open, peeking into what the god knows should be a pit of darkness, but—

All he sees is crimson.

Xie Lian doesn't say a word, but he smiles faintly. He thought so.

He closes his eyes again as San Lang comes to a halt, bending over slightly so the god can slip one leg out of his grasp, probing at the ground with his toe before he slowly eases himself down.

He's a little woozy once he's solidly on his feet, his shackles aching, but...

Xie Lian already knew that was probably going to be the case when he jumped into this pit—and he's used to the feeling now, even if it's uncomfortable.

“Thank you, San Lang,” he murmurs, turning his attention to the other ghost in the pit with them. “General Ke Mo!” He calls.

The general snarls in response, writhing on the ground—and when Xie Lian nods in San Lang’s direction, he allows the dead man to struggle to his feet.

“The ‘she’ you referred to before…” Xie Lian trails off. “Who were you speaking about?”

“Don’t pretend you don’t know!” Ke Mo glares, blood streaming down his chin. “THAT DEMONIC CULTIVATOR SENT YOU HERE!”

Could he mean one of the women that they saw before?”

“You mean the High Priestess of the Crescent Moon?” Xie Lian questions. “I thought you were loyal to her.”

The mere mention of past loyalties make Ke Mo flinch, his eyes burning with rage. “NEVER!” He snarls, pounding his fists against the ground. “I’ll NEVER be loyal to that traitor. NOT EVER AGAIN!”

“You…” Xie Lian stops, his eyebrows raising even higher.

If the soldiers aren’t in league with the Imperial Preceptor, then…

“I DON’T CARE HOW MANY TIMES I HAVE TO HANG HER!” Ke Mo snarls, slamming his fists down over and over again. “I’LL DO IT FOR ALL ETERNITY IF I HAVE TO!”

Xie Lian freezes, his expression contorting.

“You…You’ve been hanging her?” He questions, his voice quiet. “That’s the person who was hanging above the pit?”

“Who else?!” Ke Mo glances back and forth between the two men in the dark, glaring furiously. “Don’t play STUPID!”

For a moment, Xie Lian can’t speak.

It’s funny, because in what comes close to being a millennia—you can really convince yourself that you’ve changed.

There are moments when Xie Lian feels so far removed from the angry, broken child that he used to be.

But now, he feels a skin's breadth away from him.

The moment he heard Ke Mo say, ‘I’ll hang her,’ regardless of what the young woman had done, or what she deserved—

In that moment, he ceased being a human being to Xie Lian. Twisted into something monstrous.

And if he hadn’t changed, he would have ordered San Lang to hurt him.

It crosses his mind even now, but—

The god grits his teeth, his hands balled into fists.

He won’t.

He won’t use people again—not the way that he used Wu Ming.

He promised.

Xie Lian takes a deep breath. “I wanted to ask—”

“YOU THINK I CARE?!” Ke Mo roars. “AFTER WHAT YOU TWO DID TO MY SOLDIERS, YOU THINK I’LL TALK TO YOU?”

“You had better,” San Lang replies calmly, his arms crossed as he stares the general down, one eye flashing in the darkness. “For the sake of your men, anyway.”

Ke Mo stops, eyes narrowed. “What...What are you talking about?”

San Lang smirks, and when he steps into the moonlight and speaks again—his voice is more familiar. The way it was before—light and youthful. “Isn’t it the belief of the Crescent Moon that the condition of a corpse determines its next life?”

Ke Mo stiffens with horror, realizing what the ghost intends—and it almost seems too horrible for the General to comprehend. “You...you wouldn’t...”

San Lang tilts his head, and while he doesn’t lift a finger—the savage ghost before him still stumbles one step back. “Try me.”

The General trembles, then stumbles forward, like he might attack, but— He falls to his knees instead, hanging his head low.

His men have suffered enough, over the centuries.

He can’t bear to make them suffer one final indignity.

“...Ask your questions,” he spits out.

“The Imperial Preceptor,” Xie Lian murmurs. “Tell me more about her.”

Ke Mo’s eyes narrow, burning with pure hatred. “There isn’t much to say,” he mutters, his words trembling with anger. “Other than the fact that she hated the Crescent Moon Kingdom.”

“...Hated?” Xie Lian questions, wondering how that could be.

After all—they gave her so much power.

“Wasn’t she one of you?”

“...Not exactly,” Ke Mo mutters, and his words—they make Xie Lian’s jaw lock. “She was a half breed. Her mother Crescent Moon, and her father Yong’an.”

Xie Lian doesn’t say a word, his hands balling into fists as Ke Mo tells the story. The first half of it painfully familiar.

A peasant girl—one whose mother died of a broken heart after their father left them, leaving her to scavenge on the streets at a young age.

Constantly ostracized by both countries, but particularly the larger, well-fed children of the Crescent Moon, despised for her ‘tainted’ blood.

Until she learned magic, that is.

Then, she was cautiously allowed to serve in the Royal Court—even if it was initially out of fear.

The snakes that the Crescent Moon feared became one of their greatest weapons under her hands. But initially—no one trusted her, and she was kept in a lower position as a result.

Until Ke Mo.

She saved dozens of his men during a storm in the desert, leading to a cave collapse.

Even the ones who didn’t survive, she showed respect—burying their bodies before they had time to rot in the desert sun.

From then on, Ke Mo was her first and strongest supporter. He convinced the King to trust her. The soldiers. And eventually, the people.

She was revered.

She was trusted.

But even now, without Ke Mo ever saying one way or the other—Xie Lian suspects that she was not beloved.

Still, Ke Mo supported her, put her forward over and over again, until she was elevated to the role of Imperial Preceptor of the Crescent Moon Kingdom.

And it was then, once she had it all—the love and acceptance she likely always craved on some level, that she turned against them.

When their enemies knocked on the door, she threw it wide open. She gave them the key with a smile.

“So,” He hisses, his eyes filled with hate. “I hung her.”

Xie Lian doesn’t speak, his stomach twisting with nausea.

“And every time she has tried to escape—I have tracked her down, and I have hung her again, and again, and again—and I’ll do it until we’re BOTH gone from this world!”

But if that’s the case...

“...If she’s been hanging, she couldn’t have been luring people down here,” Xie Lian mutters, “but if that’s true—has it been you, Ke Mo?”

“What?” The Ghost glares. “The humans come here on their own! When they do, we do as we please—it’s probably that TRAITOR’S curse!”

“Funny you should call her a traitor,” San Lang pipes up, moving slightly in front of Xie Lian now, crossing his arms. “It’s your own stupidity that got you in this situation.”

Ke Mo trembles, his eyes burning with rage. “You...dare call my people STUPID?!”

“No,” San Lang holds up a finger, “I called you stupid. Unlike you and the people around you, I don’t paint an entire civilization of mortals with the same brush."

"How could you judge?!" Ke Mo snarls. "You weren't there, wars—they bring out a different side to humans!"

San Lang's tone is cold, catching Xie Lian's attention, "I was a soldier, once."

He—?

"But I was never foolish enough to think a child would forget that my people brutalized her and treated her like an animal just because they gave her recognition." He sneers.

"Now you expect pity? What, because you placed your trust in and gave infinite authority to a child who grew up under your prejudice, and expected that to work out well for you?" San Lang shakes his head with a bitter laugh.

"I never ASKED for pity!" Ke Mo snarls. "I killed her MYSELF! I took RESPONSIBILITY!"

Xie Lian sighs, because that isn't even close to addressing San Lang's point, but he doubts Ke Mo would be willing to see it, regardless.

But then there's a whoosh of air, and all three fall silent, looking up. Someone else jumped.

"You want to talk about atrocities?!" Ke Mo snarls, pointing towards the falling figure. "SHE tormented my men, even after death! Threw them down into this pit to suffer, then created a formation so they couldn't escape!"

Admittedly, it sounds cruel, but...

"What choice did we have, but to take the travelers who passed through the city?! We had to feed the men—and to fertilize the Shan Yue fern to protect ourselves from those filthy snakes!"

Even in death, Ke Mo is afraid of them—which is interesting.

If he was still frightened of them, it stands to reason that the Imperial Preceptor should have been able to protect herself with them before she died.

So, why didn't she?

Instead of landing hard on the ground, like the others—the Imperial Preceptor hovers a few meters above.

Long, dark hair swirls around her like smoke, half of it fallen out of a loose braid. Her skin is fairer now, in death—but still maintains the warmer undertones that she held in life.

Her robes are hooded, made from torn silk of black, red, and silver threads.

While her clothes were once fine, and her earrings are made from expensive gems and ore—her feet remain bare, aside from one silver anklet on her right foot, bells tinkling gently in the wind.

Clink!

Amethyst eyes burn the same shade as the flame in her palm, flickering.

She was clearly a beautiful young woman in life—and now, in death, it gives her premature, cruel end a sense of tragedy.

“Ke Mo,” she murmurs, her voice far more delicate than her aura would imply, revealing her youth, “What happened?”

The General trembles upon seeing her, seething.

“You dare ask me that?!” He snarls. “After you threw those men down here?!”

“Are...” She lands on the ground lightly, the bells at her ankles clinking once again, “Are all of them dead?”

“What does it look like?! Of course they are!”

She tilts her head back, her hood falling down over her shoulders, the moonlight illuminating her face.

“...” The Imperial Preceptor stares up at that moon, bearing down upon them in the Crescent phase on this night, her eyes sliding shut. “Good,” She murmurs.

“Good?!” Ke Mo glares, “Are you finally satisfied now that you finally got what you wanted?! Is your revenge complete, you EVIL BITCH?!”

She doesn’t flinch, her demeanor remaining calm. “I simply mean that we’re all free now, Ke Mo,” she lowers her chin. “It’s over.”

Finally, she turns her attention to the other figures in the pit, flame still in hand as her gaze finds San Lang. “Was it you who killed them?”

Xie Lian opens his mouth to try to explain it away, but San Lang replies first: “I did.”

Calm, completely unabashed.

Now, Xie Lian speaks up, rubbing the side of his neck awkwardly, “He did it to protect me. I’m a Heavenly Official, here to investigate the disappearances in the Crescent Moon Pass, and San Lang here is my...friend.”

The Imperial Preceptor arches an eyebrow.

“The Heavens have never bothered to intervene here before,” She murmurs. “I didn’t think they cared.”

After all, she had no reason to, but there’s nothing bitter about her tone now—it’s simply tired, matter of fact.

Odd, for a resentful spirit not to despise the Heavens.

She must have some sort of wrath—if she didn’t, she wouldn’t have lingered on this long. Even if tormenting the Crescent Moon soldiers was her only purpose, she would simply disperse now, having no motive left to carry on.

Humans need certain things to carry on.

The air in their lungs. The blood in their veins. Food, water, sunlight.

Ghosts are no different—but for them, it’s resentment, desire, and need.

For her to be so strong, and to have survived for so long—there must be something driving her. Something powerful.

Still, as she grows closer, and the flame in her hand illuminates San Lang’s face, she stops—staring up into his eyes.

Xie Lian can’t see the recognition in her gaze, which suddenly becomes overwhelmed by a new emotion—shame.

Without saying a word, she drops to the ground.

On her hands and knees, not seeming to care that the blood of her countrymen stains her hands, feet, and knees, bowing as low as possible in complete silence.

“What are you doing?!” Ke Mo snarls, “Are you THANKING that bastard?!”

Xie Lian frowns, unable to tell exactly what’s going on—but San Lang steps further in front of him, his stance clearly protective as he surveys the young woman, quirking an eyebrow.

She doesn’t reply to Ke Mo, keeping her eyes fixed on the ground—Clearly waiting for something.

“...You should get up,” San Lang murmurs, holding out one hand. “We still have business.”

She doesn’t move at first, eyes opening wide, her shoulders trembling slightly as she looks up at him.

The expression of the youth staring down at her is unreadable, and her lips quiver.

Not out of fear—no. The emotion in her gaze is something entirely different.

Slowly, she takes San Lang’s hand, pulling herself to her feet.

“...Would you like to get out of here?” She whispers, glancing at Xie Lian—who, after a moment, nods.

“We would, but that array is making it impossible,” the god explains—to which the Imperial Preceptor immediately nods, forming a small hand sign before raising her palm to the sky, and—

Just like that, Xie Lian feels a weight lift, like the shackles on his body have loosened. Was it...really that easy?

“You’re free to go now,” the young girl murmurs, her voice so...benign. Like she genuinely means no harm.

And if this is the Imperial Preceptor—just who were those women from before? Before Xie Lian can think much more on the matter, a voice calls out—

“Is anybody down there?” Then, after not waiting particularly long—“If nobody answers, I’m leaving.”

Fu Yao?

Xie Lian lets out a sigh of relief, “FU YAO! I’m here!”

“Your highness? Who else is with you?”

“Uh...” Xie Lian frowns, “You ought to just come down and see yourself.”

“...” From the top of the pit, Fu Yao shrugs, not seeing a flaw in that logic—before he jumps down, he tosses down an array of flames to illuminate the pit, which is certainly helpful to just about everyone else, excluding...well, Xie Lian.

The warmth is nice, though.

When he lands, Xie Lian starts explaining the situation to him as best as he can before asking—

“What about the man who was bitten? Surely you weren’t able to take him out of the desert.”

“No,” Fu Yao shakes his head.

“I made an array for him and a few mortals who stayed behind.”

“...They could be in danger,” Xie Lian sighs, shaking his head.

“If they are, it’s because they disobeyed and left the array,” Fu Yao shrugs. “That won’t be on my hands, anyway—”

He glances over to the far corner of the array, raising an eyebrow, “Should we be stopping them?”

Ke Mo has the Imperial Preceptor by the throat, pressing her down into the ground, slamming her head over and over again.

“WHY DON’T YOU CALL ONE OF YOUR SNAKES?!” He snarls.

All around them now, the firelight exposes mounds of broken bodies. Countless slaughtered soldiers, the Sinner’s Pit suddenly turned into the world’s largest mass grave.

“Ke Mo...” The girl whimpers, pulling at the hand around her throat weakly, but not fighting back. “I can’t...”

“YOU BETTER!” Ke Mo glares, punching her over and over again, until even Fu Yao winces.

There's something obscene about the sight of a man that size pummeling a little girl, magical powers or not.

"IF YOU DON'T, WE'RE BOTH GOING TO DIE HERE! IS THAT WHAT YOU WANT?!"

Ke Mo glares down at her, struggling to see through the rage and the sadness, tears flooding down his cheeks.

"THAT BOY FELT SORRY FOR YOU, DID YOU HEAR?! NOW—WE'RE ALL GONE, AND I'M THE MONSTER! ARE YOU HAPPY?!" He roars, "CALL YOUR SNAKES! SHOW THEM YOU AREN'T THE VICTIM HERE!"

"Ke Mo…" She tries again, blood shining against the whites of her teeth, eyes half lidded, "The snakes…they won't….listen to me anymore…"

"…Someone should," Xie Lian agrees—and clearly, from San Lang's stiff posture and a glare the god can practically feel, he's about to.

But given the violence Xie Lian has witnessed the young man to be capable of— allowing him to attack Ke Mo while he's angry doesn't seem like a good idea.

So, the god interferes on his own, flashing across the pit in a single step, grabbing Ke Mo by the arm, his grip like iron.

He only uses one hand—and yet, even a man of Ke Mo's size can't move, veins bulging from his forehead as he struggles.

"That's enough," Xie Lian mutters, his voice stern, but—

But then he stops, feeling a small hand land on top of his, squeezing softly, fingers trembling.

The words she whispers—in the space of a moment, they make an ancient, lonely mind screech to a halt.

"G…General Hua?" She whispers.

Xie Lian's eyes snap open without meaning to, knowing he wouldn't be able to see the person before him anyway, and yet—

The aura before him is a soft shade of lilac, burning slightly brighter in the core. Stronger than the other ghosts nearby, though not the sea of crimson that he saw before.

And that voice—it's older, but—

"...It's you?" He replies, his voice trembling. From joy and sadness.

She smiles through the blood and the bruises, her eyes shining as she looks up at the god's face, her voice cracking as she lifts her palm, pressing it against Xie Lian's cheek.

"Y...you're okay," She croaks, tears rolling down her cheeks, dripping from her chin. "I...I'm glad."

Xie Lian wishes he could cry now. He wants to. There's an unspeakable ache in his chest, filled with the friction of different emotions crashing together, and he wants to release it—but he...

He can't cry as easily now, as he did before.

"Banyue..." He whispers, sorrowful.

The tears flow faster, and her voice cracks.

"Y-You remember me?" She whimpers.

"...Oh, little one," Xie Lian sighs, covering her hand with his own against his cheek. "Of course I do."

Ke Mo makes the mistake, in that moment, of reminding Xie Lian of his presence. "WHAT'S—?!"

The god's eyes snap in his direction, cursed shackles burning in his direction.

A little girl of mixed race being tormented by the Crescent Moon is an unpleasantly common story. He didn't realize, when she was being beaten, who she was.

But now that he does, he realizes—

'Who is that person hanging there?'

He—

Xie Lian's hands begin to tremble, remembering the tiny, impossibly small little girl who used to fit so easily in the cradle of his arms. Who would bury herself inside of his cloak to stay warm.

How little she asked for.

How frightened she was of strangers. The way she would give her own meager scraps to kittens on the street, until Xie Lian was subsidizing a small colony of strays.

And Ke Mo— He hung her. He—He—

CRACK!

It takes a moment for anyone to recognize the sound.

When Ke Mo looks down, he finds his arm limp, bent at an impossible angle, bones protruding from the skin—but his body is still in too much shock to process it. “YOU —?!”

Xie Lian clutches the young ghost to his chest, trembling from head to toe. From rage, grief, and fear.

San Lang isn’t far away, his expression dark now, starting to put it together, but Fu Yao—

He stands on the other side of the pit, his expression a mask of confusion. What was that reaction?

Even when Xie Lian was as angry at him as he’d ever been, he…Never looked like that.

“Ruoye,” Xie Lian snarls, his voice guttural, using a tone that makes San Lang’s eyes widen slightly with recognition.

Let him see.

“Hang him.”

Let him see how it feels, to be a broken, helpless thing, dangling overhead.

Let him see.

The bandage hesitates for a moment.

Just a brief moment, before it springs into action. And even if Ke Mo is a strong spirit, well—

This is what Ruoye does best.

It flings itself around the ghost's throat, hauling him up, up, up, until he's dangling over the Sinner's Pit—from the same pole as she had been before.

"General..." Banyue rasps, wincing from the pain in her jaw. "D-don't kill him..."

"He won't die," Xie Lian murmurs, his tone cold, distant. "I didn't order that."

She's quiet, staring up at the god—but he isn't looking at her.

He's glaring up at Ke Mo, cursed shackles gleaming.

Let him see.

Xie Lian can't stop shaking, to the point where it feels like there's pressure on his temples, his teeth starting to chatter.

Who does he think he is, doing that to anyone? What makes him think he has the right?

Let him see.

Xie Lian won't let him.

He won't let him get off so—

There's a weight on his shoulder that makes him jump—that of a hand. Warm, familiar, paired with a voice in his ear.

"Gege," Xie Lian's eyes widen blearily, hurt and confused. "Come back."

"..."

The god hangs his head, lips trembling.

"...I'm sorry," he mumbles, his voice faint. "I don't know what came over me."

It's a blatant lie—of course, he knows. He's far too disoriented to contemplate the fact that San Lang was able to recognize his disassociation and pull him back so easily, but...

Xie Lian knows exactly what happened, just now—and to have it happen in front of so many people leaves him feeling raw, ashamed, and exposed.

"...Yeah, neither do I." Fu Yao mutters, walking closer—and while his words are blunt, his tone isn't. It's just—

Concerned.

"What the fuck was that?"

"..." Xie Lian swallows thickly, hugging Banyue a little tighter. The teenager doesn't protest, leaning against him, but Fu Yao isn't so docile.

"Your highness—"

"He just said he doesn't know," San Lang cuts him off, his tone sharp edged. "Let it go."

"Who do you think you are to tell me—?!"

"It's alright," Xie Lian cuts them both off, his voice still a little faint. "I just—" He swallows dryly. "You weren't here before when I explained it to San Lang and Nan Feng, but...hanging bodies upset me," he mumbles. "I had a bad experience."

'Upset' being the understatement of the century.

"...That's a pretty delayed reaction," Fu Yao mutters, watching him warily.

San Lang's eyes flash, and Xie Lian just sighs, pressing a hand against his shoulder to make him back off.

"It's worse when it's someone I know," he explains, struggling not to allow himself to remember—knowing that he's too fragile for it at the moment. "I had...a very bad experience. Alright?"

Describing it as 'very bad' seems to be enough to make the deputy god get the point. "...Alright," he agrees, holding his hands up in a peace gesture. "Alright, fine."

The prince lets out a shaky breath, sinking to the ground with Banyue in his arms, cradling her close.

(The ground here is mysteriously clear, for some reason.)

She isn't quite so small anymore, but Xie Lian doesn't care, pressing his face against her hair. "Banyue..." He mutters, "What happened to you? How did you end up here?"

